It happened also that a bafe brother of the Emperours called DAVZMAR, found himselfe grieved, for that the Emperour had not giuen him the gouernment of the Province of Saxony, with the title of Earle, which was OTHO's patrimony by the death of Earle SIGISBERT, lately deceased. In like manner the sonnes of ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere, who then died, were discontent, for that OTHO had giuen that estate to his elder brother BARTOLD; and they would not accept of the Earldome, and of that part which the Emperour had assigned them: wherefore vpon this occasion EBERARD made a league with them, and with SIGISBERT Duke of Lorraine, notwithstanding that he had married one of the Emperours sisters; and contending with HENRY the Emperours second brother, who was a very young man, about the boundes of certaine lands, he besieged him in a citie, and very shamefully took him prisoner. And his bafe brother DAVZMAR, with the aide of the said EBERARD, at the same time, took a citie in Saxony, and lacked it, thinking to haue gotten the Earldome, which he demanded perforce as his right. The Emperour vnderstanding thereof, marched against his brother; and entering the citie by assault, DAVZMAR was slaine in a Church, whither he was brought by EBERARD the motor of this treason. And after other practices, EBERARD agreed with HENRY the Emperours brother, whom he held prisoner, to release and serue him, saying that the Empire appertained vnto him, for that his father begat him after that he was Emperour, and OTHO before. HENRY moued with a desire to raigne (a thing which leadeth men to greater mischiefes) refused to rebel against his elder brother and soueraigne Lord; whereto SIGISBERT Duke of Lorraine yielded ayde and assistance; who was a mighty Prince, and had the sister of the Emperour and of HENRY to wife. And as the report went, that HENRY should be Emperour, each of them desired to haue the Empire for himselfe, and so practised the same in secret, for amongst the wicked there is neither faith nor truth: But they all agreed together to ruine OTHO; and that he being removed, each of them thought to haue been a soueraigne Lord; and to haue had the Empire. The power and Army which they leui'd was so great, as they took many townes: and as it vually hapneth, fame and feare advanced the effect, so as OTHO was in great danger. Nevertheless the other Princes of Germany did well and faithfully helpe and assist him; and he, with the courage and diligence of a good Capitaine, leui'd his forces, and marched against his enemies; and being come with his armie to the banks of the riuer of Rhine, and part thereof being transported in boates to goe against his enemies, which were encamped on the other side, whereof his brother HENRY was Generall; his enemies hauing marched in great haste, were gotten thither before them, and charged his men in such manner, as they were likely to haue been ouerthrowne in the Emperours fight, who had not yett past the Riuer: but in the end, the Emperour making his prayers to God, obtained the victory, and his brother being wounded, saved himselfe by flight. After this victory, the same went, that the Emperours brother HENRY was dead: which brought the Emperour this profit, that the most of the Cities which held for his brother, yielded to him: which when HENRY vnderstood, he gat him into the City of Merseburgh, which is in Saxony, and fortified the same in the best manner he could: and the Emperour followed and besieged him, and brought him to that extremity, that he was driven to giue vnto the City vpon condition, that he should suffer him freely to depart whither he would. After which he went into Lorraine, and renewed the war, joining with Duke SIGISBERT, and with Duke EBERARD, his kinsmen: who with greater fury and power then at the first, invaded the Emperours Countries, who then was busied in besieging a towne of Duke EBERARDS, called Sissac, before which he lay longer then was fit he should haue done, through the deceit and treachery of the Archbishop of Mentz, who secretly was a traitor to him, and had intelligence with his enemies, to the end that HENRY and his confederates should in the meane time make themselves Lords and Masters of the Country: which when HERMAN Duke of Swedia, and his brother OTHO, and CONRAD called the wife, and other great Lords and Knights (which were the Emperours subjects) vnderstood, they ioined all their forces together, and by his direction, with an Army fought their enemies; and meeting them, fought a terrible battell: But the Imperiallists had the victory, and EBERARD, the ring-leader, was slaine fighting, and SIGISBERT D. of Lorraine, was drowned in the Rhine, neer the battell: yet some say that he died in another batell, and that HENRY the Emperours brother was not that day in the field, but made war elsewhere. In this ouerthrow were slaine, and taken prisoners, all those which held with these Lords; amongst which were many Earles, and great Personages.

The Emperours victory against his brother, Henry.

Duke Eberard slaine fighting, or Duke Sigisbert drowned in the Rhine.

OO

This

Henry fled into France.

This great victory being obtained by OTHO's faithfull friends and subjects, the city which he besieged yielded, and he prepared himself presently to pursue his brother HENRY, who fled into France. And then the Emperor went into Lorraine, where his sister yielded herself into his power; together with her son: where having let good order in that estate, and made peace with LEUVS King of France, and recovered certain Towns which he formerly had lost, hee returned into Germany. In this manner he wholly subdued and tamed all the Rebels; and in the end his brother HENRY humbly yielded himself into his power: and hee forgave him, and gave him lands and revenues for his maintenance, and likewise pardoned the other Barles and great men which had bin his adversaries, together with FRADERICK Archbishop of Mainz, who was a Traitor vnto him, and was now in his power: but in the end he pardoned him also. And forasmuch as his brother HENRY continued loyall vnto him, he made him Duke of Bauiere after the death of BERTOLD, who died without issue male; whose brethren lost their right to that estate, for that they had conspired against the Emperor; and HENRY had his legitimate daughter to wife, and so in good grace he remained in his brothers service: Who, having brought these matters to an end, resolved to make an end of the troubles in Bohemia, which through the aid of the Hungars still continued, without any one daies intermission, from the first beginning of his Reigne, which was a long time.

Boislaus overthrown by the Emperor.

Finally, in some battels (wherein he was himself in person) BOISLAUS was ouerthrown, in such manner, that he submitted himself, and became subject. Having in this manner subdued the Hungarians, the Bohemians, and such as rebelled, he resolved to relieue LEUVS the French King, who was his brother-in-law, and had sued vnto him for succours; whom for some occasions, too long to be recited, certain Dukes and great Lords of France oppressed. Yet some Authors say, that this his going into France was before the warres of Bohemia: but at what time, or in what order hee did it, was he went thither with a great Army, and relieved his brother-in-law, and so again returned into Germany; where we will leave him to enjoy his victories & good success, and will briefly declare in what estate Italy then stood, and the accidents which then happened: which appertain to our History, as well for that it was part of the Empire, as also for that HUGH before named reigned there with the name of Emperor, although a tyrant. HUGH having for certain yeeres space possessed Lombardy, and a great part of Italy, no man seeking to deprive him of his estate; for, OTHO (as is already said) was busied with the troubles of Germany: in the end BERNIGARIVS the Third, after many long journeyes, having a desire to recover the Kingdom which his father and uncle had possessed, and of all Italy, whereof the Emperor RODOLPHVS had bereaved him; with the aid of certain Princes of Germany and of Italy, resolved to make warre against HUGH; and to that effect leuied a great number of good souldiers, and took his way towards Italy. HUGH, houlding himself vnable to make his party good against him, finding that such as were of greatest power and authority in the cities, did not fauour his faction; he resolved to come to any composition: and so, finally, they agreed that HUGH should leave the title of King of Italy, and return to his Duchie of Arles in France, vpon condition that his son LOTHARY should remain King in Italy together with BERNIGARIVS. BERNIGARIVS accepted these conditions; and HUGH returned to his old Dukedome, and left his son a King, and companion with BERNIGARIVS. This LOTHARY was married with ADELHAIDA, which by some was called ALVADA, daughter to ARNOLPH Duke of Burgundy, who had reigned some certain time in Lombardy, as we said before, and was expelled by HUGH. It hapned that HUGH afterwards died in France: and in a short space (and after other matters that ensued, which I leaue to relate) LOTHARY died in Lombardy. And BERNIGARIVS, seeing himself freed from company, took to wife the widow Queen ADELHAIDA, which was a very excellent Lady. And first that he found no contradiction or resistance in the Estate of Italy, against the dignity of the Emperor OTHO (from whom he had receiued many benefits and fauours) he took vpon him the name and title of Emperor, and instituted his eldest sonne, whose name was ALBERT, King of Italy, and beganne to entreat the people very badly, and in other matters to behaue himself altogether like a Tyrant.

At this time AGAPTVS the Second was Pope, who was held a vertuous, religious, and innocent man (which, among men of that coar, was a matter not slightly to be regarded) and he considering the violence and tyranny vsed by BERNIGARIVS, having now been Pope the space of 6 yeeres, sent to sollicite OTHO, Emperor of Germany, to come into Italy, to free the same from so pernicious a Tyrant. The like was done by sundry other Prelates and great men.

OTHO

OTHO at that time was a widower of his wife EBTTHA; by whom hee had a sonne whose name was LVITOLPHVS, a valiant and high minded young man: and having heard the Italian ambassadours, at such time as hee had ended the warres before mentioned, moued by their perswasions, and through the desire he had to marrie Queene ADELHAIDA, whom BERNIGARIVS held prisoner in Pania, and to make himselfe Lord of Italy, he leuied an Armie of fiftie thousand men, and came downe against BERNIGARIVS; who having no sufficient power to make head against him, in the best order that he could, gaue ground; still defending the strongest castles and fortresses. OTHO marching forwards, taking townes and cities; coming to Pania, set ADELHAIDA at liberty, and with her good liking married her, holding solemne nuptials: by reason whereof, his sonne LVITOLPHVS was very sorry, and after it their ensued many inconueniences. This being done, and OTHO having settled all matters concerning the State of Italy in good order, he returned into Germany, leaving CONRAD for his Lieutenant in Lombardy. This CONRAD was called the wife, and was Duke of Franconia, and sonne-in-law to the Emperor by the marriage of his daughter LVIGARDA: but his son LVITOLPHVS was gone before into Saxony, which was his fathers house and patrimony, where he raised some Commotions against him, for he was much grieued & discontented with his fathers late marriage. OTHO being returned into Germany, and BERNIGARIVS seeing that by warre, he could not recover what he had lost, came into Germany, and brought with him his sonne ALBERTVS, and desiring pardon, yielded himselfe into the Emperours power, vowing to be his loyall seruant and subject; which he protested in such manner, that the Emperor thought himselfe well assured of him, and thereupon made him his Lieutenant in Milan and all Lombardy, the auncient inheritance of the Empire, and gaue certain lands to him, and to his sonne ALBERTVS; wherewith his sonne-in-law CONRAD, which before held that charge, being greatly discontented, he ioyned with LVITOLPHVS the Emperours sonne, and some sonne and sonne-in-law rebelled against him. BLONDS and other Italian writers, make mention of CONRAD'S abode in Italy, neither of BERNIGARIVS his going into Germany; yet they mention his pardon, and the offices that the Emperor bestowed vpon him: But ABAS WESPERGENSIS writeth in the same manner as I haue related, and so do NAVELEERS and other Dutch writers. Italy remaining in this estate, the Emperor did not so soon abandon it (as I suppose) without some suspicion conceived of his sonne LVITOLPHVS, who departed from him and rebelled: truly he had reason to mistrust him, for LVITOLPHVS being accounted his successor, found many friends to ioyne with him against his father, amongst which was his brother-in-law CONRAD, and ARNOLD, and the other sonnes of BERTOLD Duke of Bauiere; who dying, the Emperor gaue to his brother HENRY that Estate: wherefore all those which were called Dukes of Bauiere, were so much discontented with him, that they raised an Armie, and tooke many townes and castles, meaning by force to defend the same, with a resolution to depose him from the Empire, without regard of the faith and loyalty which they, as his sonne and sonne-in-law, ought to him.

OTHO making such account of this warre as the importance thereof required, leuied his forces, and went against his sonne; who daring not to keepe the field against him, fortified himselfe in the citie of Mentz, where his father besieged him the space of threescore dayes, after that he had recovered many of those townes which had given their voices against him; the citie in the meane time being battered, and most valiantly defended, in the end the besieged made a motion of peace: and the end they might haue time to treat thereof, a truce was granted; in which time, the forces brought by the Emperors brother HENRY to his seruice, through the secret perswasion of ARNOLPHVS, and his brethren, which were called Dukes of Bauiere, came to an agreement with LVITOLPHVS; with which, and with those which already were in Mentz, in a night hee found meanes to depart the citie, and to get into Ratisbone. The Emperor without making one daies tariance, raised his siege, and went to Ratisbone, which was better fortified and furnished then Mentz, and so the siege was more hard and doubtful; and in the assaults and sallies many men lost their liues, of the one and other party. And although that LVITOLPHVS desired peace, and his fathers pardon, yet the Emperor would neuer yield thereto, until that by the importunacie of some Prelates, hee limited a certaine time, wherein his faults and offences should be examined, and a treaty should be held concerning what was to be done; and so LVITOLPHVS gaue vp the citie. And going thence, absented himself from his fathers presence, till that (within the time prefixed) the Emperor being on hunting in the fields, LVITOLPHVS acknowledging his error, and being very sorry for it, without security from his

Otho made Berengarius his Lieutenant in Lombardy.

Luitolph and other rise against Otho.

Luitolphus besieved by his father Otho.

The death of Hugh and Lothary two Tyrants.

Luitolphus submitting himselfe to his father entreated him.

father, came before him vpon the way, bare beaded and bare footed, and kneeling at his fathers feet, wept; who being amazed at the strangenes thereof, expecting no such matter, stood still, and the sonne recovering spirit, in this maner entreated him to haue compassion on him, acknowledging his faults and offences to be very great, rather desiring a thousand deaths then any pardon; and therefore being hartly sorie for the same, (like the prodigall childe) he presented himselfe before his father, who also had a father in heauen, by whom he hoped to be forgiven; and if it might please him, to grant him his life, he should be assured of him, to be cuer after a loyal and obedient sonne, and one which liued, and would liue, in continuall sorow for what was past: if he meant to do otherwise by him, he should yet consider that he was his owne flesh and blood; and although that the offence were onely his, yet of the punishment inflicted vpon the guiltie sonne, the iust father would beare part of the sorrowe; and that in shewing him mercie, there could no inconuenience ensue; but if he did to the contrary, he should lose the most obedient sonne that cuer father had.

Having ended these words, and other to the same effect, with great humilitie he prostrated himselfe vpon the earth, expecting his fathers sentence of life or death. This stroke so great an impression into the Emperours heart, to heare and see his sonne to shew such humilitie, and to shed so many teares, that he could not forbear from doing the like: and commanding him to arise from the ground, with ioy mixt with teares, from himselfe, and the rest which were there present, he presently pardoned him, and restored him to his grace and fatherly fauour, and to the same place and dignity which he held before; and so he continued constant in that loyalty and duty which he ought to his father and soueraigne Lord. This is a notable example to be read with attention, whereby sonnes and subiects which haue erred and offended their soueraigne Lords, may learne to repent and amend; and Princes to pardon those which truly desire to be restored to their grace and seruice: for although that it be most certaine, that it is expedient for the good of the Common wealth, that offences be punished; yet generally no rule ought to be so strict and seuer, that no exception should be allowed; seeing that sometimes for the common good, clemencie is as profitable. Moreover, the shame and sorrow for the offences committed, is no final punishment to him that is pardoned.

Otho having pardoned his sonne, and recovered Mentz and Ratisbone, and all the other strong holds which had rebelled, and (according to the most and best authors) reclaimed his sonne-in-law CONRAD, (yet some say the contrary) when he should haue taken rest, and haue repofed himselfe, there arose new warres, more dangerous then the former; for on the one side the Dalmatians and Slauians entred the territories of the Empire; and on the other side, the Hungars (who now had liued sometime in rest) gathering together an infinite number of them, began the most dangerous and cruell warre they cuer had made; for besides that they were a most valiant and proud people, they were so many in number, that they reported of themselves, that the skies might fall and so kill them, or the earth might open and swallow them; but the power of no nations, or of any Kings of the earth was sufficient to make head against them. Against a nation so valiant and resolute, the valiant Emperor leuid the best and mightiest Armie that cuer he had done; for it consisted of eight legions, vnder the leading of excellent Captains and those, Dukes and Princes of the Empire. In this war were many conflicts and exploits of Armes worth relating, which I omit for breuitie which I am bound to obserue.

In the end these two mightie Armies ioynd, and fought a battaile nere the river Danubius, which began about noone, and continued vntill night, without any signe of victorie to either side; the fields lying full of dead bodies, and died with the blood of the slaine and wounded; and the darknes of the night parted the Armies, and made them leaue fighting: but the Emperor spent the whole night in dressing the wounded, giuing them meate, and encouraging the rest; and as soone as it was day, setting his troups in order, he took the field, where they againe began the fight, with as great furie as the day before: But the Hungarians began to giue ground, and within short space were overthrowne, and the Imperialists made an exceeding great slaughter of them, and obtained one of the most famous victories that hath bin in the world: where with the Hungarians were so much daunted, that they neuer durst after that time attempt to make war in Germany. There died that day of the Emperors side some principall men, among which was his sonne-in-law CONRAD Duke of Franconia, of whom all authors write, that he was the best and most valiant captain of his time. Of the Hungarians died in a manner all the Nobilitie, and three Dukes or Reguli, were taken prisoners, which the Emperor commanded to be hangd, for an example, and punishment of the rebellion and pride of that nation.

This

This battaile was fought in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, after which he spent many daies in processions, and in shewing himselfe thankfull to God for so noble a victorie: which being ended, he sent the greatest part of his Armie against the Slauians, and other nations which warred against him; all which he vanquished and subdued with the like felicitie, and then went to visit sundrie townes and cities of his Empire, to the great ioy of his subiects. Great matters in these times passed in France and in Spain, and in other parts of the world, which I haue not time to relate: In Italy BERNGARIVS and his sonne ALBERT (seeing the Emperor busied in those dangerous warres) forgetting the good which they had receiued from him, committed many tyrannies and infolencies; aswell against the Church of Rome, as against the inhabitants of the countie: and therein also were other tyrants in diuers other parts. At this time died Pope AGAPETVS, who held that seate almost ten yeres, and after his death (by sinister meanes more by force and fauour, then by any iust forme of election) OTAVIANVS, a Romane borne, the sonne of aman of great power and authoritie in Rome, was chosen Pope, and called JOHN the twelfth; a most vicious wicked man, and giuen to all kinde of dissoluition and ribaldries; and aboute all, extreme cruell and conetous.

The commendation of Pope Otavianus, called John the twelfth. The death of Romane life, Greece Empt, Rome.

At this time died also in Constantinople ROMANVS the Greeke Emperor, who was a Prince farre vnworthe thereof; for he was both wicked and of a base mind, and suffered his seruants to rule him. In his time were two great warres in the East Empire; one against the Mahometists Infidels, who had taken the Ile of Candia; and the other in Asia, against the Turks and Persians. In the first, NICPHORVS (nephew to that NICPHORVS which in the time of BASILIUS was so excellent a Captaine) was General, and wan great victories: In the other, LEO was General, cousin germane to this NICPHORVS; both which had happie successe: In the rest of his government he was a wicked and cruell Emperor; for although that he had an excellent sharpe wit and vnderstanding, yet he abused the same. ROMANVS being dead, notwithstanding that he left two sonnes, BASILVS and CONSTANTINE, and one daughter called THEODORA; yet by reason of their young yeeres and the hatred borne to their father, they then obtained not the Empire; but yet afterwards in process of time they gat it: and the said Captaine NICPHORVS was chosen Emperor, who in the warres was very fortunate, and both valiant and carefull, but in peace carelesse and conetous.

Returning now to our Emperour Otho, I say, that it was about six yeeres after his first coming into Italy, in which time haueing ended the wars with his sonne, with the Hungarians and with the Slauians, as we haue declared; when as (besides other times, that he had been prayed and entreated) Ambassadors came vnto him from Rome, and from sundrie cities of Italy, entreating him to come thither, and to free them from the tyrannie of BERNGARIVS, and the cruell tyrannous Pope JOHN, who also sent Ambassadors to him: whereto Otho consenting, resolved vpon his journey into Italy with strong hand; and staying to see some things in Germany in order, he sent his now louing and obedient sonne LUITOLPHVS before him with the greatest part of his forces against BERNGARIVS; who after some victories obtained against him, and the taking of many cities, died of an infirmite: wherupon his father hastened his journey; but first he made his then eldest sonne called Otho, of the age of seuen yeeres, whom he had by his second wife, CESAR and his succesor. And being come into Italy, neither BERNGARIVS nor his sonne ALBERT durst keepe the field, but fled to their holds and castles; and ALBERT gat into the Ile of Corsica, and BERNGARIVS put himselfe into a very strong castle in Mount Leon: And so Otho, without shedding any drop of blood, took all Lombardy, and marched towards Rome, where Pope JOHN attended his coming, and had by all meanes possible sought his friendship; his conscience accusing him of his vices. In matters which passed at Otho's second coming into Italy, there is some difference betweene the Historiographers which write the same; but I will follow that rule which the most of them haue set downe, and that which by many coniectures seemeth to be most true. Great cometo Rome (where of long time they had not sene any Emperor) he was receiued with beating felicitie and incredible pompe, by Pope JOHN and the Romanes; and with the like was by him crowned, hauing first sworn those things contained in the Chapter Tibi Domine in the thirteenth Distinction. The Emperour being enformed in what manner Pope JOHN had attained to the Papacie, and withall of his loose kind of life; after that he had remained there certaine daies, in friendly sort hee secretly admonished him to reforme his dissolute life, and the manner of his government in the Church; and seeing that his secret warning preuailed not, he spake to him in the Consistorie before his Cardinals, with greater authoritie & seueritie,

The death of Luitolphus.

The Emper. Otho crowned by Pope John the twelfth.

O 3

then the other would he should haue done: which being ended, in hope that the Pope would haue reformed himselfe, he departed from Rome, to seeke BERNARDVS; and beseeching him in a Citie which he had fortified, he daily assailed it with great force and resolution: in the meane tyme that he busied himselfe herein, Pope IOHN, with some of his confederats (showing himselfe an enemy to the Emperour) called ALBERT the sonne of BERNARDVS into Italie, and made a revolt against him: whereupon, O T H O leaving to besiege BERNARDVS, returned towards Rome, where the Pope had vsed great cruelty to those which held for the Emperour; among which (it is said) that he cut off the Noes, and put out the Eyes of some of the Cardinals and Citizens: but knowing with what furie the Emperour came, he durst not stay his bombing, but fled, and so lurked in sundry parts: and O T H O being come, the greatest part of the Cardinals, Clergie, and People of Rome informed him of the Popes lewde life, and the insufficiency of his election; desiring him to place a new: whereto he answered, that if their informations were true, they had authority of themselves to chooseth whom they listed: And they holding *IOHN*s election to be of no effect, made choise of another, whose name was LEO, the eighth of that name, who was presently receiued for Pope, the Emperour holding him for such. And leaving him seated in his throne, O T H O went from Rome, returning to his enterprise against BERNARDVS and his sonne ALBERT; wherein he vsed such diligence, and had so good successe, that BERNARDVS despairing to be able to defend himselfe, yielded to his mercie; and his sonne ALBERT, with his wife and children, were taken prisoners: And the Emperour O T H O (vsing his accustomed clemency and magnanimity) would not put them to death, but contented himselfe to banish them: BERNARDVS he sent prisoner, and banished into a strong Castle in Saxony; and his sonne ALBERT to Constantinople, and so ended the tyranny of the BERNARDI in Italie.

BLONDVS and other authors write that their imprisonment was as soone as O T H O came into Italy: but I follow the Abbot WASSERBURGENSIS, and the most part of all the other Historiographers.

Within few daies after that O T H O was departed from Rome, wherein he had left LEO the eighth for Pope, the Romane people, by the perswasion of Pope IOHN, and of his Allies and kindred (with the like lightnesse as they usually are moued) altered their mindes, and determined to cast out LEO, and to receiue IOHN; and so IOHN was restored, and LEO driven to flie, and to complaine to the Emperour at Spolito.

When the Emperour was aduertised hereof, making an end of such businesse as he then had in hand, he concluded to come within few daies with his forces to Rome, against his enemy Pope IOHN, who died there before his coming: some writers say, that a Roman, taking him with his wife, slew him, when he had continued Pope nine yeeres. The Romanes hoping Pope LEO, who was now with the Emperour, chose another called BENEDICT the fifth; and hee and they presently sent their Ambassadors to the Emperour, to entreate him to be pleased with his election: wherewith the Emperour was more offended then before, and gaue them a very sharpe answer: But the Romanes (who by this time loathed the Germans, murmuring against the Emperour) persisted in their opinion of holding BENEDICT for Pope: for this cause, O T H O remoued with his Army, and came to Rome, where Pope BENEDICT and the Romanes had made prouision of men and munition for their defence; and he first spoyleing the territory thereof, besieged the Citie, and brought it to such distresse, that they wrote wonder of the famine and want which the besieged endured; which was such, that being vaine to endure the extremity thereof, they gaue vp the Citie to O T H O; who being now Lord of that Citie, deposed BENEDICT whom he held for no Pope; and reestablished LEO, whom he brought with him: then he stayed some daies in Rome, setting all things in good order, and carrying BENEDICT with him, whom they had chosen in contempt of him, together with the sonnes of many of the chiefe men in Rome for his better securitie, he departed thence, and came into Lombardy, wherein, placing gouernours and garrisons in all the Cities which appertained to the Empire, he returned into Germany; where he was solemnly receiued by all the Princes and estates thereof: Within few daies BENEDICT (whom the Emperour brought with him) died of sorrow, six moneths after his election; so that Pope LEO remained sole Pope without any competency: but his prosperity continued but a while: for within little more then one yeere, after that he came to be Pope, he died also; and through his death they chose Pope IOHN the fourteenth of that name, but he was not receiued; for the President of Rome, who then was called PETRUS, rose against him, and with the fauour and assistance of the

Benedictus captiuitie
perpetuall
in prison, and his sonne ALBERT
here to be sold,
by the Emperour
O T H O the son.

Rome besieged and taken by the Emperour O T H O.

the Decarcomi, which were Rulers for one yeere; and of the two Consuls of the City (this was the manner of their gouernment at that time) and a certaine Prince which was Earle of Campania, whose name was O T H O, rising against the Pope, they became so mighty, that they captiued him, and committed him to the Castle S. Angelo; and afterwards, being masters of the Citie, they released him thence, so as he liued exiled eleven moneths: which being past, with the aid of IOHN, Prince or Duke of Capua, he was restored to his estate, and the afore said O T H O was put to death: this was in the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred sixty and seven. O T H O having reigned Emperour thirte and odd yeeres; and being in Germany aduertised of what passed in Rome, and much grieved therewith, he resolved presently to take his way towards Italie, to punish so great a contempt, and to supplant other Tyrants; and putting the same in execution, he came thither with great forces of foot and horse, and brought with him his eldest sonne and successor; coming to Rome, hee inflicted notable punishment vpon this prelate PETRUS, and the rest of the principall offenders.

This being ended, he sent his sonne O T H O with part of his Armie against the Mopres, who held many Townes in Pulia; and this O T H O drave them thence by force, and was then time Emperour of Constantinople: And for as much as her father would not send her vnto him, he resolved to make a conquest of those Lands which were subiect to that Empire in Italie, and did so: for which cause (as some authors write) the Greekes rebelled against NICEPHORVS, and depriviing him of his Empire slew him, taking IOHN for Emperour, whose sister or cozin germane O T H O afterwards married.

Others say that the cause of this warre was, for that the Greekes which dwelt in Pulia, held peace and friendship with the Infidels which dwelt among them, and did assist them. But, whatsoeuer was the occasion, O T H O and his sonne bereaued them of the best lands that they held in Italie; wherco PANDULPHVS Duke of Capua did him especiall seruice. All which being brought to a wished end; Pope IOHN, with the consent and good liking of O T H O, crowned and made his sonne O T H O his companion in the Empire, with great feasting and solemnity: and so, very joyfull and victorious, both the father and the sonne returned into Germany, leaving the Pope in peace absolute Lord of Rome; and so was Italie maintained seven yeers in peace without any tyranny.

The Emperours, being come into Germany, were with great joy receiued; and to them came Ambassadors of amity and friendship from all the Princes Christian. The rest of his life, which was not long, he spent in doing justice, in building of Churches and Monasteries, and in such like exercises: In which, in the six and thirtieth yeer of his Raig in Germany, and the thirteenth yeer after his Coronation in Rome, it pleased God to take him out of this world, in the month of May, in the yeere of our Lord 974.

A little before the death of O T H O, NICEPHORVS Emperour of Constantinople was deposed and slain, who had reigned six or seven yeeres, and had obtained great victories against the Infidels: but, through his cuill gouernment in time of peace, they rebelled and slue him; And an excellent Captain, whose name was ZIMISCUS, was chosen Emperour: who, the better to confirm himself in the Empire, chose for his companions the two sonnes of ROMANVS, who was Emperour before NICEPHORVS, whose names were BASILVS and CONSTANTINE; and married himselfe to a sister of theirs called THEODORA. This proued an excellent and valiant Emperour, and subdued the Russians, and other northerly Nations, and also PHOCAS a Tyrant, who rebelled against him: of whose end you shall hear more hereafter.

Pope IOHN pri-soned, the ca-ple S. Angelo.

*O T H O*s second coming into Italy.

The death of the Greek Emperour Nicephorus.

The death of the
Emperour O T H O.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSORE & EIGHTTH ROMANE Emperor; And of IOHN, BASILIUS & CONSTAN- TINE, Emperors of Constantinople.

(*)

This Otho was according to the order of the Roman Emperors, the second; but the third Romane Emperor of that name.

OTHO the sonne of OTHO, and therefore called the Second (yet in truth he was the Third) as soon as his father was dead, as well for his fathers worthinesse, as for that in his life time he was elect and crowned in Rome by the Pope, as wee have related, was without any contradiction receiued and obeyed for Emperor. This OTHO was a man of a great spirit, and very valiant, and so shewed himself in all his actions; though in the later end of his Raige hee was vnfortunate, as you shall vnderstand. Hee beginning to rule the Empire, all Christian Princes sent Ambassadors vnto him, to condole the death of his father, and to congratulate his succession; and the Princes of Germany came to do him homage: onely HENRY Duke of Baniere (who was his cousin germane, sonne of the other HENRY, brother to his father OTHO, of whom we haue made some mention, and whom his father made Duke of Baniere, being a man of great power, and therewith very proud) refused to yeeld obedience to the new Emperor: but OTHO raised an Army, and went against him, and compelled him to submit himself, and to yeeld his obedience; this befell in the first yeer of his Raige. From thence hee marched against some Towns in Slauonia, which took Arms against him. In the meane time, in the Prouince of Lorraine were some combutations, procured by LOTHARIUS King of France; vpon the newes wherof, OTHO returned into Germany: but the French King had raised such forces, and was so suddenly entred Lorraine, that he made himself Lord thereof; pretending that the Prouince did appertain to the Crown of France, And not content to haue subdued all that Country, within fewe daies after he marched forwards, spoiling and wasting the Country euen to Aken; where OTHO then was with small forces, nothing mistrusting that the King of France would haue proceeded so farre in that warre, where he was like to haue been taken, and was driuen to depart thence in more than haste: but the French King retiring with great prey and spoils; the Emperor, much displeased with his doings, raised a very mighty Army, and the next yeer following, with great courage and equall power, entred the Kingdom of France; in such manner, that the French King neither durst nor was able to fight with him; but retired, and fortified himself in the City of Paris: whither OTHO came (the King being therein) and spoiled the Country, in reuenge of the harms receiued; and in coming within sight of the City, he lost some of his people in a skirmish against the French: and seeing that the King salied not forth to giue him battell, and that he could not besiege him with any aduantage, he resolved for that winter to return into his Country: and in his retreat the King of France sent the Duke of Burgundy and other Princes, to charge him in the arieregard (as GLOVIN and other French Hi-Historians write) and at the passage ouer a riuer, which was growne so high by reason of the raige, that it could not be waded through, he receiued great harme by his enemies, and they slew a great part of his Armie; which the Germanes doe not so brauely describe (yet they acknowledge to haue lost som of their people at that passage) and the Emperor being returned, resolved to haue prosecuted that warre; but it hapned otherwise: for he gaue ear to a treatie of peace betwene him and the French king, moued by certaine prelates; which was concluded, as we will shew you; wherof the warres in Italie, made by the Greeke Emperor, were the chief occasion; which passed in this manner.

IOHN ZIMISCUS (as is before recited) hauing obtained the Empire of Constantinople by the death of NICEPHORUS, and taken for his companions the two sons of the Emperor ROMANUS, whose names were BASILIUS and CONSTANTINE; and hauing obtained many victories, and governed the Empire very well, was poisoned in Constantinople, when hee had reigned six yeers and a halfe, and BASILIUS, and his brother CONSTANTINE, which were his brothers in law, remained Emperors; but BASILIUS bare the chiefest sway in the government, being now twenty yeeres old; who in proesse of time was many great victories, as well against tyrants which rebelled, as other people, and reigned fifty and ouer yeers; in which time many reigned in Germany, the story wherof I am to write, although I euer make in some mention of Constantinople, as I haue done hitherto.

In the beginning of the raige of BASILIUS, and of his brother CONSTANTINE, they being both yong, and of great power, and seeing that OTHO was busied in the warres of France, and grieuing that he and his father had taken the lands belonging to the Greeke Empire in Pulia and in Calabria; they resolved to recover the same, embracing the opportunitie, considering that OTHO was pestered with these troubles, and that the Popes were of small power by reason of the great tyrants which were in Rome; and in a manner through all Italie by reason of the Emperors absence: The two brethren hauing placed good Capitaines and Garrisons in the prouinces of Asia, and Gracia, took their passage into Italie, and brought in their Armie many Infidels, as well such as were newly entertained, as such as in former time had made warre in that countrie; and began to take Cities and Castles, and in short space tooke all the rest of Pulia, and Calabria: and Rome it selfe and all the countrie thereabout stood in great feare of them.

OTHO hauing intelligence hereof (at what time as he was in parley of peace with France) and grieuing much that the Greekes should recouer what he had conquered at the time of his fathers coronation in Rome, with a resolution to recouer and to defend the same, he concluded a peace with the French: wherein was granted to him the supreme iurisdiction, and all the prouince of Lotharingia, otherwife called Aufrasia, which afterwards was diuided into sundrie estates, as Brabant, Gelders, Cleue, Gulick, and that which now is called Lorraine; wherof he gaue the Dominion to the French kings brother, whose name was CHARLES, with the title of Duke, the more to binde the king of France to obserue the peace: And hauing taken such order herein, and in the rest of Germany, as was expedient; he went with great power into Italie, where his comming was long expected; and taking his way towards Rome, he was there againe crowned by the Pope, notwithstanding that he was so in the time of his father: and he required the Cities of Italie, that at a certaine time and place appointed, they should send him their men of warre, which was performed accordingly: and staying but a very small time in Rome, he drew all his Armie to one head; and so went to seeke his enemies, who refused not the battell: and both parties desiring the same, it was fought, wherein OTHO had very ill successe. For, hauing a greater number, and better men then were the Greekes, the Romanes, the Benenatians, and others which had the auantguard, at the first encounter charged so cowardly, that without making any resistance, they abandoned the field in such confusion, that they disordered the other Battalions and Squadrons of the Germanes: so as the Greekes encouraged hereby, followed the chace of them which fled; in such manner that OTHO's people, being vnabled to doe as they would, and ought to haue done, were broken and ouerthrowne, and a very great number of them slaine.

The Emperor seeing no hope of better helpe, fled from the battaile; and comming to the Sea side (which was not farre from thence) put himself into a small boat, which he found there by chance, thinking so to escape: but he was taken vnkowne by a Pirat, and carried into Sicilia, where he was discovered by a Merchant of Slauonia; who vpon promise of reward made by the Emperor, bewrayed him not, but agreed for his ransom. This is reported in sundry sorts: but but in the end he was deliuered by the Merchants means, they nothing knowing that hee was an Emperor. And so he returned into Italie, and came to Rome, whereof the Greeks might haue been masters if they had knowne how to haue followed their aduantage; for, their enemies being ouerthrowne, they had not found therein any resistance: but, God hauing otherwise ordained, they left the war, contenting themselves with the victory.

The Emperor of Constantinople poisoned Basilus, seized his brother Constantine, succeeded John in the Greeke Empire.

The Emperor made peace with France.

Otho taken by a Sea-pirater.

O T H O, being com to Rome, gathered together the remainder of his Armie; and, adding thereto new supplies, the first enterprize that he attempted, was, to go to Beneuent: where hee put the greatest part of the Inhabitants to the sword, and sacked the City, because they fledde from the battell. It is written of him, that hee inflicted cruell punishment in Rome for the same cause; so as he was therefore called bloudy: the cause whereof was, The great grief and sorrow which he conceived for the losse of the battell, and his sight: considering, that through the fault and cowardize of his friends it had hapned: so as they write of him, that euer after, whilst hee liued, his countenance was euer sad and pensiu, and that hee often gaue great groans and sighes: and, finally, in his apparell, and in all other things, he shewed continual sorrow and extreme heauinesse; and all his speeches and discourses were, how he might be reuenged, and recover this losse.

After this, liuing in this care and melancholie in the City of Rome, he was taken with a mortal infirmity, which (as some say) came through sorrow (but not without suspicion of poison) which increased so, that hee died thereof, hauing reigned teene yeeres, in the year of our Lord nine hundred fourescore and foure. He left behinde him, when he died, one sonne called O T H O (as himselfe) of the age of twelue yeeres, who was afterwards Emperor; and another called H Y O N, who was Duke of Saxony, and one daughter called A L A S I A, which afterwards was married to a Prince of Saxony, whose name was A L R A N E or A L E D R A N E, and was Marquesse of Monferrato; in whom that house and state had beginning. All these hee had by his first wife, whose name was T H E O P H A N I A, who had been late wife to I O H N Emperor of Constantinople. He had also another daughter called V T I E H V I D A, by his second wife, which was the Marquesse of Austrich his daughter, who was married to T H E O D O R I C V S, the first Earl of Holland: and, O T H O being dead, the Greeks for that time continued Lords of Polia and Calabria.

The death of
the Emperor
Otho the third

THE
LIFE OF OTHO. BEING THE FOURTH OF THAT NAME, AND FOURSCORE AND NINTH ROMANE
Emperor; And of BASILVS & CONSTAN-TINE, Emperors of Constantinople.

(* *)

THE ARGUMENT.

After long disputations and contentions about the election of the Emperor, between the Roman and the Princes of Germany; in the end Otho the sonne of the deceased Emperor, was chosen, being a child not fully twelue yeeres old; and so one Crencencius in the beginning of his reigne rebelled against him in Rome; who aspired to the Empire, and made himselfe a tyrant over many Countreies; persecuted the Pope, driving him to flee, but finally for feare of the Emperours, who came into Italy to protect the Pope, he made his peace with him, and became his subject: the Emperor being departed, Crencencius gaine tooke Armes and made a new Pope: and persecuting the Pope made by the Emperor, he constrained him to flee to the Emperor, who conducting him into Italy, tooke Rome, and slew Crencencius; and the other Pope died miserably. At this time, an order and forme was set downe for the choosing of the Emperor, and the honor being giuen to the Germans, the Romanes were therewith much displeased, and conspiring against the Emperours, put him so to his sister, that he was driven to flee disguised; but in the end, unable to eschew treason, he died of poison, when hee had reigned eighteen yeeres.

In such manner as I haue declared, the Emperor called O T H O the Third deceased: and in the Citie of Rome, was great contention and controuersie about the election of a new Emperor, between the Princes of Germany which were there, and came with him; for some would haue his sonne to succcede him, whose name also was O T H O, being then but a child of cleuen and halfe yeeres old; being the fourth of that name, but the third of the Germanes. Others were of opinion (by reason of the childes nonage) to make H E N R Y Duke of Banaria Emperor, who was his fathers Cousin-germane, the first O T H O's brothers sonne; who being a mighty man and there present, fought to haue gotten his yong cousin into his power, to the end that he should not haue been chosen; and did so, and tooke vpon him the title of Emperor: And the Roman and Italian Princes (desiring to be freed from the Gouvernement of the Germanes whom they naturally hated) fought by all meanes that an Italian might haue bene chosen; and they named one who was a very mightie Roman, called C R E S C E N C I V S N V M I T A N V S, who at that time was Gouernour, and Confull in Rome: for (as it is said) they had established a new manner of Gouvernement, imitating the ancient custome; for at this time they had a certaine kinde of Consulate.

The Princes of Germany standing in feare of the Roman and Italian people (in a manner) by common consent, maugre H E N R Y Duke of Banaria (who thought to haue bene Emperor) resolved to choose O T H O sonne to the last O T H O; for although that hee were but young and scarcely twelue yeeres old, yet he gaue great signes and hope of a future excellent Prince; and taking him out of the power of the said H E N R Y of Banaria, they departed with him from Rome towards Germany, and came with him to the Citie of Aken, where he was crowned with great solemnity, and obeyed and held for Emperor; and so he was in Milan, and in other parts of the Empire. But in Rome C R E S C E N C I V S N V M I T A N V S, who (as we said) fought to haue bene Emperor, possessed himselfe of the Citie, and of the territory thereof; and for as much as Pope I O H N tooke part with O T H O, he made him to be apprehended in the third moneth of his Papacie, and committed him prisoner to the Castle of Saint Angelo, a wicked and impious act; where within five moneths after he died of sorrow. Afterwards I O H N the sixteenth came to be Pope, who was a couetous wicked man, and consented to the Tyranny of C R E S C E N C I V S afore named, and rebelled with Rome against the Emperour O T H O (whereof the Emperours nonage gaue the chiefe occasion, and for the same cause some Princes of Germany likewise rebelled against him) but within short space, hauing attained to the age of fourteene yeeres, he was of such courage and discretion, as he might well be accounted for a perfect and stout man: And with the ayde of those which continued his loyall subjects, he subdued and ouercame (although long first) all such as rebelled against him; with such happinesse and good successe, that he was held for the wonder of the World, seeing in him so great valour and fortie a judgement in so greene yeeres.

What Rebellsions these were, and in what manner he had so great good fortune, none of the Historiographers doe write particularly, that I could euer see; so briefly they passe over this place: Wherefore I can relate no more then I finde written; onely this they affirme, that for ordinary course, this Otho was the fourth of that name, although the third of the German Emperors.

Observing the

Crencencius apprehended
Pope John the Sixteenth, and committed him prisoner to the Castle S.
Angelo, where he died of sorrow.

for the space of ten yeeres, he was busied in pacifying and ordering the state of Germany: in which time CRASCENTIVS tyrannized Rome; which passed in this manner:

Pope IOHN the sixteenth, who (as I said) succeeded IOHN the fifteenth (as it pleased God) lived Pope but seven moneths; all which he spent vily; and hee being dead, a learned man was chosen, whose name was IOHN also, which was IOHN the seventeenth, but much unlike his Predecessor; for, he was an honest man and for being so, was soon at variance with the Tyrant CRASCENTIVS; who was of such power, that Pope IOHN was driven to leave Rome, and to giue place to his tyranny. He oftentimes sent to the Emperor O T H O for succours, and to come and reform the state of Rome and Italie: But the Emperor could not then perform his request, by reason of his other waighy affairs; yet afterwards he did it, as you shall hear.

In the mean time, CRASCENTIVS fearing the Emperours coming, acknowledging his error, practised with Pope IOHN to return, promising him to be obeyed and respected: and he so effectually handled the matter, that a peace was concluded between them; and the Pope came, and was received with great solemnity. But, this notwithstanding, the Emperour held on his way, and came into Italie with great power (which was in the eleventh year of his reign) and was received every where as he passed, with great joy and feasting: and so he came to Rome, where the Pope and CRASCENTIVS (after some treaties and ambassages which passed) made great preparation to receive him. And the Emperour being come neere the City; the Pope, accompanied with all his Cardinals and Clergie, and with all the Roman Nobility and Gentlemen, went forth to entertain him: and so in peace and good friendship the Emperour staid some daies in Rome; and, to gratifie the Pope and the Romans, hee went with his Armie to Capua and to Beneuent, which disobeyed, and were at warres among themselves: whom hee compelled to lue in peace, to the contentment of the Romans.

About this time died Pope IOHN; and the Emperour, returning to Rome, procured an vncle of his of the house of Saxony, whose name was BENNY, to be made Pope, and hee was called GREGORY the Fifth: who, being feared in his papall dignity, anointed and crowned the Emperour, with such solemnity and pomp as his father and grandfather had been before him: Which being ended, and O T H O imagining that the estate of Italie stood now in good form and order (considering that his vncle remained highest Bishop) he took his way towards Germany, and by the way visited Lombardy, and other parts subiect to the Emper.

In the mean time, whilst that O T H O was busied about the affairs of Italie, the Successors of CHARLES the Great were depose from the Crown of France; which although it concern not our History, yet for as much as it is a matter of great importance, I think it worthy to be reduced to memory; and thus it was: King LOTHARY being dead (who as we said died also against O T H O the Second) his sonne LEVVVS, succeeding him, within one yeer died also. This LEVVVS being dead, HUGH called CAPTIVS or CAPT, Earle or Gouernor of Paris, being a man of great power and authority in that Kingdom, tyrannically took vpon him the title of King, and made himself Lord of France; having no right thereto, but the right of warre; and first he took CHARLES (brother to LOTHARYS) prisoner by treason (who, by the death of his nephew LEVVVS, was called King) and caused him to dy in prison, and (subduing all such as made any resistance) got the Crown and Kingdom; which hath continued in his Successors vnto this day.

O T H O being returned into Italie; the Romans, who had euer murmured at the election of Pope GREGORY, and loathed the rule and command of the Germanes, chose the Tyrant CRASCENTIVS for Consul: by whose aid and counsel they again rebelled against the Pope; in such sort, that hee was driven to flee Rome, and earnestly to intreat the Emperour to relieue him; in hope that he would haue come to his rescue, or that CRASCENTIVS and the Romans, fearing the Emperours coming, would haue recalled him, and haue made peace with him, as they had done with his Predecessor. But it fell out cleane contrary: for, CRASCENTIVS, alleging that Pope GREGORYS election was violent (the Emperour forcing the same) hee caused the Bishop of Placentia to be chosen and made Pope, who was called IOHN the eighteenth (yet sundry Authors hold him not for Pope). Wherefore Pope GREGORY, leaving Italie, went into Germany to the Emperour; who, being highly displeased, leuied an Armie, and came into Italie, and so directly to Rome, where CRASCENTIVS had fortified himself, and provided a garrison to defend the same; and the Emperour besieged the City: which put the Romans in such fear; that they durst not stand to their defence; but, opening the gates, desired

The coming of
the Emperour
Otho into Italy

Hugh Capet
usurper of the kingdom of France.

the Emperour to pardon them; and the two tyrants, CRASCENTIVS and Pope IOHN, withdrew themselves into the castell S. Angela, which CRASCENTIVS had so well fortified, that it was held for impregnable: whereupon O T H O came to a parley with him, to the end that he should haue yielded: and CRASCENTIVS presuming that his life should haue been saved (whereof he was put in some hope) deliuered vpon the castile; and hee and the Pope coming towards the Emperour, were apprehended vpon the way; and CRASCENTIVS was presently put to death by his commandement, as a violator of his faith, and one that had been twice a traitor. Others write that he caused him to be hanged, and Pope IOHN's eyes to be put out, who afterwards died miserably: such are the rewards which the world bestoweth vpon those which to follow the same forget God, their owne honour and honestie. These tyrants being suppressed, the Emperour restored Pope GREGORY to his seate and dignitie, and let the best order in all matters in Rome, that the time would permit.

All this which I haue recited being ended, Pope GREGORY acknowledging the succours which the Church of Rome had received from the Emperour; and from the Princes of Germany (as a man affected to his native country, and to the Germanenation; by the will and content of the Emperour, and to prevent and eschue the discord which did arise, or might happen, about the choosing of the Emperour) made a law and Canon, which hath lasted about six hundred yeeres, euen vntill this day, which was, that the election of the Emperour, so long as the Empire should be void, should appertaine to six Princes onely, which we will presently nominate; three, whereof were Prelates, and the other three, secular Princes, viz. a Duke, a Marquess, and an Earle, and if by chance there should be equality of voyces betwene these six, the King of Bohemia (which then was no King) should also haue his voyce, and the party whereto he inclined, should make the choise, and their election should stand: the Prelates are, the Archbishop of Mentz, the Archbishop of Colein, and the Archbishop of Trier: the Princes are the Count Palatine of Rhine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Marquess of Brandenburgh. And he further ordained, that no man should be chosen Emperour, except he were a Germane borne; and that being chosen by the Princes Electors aforesaid, hee should be called King of the Romanes, and not Emperour Augustus, vntill that he were confirmed and crowned by the Pope, as it is obserued vnto this day.

This decree and law (as most authors write) was made in the yeere, one thousand and two: which cannot be so, for all agree, that Pope GREGORY the fifth which made the same, died in the yeere, nine hundred ninety and seven: But this contrarietie is easily salued, for the Emperour O T H O died in the yeere, one thousand and two, or three; and so in that yeere, or the next, that law was put in execution, notwithstanding that it was made some time before, and therefore they say that it was made that yeere: And thus they are excused, which attribute this order and forme of election to Pope SYLVESTER, which succeeded Pope GREGORY, who indeed was the man which made the same. And hee further ordained, that the election should be made in the citie of Frankford, and that hee which was chosen, should come to the citie of Aken to be crowned King of the Romanes. And the Emperour O T H O ordained certaine prehemines and offices, which each of these Electors should hold in the Emperours house and court; as one to beare his Sword, another to be his Cupbearer, with such like, which concerne not our historie.

This being ended and concluded in this manner; some authors write, that the Emperour went into Germany, to set an order in the affaires of the Empire, where this election before recited was approved & ratified: others make no mention of this his going, but rather report, that he spent the rest of his time in Rome. Howsoever it was, after the death of Pope GREGORY (which was when he had been Pope two yeeres and halfe) in his place was chosen one GILBERT, a more excellent man for wit and learning, then any in his time was to be found: but he abused and ill employed the same; for he was a great Necromancer and enchanter, and gaue himself to bargaining with the diuell, and to other vnlawfull Artes: he was a French-man borne, and was called SYLVESTER, and had been the Emperours Schoole-master, whom most authors affirme, to haue learned Magicke in the citie of Seuill in Spain: which notwithstanding that it was in the power of Infidels, yet the Artes and Philosophie did flourish there.

This people held the chaire foure yeeres, in which time the Emperour came againe to Rome (or had not gone forth of it) and very effectually applied himself to the good gouernment of the Empire, punishing and reforming the abuses committed by sundrie, through the small put to death.

Crescentius

Pope John the eighteenth had his eyes put out.

Pope Gregory restored to his seate.

The original of the order of the choosing of the Emperours, ordained by Pope Gregory the fifth.

Pope Syluester
a Necromancer.

authority and worth of former Popes, and the tyrannies and factions which had been in Rome, all which was done by the Popes consent, as by him which had been the Emperours Schoole-master; and was placed there by his authority. The Emperour (as it is written of him) was a man of great vnderstanding, and of a very good condition: But the Romanes, who now were much discontented with the forme set downe, for choosing the Emperour, wherein they had no voice or authoritie, either to chuse or to be chosen; it being the chiefe seate and head of the Empire; and being also extremely grieved, to see that O T H O did so absolutely command in Rome and in Italie, and made to long abode there: first they began to murmure thereat, and afterwards secretly to conspire, and to practice his death; and in the end their enuie encreased, their audacioulines and contempt likewise encreased: whereupon, one day when the Emperour suspected no such matter, and the people which he then had with him in the Citie being but onely Courtiers, the Romanes arose with a great tumult; and putting themselves in Armes, slew many of the Germanes: and then went to the Palace where the Emperour was, and being vnable to enter at their first approach (for that his guard and Gentlemen which repaired thither defended the same) they compassed the house, in such sort as the Emperour had been either presently taken, or slaine; but that one H V O N (who was his Lieutenant, and governed a great part of the Emperours countries in Italie, with the title of Marquess, and was well beloued amongst the Romanes) came to a parley with them, desiring some treaties of peace and agreement: and with him ioyned H E N R Y Duke of Baviere, to whom they also gaue care; which restrained the furie and rage of the people: and holding them thus in talke, a meane was found whereby the Emperour (changing his habit) gat forth of the Citie, not being discouered, and went to the place where his forces lay (and the Pope did the like) whither repaired to him all those which fled from the furie: and so for that time he escaped death. But although that he was delinered from this publike treason, yet he could not free himselfe from that which was secret: for within short space after, being busie in gathering his forces together (with an intent (as some say) to haue gone into Germany, and as others say, against Rome) he was poisoned (as some write) by the wife of C R E S C E N T I V S the tyrant before named (whom he commanded to be hanged in Rome) with whom, as she was the fairest woman of her time, they say, that the Emperour being in Rome had secret conuersation, and that she faining to be greatly in loue, poysoned him in a paire of Gloues, which she sent him excellently perfumed: whereof within three or foure daies after, he died, the poyson working slowly and leisurely.

The death of the Emperour Otho by poyson Anno 1002.

Other Authors beleue not this, but that he was poysoned by others; yet they all agree that he died of poyson, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand and two; when he had reigned eighteen yeeres complear, and liued only nine and twenty and a halfe, leaving no sonne to succcede him: which some affirm was the cause why he procured Pope G R E G O R I E to ordaine that manner of choosing the Emperour, as I haue already described: And they say moreover that he was married with the king of Aragons daughter, whose name was M A R Y, a woman not so carefull for the preferuation of the honour and honesty of her person, as shee ought to haue beene.

This Prince is accounted amongst the good Emperours, for his many vertues, and for that he ruled the Empire with justice, and vprightly. Before his death there appeared great signes in the firmament, as Comets, which continued many daies; and the most notable was, that one day in the morning about nine of the clock, there appeared in the element a great flaming fire, like to a burning torch, which continued a great while; and the light being vanished, there appeared in the same place the likenes of a Serpent. The body of the Emperour was carried by H E N R Y Duke of Baviere, and the other great Lords, into Germany, and buried in the Citie of Aken. A little before his death Pope S Y L V S T E R died in Rome, whither it seemeth that he was returned, who died through Gods great goodness (as it is written) very penitent for his sinnes; and in his place was chosen I O H N the 19, who dying within foure moneths after without doing ought worth the writing, another I O H N succeeded him, which was I O H N the 20, of whom we will hereafter make mention.

The Emperour Otho buried in Aken.

During the raigne of O T H O, in Constantinsple reigned B A S I L I V S and C O N S T A N T I N E, brethren; but (as I said) B A S I L I V S was the more valiant, and the man by whose counsell and direction, all actions were worthily and happily achieved in the wars: for he enlarged that Empire both in Asia and Europe, and obtained many great victories. In the beginning of their raigne (as is before declared) they came into Italie, and ouerthrew O T H O the Second: after this, their quarrels were with tyrants; the first was with a Captain called S C L E R V S a very valiant

valiant man, and of great power, who was their Lieutenant in Syria and in Phenicia; who rebelling, made himselfe to be called Emperour: this was a very dangerous warre, but in the end he was ouerthrowne, and escaped by flight to Babylon: but afterwards (many things happening in the meane time) hee was reduced to their seruice. The second was with P H O C A S, another Captain of no lesse renowne and valour then S C L E R V S, who would also haue been Emperour, and to that effect had leuiued so great an armie, that hee doubted not to fight a battaile with B A S I L I V S, wherein he was slaine, and therewith ended his life and tyranny; and so achieved B A S I L I V S the two great exploits: after which ensued the warre which hee had begun with S A M V E L, King of the Bulgarians; from whom, the lands of the Empire had received much harme by fire and sword, in the time of the warres with the Tyrants aforesaid; of whom B A S I L I V S was sufficiently reuenged in many battailes, as hereafter shall bee related when time shall serue: the Greeke Emperours also held the greatest part of Pulia and Calabria; for the said B A S I L I V S and C O N S T A N T I N E recovered the same, when they ouerthrew O T H O the second in Italy, and they sent some thither, with the titles of Gouvernours and Capitaines, who were called Calisti, as in auncient time were the Exarchi: yet Sicilia was in a manner wholly possessed by the Infidels of Africa.

THE LIFE OF HENRY. THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOURSORE AND TENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

Otho being dead, the Germane Princes Electors, according to their authority chose and crowned Henry Duke of Baviere (Cousin Germane to the deceased Otho) Emperour. This Prince, in the beginning of his raigne, was much troubled, by reason of certain rebels. He married against Robert King of France, and leuiued a power against the Duke of Bohemia which rebelled: in both which attempts, he obtained honourable victories. He made the King of Hungarie (who desired his sister in marriage) to be baptized; and went into Italie, whereto he had a great desire; and marching with an Army against the Infidels, which held many Townes in Italie, chiefly in Pulia, he subdued them. Returning into Germany, he invited Pope Benedict to come to visit him; and the Pope coming thither, he was received with exceeding great honour. He lived with his wife in continuall chastitie, and left her as good a maide as he found her; and so falling sick of an extreme infirmity, having performed all things appertaining to a good Christian, he departed out of this life; but he first intreated the Princes Electors, to make choice of a good Emperour.

1602

I cannot be denied, but that the three O T H O 's, the Father, the Sonne, and the Nephew, of whom but euen now we left to discourse, were very valiant and worthie Princes; and which repaired the credit and reputation of the Empire, very much torne and decayed; and for such are commended and recorded by Historiographers. O T H O then dying in Italie (as I haue declared) after that the Germane Princes and people were returned into their Countie, with the Emperours dead bodie, and had buried the same, with such solemnity as thereto appertained: the afore named Princes, that were made Princes Electors (which were the Archbishops of Mentz, Coleyn, and Trenter; the

Pp 2

the

the Duke of Saxony, the Marquess of Brandenburg, and the Count Palatine of the Rhine) purposing to shew their Authority, and to choole an Emperour, met together in the Citie of Frankford; where knowing the many vertues and merits of HENRY Duke of Baviera, they chose him for King of the Romanes, and future Emperour AVGVSTVS; and hee was, anoynted in Aken by the Archbishop of Mentz, which was in a manner by the common consent of them all, excepting HERRERY Archbishoppe of Coleyn, who was of a contrary faction.

This HENRY was cousin german to OTHO, whom he succeeded in the Empire, and Nephew to HENRY Duke of Baviera, Brother to OTHO the first (yet second of that name) who by the same OTHO was made Duke of Baviera, as in his life we haue specified; and was the second of the Emperours so called: yet the Italian writers say, that he was the first, for they doe not reckon the other HENRY, Duke of Saxony, for Emperour (whose life we haue before written, who was Father to OTHO the first) for that he came not into Italie, neither was crowned there by the Pope. The election of the new Emperour was commended and approved by all those which desired the good of the Common-wealth, for that he was a good man: yet there were some ambitious, and vnquiet Princes, which rebelling, took Armes against him; but he shewing his power and valour, in short space tamed and brought them to his obedience: who they were which thus rebelled against the Emperour HENRY, I could neuer reade, for writers doe not specify the same.

This HENRY being confirmed and assured in his seate, desired to come into Italy: but hee could not bring it to passe, vntill the eleuenth yeare of his raigne, by reason of such warres as happened. First, some Authors write, that there presently grew warres betwene him, and ROBERT King of France, who (by the report of all writers) was also an excellent Prince, although the son of HUGH CAPET, which vsurped those Kingdomes: for what cause those two good Princes fell at variance I finde not written: but those which make mention thereof, say, that HENRY had the victorie in this warre; and that afterwards they came to an agreement: which being ended, there followed a farre more dangerous warre than the former: which was against BODISLAV, D. of Bohemia, who being of great power & ayded by the Slauians, the Polacres, Morauians and other nations, rebelled against the Empire; and the Emperour with a great power resolutely marching against him, the warres grew to bee very cruell; and some battails were fought, wherein BODISLAV was ouerthrowne: but not dismayed therewith, persisting in his rebellion, he reinforced his armie, and leuied the greatest power hee was able, and againe gaue the Emperour battaile, which, through the valour and courage of the Captaines and Souldiers of either side, was very doubtfull and terrible, but the Emperour HENRY with much difficultie obtained the victorie; and followed the same in such manner as BODISLAV was constrained humbly to craue pardon, and sue for peace: which was granted vpon very hard and heauy conditions; and so hee was subdued, and made subiect to the Empire, together with his Confederates.

This enterprise being ended, and hee free from warre, in the meane time that hee made preparation for his going into Italy, (which hee greatly desired) hee applied himselfe to matters of peace and good government, doing iustice to all men indifferently; and builded and enriched many Churches and Monasteries; and honored and aduanc'd Bishops, Monks, Priests, Friars, and other such like religious people. In those dayes (being importuned, and in a manner compelled by the great Princes of the Empire, wholly against his will) hee married the daughter of the Count Palatine of Rhine, called AMIGYNDIA, a religious Lady: with whom (vndiscovered and vnkowne to any, vntill his death) he liued most chastely, both of them obseruing voluntary virginity, without hauing any carnall knowledge the one of the other; which is one of the most rare things that I euer read, of any King or Emperour.

This Emperour had also a sister called GISELA, which (as they write) was the fairest woman of her time, whom STYEFEN, Duke and Lord of Hungarie, desiring to haue to wife, he could not obtaine his sue, except hee would first become a Christian, and be baptized (for although that in that Kingdom were many Christians, yet the Princes were Infidels) whereupon STYEFEN yielded, and became so deuout, that he is accounted amongst the Saints: and the Emperour gaue him his Sister, and with her the title of King, and so he was the first that was called King of Hungary. Some write that this GISELA was Neece and not Sister to the Emperour. In these accidents before related, HENRY spent ten yeeres of his raigne, and

Henry the first and chosen Emperour.

Bodislaus
Duke of Bohemia ouertrowne
by the Emperour

voluntary chastity observed by
the Emperour
and the Emperesse.

The King of Hungary became a Christian,
and was baptized.

and then resolved to leuie a great Armie to go into Italy, wherein had passed some great matters: among which, MOLOCHVS, Gouverneur of Pulia and Calabria for the Emperour of Constantinople, and with him WILLIAM, and his other brothers, (sonnes to the Duke of Normandy came about (some certain enterprises) joyned their forces together, and agreed with the Duke of Salerno and other Princes, to expell the Infidels of Africa out of the Ile of Sicilia where they inhabited; which they did with such force and courage, that within lesse than two yeeres they recovered the whole Island: whereof (according to the agreement) certain Cities and Towns were to haue bin giuen to the said WILLIAM, and to the other Dukes; but MOLOCHVS was satisfying the debt with part of the prey and booty which they had taken of all the rest would part with nothing, but put garrisons into all the Towns, to hold the same for his Lord the Emperour. WILLIAM and the rest, being discontent heerewith, came into Italie, where they took by force such Cities as were vnder MOLOCHVS government: and MOLOCHVS, coming out of Sicilia to make head against him, they joyned battell; and WILLIAM, obtaining the victory, became Lord of the most part of Pulia and Calabria: where dying, his brother DROGOVS succeeded; and afterward, through fundry accidents, his offspring became Lords of those Provinces, and in proceesse of time of Sicilia also for a long time after (first with the title of Dukes, and afterwards of Kings of Sicilia) and in the end of both the Sicilies, which are Sicilia and Naples, as in time shall be remembered in our History. Of the time when this WILLIAM and the Normans came into Italy, Authors differ; but so farre as I can conjecture by the true computation of times, it hapned at such time as I haue set down. This being past, Pope SARADVS died in Rome, and BENEDICT the Eighth succeeded him: yet BLONDVS calls him STEPHEN, which is contrary to the opinion of all other Historiographers; so as I imagine it was through the error of the Writer: for, in that time there was not any Pope that was called after that name.

In the time of this BENEDICT, the Emperour HENRY prepared for his coming into Italy, and came very mighty: and by the way visiting Milan, and the other Imperiall Cities, he came to Rome, where by Pope BENEDICT he was most solemnly receiued, and afterward crowned with exceeding feasting and magnificence; where making his abode some few daies space, he marched thence with his Armie against the Infidels, which through the aid and permission of the Greeks (to vs their seruice against the Normans) came into Italie, and had besieged the City of Capua: with whom the Emperour fought, and ouerthrowing them, forst them to abandon the Country.

After this, he went against SVBAGENVS, Generall for the Emperour BASILVS, for that he had supported the Infidels in Pulia; and, making cruell warre against him, dispossessed him of many Towns: and in the end laying siege (which lasted foure moneths) to the City of Treya which was but newly erected and ennobled, he took it by force; so as, expelling the Infidels, and taming the Greeks, leauing them some part of Calabria to inhabit, and in part fauouring the Normans, as those which had shewed themselves his obedient and dutifull seruants, hee left to them Pulia, whereof they were already possessed; and, returning to Rome, staid there certain daies, and thence went into Germanie with great honor; and by the way visiting Milan and other Towns, was receiued in Germany with great joy and solemnity: and so, his dominions being in peace, he spent his time in ministring justice, and in well gouerning his Empire. As the Emperour HENRY busied himself in those actions before specified, and had reigned two and twenty yeeres (some say, two yeeres lesse, yet PLAYINA and BLONDVS write, that hee reigned but eight yeeres, wherein they are much deceived: but I think for certain, that, as they were Italians, so they reckon his Raig but from the time that hee was crowned in Rome, which was in the twelfth yeer thereof; and so cometh their account to agree with the rest of the Authors: whereof let the Reader be well aduised, as well in this, as in what shall be said hereafter) at the end of this time he was taken with a greuous sickness; wherewith seeing himself oppressed, he commanded such of the Princes Electors as might come in so short space, to be sent for: who being come, hee counselled them, that after his decease they should chuse the valiant Prince CONRADVS, Emperour; who was one of the Dukes of Sueria, others say of Francia: the cause whereof may be, that he came of both houses; and so, after the German manner, was called by both names, as at this day the Dukes of Baviera are called Count Palatines of Rhine. Hee nominated this man vnto them, for that he thought hee was desirous of the Empire; and within fewe daies after died, viz. in the yeer of our Lord one thousand foure and twenty, leauing his

The Emperour
Henry's coming into Italie.

The death of the Emperour Henry
the Second.

wife as good a virgin as she came to him. It is written that she being accused of adultery, shewed her innocence by going barefooted upon certaine places of fiery hot yron; and that the Emperour became very penitent for permitting her to expose herselfe to such danger, being so chaste and vertuous a woman.

In a manner above this time died BASILIUS Emperour of Constantinople: I say in a manner, for that in this place, it is a hard matter to reconcile the times, by reason of the incertaintie and varietie among writers: BASILIUS when hee died was seuentie and two yeeres old, and had reigned two and fiftye, in most matters, in great prosperitie, at least in Affaires, as well against the Bulgarians, whom hee compelled to pay him tribute, as against the Infidels; and dying left his Empire to his brother, CONSTANTINE, who reigned three yeeres, and governed the same negligently and viciously; and he before his decease, ordained and left a great and valiant personage, called ROMANVS ARISTOPHILVS, for Emperour; whom he first married to his daughter.

This ROMANVS in the beginning, shewed himselfe to be an excellent and valiant Prince; but being afterwards ouerthrowne by the Infidels in Asia, he altering his condition, became couetous, and gave himselfe ouer to many other vices, for which cause hee grew to be somewhat hated; that having reigned but fuyre yeeres, his owne wife ZON practised his death, by the hands of one MICHAEL PAPHAAGONVS, with whom she liued in adulterie; and afterwards married him, being a man very well conditioned; who by her meanes had the Empire, which he valiantly and manfully defended the space of seauen yeeres, in the warres which he held with the Infidels in Asia, in Syria defending the frontiers of Phenicia.

THE LIFE OF CONRADE, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRESORE AND ELEVENTH ROMANE EMPEVOVR, AND OF

MICHAEL, Emperour of Constantinople.
(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

Conrade the second was chosen Emperour accordingly as the Emperour Henry before his death had ordained, and thereto had perswaded the Princes Electors; yet notwithstanding his election was not without some contradiction and difficultie. Being in possession of the Empire, he was to provide for many matters, and to subdue many Rebels, which rebelled through the long vacation of the Imperiall seate, which was two yeeres without any Soueraigne. But all these rebellions and tumults of warre were pacified without shedding any drop of blood, or drawing of sword; for he subdued them all through his humanitie and clemencie: these warres hindered him three yeeres. This being done, he came into Italie with a very great Armie, and tooke Milan: which was a most rebel-lous Citie, then any of the rest; and coming to Rome was crowned by Pope John the one and twentieth. Afterwards understanding of certaine tumults in Germany, hee speedily returned; and thus enterprise

prise being ended, he came againe into Italie, where many Cities had revolted: but inflicting terrible punishments upon the malefactors, he came at length to Rome, to relieve the Pope against such as molested him; and having reformed all matters in Italie, he returned into Germany: where being assailed by an infirmitie, hee died, having reigned Emperour ten yeeres.

HE Princes Electors of the Empire being assembled, to choose a successor to the Emperour HENRY (whose History we haue now written) notwithstanding that he aduised them to make choice of CON-RADE, yet they could not so easily agree, but that the difference continued betweene them the space of two yeeres, nor being able to resolve, who should, or ought to be Emperour, whereof many inconueniences and disorders ensued, and many Cities and Townes in Italie, and some Princes in Germany, attempted to set themselves at libertie, and to shake off the Imperiall yoke: wherewith the new Emperour Elect was afterwards greatly troubled. At the end of this time, the aforesaid CON-RADE was chosen & crowned Emperour, as HEN-RY had willed; yet he was in some sort contradicted, particularly by CONON one of the Dukes of Baviere, and Vncle to the late Emperour HENRY; who would haue been Emperour.

This Emperour CONRADE was a singular good man at armes, and had been Generall in the warres for the Emperour HENRY. Here authors doe vary, and contend about the matter, viz. Whether, that he were of the Dukes of Suenia, or of Franconia, and spend many peeces about prouing their opinions; but I will auoide this trauell, notwithstanding that it seemeth to be most certaine, that hee was of the house of Suenia, or (as I said above) was peraduenture descended from both the houses, and after the Germane manner, enioyed both titles, as at this day is vsed. But let it be, as it shall please the reader. He was chosen as a man which best deserved the same; which hee afterwards very well verified and made manifest. As soone as hee was inuested, he wrote his letters to all parts, procuring peace and friendship with all the Kings and princes which desired it, and commanded his subjects duly to obserue the same: but the two yeeres vacation had bred such a custome of libertie, as they rebelled against him. The first was BODISLAVS, Duke of Austria, whom HENRY had subdued, and made tributarie to the Empire, who (taking vpon him the title of King) denied both his vassalage and tribute:
against whom CONRADE leuied an Armie, purposing to haue gone against him in person;
but at the same time BODISLAVS died and left two sonnes, the one called OTHO, and the other MISICVS. MISICVS was the elder brother, and remained absolute Lord, and imitating his father, persisted in his rebellion against the Emperour, and expelled his brother OTHO, because he would not ioyne with him in the action; and this OTHO departed presently to the Emperour, who entertained him well, but was so much displeased with his brother MISICVS his presumption, as he sent the same OTHO with part of his Armie to begin the warre: and within few daies, he himselfe followed with the rest, and entred the countrie with such power, that MISICVS durst not abide his coming, but went into Bohemia, to craue aide of WALDERICVS, Duke and Lord thereof, who was also one of those which rebelled against the new Emperour.

WALDERICVS hauing entertained and assured him; in lieu of ayding him, sent to treat secretly with the Emperour, with an intent to haue deliuered him into his hands, thinking by this meane to haue come to the better composition. But the Emperour disdaining to circumuent his enemy by Treason, was so much displeased with WALDERICVS for his treacherie, as besides that he would not accept his offer, he shewed the greatnesse of his generous and noble disposition, by sending to MISICVS, secretly aduising him to come to his obedience, or to seeke reliefe some where else; for in Bohemia he had no securitie. MISICVS understanding what passed, and well considering the Emperours bountie, went out of Bohemia; and coming into his countrie, left the Ensignes and title of King, which his father and he had vsurped, and with a small traine, came and yielded himselfe into the Emperours power, humbly submitting himselfe

The loyalty of the Emperour
Conrade.

himselfe, more in regard of his kinde and gentle admonition and aduice, then for feare of his force: and the Emperor pardoned him, and granted him peace vpon the same conditions as before.

Following the example of MISIEVS, the Duke of Poland and all the rest which had taken Armes, and rebelled, came to the Emperours seruice and obedience; amongst which were STEPHEN King of Hungary, and WALTER Duke of Bohemia, notwithstanding that they first failed not to try the utmost of what they were able to doe by Armes. In all which CONRADE spent the first three yeeres of his reigne, and could not accomplishing as he desired, goe into Italy to be crowned; where he had much to doe, by reason of the great leagues and confederacies made against him, that they might free themselves from the imperiall yoke and subjection.

Conrade came into Italy.

This time being expired, and having taken order for the estate of Germany, he leuied the greatest Army he could, and came into Italy; but he first nominated his sonne HENRY, King of the Romanes: and forasmuch as Milan, and all the Townes in that quarter, which in former time were wont to be most seruiceable and in greatest subjection, were now in Armes, and rebelled, he therefore marched directly thither, and so it behoued him to doe for Pope GRIGORIUS the fifth (in the rule and Canon which he made in the time of OTTO the Third, concerning the Princes Electors, and the choosing of the Emperor) instituted and ordained, that he which was chosen, besides the golden Crowne which he should receive of the Pope, should be crowned with two other Crownes; the one of straw in Monza, a Citie in Lombardie; and the other of Iron, in the Citie of Milan; which (of set purpose) I haue referred to be written in this place, and doe here finde it written by those Authors which I follow. Wherefore, for the full accomplishment hereof (although I haue not read that any his predecessors had done the like) the Emperor, battering and forcing such townes as would not receiue him, came to Milan, which then was more obstinate and rebellious then any other, and doing much harme in the territorie thereof, he narrowly begre the citie with a siege, with a resolution to haue ruined and burnt the same, for the great displeasure which he had conceived against it; and for an example to the rest. Which he might and had easily performed, and that in short space (as many writers affirme) but that (I know not vpon what occasion) he raised his siege and went towards Rome (no man daring to make head against him) where Pope JOHN the one and twentieth most solemnly receiued him, and with the like solemnitie crowned him with the Crown of gold: at which coronation (as affirme some authors which I follow) was KANTVS King of England in pilgrimage, with whose daughter, they say, that HENRY, sonne to this Emperour CONRADE, was before this time married. And there was also RODOLPH, King of Burgundie, and Vncle to GISLA the Emperesse, who was descended from CHARLES the Great; and being deprived of his citie of Burgundie, by ROBERT brother to the French king, came to implore the Emperours aide and succours.

CONRADE being in Rome, there arose a great tumult betweene his traine, and the citizens, in so much that they all took Armes and fought a whole day together, and many were slaine of either side, but the Imperialists had the better; and the Emperour in the best manner he could, pacified this ryot: and staying but a short space after this in Rome, he departed thence and out of Italy also towards Germany; for his sonne-in law ERNESTVS Duke of Suecia, son to the Emperesse GISLA, by her first husband Duke of Suecia, rebelled, and made warre, seeing him persecuted in Italy. But he being come into Germany, ERNESTVS, being of no sufficient power long to defend himself, was soone overthrowne, and fled to the Mountaines, where he was afterwards taken and slaine by the Emperours souldiers, and his estate was giuen to his brother, whose name was HARMAN. At this his coming (so farre as I can gather, comparing the times with the accidents) CONRADE gat by his Captaines the countrie of Burgundie, and made it subiect to the Empire, which one hundred and odd yeeres had been subiect to the house of France (but yet there had been very mightie Kings and Dukes therein) which was effected by the will and testament of RODOLPH, who was present at the Emperours coronation in Rome: and hee bequeathed it to the Emperours son HENRY, which could not be done without war and bloodshed; for the King of France of the one part, and a certaine mightie Earle of another, pretended right thereto, and were possessed of great part of the countrie; but to be short (for herein much might be said) at this time the supreme dignitie of Burgundie was transported to the Empire: yet ROBERT GAOUIN in the end of his fift booke, saith, that Burgundie was then diuided into two parts, the one remaining subiect to the French, and the other to the Empire.

The diuision of Burgundie into the Duchy and the Countie.

The Emperour CONRADE hauing ended these things so happily for his profit, after that he had liued quietly some yeeres in Germany, without any accident worthy writing (by reason of which, the History of his time is more briefe than of other Emperours) he resolved to come the second time into Italy: for at the first, by reason of the small time that he made his abode there, he could not settle things in such order as hee desired; and also for that he understood that the Italians sought aid and relief from the Slauians and the Hungars, against him, with a determination not to yeeld him any obedience. So as, hauing all things in a readinesse for his journey, as speedily as he could he departed, and came with greater expedition and power than anie man thought of: and in his journey ruining some Towns, and punishing some offenders, which thought to haue made head against him, he came to Milan, which presently yeelded; where he punished the guilty for former offenses, and remained some daies therein.

Conrade's second coming into Italy.

Departing from thence, he took all the Cities in that Territory; and then went to Rome to see the Pope, and to relieue him against such as disobeyed him (which now, as I coniecture, was BENEDICT the Ninth, JOHN the one and twentieth being dead, who was Pope eleuen yeeres). And from thence with great power he trauelled ouer all Italy, visiting all the lands belonging to the Church of Rome and, to the Empire, not finding any resistance whatsoeuer: yet in Pulia and in Calabria the warres were still on foot between the Grecians and the Normans.

In this manner returned CONRADE into Germany triumphing and mighty, whose History I haue written very briefly; for, so do Authors handle the same: and thinking now to repose himself after his former toils (which for the space of fifteen yeeres that he was Emperour he had endured) he was taken with an infirmity, whereof within fewe daies hee died, in the yeer of our Lord one thousand and fortie; some adde thereto three yeeres. Hee left behinde him one sonne whose name was HENRY; who, as I will presently tell you, succeeded him in the Empire.

The death of the Emperour Conrade.

In the time of the Emperour CONRADE, MICHAEL PAPHLAGONVS (as is already said) reigned Emperour of Constantinople, for that ZOE took him for her husband; with whom she had liued euer since the deceale of ARGIROPOLVS her first husband; and hee ruled the Empire seven yeeres. After his decease shee took another husband of the same name, called MICHAEL CALAPATES; and being accustomed to that trade, hee made him Emperour: but, for that he liued with her but foure moneths, shee remained a widow. By reason whereof, the same ZOE, together with her siter, THEODORA (which were the Emperour CONSTANTINE's daughters) gouerned the Empire three moneths: and as shee was both inconstant and incontinent, so shee resolved once again to haue a husband; and vpon this occasion banished her siter, and married a man whose name was CONSTANTINVS MONACVS, for that he came of the line of the Emperours; who neuertheless was a wicked and euill Emperour: which was the occasion that the Empire began to decline, and to be of small account. At this time died the Emperour CONRADE. What end this Emperour CONSTANTINVS MONACVS made, more shall be said hereafter.

THE

THE LIFE OF HENRY, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND THE FOVRESORE AND TWELFTH ROMAN
Emperour; And of those which in his time reigned in CONSTANTINOPLE.

()

THE ARGUMENT.

IN the beginning of this Emperours Reign there were some troubles, for that he was not chosen according to order: nevertheless, being held for such, he married upon the Duke of Bohemia, which debited him tribute; and, taking him prisoner, constrained him to become a good and obedient subject. He afterwards took Arms against the Hungars, a self for that they had given aid to the Bohemians; as for continuing some unquietness in Bohemia; and gave them a very great overthrow: the Bohemian King being dead, making him not bold to make benefit of the Emperours clemency, he restored Peter to the Crown; and afterwards subdued the Duke of Bohemia, which denied him obedience. He came into Italy; where he reformed the state of the Church, which was out of order; and was crowned in Rome; and afterwards, being his forces against the Infidels, he drove them out of Libya, and living continually in Germany, he sent a Pope to Rome (his name was Innocent) to make unto him by the Cardinal concerning the Popes election, who being received by the Cardinals, showed like a Pope; this Pope, going against the Duke of Normandy, being in a battell taken prisoner, was the very same day set at liberty, and obeyed the victor. This Emperour then again made war against the Hungars, for punishing Peter their King to death; and after many incidents came to an agreement with them: in which time there were so many calamities and scourges sent from God into the world, that the Emperour falling sick, died of sorrow when he had held the Empire 17 years.

them by election, seeing they could not do it by inheritance: which in truth seems to be but a de-

device to frustrate and prevent the law and decree made and established by the Emperour Otho the Third, and Pope GREGORY the Fifth, concerning the place where, in what manner, and by whom, the Emperours (the Empire being void) should be chosen; and that it should not be inherited by succession, but by election: whereupon there grew some question & doubt about the matter; viz. Whether this HENRY should be held for Emperour or no: for, the Princes of Germany held it for very inconvenient and vnjust, that his father should nominate him; and that it was a dangerous matter to introduce such a custome, for, this was a thing that ought to be done by the Princes Electors onely; but in the end (they acknowledging his good parts and deserts) he was confirmed and crowned Emperour, and generally obeyed for such, according to the accustomed manner: onely GRATISLAVS Duke of Bohemia, whom the Abbat WESPERGENSIS, BLONDVS, PLATINA, and OEDERICVS, call FRATISLAVS (a man of great power) rebelled against him, denying any superiority, or to pay him any tribute, which (as JOHN CUSPINIAN saith) was one hundred cowes, and five hundred Marks of Silver yearly. Against whom, HENRY (as a new Emperour, of a great courage, and desirous to winne honour and reputation) raised a great Armie, and that sooner than he should haue done: for, they write, that he began his warre in the winter, and therefore failed of his expectation, and that through the vnseasonableness of the time, and the distemperature of the Countre, in skirmishes and encounters he lost many of his men, which were taken and slain by the enemy; so as for that time hee had the worst, and was driuen to retire, without accomplishing what he had projected, and with losse of reputation: wherewith he was so much grieved and ashamed, that presently in the beginning of the next spring he returned to the warres of Bohemia with all the force he was able to make: and GRATISLAVS, growne proud of his late good success, and through the new supplies which came to him out of Hungary, offered him battell, wherein (notwithstanding that both Armies fought courageously) in the end the Duke was overthrown, and afterward taken flying: and the Emperour (showing what compassion the other craved) granted him life, and pardoned the offense vpon security, that from thenceforth he should be a loyall subject; first gathering in the arrears of three years tribute which was behinde vpaid, as COSMVS de Andrepragana recounteth in his Annals; whereby the Emperour wonne much honour. And presently after this, followed another warre against the Hungarians for the same occasion.

Henry the Third chosen Emperour.

The Emperour Henry's victory against the king of Hungary.

By the death of King STEPHEN, who was K. of Hungary, PETER came to the Crown: against whom, for some ill usage, his subjects rebelled, and made a kinsman of his, King; whom the Abbat WESPERGENSIS calls VBO, and others call him ABA: and the Tyrant ABA being of greater power than the King, PETER was expelled his Countre, and driuen to seek justice and relief from the Emperour HENRY; who notwithstanding that hee was not well pleased with him for assisting the Duke of Bohemia against him, yet for that he had subdued them both, he as his soueraign Lord entertained him, seeing that to him it appertained to do justice, and not to permit any tyranny in his time: and ABA or VBO being aduertised hereof, and having sent his Ambassadors to the Emperour to shew him the equity of his cause, and to desire his confirmation in the Kingdome, not contenting himself in that he had tyrannized Hungary, entred Austria and Banaria; and robbing and spoiling those Countreies, carried great booty and prey out of those Quarters. This he did at such time as the Emperour held a Diet or Parliament in Colein; where the Princes of Germany were assembled: whereupon, by the generall consent of them all, the Emperour (accompanied with some of the Princes) with a great Armie departed from Colein towards Hungary, sending GRATISLAVS Duke of Bohemia before to begin the warre: which, ABA the Tyrant-king of Hungary fearing, hee sent Ambassadors to meet the Emperour vpon the way, with all the booty and prey that they had gotten in Austria and Banaria; intreating him for peace, promising to do what he should enjoy him vnto, conditionally that he might not be deposed from that Kingdome: whereto the Emperour for that time yeelded and consented, moued thereto by a rumor spread abroad, that the Duke LORRAIN, with the aid of France, was in Arms and rebelled; which was the occasion of the peace granted to the King of Hungary, to the end that the Emperour thereby might haue the better leasure and opportunity to follow the warres of Lorraine, which were so much doubted. But ABA made not the benefit of that peace, which a wise and a peacefull Prince would haue done: but hee intreated his subjects rather with greater pride and rigor than before, putting many of the chief of them, to death: vpon which occasion the Emperour the next year following (with no lesse an Armie than the former, but with greater resolution) entred Hungary; where ABA already attended his as CHURCH said to S. PETER, Put thy sword into the sheath. But being prisoner, G. S. V. S. entertained him with great honour, and presently the same day let him at liberty, and gave him company and servants fit to attend on him, where with he went to Rome; and they afterwards came to a composition between themselves. Herein is a great confusion among the Historiographers; for the Germanes write that this Pope went into Germany to see the Emperor, and that he called a Synode or Council in the City of Metz, and that the Emperor came the second time into Italy: Others write nothing, either of the Popes going, or of the Emperors second coming; in the rest they all agree. L. M. held the chiefe five yeeres and a halfe; and when he was dead, one G. S. A. D. V. a Germane Bishop born in Baviere, was chosen, and called V. N. O. R. the Second, which they did to gratifie the Emperor: and presently without any delay, to the end he should not be discontented, for that they had made choice of a Pope without his consent; the new Pope and Clergie sent I. D. B. A. N. D. to him, who performed his legacie in such sort, as the Emperor approved and confirmed what they had done.

Whilst these things passed in Italy, the subjects of P. A. A. King of Hungary (whom the Emperor had placed in that Kingdom) rebelled against him; and sent into Poland for certaine great men of Hungary which lived there in exile, one of which was called A. N. D. A. V. V. and another L. V. E. N. A. V. who were their Captaines; and after other great matters (which I omit) they killed on their King, and putting out his eyes, caused him die in prison; and with the help of certaine Barbarians and Infidels which came to their aide, slew some Bishops: which when the Emperor understood, he made great preparation for war against them, especially against A. N. D. A. V. V. who tooke upon him the name of King; and having built and rigged up a great number of Barks and Ships, the Emperor came downe the river Danubius, from Austria to Buda, and to other places, where this A. N. D. A. V. V. and the rest were, which voiage had ill success, for his adversaries gat certain excellent swimmers and divers which would lie a long time under the water, and these in a night boughed the Emperors barks, in such sort, as the greatest part of his munition and victual was lost; so as he was constrained to returne with his people in the best manner he could, without effecting any thing of worth. Afterwards he twice entered Hungary; in the first, notwithstanding that he went with great preparation of horse and foote, yet he obtained no notable victorie; and the third yeere he made peace with the Hungarians, A. N. D. A. V. V. remaining still their King; who acknowledged a certaine kinde of superiority.

This being ended, and it seeming a small time since that the Emperor began to repose himselfe; through the secret judgement of God, great calamities ensued in many countries, as famine, cruell plagues, horrible earth-quakes, and other lamentable disasters; after which ensued the death of the Emperor; the end of whose raigne was, for the causes afore said, pitifull and sorrowfull. It is written, that for sorrow and griefe, to see so great afflictions and miseries happen in his time, he fell sick and died; leaving behinde him one sonne about about ten years old, called H. A. N. Y., whom before his death he made to be crowned king of the Romanes, the Electors consenting thereto; and three daughters, which afterward were married to severall princes the raigne threene yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiftie seven.

In Constantinople during the time of this Emperor H. E. N. R. Y. (of whom we now treated) raigne CONSTANTINVS MONACHVS, by his marriage with the Emperesse Z. O. A., as I said in the end of the Emperor CONRAD: This CONSTANTINVS was a negligent and vicious Emperor, and a publike ill liver. In his time began the Turks to be of great power in Asia, and did much harme in the territories of the Empire. This Emperor was also much troubled by some which rebelled against him; yet he at length subdued them all: and so betwene prosperity and aduersitie, he raigne threene yeeres. In his time also the Empire did greatly decay, both in power and authority. One only good qualitie he had, which was, that he was an Alms giuer, and a great relieuer of the poore; and made a great Hospitall for old men only, such as through their great age being decrepit, could not get their living. Both he and the Emperesse died (in a manner) at one time, and both of the plague.

The husband and wife being dead, T. H. E. O. D. O. R. A., sister to Z. O. A., had the Empire, by the authority and sentence of the Senate, and people of Constantinople, and governed the same with such equitie, justice and quietnesse, for the space of two yeeres, that they sorrowed she had not lived much longer. Before her death, by the counsell of certaine Eunuchs (by Peter king of Hungary was taken by his subjects, and had his eyes put out.

Emperors swimmers.

Calamities by Gods providence

The death of the Emperor Henry the second.

When the Turks began to grow mighty in Asia.

(by whom she was much ruled) she made Y. S. A. C. I. V. S. CONNENVS Generall of her forces, who was a valiant and wife Captaine. T. H. E. O. D. O. R. A. being dead, a man of great age, called M. I. C. H. A. E. L., was made Emperor: but proving to be incapable and insufficient for the government, which he had not ruled one whole yeere; by a generall consent he was deposed from the Empire, and Y. S. A. C. I. V. S. CONNENVS (whom T. H. E. O. D. O. R. A. had made her Captaine Generall) was chosen in his place; who raigne threene yeeres; and although he made a good shew of himselfe, yet (considering his short time) he could not doe any notable exploit, and him succeeded CONSTANTINVS D. V. C. A.

THE LIFE OF HENRY, THE FOURTH OF THAT NAME, AND FOURSCORE AND THIRTEENTH ROMAN Emperour; And of those which in his time raigne in CONSTANTINOPLE.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

Henry being yet a child when his father died, and chosen and proclaimed Emperour; it behoved him for many yeeres space to live under the government of his mother, who by the consent of all men took the charge of him, and the protection of the Empire; but afterwards, being come to riper years, he would no longer live under her command, but took the government into his own hands. His first warlike enterprise, was against the Saxons; wherein he behaved himselfe so gallantly (notwithstanding that he was but young) that he brought them to his obedience: yet they afterwards rebelled, for that he would not endure the insolvency of the Pope and Court of Rome, which he little regarded. This second warre was farre more dangerous than the first (although he had the victory) and made him more disobedient to the Pope than before; whereupon he was solemnly excommunicated, and deprived of the title and dignity of the Empire, for that hee called a Council in Germany against Pope Gregory. Of which excommunication he could never be absolved, untill that hee had three daies together come barefooted to intreat the Pope for pardon, who met him at Vercelli. Whilst the Emperour was in this parley with the Pope, many Princes of Germany rebelling against him, made another Emperour, which was Rodulph Duke of Saxonia; with whom Henry coming to a battell, had no such victory as hee expected; but was again excommunicate, and deprived of the title of Emperour, which was given to Rodulph newly chosen: upon this occasion, Henry being much incensed, chose another Pope called Clement, and made a schism in the Papacy, which was the occasion of very great warre: but Henry, after the death of his competitor Rodulph, came into Italy, and besieged Rome; and entering it, was crowned by the hands of Pope Clement; the other Pope being retired into the Castle Saint Angelo: to whom great succours coming, Henry abandoned Rome, and with Pope Clement went into Germany; and Pope Gregory, accompanied with his suite of Cardinals, went to the City of Salerno, where hee ended his daies. At this time followed the enterprise of Jerusalem, and the rebellion of Henry's eldest son Conrade, because the Emperour sought to make his second son called also Henry, his successor: which being done, he also rebelled against his father; so as there was more than civil warre between them, neither could there any means be found to appease them, neither could this warre be brought to spend but through the death of the said Emperor Henry; who having publicly (but by constraints) renounced all his jurisdiction of the Empire unto his sonne, and afterwards repenting and seeking to recover the same, could obtain no composition with him; and as for sorrow and grief falling sick, died, God suffering him to make a miserable end.

Henry, the three Emperors called HENRYS, of whom we have treated, were very valiant and worthy Princes in Arms; as, the father of him of whom we now begin to write, and the other two before mentioned: but none of them can be compared to this Fourth, of whom we are now to discourse. It is certain, that he was valiant and addicted to Arms, as being trained up therein, and was one of the most excellent Princes that ever was; for, unto this day it is not found written, that any Emperor came so often to blowes with his enemies, as he did: for, all Authors affirm, that he fought in ranged battels with ensignes displayed, threecore and two severall times, and for the most part had ever the victorie; to which number JULIUS CESAR or MARCUS MARCELLUS neuer attained (which two in their time excelled all others).

The qualities of the Emperor Henry the Fourth.

This Emperor reigned fifty yeeres. He was a man liberrall, well spoken, very wise, and had many other natural gifts and vertues: but (as saith this Author) he stained and blemished them all with his ambition, for hee would be Lord over all both spirituall and temporall, concerning the Canons and Decretals of the Church of Rome: which was the occasion, that in his later daies, he was disobeyed by those which ought him greatest obedience, which were his owne children. The Historie of his life cannot but be longer then ordinarie, for that it treateth of many great accidents which happened in the space of more then fiftie yeeres that he reigned. I say then, that when his father died, he was not fully ten yeeres old; but yet for his fathers worthines, and his mothers vertues, called YNS (an excellent & discrete woman) he was crowned and obeyed for Emperor and King of the Germanes, as his father in his life time had intituled him; and, by the consent of the greatest part of the Princes, his mother governed both his person and the Empire: And all that time he ruled very wisely and valiantly, as well in peace as in warre, against some Princes, which, for that she was a woman, and her sonne the Emperor so very a child, rebelled against him. Into Italie he sent one GILBERT for Gouverneur, who afterwards was the cause and motiue of great schisms and dissensions in the Church of Rome. Of those which rebelled, the first was a great Lord called FRANK of Gilbergh, and his brethren and kinsfolks, who were men of great power: but he took so good order with them, that he compelled them to sue for pardon, and to yeeld their obedience. The greatest trouble and difficulty that she had, was against ROBERT Earle of Reinsfelz; with whom in proceesse of time, HENRY had most cruell warre: who, by the aid of ROMOLDVS Archbishop of Cassance, took the Emperors sister MAVD, and married her; thinking by this title to become Emperor: and the Emperesse (to gratifie him, and to reduce him to her sons service) made him Duke of Suenia, which then was void through the death of OTHO who died without issue; which Dukedome was promised to a great Earle called BERTOLD: in recompence whereof, the Emperesse gaue him Carinthia. And so he pacified the great troubles which then arose; and som other by force, with the aid and assistance of such as remained loyall Subjects. But in the end the yong Emperor growing to riper yeeres, by the aduice of some which were of his Councell, disobeying his mother, sought to be free from her authority, being thereto perswaded chiefly by ANO (and, as others say, OTHO) Archbishop of Colein; who dealt so cunningly, that hee got him into his protection: and by the assistance of some others, hee assembling the Princes, alleged that it was very vndecent and vsite to be ruled by a woman, seeing the Emperor was of sufficient discretion and vnderstanding to do what was conuenient.

The Emperor being gotten out of the power and controulement of his mother, the Archbishop commanded in such sort, that all went to wrack: for, being bred up in such liberty, he did what he listed, which in the end was the cause of his ruine; for, he became both licentious and presumptuous, favouring some, and grieving others: by reason whereof he was ill beloved of many; and gaue himself to hunting, and to such other sports as that age is chiefly delighted withall. His mother, seeing herself so little regarded, and that she could bear no more sway with him, went to Rome, where he lived and died in a Cloister of Nuns.

Germany standing in these teares, in Italie a little before this time died POPE NICHOLAS the Second, when he had held that Chair foure yeeres. This Pope recovered much of the Church-lands which were vsurped by sundry Captaines and Gouvernours, which did make themselves tyrants. And he also gaue the title of Duke of Pulia and Calabria, to GUESCARD a Nora Normane being already Lord of those prouinces, who made himself and his countries subiect and feudatorie to the Church of Rome. This Pope held a Councell, wherein he ordained that from thenceforth, the Cardinals onely should chuse the Popes, thereby to auoide the factions and dissension which arose concerning the same; as it appeareth in the chapter In nomine Domini in the three and twentieth distinction; which is obserued vnto this day. By this meane, the Deacons and Cardinals Priests attained to great authoritie and credit: for vntill then, they were not of any such account (although already very much esteemed).

The dignity of Cardinals.

This name and dignitie of Cardinals, was in Rome at the beginning but a troublefome and painefull office; for they were as the Curates of parishes, and had the charge of ministering the Sacraments and of burying the dead, and were called Priests Cardinals; as the more worthie and of greater reputation: and as Rome was then held for the head of all other Churches, so these Priests Cardinals were regarded and more respected than any other; and they afterwards attained to greater preheminance, for that they were euernere vnto the Pope; and being in the time of this Pope NICHOLAS the second established Electors, they grew to be of greater reputation; but not in so high a degree, as we now see them, vntill the time of Pope INNOCENT the fourth, about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand two hundred foure and fortie; for hee gaue them libertie to ride on their footeclothes, and to wear such robes as they now vse to wear, to the end, that as they did excell other men in their degree and ornaments, so should they in their behauior and vertuous conditions: wherefore to paint SAINT AMBROS with a Cardinals crimson hat is a meere mockery; for in his time there were not any: and so althrough the dignitie of Cardinal came to bee the greatest and the highest degree next to the Pope, and they accompany and counsell him in all matters of importance: but many of them haue carried themselves so prophanly, as they haue giuen iust occasion to the world, to note and murmure at their Consistorie.

Pope NICHOLAS being dead, ANSELME Bishop of Luca was chosen, and called ALEXANDER the Second, against whom, GILBERT Gouverneur of Lombardy for the Emperour, by the consent of certaine Bishops of that Prouince, made a Schisme in the Papacie, and chose another Pope: But GOTHFREDVS and his wife MAVD, (which were the greatest Princes in Italie at that time) protected the first Pope: And in Rome and abroade elsewhere; followed many slaughters and murders of the one and the other partie, vntill that in the end Pope ALEXANDER preuailed, and the other Pope fled to Milan.

Whilst these matters passed in Italie (the Emperor, as it was said, permitting and allowing the same) the like or greater were tolerated in Germany; for he suffered Priests to marry, and gaue Benefices and Bishopricks without the Popes licence or authoritie: wherewith the Pope was much displeased, and twice or thrice sent his Ambassadors to the Emperor about that business. And in other matters were great troubles and factions, and many rose against the Emperor: the first were the Saxons: for from OTHO Duke of Saxonia and Bauiera, who was accused of treason, the Emperor tooke the Duchie of Bauiera, which his mother had giuen him, and gaue the same to a Noble man, named GYLFHO; against these Saxons the Emperor attempted his first wars, when he was not full 18 yeeres old; wherein shewing himself to be of an high mind, and free from feare or cowardise, he personally fought in many battailes and skirmishes against that people, which is, and euere hath been accounted for one of the most valiant Nations of the world: but he finally ouerthrew them, and compelled them (for this time) to yeeld him seruice.

Having obtained these victories, the Emperor sent into Italie for his Ambassador to the Pope, the Archbishop of Coleyn, with sufficient authority to conclude what to him seemed best to be done, and to excuse him of such things as were laid to his charge: who being come into Italie, he put GILBERT out of the Chancelorship and gouernment of Lombardy, which the Emperesse INES had giuen him, and placed therein the Bishop of Berzell: and from thence, with great authority and majesty, he went to Rome, where (Pope ALEXANDER giuing him publicke audience) he made a solemne Oration; wherein in effect, in the behalfe of his Lord the Emperor, he reproved the Pope, for hauing accepted the Papacy without his confirmation, with other matters in the behalfe of the Emperour: whereto HILDEBRAND, by the Popes order, answered peremptorily, alleging that the Pope ought not to attend any such confirmation; and he so sharply reprehended the Emperor, as the Archbishop was constrained to rest satisfied and to craue pardon for his speech. After this, many matters followed in Italy, which (unwillingly) I omit, to the end to treat of what passed in the time of the Emperor HENRY, of whom only I write this History.

The death of pope Nicholas.

About this time, which was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand sixty and six, EDWARD King of England dying without issue, he made WILLIAM Duke of Normandy his heire, who with the aide of BALDVIN Earle of Flanders, obtained the Kingdome; and so the houses of England and Normandy were united, and so haue continued a long time in the kings thereof, and in their successors.

The Archbishoppe of Caley having dispatched his businesse in Italie, returned (discontent with his answere) into Germanie, and within few daies after died POPE ALEXANDER, hauing held that seate eleuen yeeres and a halfe: Afterwards the Archbishoppe of Rauenna reuolted from the Church of Rome. ALEXANDER being dead, by the generall consent of all the Cardinals and Clergie, HILDEBRAND the Arch-deacon (often before named) was made Pope, and was called GREGORY the seuenth; who sent his Ambassadors to the Emperour, praying and requiring him to become an obedient sonne to the Church, and to alter the manner of his gouernement in Germanie; and thereby gaue him further to vnderstand, that he was resolu'd not to allow thereof, but to vse his authoritie to reform the same.

POPE GREGORY at this time (as some approued Authors write) injoynd the Bishops of Germany (contrary to the antient Lawes) not to suffer the Emperour to conferre any Bishopricks, who he said would giue them to vnworthy men or not fit, neither should they from that time require any confirmation from the Emperour; which care and ordination did not belong to any secular Princes, but to the holy order, and chiefly to the Bishop of Rome, the President thereof.

The Emperour hereto gaue a doubtfull answere, but performed in effect nothing of what was required; maintaining, that the Pope ought not to accept the Papacie without his confirmation, according to the agreement made betwene his father the Emperour, HENRY the third, and POPE CLEMENT the second, and so these Ambassadors returned without any conclusion: this was in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand seuentie foure. At this time, (and also before and after it) the Emperour had cruell warres with the Dukes of Saxony, which againe rebelled against him, they alleging the Emperours disobedience to the Church of Rome to be the occasion thereof. This was the most dangerous warre that euer he vndertooke, wherein passed many perillous Incounters, the Emperour hazarding his person (so valiant and warlike he was) and he principally fought one veyie bloody battell, wherein he preuailed; but (as sayth BONDVS) with the losse of fiftie thousand men: and the Emperour and his brother in lawe RODOLPH, who afterward was his great enemy, fought therein with their owne hands most valiantly.

During these Combuitions in Germanie, Italie was not free from factions and controuersies, betwene the Imperialists and the Popes adherents. GILBERT, the abouenamed Archbishop of Rauenna (who had been Gouernour for the Emperour in Italie) finding that the Pope had resolu'd to excommunicate the Emperour, he secretly agreed with one CINCIVS a young Romane Knight, a man of a bold spirit (whose father was Prefect of the Citie) that he should seise vpon the Pope; assuring him that the Emperour would accept thereof, for a speciall peece of seruice; and he accordingly put the matter in execution: the Pope being vpon Christmas Eue saying Masse in the Church of Saint MARY the greater in Rome; this CINCIVS with a good guard, entred the Church, and laying hands vpon him, caried him away, and in a Tower detained him prisoner. But the people as soone as it was day (being aduertised thereof) went to CINCIVS house, and setting the Pope at libertie, rased the Tower, from the toppe to the foundation: And of all such of CINCIVS his seruants as they found, they cutt off the Noes, and banished them from Rome; and CINCIVS escaping the death (which they desired to haue giuen him) by flight, durst not stay in Italie, but went into Germany to the Emperour: This Archbishoppe GILBERT, whose practice was not yet discovered, letting a good countenance vpon the matter, departed the Citie; but being come to Rauenna, hee was by the Pope excommunicate and depriued of all his ecclesiasticall dignities and Benefices.

In Germany were no lesse contempts, against his Holinesse then in Italie: for (as the Abbot WESBROMPT and other Germane Authors report, besides the Italians which verifie the same) by the procurement of STABRINDS Archbishoppe of Mentz, with some other Bishops and Abbats which ioynd with him, a Councell was held against the Pope, (the Bishops of Saxony disallowing and contradicting the same) in which Councell it was resolu'd, that GREGORY should not be held for Pope; and that they all should renounce their obedience vnto him: Whereupon the Emperour and his Councell, sent for Ambassadors to Pope GREGORY, a Priest, whose name was ROVLAND.

that

The Pope in like manner called a Councell against the Emperour, at Saint JOHN DE LA TERRE in Rome; where ROVLAND being arrived, and the Pope and his Councell giuing him audience, he in the behalf of the Emperour, required GREGORY to desist from any longer exercising the papall function, and to resigne the authority of Pope: and he likewise signified the same to the Cardinals, willing them to repair into Germany to the Emperour, who would nominate a Pope. GREGORY was heerewith much troubled; and for as much as ROVLAND was an Ambassador, he commanded him presently to depart without any answer, and without any other disgrace. But it is also written, that the Emperours mother at the Popes request went into Germany, accompanied with many great Prelates, to perswade her sonne to desist from intermeddling with the donation of Bishopricks or other ecclesiasticall Benefices; to forbid the marriage of Priests, and to yeeld obedience to the Church of Rome: but for that it took no effect, the Pope vey solemnly excommunicated the Emperour, and depriued him of all imperiall dignity; and he also excommunicated all such as took his part, and freed all the Princes and Lords of Germany and elsewhere, which ought him any duty or allegiance, from their oaths, homage, and bands of obedience or subiection, giuing free liberty to all men; and authority to the Princes Electors to chuse another Emperour, such as should best please them. The Archbishop of Mentz was likewise excommunicate, and depriued of all ecclesiasticall dignity, and with him all such as had been in the Councell aforesaid: but before the Pope had proceeded so far, he aduertised all the Princes in Christendome, of all, both past and present; and the Emperour wrote to them, in like manner defending his cause, and excusing himself against the Popes accusations.

The Popes terrible Sentence being published in Germany (as there were many that took his part, principally the Prelates of Saxony and others) RODOLPH Duke thereof, with many other Princes, called a Diet or Councell; wherein they resolu'd to require the Emperour to ask the Pope forgiveness, and to submit himself to the Church of Rome: which if he refused to doo, they concluded to renounce their obedience vnto him. The Emperour, notwithstanding that he was a very braue man, and exceeding valiant (as some say, fainedly; and as others say, of his owne accord) promised to do what they required, which he openly protested. Finally, it was agreed, To send to the Pope to come into Germany, where full and entire obedience should be yeelded to him; and in the name of the Princes and Lords assembled at that Diet or Councell, the Archbishop of Trenier, and others of great account, went to the Pope, and intreated him with such instance, that he was perswaded to take his way toward Germany to meet the Emperour, who staid (as they said) for him, and would suffice to ask him forgiveness, and submit himself into his hands. The Pope came to the City of Bercelli in Lombardy; where being aduertised, that the Emperour marched towards him with great troops of men at Arms, fearing that he would haue either slain him or taken him prisoner, gaue out his journey, and turned into the Country of Gothreds and his wife MARY, and was by them protected in an expugnable Town and Castle, called Cansio or Cansio; whither within fewe daies the Emperour came: who, lodging his Army before the Town, in great humility sent to intreat the Pope to absolve him of his excommunication, offering to become his obedient sonne and subject; and three daies together came barefooted to the gates of the City, to sue for this absolution: but the Pope would not yeeld thereto. In conclusion, there passed many treaties, oaths and promises; but at length (through the instant suit of the said MARY, and of ADELAYS Earle of Saxony, and, as some say, of INES the Emperours mother also) the Pope, admitting the Emperour into his presence, absolved him: but whereas he had depriued him of his Empire, and had laid other penalties vpon him for former matters, he referred that to the judgement of the next generall Councell, which should presently be called; and the Emperour promised to stand to the Councels arbitrement, and to banish from his company CINCIVS, who seised on the Pope in Rome, and some excommunicated Prelates.

The Emperour continued some daies in those parts (as some write; expecting when the Pope would haue come forth of that City; imagining that he, trusting to the peace, might haue bin apprehended) and departing from thence, he went to Paula in Lombardy, where the before-named CINCIVS died; and the Emperour, by reason of the great abundance of rain which fell at that time, made his abode there for certain daies: in which he was giuen to vnderstand, that

The Emperour Henry the Fourth excommunicated the Pope.

The Emperours submission, who came 3 severall daies barefooted to the city gates wherein the Pope was sitting for absolution.

A Councell held in Germany against the Pope.

Rodolph Duke
of Saxony chiefen Emperor.

to Duke of Suenia Empe

A battell between the Emperor and the Duke of Saxo-nia.

in Germany the Saxons and other his enemies (among which were BARTOLD Earle of Carinthia, the Duke of Baniere, RODOLPH Duke of Suenia, and others) rebelled against him; and assembling themselves together (denying him their obedience) made the Duke of Saxony Emperor, of whom we haue hitherto made mention; who was a man of the greatest accompli- both for power and valour, of his time in Germany. This (after the Abbat WESPERGANGS his computation) was in the year of our Lord 1079, and in the twentieth yeer of the reign of the Emperor HENRY the Fourth.

These newes being brought to the Emperor HENRY (as hee was a man of an high minde and great courage) with the greatest fury of the world hee departed towards Germany, and by the way gathered together all such his friends as took his part, which were many: and RODOLPH, assisted by the Saxons and Suenians, accompanied with some Princes and great Prelates; the most cruell war began between them two, that had been euer seen in Germany, which lasted full four yeers. In the beginning whereof (besides sundry conflicts and accidents of warre, whereto either of these Emperors did set their hands) they came to a pitched battall, Armie against Armie: which because that their forces were in a manner equal, and both the Generals very valiant, was very doubtfull and bloody: HENRY to defend the Empire, and RODOLPH to get the same, did both that day marceiles in Armes in their owne persons. Finally, authors affirme, that either partie fought with such resolution, that hauing spent the greatest part of the day, the battell was ended without any certaine appearance of victory, both Campes remaining full of dead and wounded bodies; and each Generall was constrained of necessity to withdraw his Armie from the other, to refresh and relieue his troups; but yet the warre ceased not.

In the meane time both these Princes sent their Ambassadors to the Pope, either of them entreating him to condemne the other: and the Pope returned Ambassadors to both these Princes, requiring them both to lay downe their Armes, and HENRY (according to the agreement made with him in Lanusio) to permit a generall Councell to be held in Germany; and that either of them should stand to such arbitrement, as by that Councell should be concluded. RODOLPH accepted these conditions; but HENRY answered that he was not bound thereto, except the Pope would first excommunicate RODOLPH; and so prosecuted the warre with greater resolution then before. The Pope receiving this answer, sent a new excommunication against him, and ratified the election of RODOLPHVS; to whom (as IOHANNES DE COLYMA, ANTONINVS, VINCENTIUS, IOHNCYSPINIAN, IOHNCARTON, and many others doe write) he sent a Crowne, wherewith he should be crowned, with this inscription, Petra dedit petro: Petrus diadema Rodolpho.

After this, both these Emperors resolved againe to try their fortunes by battaille; notwithstanding that it was in the midst of winter, which was no lesse cruell and doubtfull then the former, but rather more, and therein (as saith PLATINA) was as little signe of victorie, as in the last; some authors attribute the victorie to RODOLPH, and others to HENRY; the cause whereof was (as saith the Abbat WESPERGANGS and some others) for that in the beginning RODOLPH's vauntguard of Saxons was put to flight, and HENRY prosecuted the victorie: wherein the Duke of Bohemia, who bare RODOLPH's imperiall standard, made a great shew of his valour, which standard his successors afterwards bare in the wars, in remembrance of this victorie. And in the meane season, RODOLPH's arierguard spoiled the Emperour HENRY's campe, and so they might well retire without any defeat, and either party might pretend to haue gotten the victorie: this is the cause why it is so diuersly reported. But howsoeuer it was, HENRY was wounded, although not dangerously, but yet the war ceased not; for shortly after either of these Emperors reinforcing his Army, desired to fight the third battaille, with power against power, (notwithstanding that betweene them there were daily some encounters) and neither partie refusing the fight, the two Armies ioyned, and they fought with greater furie then at any time before: for the harmes which were done, and the slaughters of their people of either side were so great and so many, and their hatred and malice was growne to so high a degree, that they thought on nothing else but how to kill and destroy; with this desire and rage they maintained the fight: wherein after the death of an infinite number of men, and the effusion of much blood, HENRY obtained the victorie, and RODOLPH was ouerthrowne, and lost many of his Saxons, which were very good men, but notwithstanding RODOLPH's ouerthrow, yet (as a valiant Prince) gathering his forces together, and reinforcing his Armie, he retired into Saxony, which was his best refuge: where were some treaties of peace

A third bat-
telle betwene
the Emperour
Henry the fourth, and Rodolph Duke
of Saxony.

and of a composition to be made betweene the Emperor HENRY and him; which tooke no effect, for HENRY would not determine the warres, but by the sword: for as he was a man of a great and high minde, so hee refused to subdue all his aduersaries by his power; and his haucie courage was such as could endure no riuall or equal; which through his late victory greatly encreased.

The affaires of Germany standing vpon these tearmes, HENRY still following the waite, fought the Popes destruction, and procured to be assembled in a citie in Germany, such prelates as took part with him, in the name of a Councell; which chose the before named GILBERT Archbishop of Rauenna, Pope (who was Pope GREGORY's capital enemy; and a wicked man, and had laid the plot before mentioned for his apprehension in Rome by CINGIS) hee was called CLEMENT. Hereupon besides the miseries which afflicted Italy began a schisme and diuision in the Church of Rome, for those which took part with the Emperor HENRY held him for Pope. The Emperor at that time sent his sonne HENRY into Italie, there to gouern such estates as were subiect vnto him, and to make warre against such as held with Pope GREGORY: of which that MAWDE (before named) was the principally; who leuied her forces and came to a battell with HENRY the sonne, wherein hee was ouerthrowne: for which the Pope was wonderfully grieved, comparing this ill fortune, with the schisme made by Pope GILBERT. The Emperour was herewith so much encouraged, as leuying the greatest power that he was able to make, he went to seeke RODOLPH, who (as I hauid) was in Saxony, making preparation for the warres, and was already in such order, that he doubted not to fight with the Emperour, in hope to haue ouerthrowne him. And so they fought a most cruell and bloodie battaille, wherein (as then there were no Cannons, Culuerins, Musket shot, or other artillerie, as now is vsed) neither partie wanting either force or courage, or standing in any feare or doubt to come to blowes with the other, with dint of sword and lance, they flew and wounded their enemies; the two Emperours in person fighting in the thickest of the prease. This fight was maintained the greatest part of the day; the end whereof is related by Historiographers diuersly. The most common opinion is, that the Emperor HENRY's Armie was ouerthrowne, and that RODOLPH had the victorie; but he was sore wounded and lost his right hand: some say that hee receiued that hurt by mischance amongst his owne people, which wound bled so much and pained him so sore, that he could not prosecute the victorie, and therefore was constrained to retire himselfe, to a strong castle to be cured, where within few daies after he died. So as the Emperor HENRY of a man conquered became a conquerour: for RODOLPH being miffing, his people disbanded, and so HENRY became Master of the field. Yet BLOONDWISSETH, that the Emperor HENRY fled out of the field the same day wherein the battaille was fought, and lay close in a castle, vntill that he was certified of the death of RODOLPHVS; and that he then came forth to enioy the victorie, through the death of his enemy, whom he had not ouerthrowne. CARTON writes that when RODOLPH was readie to breath out his last (his right hand which he had lost in the battaille being brought vnto him) detesting the wickednes and the treacherie of Popes too late, speaking to a troupe of Bishops which were about him: This is the right hand (sayed he) by the which I confirmed my plighted faith vnto the Emperour. This is an argument of my periuic (you being the motiues) and a testimony of your wicked treacherie whereof you shall giue an account vnto God. RODOLPHVS his seruants going about to burie the body of their deceased Lord, with the ensignes and ornaments of Emperour; some asked of the Emperour HENRY; wherefore he suffered RODOLPHVS to be buried with such honour, seeing that he was a tyrant and his enemy: whereto he made an excellent answer: I would to God (quoth he) that all mine enemies were (like RODOLPH) buried with the ornaments and ensignes of Emperours.

The Emperour HENRY hauing slaine his competitor RODOLPHVS, making small account of the rest, seized Suenia into his hands, and dispossessed BERTOLDVS thereof; to whom RODOLPH had giuen the same, and leauing garriisons in the frontiers of Saxony (which was not yet thoroughly pacified) and establishing the best order he could in all parts of Germany, with his victorious Armie he took his way towards Italy; whither he came within few daies, hauing with him Pope CLEMENT who was chosen in Germany, with a resolution to depose Pope GREGORY; to whose aide the forenamed MAWDE had sent a great supplie of men; and Pope GREGORY had already fortified and victualled Rome: for the Emperour came with so great force and furie, that there was no reason to attend his comming in the open fields; so as without encountering or resistance, he came to the very walles of the citie, whereto he presently com-

A fourth bat-
telle betwene
the Emperour
and Duke Rodolph: and last ende.

A notable signing of the Em-perour Henry
the Fourth.

Rome besieged by the Emperor
Henry,

manded assault to be given: but he found such resistance, that being out of hope to enter it at that time, he burned and spoiled the suburbs and Countie round about, continuing his siege before the Citie notwithstanding; which was one of the most famous that hath beene scene before any City in the World, as well for continuance of time, as for the many accidents and adventures in Armes, for it continued above three yeeres, in which time there were many cruell assaults and sales; and the besieged endured great famine, and want of all things necessary: in the meane time the Emperor made some incursions into Lombardy, and into other parts of Italie: the Germane Pope CLEMENT commanding his Armie in the time of his absence. In this siege the Vatican was taken, wherein are the Popes Palace, and Saint PETERS Church, which were ruined and burnt by the Emperor, together with the best and fairest houses and buildings.

Whilest now the Emperor was busied in Italie, they were not quiet in Germany: for besides the ordinary warres, the Saxons advanced a great man, called HARMAN, to the dignity of Emperour: but this was a matter of small moment which did little disturbe HENRY, for they themselves expelled him. In the end, after so long a time as the Pope was thus besieged in Rome, ROBERT GVISCARD a potent Norman, Prince and Lord of Pulcia and of Calabria, grieving to see the Pope thus distressed, resolved to give over his warres with the Grecians in Dalmatia and in other parts, and (as the Popes liege man) to come to the reliefe of Rome: and to that effect left his sonne BOHEMUND in his place, and leaved forces and other necessities, fit for so high an enterprise.

The newes hereof, being every where published, the Emperor with greater care and circumspection more strictly continued his siege; and using as well policie as force, he caused to be published amongst the Romanes, that his desire was, but to be absolved and crowned by the Pope; and that confirming him in the Empire, he would presently depart from Rome: Whereupon the Pope would not give care, except the Emperour would give securitie for the performance of his promise: For, knowing that all was but dissembling and deceite, he would rather continue constant in his resolution, then yield shamefully to such basenesse, and thereby lose himselfe: But the Emperour used such meanes, that the greatest part of the Romanes (being tired with so long and so cruell a siege) went over to the Emperours Campe; and others promised to tell the Popes his face, that he did ill in not receiuing him into Rome, seeing he promised to depart againe speedily: Besides this, the Pope was certified, that some had resolved whether he would or no, to let the Emperour into the Citie: Whereupon he withdrew himselfe into the Castle S. Angelo, and with him all the Cardinals; and made a Nephew of his, whose name was RUSTICVS, to possesse himselfe of another Castle called Septem Sella, wherein he was well aduised, for the Emperour was presently receiued into the Citie, and with him the Germane Pope CLEMENT, and the said Castles by his commandement were presently besieged, which was in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand fourescore and foure: And the Emperour with great solemnity was anointed and crowned by Pope CLEMENT, more accompanied with men of warre then with Bishops and Prelates. Yet not omitting to batter the Castles, wherein Pope GREGORY and his Nephew were; the assaults given were so furious, that RUSTICVS was druen to yeeld himselfe prisoner: But the Castle S. Angelo was so strong, that the Emperour could not preuaile against it.

The affaires standing in this estate, the said ROBERT GVISCARD so much hastened his coming with so great force, that (as the Italian Authors write) the Emperour durst not stay for him, but giving it out that by reason of some urgent affaires in Germany, it behoued him presently to depart, he left part of his forces for the defense of the Citie, and to continue the siege of the Castle, wherein the Pope was; and fortified the Capitoll, which then was strong, and repaired other towers and fortresses decayed.

The Abbat WESPERGIMUS, and other Germane Authors write nothing of any such feare the Emperour was in, but make mention of all the rest: But howeuer it was, he went out of Italie, and with him his Pope, whom RICHARD Duke of Beneuent did support for a season: Within few daies following, ROBERT GVISCARD came to Rome with all his troops of Normans and Calabrians (it had been better that he had neuer come, as it afterwards happened) and others which came to his aide, to set Pope GREGORY at libertie: for from else where it was not to be expected, for in Gracia the Emperours were at wars: and from France could come no reliefe, for that Lombardy held for the Emperour: and in Spain, the Princes were troubled and turmoyled with warres against the Moores; so as onely ROBERT GVISCARD, had had meanes to doe it and none other: Being come, the Citizens of Rome which had receiued the Emperour, with the assistance of those which he had left in garrison, offered themselves to defend the Citie, so as he entered it by force, with the ayde and fauour of some which were within it. He found so great resistance in his aduersaries, that the two factions oftentimes fought within the Citie, the greatest part of the Citizens taking part with the Imperialists: and there was so great disorder and confusion, that the greatest part of miserable Rome was burned and ruined; for whatsoever either partie gat, they ouerthrow or set on fire: so great was the rage and fury wherewith they made this warre. But in the end ROBERT GVISCARD and the Popes partie preuailed against their enemies, they took, burned and destroyed the Capitoll; and left Rome so ruined, that neither ATTILA, or any other barbarous nation, did euer commit the like spoiles: for at this day there are orchards, vineyards and gardens, where before that warre, were dreeces, houses, Churches and other sumptuous buildings. ROBERT hauing obtained so pitifull a victory, went to the Castle S. Angelo, which vntill then was besieged; and freeing Pope GREGORY from thence, restored him to his seate and palace. But within few daies after, the Pope considering into how miserable and pitifull estate the Citie was brought; by the counsell of the said ROBERT, he determined to absent himselfe; and being accompanied with the same ROBERT, and with his Colledge of Cardinals he went to the Citie of Salerno, where he afterwards died, hauing bene Pope twelue yeeres, one moneth, and three daies: It is written that this Pope was a iust, an vpright, a wise, and a charitable man; and an almes giuer: but it is certaine that he was an obstinate, presumptuous, stout, and firme defender of the Romane prelatie, with the liberties and immunities thereof. BRUNVS, and SIGISMUNDVS report him to have beene both ambitious, a Negromancer, and an Inchaunter; and that he had poisoned seuen other Popes before he could attaine to the Papacie.

Before we proceed any further, it shall be very requisite to make some relation of the Emperours of Constantinople (seeing that we are not to discourse of other kingdoms and commonwealths to the end that hauing ended herewith, we may proceede with our HENRY and the successors of Pope GREGORY. I say then that in the space of seuen and twentie yeeres of HENRY's raigne, little more or lesse, five or six Emperours had raigned in Constantinople, before which time, the Turkes, Persians and other nations made themselves Lords of what the Greekes held in Asia: whose euent was this, as we said in the end of the life of HENRY the Third, father to this HENRY of whom we now write. The better to understand the matter, it shal not be amisse to returne to YSAIVS CONNENVS, who raigned two yeeres Emperour in Constantinople: to whom succeeded CONSTANTINVS DEVA, who in the beginning behaued himselfe very valiantly, subduing and punishing such as rebelled against him, and in the rest was a very deuout Christian: but, being infected with the disease of couetousnes, he was therefore contemned both by his owne subjects, and by the Barbarians; and in his time were lost many Towns in Asia: and in Constantinople was so great an earthquake, that the Churches and other Buildings fell down. And so his Empire being unfortunate, he died in the seuenth yeer of his Raign; and his sonnes remaining his successors, his wife EVDOKIA took vpon her the government, who held the same space of seuen moneths onely: for, by reason of the wars with the Turkes and Barbarians, the Greekes made her to take to husband a great man amongst them, called ROMANVS DIOGENES, to help to defend the Empire, who, not content to gouerne in the behalfe of her sonnes, but proclaiming himselfe Emperour, vsurped the Empire, and going into Asia with an Army against the Turkes, had variable successes, and was sometimes victorious, and sometime vanquished; and in the end was in a battaile ouerthrowne by them, and many of his people slaine; and being afterwards by the Generall of the Infidels well intreated and set at libertie, coming to Constantinople, he found alreadie placed in his throne the eldest of his wiues sonnes, called MICHAEL PARAPINASSVS: And notwithstanding that hee attempted by force to haue recovered the Empire, yet he could not bring it to passe, but was taken prisoner, and had his eyes put out (a crueltie much used in Gracia in those daies) and banished in the habit of a religious man to a certaine Island, where he died, when he had been Emperour about the space of foure yeeres. MICHAEL PARAPINASSVS remaining in the Imperiall throne, grew to be so carelesse and negligent, and therewith of so little worth, that hee applied himselfe to nothing but to making of verses, and to dressing the gown wherewith he was grieved: he held the Empire fix yeeres and halfe, with great losse in Asia, the Infidels conquering many cities thereof: for which cause his subjects rebelled against him, and chose for their Emperour a man of great fame and parentage, whose name was NICEPHORVS BOTANUS.

Rome taken by Robert

Hildebrand, called Pope Gregorie the first, a notable Inchaunter and Negro-magician.

A great earthquake in Constantinople.

who was defended from the Emperor P^{er}otto as above mentioned: this man much honoured the brothers of his predecessor, who in the year 1044, who were the sons of CONRAD and Blondy before named; and giving them offices and commands, to wit: Bohemond and Bohemond; which rebelled against him, for which and other things which he did, he was very ill requited, for they being his sons and brothers, Emperor fought to be his felons; and so the youngest and most valiant of them, called Antioch (procuring friends) deposed him from the Empire, and set the same for himself, when he had reigned three years, causing him to be a religious habit. And this Antioch held the Empire seven and thirty yeres, and fought many battles, both with Infidels and with Christians, but chiefly with Robert, Count of Sicily, and Count of Calabria, who reigned Pope Gregory, as we have related; who also thought to have been Emperor of Gracia, which was he continued with the aid of the Venetians. In this estate stood the affairs of Gracia, at such time as the Emperor Henry the Fourth departed out of Italy, and Pope Gregory the seventh died: wherefore let us now returne to speak of them.

The Emperor Henry the First, being departed out of Italy in such manner as we have declared, and leaving Rome in such combustion as is before said, he came into Germany, where he called a Diet or Councell in the Citie of Metz, as well to justify himselfe concerning such matters as were done in Italy, as to prosecute the warre against the Saxons and their adherents. In this Councell (being perswaded and in a manner compelled by sundry prelates) he yielded to the restoring of some things in the Church, as so decreed that Priests should have no wives, and some other matters; yet he perswaded in supporting Pope Clement, who was chosen against Pope Gregory, and in such other things as before he did. This Councell of Metz being dissolved, the Emperor againe prosecuted the warre against the Saxons, in which betweene both parties costed great spoiles, many slaughters and great batailles and encounters; wherein the Emperor did often hazard his person; and in the most of them fighting most valiantly, obtained the victory, they being of either side great Princes, Captaines, and very valiant men, with many of which he came to an accord in the end; and so grew daily more potent, yet never without enemies. Wherein succeeded many and sundry accidents, which the brevity of the Historie permiteth me not to relate in particular.

In the meane season while he was thus busied, Pope Gregory the seventh died in Salerno, in whose place was chosen (notwithstanding that Clement was still called Pope) an Abbat, called Dionysius, who being installed, was called Victor the Third; This Pope also withstood the Emperors proceedings.

At this time also died Robert Count of Calabria, and of great part of Sicily, to whom succeeded his sonnes, Robert and Bohemond. Victor continued Pope one yere and four moneths onely; and being dead, they chose to succede him, the Cardinal of Hostia, whose name was Onyx and called him Urban the Second; who in the beginning of his Papacie was somewhat troubled in Rome, by some which were Emperours adherents, and took part with Pope Clement, who yet lived, whom a certain Duke of Italy maintained in his Countrey: Whereupon this Pope (for his better safety) went from Rome to the Citie of Melfi; but he after wards removed to the Citie of Placencia, (there to be of the greater power, by reason of Mary, the great Lady so often before named) where he called a Councell, wherein some new orders were made; but he still upheld and maintained the quarrell of his predecessors Pope Gregory and Pope Victor, against the Emperor and his followers: And there also he held not himselfe to be safe, for that the Emperor Henry was of very great power; wherefore he resolved to goe into France, where what befell him you shall understand.

In this place Authors doe greatly varie, in relating the acts of this Emperour: for some make not any mention of his second coming into Italy; others hold it to have bene at this time; and those which write it, agree not well together in the times, neither doe they distinctly set downe what he did there; which hath bene a great trouble to me, and hath bred a great confusion: wherefore let the reader passe it over as he may, for I cannot certainly auerre, which accidents preceded the other.

The Abbat Wespergus, and Blondy say, that the Emperor Henry after that he had buried his first wife, whose name was Berry, and had married againe the second time, came into Italy, and made his abode there about seven yeres, making warre against the Popes dominions in his own person, and that he took many cities by force; among which were Montes and Ferrara, which were held by Mavv. And Blondy likewise affirmeth, that others write that these cities were in the same warre recovered by Mavv, by the suffrance and ayde of Conrad the Emperours eldest sonne, who openly favoured her and the Pope against his father: whereupon (they say) Mavv grew to be so hardie as to ioyne all her owne forces, with the power of his friends and allies, to stop the Emperours passage to Rome; and that she fought with him and overthrew him; so as he was constrained to depart out of Italy. Howsoever it was, among such diversitie of opinions, the truth is, and is approved by all without any difference, that in this time the Pope being come into France, he called a generall Councell in the citie of Clerevaunt, in the yere of our Lord 1094: where having treated of many things concerning the faith, he attempted the greatest matter that ever any other Pope had done; which was, the conquest of Jerusalem, and other cities in the East, which of long time had been subject to Mahomet's successors; and he solicited the same in that Councell, with such instance and efficacy, and his speeches so incensed the hearts of the people, that many great Princes resolved to undertake the action: for out of France, Spain, England, Italy, and Germany, there went so many, that all writers affirme, they did exceede the number of three hundred thousand fighting men, which took for their devise the signe of the Crosse: the chiefe Commanders of the onefide, were Peter the Hermit, and another great Lord Duke of Lorraine, called Godfrey of Beillon, and his two brethren, the one called Eustace, the other Baldwin, and with them other great Princes: And on the other side went Henry, brother to the French King, Robert Earle of Flanders, Robert Duke of Normandy, Stephen Earle of Chartres, Raymond Earle of S. Giler, and Bohemond Prince of Otranto in Italy; and others of equall and inferiour degree.

Popes

Some taking their way through Germany, Hungary, and Gracia, passed over into Asia; and others through Italy, (taking for their good speede, the Popes blessing with them, who then was Urban the Second) and passing the seas, they divided themselves into two Armies, although not without great trouble and difficultie; the cause whereof was Alxius Emperour of Constantinople. In the end, these troops passed over into Asia, and made cruell warres in sundry parts, principally in Syria, and in India: This was one of the greatest actions that ever was; which I forbear to write at large, as well for that it maketh nothing to my purpose; as also, for that so great an enterprize deserueth a particular historie; but the successe then was, that after many batailles, having taken many cities, and continued the warre the space of three yeres, the citie of Jerusalem was taken by Godfrey of Beillon, the Duke of Normandy, and the Earle of Flanders, and others, in the yere of our Lord, one thousand ninety and nine, upon the 15 day of Iuly: four hundred and ninety yeres after that it was first taken by the Sarazins, in the time of the Emperor Heraclyus.

The citie being taken, the sayd Godfrey was made King thereof; and of all the countrey round about it. Other of the Princes and Captaines before named, remained Lords and gouernours of other great cities and townes in Syria; yet many of them returned to their countreys, after the performance of so honourable an action; among which were the Eatles of Flanders, of S. Gils and others: And the war continuing, this kingdom remained in him, and his successors, the space of fourescore and eight yeres; which being expired, through the weakness, and dissension among the Princes, it was againe lost, in the time of the Emperor Baris. As Ross, as hereafter you shall understand.

Let us now returne to our discourse of the Emperor Henry, who at such time as these matters passed in Jerusalem, being returned out of Italy, the last time that euer he was there; wherein he then left his eldest sonne Conrad for his Lieutenant; assembling then some of the Prince Electors in the citie of Culen, hee labored to haue his sonne Henry to be chosen King of Romanes, whom he had already made Duke of Franconia (which was his house and patrimony) which Henry was his second sonne, and whom hee loued best. When this was made knowne to his eldest sonne Conrad, hee was much discontented and grieved at his fathers proceedings; and therefore resolved openly to denie him his obedience (as to an Emperour; which was a Schismatike, and excommunicated) and so hee seized into his hands all the Lands of the Empire in ITALIE, finding all men well affected thereunto for the hatred which they bare to his father; and he held the same nine yeres with the title of King of Italy; his father either dissembling, or not daring to come against him. And they say that he gouerned as a wife and vertuous Prince: at the end of which time, he fell sick and dyed.

R r

about

Council of 1094 the conquest of the holy Land.

Many Authors

write of this war, as Abbas

Wespergus, in the life of Henry the 4th.

Paulus Emilius

in his fourth

booke of the history of France.

Metulian his third booke of the history of Anien.

Blondus in his fourth of his second Decade.

Antoninus.

Platina.

Sabellicus.

Nauclerus.

The death of Godfrey of Bouillon.

about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand and twentie: and at the same time died GODFREY the new King of Ierusalem, whom his brother BALDVIN succeeded, and Pope VRBANE the Second likewise died in Rome, and there succeeded PASCAL the Second: and within few daies after died CLARENT, who was made Pope by the Emperour: and after his deceale, the Earle of Capua, and others attempted to make one ALBERT Pope; and afterwards one THEOPHILACTUS: and in Ravenna one MAGNIFOLVS, a man of great courage and power attempted to haue made himself Pope; but none of all these continued long: and so PASCAL remained Pope in esse, who performed great matters both touching the spirituality and temporality, in reforming the corruption of manners, and recouring and defending the patrimonie of the Church: which the Emperour could not hinder, as he would haue done; for at that instant, his sonne HENRY (being desirous to rule) rebelled against him, and warres began betweene them two, which were more then ciuill, which I will breefly set downe. The Emperour HENRY (the better to assure himselfe in his estate) procured his sonne HENRY to be choſen King of the Romanes (publishing that he meant to go into Italy) and summoned a generall Councell to be held in Rome, with intent (as some write) to haue depose Pope PASCAL. The Pope being aduertised hereof, he presently excommunicated him: for which cause, after many accidents which happened (which for breuitie I ouerpasse) by the aduice and counsell of some of the Princes and prelates of Germany, his sonne HENRY began to take Armes against him, pretending that he did it, for that his father was disobedient to the Church, and that he abhorred his Simony, and other crimes which hee laid to his charge: and in short space vnder this pretence (which as is most likely, was rather to depose his father, then for any loue he bare to the Pope) he grew to be so mightie, that his father offered him large compositions, to reduce him to his obedience; which taking no effect (for the son was resolu'd to be absolute) they took Armes, and each of them assembled their forces and leuied Armies and began to make cruel war one against the other. The sonne was aided and assisted by the Dukes of Baviera and Saxony, and by other Princes and great cities; and the father by the Duke of Bohemia, and the Marquess of Austria, with other mightie Dukes and Earles. In the beginning, neere the citie of Ratisbona, with the aide of those of that citie, the father obtained the vpper hand against the son, so as he was drinen to retire to reinforce his troups: afterwards much desiring a bataille, the sonne came against the father, in whom his men now for his old age had lesse confidence then in former times. And the Armies and Emperours drawing neere together, they stood the space of three dayes continually in fight the one of the other, marshalled, and readie to fight; a little riuer being betweene the two Camps, where were many skirmishes, in which died many notable personages; and both father and sonne being resolu'd to fight, the night before they should haue fought; LISOPOLVS the Marquess of Austria being wearie of the fathers quarrell, holding it vnfruitfull, counsell'd him to withdraw himselfe and not to fight; but seeing that his aduice was not accepted, hee retired with all his forces, and the Duke of Bohemia being aduertised thereof, did the like, and presently after this there came a gentleman of his sonnes troups, to warn him to looke to his person, and to take heed whom hee trusted, for hee was in daunger: whereupon the old Emperour, with some small troups of horse, and those the best that he could chuse, forsooke the Campe, and went into sundrie parts, exploring aide and succours. The sonne by reason of the fathers flight, seized into his hands the best and most of the cities of Germany, and the most of the Princes came to his side: and then he went against the citie of Spire (wherein his fathers treasure and iewels lay) and took the same.

After this were moued some treaties of peace betweene the father and the sonne, which was concluded vpon condition, that they two should meete in the towne of Binge, which lieth vpon the Rhine side, before that the Councell should be assembled, which the sonne had promised to be called, of all the Princes Secular and Regular, to bee held in the citie of Mentz, the next Christmas following; which was in the end of the yeere of our Lord one thousand, one hundred and fise, and the beginning of the yeere one thousand one hundred and six. They two meeting there, the sonne protested that hee pretended nothing but the peace of the Church of Rome, with a reformation of abuses in Germany; that his father should be absolved and reduced to the Popes obedience; and that hee neuer meant to bereaue him either of title or dignitie of Emperour, but that he should set matters in such order as was conuenient. The father promised to do all that he ought to doe, and offered more then hee either would or could performe: but the one distrusting the other, the father said that he would stand so that which the estates should conclude in Mentz, and in the best maner he could, departed

Henry rebelled against his father the Emperor.

A bataille fought betweene the father and the sonne.

departed thence to a strong Castle, where he made account to liue in safety in the meane time. But the sonne being there with his troups, hee shut vp all the waies and passages towards that Castle, in such sort that the Emperour could haue no conference with any, without the knowledge of his sonne. Some authors write, that he was taken and committed thither prisoner by his sonne; and that his sonne made him to renounce the Empire, and that he afterwards died in his power. But the Abbat WESPERGENSIUS (an author of those times) and OTHER FAISINGENSIUS, and the most and best Historiographers write, as I haue related it.

Christmas day being come, all the great Princes of Germany met in Mentz, excepting the Duke of Saxony, who could not come, by reason of his great age, and with him Pope PASCAL'S Legates; where the said Legates (as it was thought) not without the sonnes consent and procurement, againe pronounced the Popes censure against the father, and all such as took his part: and as they debated hereof, and of the Emperour which was in the Castle (who offered to performe what they required, humbly suing for absolution, for which purpose he desired to come to Mentz) the sonne protested that he neither desired, neither pretended any other thing, but that his father should reform himselfe, and become obedient to the Church of Rome, but in truth the issue did manifest, that his principal intent was to make himselfe Emperour. The Popes Legates answered to the Emperours offers and promises, that they neither could, neither had authority to appoint any penance for the Emperour, neither could they giue him any absolution, but that it must be done in a generall Councell, and that by the Popes direction, as it had been decreed by GREGORY the Secuenth concerning his deprivation, and all the rest. Matters standing in this estate, all men were now most affected to the sonne, and desiring to winne his grace and fauour; for they saw that he was mightie and victorious, and the father as he was a man of great courage, comming to haue put himselfe into Mentz, many Princes and prelates went forth to meete him, and perswaded him, that vnlesse he would wholly bring himselfe to ruine, there was no remedie but to renounce the Empire to his sonne, and to repose his trust in him.

The Emperour
Henry the Fourth renounced the Empire to his sonne.

HENRY seeing himselfe thus distressed, and finding no redresse or counsell in any body, accepted hereof, as some say voluntarily, as being tired and worne out with wars and troubles. Finally, reposing his trust in his sonne, or in despair by reason of the soleme decree, hee resigned his title to the Empire to his sonne HENRY; and sent to him from the Castle wherein he was, the Crosse, the Lance, the Scepter, the Globe, the Crowne, and his other Imperiall ensignes and ornaments: which renunciation being receiued in the Councell, by a generall consent HENRY the sonne was choſen and created Emperour, and called HENRY the First, after the Germane, and fourth after the Italian writers; for they allow not of HENRY the first, as is before said: and the election was confirmed and ratified by the Popes Legates; and like an Emperour, in that Councell he treated with the Popes Legates, and with the Princes of Germany, of all matters spirituall and temporall, concerning the Empire: and for his Ambassadors he sent certaine men of great account and authority to Pope PASCAL, and so continued and was held for Emperour. But before many daies were past, the father seeing himselfe deprived; and his sonne exalted, repenting, secretly sought and procured friends, to the end to haue been restored; and wrote to the French King, and to other Kings and Princes, complaining of his sonne, alleging that he was forced to what he did; and standing in some good hope, he openly shewed his intent, and leuied men of warre, the Duke of Lorraine taking his part, and some others, with the cities of Colen and Gulike, and other imperiall townes.

Henry the First deposed Emperor.

The sonne hauing intelligence hereof, againe raised great forces, and desiring to haue gone to a Councell in the citie of Liege, he sent three hundred men at Armes to take a bridge vpon the riuer of Maze, all which were either taken or slaine by the Duke of Lorraine, who tooke the fathers part, and came vpon them at vnawares: whereupon HENRY the son proclaimed him traitor, and deprived him (being absent) of his Duchy of Lorraine: in the meane time, the father entred the citie of Colen, fortifying and furnishing the same with men and munition, and thence went to haue put himselfe into the citie of Liege, whither the Councell was called, which is a most strong citie: in hope (as hee was a man of great spirit) to haue been restored, hauing some other assistance, besides those already named; principally amongst the common people, by whom he was wel beloued, they being moued thereto with compassion to see him deposed. The sonne with his forces went against the citie of Colen: and they within it fearing the siege sent Letters and messengers, in generall both to him and to all the estates, in the name of his father, complaining in that he was thus deposed and decciued; and laying great matters to his sonnes charge, hee excused and iustified his owne cause, so much as he might, desiring to be

Henry the Fourth deposed the Emperour.

R r z

relieued;

relieved: whereto the son made answer, reciting his fathers excess, his simonie, his schisme, and rebellion committed against the Pope and Church of Rome, to the general prejudice of the states of the whole Empire; protesting further that what he did, was to doe God service, by obeying his Vicar, procuring the vnion of the holy mother Church of Rome, with many other matters which the Abbat WASPERSIS, BLONDVS, and other authors do set downe at large. Finally, he sent him word, that he should not dote by reason of his old age, but that he should come priuate, and aske forgiveness of the Church; and that then the equitie of his cause should be heard, both for himselfe, and for all the princes which were with him. The father not onely refused to follow his sonnes direction, but ill entreated his Ambassadors; so as they could hardly returne to their Campe before Coleu in safety. Whereupon the Sonne (seeing that hee could not take that Citie in any short space) hee marched with his army towards Lorraine; and before his departure, sent a second ambassage to his father, the effect whereof was, that if he desired iustice, he should peaceably come to the Councell, which he summoned to be held at Aken: if otherwise, he gaue him to vnderstand, that by the consent and will of all the Princes, he was resolved to make warre vpon him, as against a common enemy. These Ambassadors came to the citie of Liege, where HENRY the father then lay; who was so enraged with his sonnes answer and resolution, that he did and said many things in furie. Matters standing in this estate (whereof it was both thought and feared, that great warres, troubles, and other evils would haue ensued) it pleased God to take compassion of his people, which by reason of the cruel warres betweene the father and the sonne, endured daily grievous and intolerable oppressions, robberies, and irreparable calamities; which was, by taking the old Emperor HENRY out of this world; which happened on the seventh day of August, about the fiftieth yeere of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and six. It is written, that he died of passion and griefe to see himself (as it were) a prisoner, and besieged in that castle, and deposed and forsaken by his owne sonne and blood. By the discourse of this Historie, it may seem to the Reader that the Emperor HENRY was an vnworthie and ill deseruing Prince, considering that he was excommunicated by the Pope, and his Empire giuen to an other, his onely Sonne took Armes against him, his Nobles rebelled, his subjects forlooke him, and in a manner all the world abandoned him, being in the end forced to resigne the Empire to his Sonne, and the Imperial ensignes and ornaments violently wrested from him: yet for the Readers better satisfaction, I will set downe what CARION (whom MEXIA voucheth among his other Authors) writeth of him in thre tearmes. Thus dyed HENRY the Fourth, a valiant and warlike Emperor, most louing to his Countrey, the last reuenger of the Imperiall Maiestie; who when hee had fought 62 batailles, hauing felt the sharpest stormes of aduers fortune, yet he was neuer daunted nor dejected, neither did he euer abandon or betraie himselfe, or those things which concerned the Maiestie of the Empire by the constitutions of his Predecessors. The dead bodie of the Emperor HENRY, was buried by the Bishop of the place where he died, in a Monastery; from whence (by the decree of the Prelates, and consent of his owne sonne) it was afterwards removed, to the end, that (as a man excommunicate) he should not be buried in Christian buriall, and was caried to Spire, where, in a prophane place, was made for him a marble sepulchre, wherein he lay fye yeeres; at the end of which time it pleased the Pope to permit him to be buried in Christian buriall. This Emperor had two sonnes, and three daughters by his first wife VERBA, who was the daughter of a great Marquesse in Italy, allyed to the Lady MAVVD: his sonnes were CONRADE, who died before him, and HENRY the Fifth which succeeded him; his daughters names were INES, which married with FREDERICK Duke of Suenia, and was mother to the Emperor CONRADE the Second; and LIMPERO which married with the Duke of Carinthia, and SOPHIA, which was wife to the King of Hungary. In Constantinople at this time raigned ALEXIVS, whose Empire continued seuen and thirtie yeeres, and hee died afterwards in the time of HENRY the Fifth: and to him succeeded his sonne CALIOIANNES, as hereafter you shall vnderstand.

THE
LIFE OF HENRIE. THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRE-
SCORE & FOVRTEENTH ROMAN

Emperour; And of ALEXIVS and CALOI-

ANNES in Constantinople.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

HENRY having taken vpon him the government of the Empire, after that the death of his father was known, all the Cities and Princes, which had bin his adherers made their peace with him, and became his subjects. He sent Ambassadors to the Pope, promising to become his good Sonne; to whom he granted to call a Councell, wherein all matters concerning the Church should be reformed, chiefly those which were introduced by his father. He committed the Count Palatine to prison, by reason of some alterations, and made wars against the King of Polonia, who insulted himselfe King, and subdued him; but not without great difficulty. He came afterwards into Italy to be crowned by Pope Pascal: and being come to Rome in S. Peters Church, he seized vpon the Pope, and committed him to prison, sacking Rome and the territory thereof; neither would he release the Pope until that he had confirmed his priuiledges of investing Prelates in the Benefices of Germany: the Pope being out of prison, and the Emperor returning crowned in Germany, the Councell did annulle the authority giuen him of investiture. At Mistrey granted by force: which when he understood, he was incensed and committed the Bishop of Alencon to prison, who favoured the Popes party. But the Emperor coming into that City the people remained and apprehended him, and would not release him, until that he had promised to set their Bishop at liberty. He was afterwards excommunicated and in danger to haue bin deposed from the Empire, but leaving Germany, he went to Rome, where he found not the Pope, neither would he come thither so long as the Emperor was therein; neither would he giue credit to his promises, or believe any thing that he said. He againe returned the third time into Italy, and set a schisme in the Church, and understanding of the Popes coming against him, he returned into Germany, and then made his peace with the Pope lastly, humbly submitting himselfe to him. There ensued in those parts a very grievous famine, and a pestilence, and the Emperor falling extremely sick, dyed, without leaving any Sonne to succeed him; when he had raigned Emperor, little less then twenty yeeres.

IN that I was longer then ordinarie in writing the life of the Emperor HENRY the Fourth, whom the Italian writers call the Third, I haue already made my excuse; which was, for that he raigned a long time, in which many great accidents happened: and as hee was a most warlike Prince, valiant, and high minded, so his raigne was troublesome and vnquiet: by reason whereof, all men (excepting some few which tooke his part) were well pleased with his death, which (as it then seemed) brought to the estates of Italy and Germany, a cleere skie and desired, after the cloudie stormes of cruell combustions: and to his sonne HENRY, who was Emperor in his life time, all lay smooth before him: Colein, and all the other cities which had held against him, submitted themselves, yeelding their obedience; and the Duke of Lorraine submitting himself, sought his grace and fauour, and so he became absolute

Lord over all: and then sent Ambassadors to Pope PASCAL, who with the assent of his Cardinals and of the Emperours Ambassadors, summoned a Council to be held in October, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and six, in a citie of Lombardie called Gardacastello, vpon the river of Po; where many things touching the state of the Church both in Lombardie and in Germany were reformed: and the Pope deposed such as were not confirmed by his authority.

In the second yeere of this Emperour HENRY (the better to corroborate the peace betweene the Pope and him) it was agreed that the Pope should come into Germany to the citie of Augsburg; where the Emperour (for certaine daies space) expected him: but the Pope vpon some ieaiousie & reposing final trust in the people of that citie, by reason of their ancient haired, came not, but went into France, where he assembled a Synode in a citie called Treves; whither came a great number of prelates: and in that Council amongst other matters which therein were handled, it was ordained, that the Emperours authoritie concerning the prelaties and Church dignities in Germany, should be abolished, and that he should not therein inuest prelates, contrarie to the Popes Canons and Decretals: which when he understood, he sent to the Pope, intreating him not to determine so of the matter, but to allow him such right of donation, as his predecessors had done to the Emperour CHARLES the Great. This matter was greatly argued, but in the end it was deferred till the next general Council, and so the Pope returned to Rome, and the Emperour in his progresse visited sundrie cities of Germany; and vpon some occasion apprehended the Count Palatine of Rhine, whose name was SIGISBERT, and for a time held him prisoner: I call him of Rhine, for the difference betweene him and other Counties Palatine.

At this time ALXIS King of Hungary, came vnto him to complaine and to desire iustice against his brother COLOMAN, who had deposed him, and made himself king; whereupon the Emperour entred Hungary with an Army, purposing to haue restored him: but through want of victuals, and by means of other disasters and disgraces which befell him, he was driuen to retire without effecting aught, and so COLOMAN enioyed the kingdom, the Emperour permitting the same. There likewise grew warre betweene him and the Duke of Poland, who with out his leaue, entitling himself King, denied to pay him any tribute, or to be subiect: to which warre hee went with a mightie Army (it behoued him to do so, for hee was to encounter a mightie enemy) and some write that they came to blowes, and that the Emperour had the victorie: but not without much bloodshed and great difficultie; and so Poland returned to the Emperours deuotion, and paid the tribute accustomed. In these actions and others of lesse moment, the Emperour spent little lesse then five yeeres, which were in the beginning of his raigne: in the end of which, moued with a desire (common to all Emperours) to be crowned by the Pope, he resolved to come into Italy, and to that effect ordained a Diet or Council to be held in Ratisbon; wherein shewing his intent, his departure by common consent was generally applauded: and leuying thirtie thousand choise men (besides the Princes and other voluntaries, which had a desire to serue and follow him in that iourney) he came into Italy, where other troupes of the states of Lombardie ioyned with him, and by the way befell many accidents, which I omit to relate such as were of most importance.

Afterwards taking his way towards Rome, many ambassages passed betweene him and Pope PASCAL; he requiring to be crowned, and the other promising the same; but vpon condition, which was, that he should relinquish his demand concerning the inuesting of prelates: about this matter some things so fell out, that the Pope grew ieaalous and mistrusted the Emperour. But in the end the Emperour promising to maintaine and obserue the priuileges and immunities of the church of Rome, and to desist from inuesting of prelates, as is aforesaid, the Pope sent a solemne ambassage to meete him, offering him amiable and friendly entertainment. Whereupon he came to the citie, vpon the twelfth day of February, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and eleuen, being the first Sunday in Lent, where he was solemnly received by all the Clergie and Romane people, with the greatest prouision, and shew of joy, that the Pope and citizens could possibly make, and the Pope accompanied with all his Cardinals, attended his coming in SAINT PETERS Church porch. The Emperour with his Princes and men of warre being entred the gate of the Castle S. Angelo, alighting, mounted vp the steps to meete him, and kist his foote: and the Pope blest him, and raising him vp, three severall times embraced him; and then they went together into the Church, and comming to the high Altar, where the Pope that day was to say Masse, they sate downe vpon seates prouided for them; where the Emperour

Emperour againe desired the Pope to confirme the priuileges which he and his predecessors had held, concerning the nomination of prelates, and the donation of Benefices; which the Pope absolutely denied. Some authors say, that the Pope requested the Emperour (in performance of his promise) to renounce the right which he chalenged to haue in ecclesiasticall causes; and that the Emperour therewith displeased, arose, and with his Germane Bishops and Princes went into a chappell from whence he sent him his answer; and denying what was required, persisted in his demand concerning the confirmation of his priuledge: so as there was much strife and contention about the matter.

Some report this after another manner; which is no great marvel though it so happen amongst Historians; seeing that we daily read, that when sundry men haue seene a matter which hath happened in their sight, yet the same men which then were present, haue afterwards related it after diuers manners, each one pretending to tell the truth. I say this, for that some men are so hard of beleefe, that if they finde any contrarietie amongst writers, they account the whole Historie to be a lie: which is too great a seueritie. But returning to my storie, I say, that although they differ herein, yet all Authors agree, that vpon this occasion the Emperours Captaines and Companies entred the Church; and the Masse being ended, by the Emperours order, the Pope was apprehended, together with the most part of the Cardinals, and that the Germans made boote or prize of the Bishops, Priests, and other the Popes friends.

The Citizens and people of Rome, tooke this in such disgrace, that bating them to their weapons, they went against the Imperialists, which held the Vatican; where, fighting with incredible furie, they forced the Emperour to abandon that part of the Citie, and to withdraw himselfe to his Campe; betweene whom and the Citizens for three or four daies space, were great skirmishes, and much blood was spilt, and many men were slaine of either side. Yet BLOONVS and some others report, that during the three daies that the fight lasted, the Emperour held the Vatican, and that he being vnable to defend it, abandoned the same and went vnto his Campe, leading the Pope and his Cardinals with him prisoners. Finally, these three daies being past, he removed his Armie, and pitcht his tents at the foote of Mount S. Syluester; and so marching forwards, left the Pope with some of his Cardinals in a place of strength; and theret he left in another place, guarded with great troupes of souldiers, and then marched vp and downe the Countrey, burning and spoyling the Castles, Townes, and Villages, neere thereabouts; and so within some few daies after, with great furie returned to Rome, and sate downe before it; but the inhabitants were resolved not to receiue him, except hee would first for the Pope and his Cardinals at liberty: But he persevering earnest in his demand, would haue his request first performed; imitating (in the action, although not in the intent) the Patriarch IACOB, who wrestling with the Angell, said, I will not let thee goe, except thou first bleste me. Wherefore the Pope to auoid further inconueniences, and to get out of the Prison wherein he was detained, came to a composition with the Emperour, and confirmed to him the priuilege of inuestiture which he required, and admitted and allowed those prelates which the Emperour had preferred and inuested. And so all being concluded, the Pope was conducted to Rome: and at the day appointed, the Emperour entred the Citie, and came into SAINT PETERS Church, first setting a good guard in the Ports and Turrets of the Vatican; and with the accustomed solemnitie was therein by the Pope crowned, with apparance of very great joy and gladnesse generally, by reason of the wished peace, after so long and tedious warre.

The coronation being ended, the Emperour (taking his leaue, and the Popes blessing with him for his good speede) departed from Rome very peaceably; and so passing through Italy, and the estate of Lombardie, he returned into Germany; where hauing made sufficient prooffe that his father dying, and acknowledging his fault, desired to be forgiven, he obtained leaue to burie him in the Church; which was performed with accustomed solemnity; and in Italy and in Germany generally was peace.

A little while after this, died that great and mighty Princeesse MARY, who was Lady of many Townes in Italy: This Lady after her death, left a great part of her estate to the Church, among which, is reckoned the Citie of Ferrara: but the Emperour FREDERICK neuertheless afterwards challeged to be her heire, by reason of the alliance betweene her and his mother. The Emperour being in England (solemnizing his marriage with another MARY, daughter to the King of that Countrey; Pope PASCAL at the request and perswasion of his Cardinals and Clergie, summoned a Council of Bishops and Prelates of many Nations; in which

The Council of Treves.

The warres of Hungary.

The warres of Poland.

The Emperour
Henry the Fifth
came to Rome.

Pope Pascal apprehended by the Emperours
Henry the Fifth.

Pope Pascal being released from the Emperours prison, crowned him Roman Emperor.

Mary the Empress daughter of Henry the First, King of England, and wife of the Em-perour Henry
the Fifth.

Councell (amongst other matters) it was concluded; that the privilege granted by the Popere the Emperour, for the inueſting of Biſhoppes and other Clergie men, ſhould be reuoked, and held for none; ſith it was exacted by force, the Pope being then his Priſoner; and for ſuch they declared and publiſhed the ſame, excommunicating the Emperour, if he perſiſted in the execution thereof: in this Councell were one hundred Biſhops, ſome Archbiſhops and Patriarchs, and all the Cardinals.

This being made knowne to the Emperour, he was much diſcontented for the ſame; and much more, after that he vnderſtood that many of the principall prelates in Germany tooke part with the Pope againſt him, and had left his ſeruiſe; amongſt which was ALDBERT Archbiſhoppe of Mentz, a very mightie Prince, whom the Emperour commaunded to be apprehended, and held him about two yeeres Priſoner; whereof enſued many great tumults: And ſome Biſhops were ſo hardie (being authoriſed by a Cardinall Legate in Hungary) as to excommunicate the Emperour: The number of thoſe which conſpired againſt him, daily encreaſing, he fearing the like fortune as befall his father, appointed a Councell to be called in the Citie of Mentz, there to treat of thoſe affaires, offering to ſtand to that which ſhould be determined; and to right any wrong that he had done.

The day appointed for this Councell being come, and the Emperour therein appearing, ſo few made their repaire thither, that he was therewith much troubled, and highly diſcontented, and therefore with greater inſtance procured the aſſembly, but it little auailed him: for before they could come, the inhabitants of Mentz mutined againſt him, as well for that he held their Biſhop Priſoner, as for that in former time in the warres betwene him and his father, that Citie had endured much loſſe by his means: whereupon they putting themſelves in Armes, went to the palace where he was, whereof they became maſters, and of his perſon alſo; and threatening to kill him, they made him to promiſe ſatisfaction for the loſſes and injuries they had received, and that he ſhould preſently ſet their Biſhop ALDBERT at libertie: all which he promiſed and confirmed with an oath, in ſuch manner that they holding themſelves ſatisfied, left the Palace; and the Emperour departed, and in performance of his promiſe, preſently releaſed the Archbiſhop: but yet notwithstanding he continued much diſpleaſed, for the ſame done him in that Citie, and no leſſe with them which failed to come to the Councell. The next yeere, which was in the yeere of our Lord, one thouſand, one hundred and ſixteenth; he holding his Chriſtmas in Spire, many prelates aſſembled themſelves in the Citie of Coleyn, and with them ſome Princes, with a reſolution to ſeek to deprive him, for that he was excommunicated, and diſobedient to the Church of Rome: which he (to his great diſliking) hauing vnderſtood, and deſiring to redreſſe the ſame, ſent his Ambaſſadors to that aſſembly, promiſing to beare what ſhould be impoſed, and proteſting that he was in all points ready to ſatiſſie the Pope: but his Ambaſſage was ill received, and as ill answered; for they ſent him word, that he ſhould make his peace with the Pope, and conſorme himſelf to his will, otherwiſe, they would neither ſerue, nor obey him, but generally would all forſake him. Whereupon hee tried his friends, ſeeking ayde by all meanes poſſible; and as Princes neuer faile to finde ſome to helpe and aſſiſt them (ſome of duty, and others in hope of gaine) he gathered many men together, thinking to effect his buſineſs by force: and depriving ſome of his aduerſaries, which held with the Pope againſt him, of their eſtates, beſtowed many graces and fauours vpon his followers; and leauing a great Armie, reſolued to goe into Italy, as well to be ſarre abſent from the fury of Germany, as for that he purpoſed (as he gaue it out) to come to ſome agreement with the Pope: for he had newes (which were certaine) that through factions and partialities in Rome, which aroſe for that the Pope would not beſtow the Prefecture, or office of Lord Preſident, vpon the ſonne of him which laſt preſided, the moſt part of the people rebelled againſt him, and fought with ſuch aſtook his part; and the matter came to this iſſue, that it behoued him to leaue Rome, and to goe into Pulis, where he was harbourd by WILLIAM the Feudatorie Duke thereof, and by ſome other Princes.

The Emperour coming with his Army into Italy, he tooke his way directly for Rome: yet ſome write that he firſt ſent his Ambaſſadors to the Pope, and requiring abſolution vſed ſome complements; but for as much as he would not make ſuch ſatisfaction as was required at his hands, the Pope would not abſolve him.

Others write, that the Emperours Ambaſſadors found the Pope in Rome, and that he vnderſtanding of his coming, would not ſtay for him. But howſoeuer it was, he came to Rome with his wife without any reſiſtance (but yet he found not the Pope there) hauing firſt made cruell warres in the territories of the Church as he came: And pretending that his coronation was violent, and done by force, although by the Pope, he therefore made himſelfe to be crowned againe by an Archbiſhoppe, whoſe name was MAURICE DE BRACHIA, whom he brought with him; the whole Clergie, together with the people of Rome murmuring thereat.

This being done, he departed thence, and made very cruell warres againſt all ſuch towines as held for Pope PASCAL: But knowing that through his abſence Germany was like to bee loſt, for (as all writers aſſume) at that time juſtice and equitie took no place, and there were ſuch warres, factions, robberies, inſolencies and other diſorders, as cannot be recited: Wherefore he marched with his Armie thitherwards, taking his way through Lombardy. Comming into Germany, with the aid of FREDERICK Duke of Suenia, and of CONRAD Duke of Prussia, which were his Nephews (being his ſiſters ſonnes) and of ſome other Princes which followed him, without any ſtay he went to make warre againſt the Duke of Saxony, who reſcuing his obedience held for the Pope; with whom he fought a terrible battail, and had the victory; whereby his power and authoritie greatly encreaſed with thoſe which had rebelled againſt him.

While theſe things paſſed in Germany, Pope PASCAL came to Rome, and after ſome troubles which there aroſe, he departed out of this life, hauing been Pope thirteene yeeres and a halfe, in the yeere of our Lord, one thouſand, one hundred and eightene: and in his place was choſen a Cardinall, whoſe name was JOHN, and was called GELASIVS the Second. About this time alſo died ALEXIVS the Emperour of Conſtantinople, and to him ſucceeded his ſon CALIOANNES, as I haue ſaid.

The Emperour hauing receiued newes of the death of Pope PASCAL, and of the Election of GELASIVS (ſeeing himſelfe excommunicate, and ſhunned by many prelates and Princes, which neither ſerued him, nor ſaw him, although they warred not againſt him) ſetting the affaires of Germany in the beſt order he could, with a great Army, he came the third time into Italy, addreſſing his way to Rome, where Pope GELASIVS durſt not ſtay his coming; for in Rome were partialities and factions againſt him. Whereof the Frangepanes (who were many in number, and of great power) were the chiefe; yet ſome others tooke his part, as the Colis, the Normanes, the families of the Leoni, and the Colunneci, which then beganne to grow great.

The Pope being fled from Rome in his Gallies downe the riuer of Tiber; the Emperour comming thither, he pretended that the Election of GELASIVS was inſufficient, for that he was choſen without his conſent, and therefore procured ſuch Biſhops and prelates as were of his faction, to make that MAURICE, who (as I ſaid) crowned him, Pope; and they did ſo, and called him GREGORY, who being inſtalled and lodged in the papall Palace, abſolued the Emperour, and confirmed and ratified his donations and inueſtures: And hauing ſet vp this new Idol, whom the Romanes in diſgrace called Bardinus, the Emperour recommended him to the protection of the Frangepanes: who were ſo much diſcontented with the Election of GELASIVS, that they would haue killed him; and then tooke the field and ſpoiled the Lands of the Church, to make his Pope GREGORY Lord thereof. Which Pope GELASIVS vnderſtanding, with the aide of WILLIAM Duke of Pulis, ROBERT Duke of Capua, RICHARD, and other great Lords of Italy, he leuiſed ſuch an Army, that the Emperour doubting what would follow, publiſhed, that ſith he was abſolued of his excommunication, he meant to returne into Germany. And being departed, Pope GELASIVS (leauing the Army which he had raiſed) came to Rome, where, betwene ſuch aſtook part with him, and the Frangepanes, which held with Pope GREGORY, were ſo many encounters, and ſo many men ſlaine, that he was driuen to forſake Rome, and (in a manner) to ſlie into France, where he died in the Monaſtery of Clunia, hauing been Pope almoſt one whole yeer and a halfe.

He being dead, CALIXTUS the Second was choſen, who before was called GUIDO; and before his coming to Rome, the Anti-pope GREGORY BYRDINO, departed thence, and went to a Towne that was called Sutrie, where what happened to him, you ſhall hereafter vnderſtand.

The Emperour to auoide loſſe of time, preſently when he came into Germany beſieged the Citie of Mentz, againſt which hee bare an old grudge, for the injury which he had received: and holding it ſtraightly beſieged, ſundry inſurrections were rayſed againſt him; for ſuch as before had ſhewed themſelves his enemies, feared that he would now be reuenged on them all: Wherefore

Wherefore with him, and against him, were euery where making of parties. ALDEBERT Archbishop of Mentz, with the aide of the Duke of Saxony, and of other Princes and Prelates, had a great Armie in a readinesse: and of the contrary side, the Duke of Suenia, and others, had no lesse on his behalfe, in such manner as it was feared that great warres would haue ensued. But the Emperour (being perswaded by some, his loyall seruants, and certaine other Ecclesiasticall persons, which interposed themselves) inclined to peace, which was treated of; and all the differences and controuersies were referred to the arbitrement of certain Princes of the Empire; and a Diet or Councell was appointed to be holden in the Citie of Wittenberg, wherall controuersies should be decided and ended: and it was so. And those which were appointed to be Arbitrators and Iudges of this controuersie, and of the rest, being there assembled (and certaine Legates, as some say, being also there from Pope CALIXTUS) it was by common consent determined, that through all Germany a generall and vniuersall peace should be proclaimed and kept: between the Emperour, and all the Princes both Ecclesiasticall and Secular; and that the Princes in like manner should maintaine the same peace amongst themselves, vpon paine of death: And that whatsoever was taken from any Church, should presently be restored: and that the like should be done by any thing withheld from the Emperours chamber of accounts or Exchequer: And that the like should also be done between all estates, which had taken aught (from other) by violence: And that all matters in controuersie should be speedily decided: And that iustice should be equally administred in all parts: And that all offences and wrongs past should be forgiven and forgotten: And that theues and robbers by the highways, should be sought out and punished: And that such order should be taken, that the country should be maintained in peace: For the due execution whereof, the most sufficient personages that could be found, were appointed; and euery where was done all that was possible to further the same.

As touching the excommunication and the Popes fulminations and censures; and the differences between the Emperour and him, all was referred to be at Pope CALIXTUS his order and discretion; to whom the Emperour sent Ambassadors about the same in great humilitie.

This being ended, Pope CALIXTUS sent his Legate Alatre, and Ambassadors Cardinals, to another meeting or generall Diet held at Wormes; the Emperour being there present, where peace and concord was concluded between them: And the Emperour acknowledging the Pope for Christs Vicar here on earth, and vniuersall Pope of the Church, desired abolution; and resigned into the Legates hands, all the right and title that he could pretend to the inueſting of Prelates, and donation of any spirituall dignities; and then gaue vp the possession of all Townes and goods belonging to any Church; and bound himselfe to vie his best meanes, that if any other Princes vsurped any, they should be restored; and himselfe to be obedient to the commandements and Injunctions of the Church, and to aide, protect, and defend the same. The Decrees and Letters-patents made hereof at large, were carried to the Pope, who allowed thereof, and gaue his Bull; whereby he granted that all the Prelacies and Abbeyes which in Germany should be voided, should be provided by the Election of the Chapters of the same Churches, and that the Emperour might be present at the Election: provided alwaies that it should not be made by force, or for bribes, or through any other kinde of Simonie; and that hee which was chosen might recieue from the Emperour, all that was merely Laicall or Temporall, but must haue recourse to the Sea of Rome for the rest, according to the Popes Canons.

This being ended, the Emperour and all those which stood excommunicate, were publickly absolved, and then the Letters-patents and instruments were solemnly read; which befell in the Month of September, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, twenty-two: But thus (saith CARION) the Constitutions and Imperial Lawes made by CHARLES the Great, and maintained for the space of three hundred yeeres, by the seditious conspiracy of his owne subiects, and a fatal successe, in fauour of the Popes, almost in an instant, were made void and ouerthrowne: What miseries fell both vpon Church and Common-wealth by this grant; What mischiefs Popes haue done, being armed with this tyranny; what did they not attempt to ouerthrow the authority of Emperors, being much shaken: Finally, how often by their cruell practices, Germany being in combustion, hath taken Arms against it selfe, and imbrued her self, with her own blood, our fore-fathers haue felt and lamented: By pretext of this Session, the Popes haue violently taken the lawfull power of the Keyes of the vniuersall Church, and haue

ſlayned

ſlayned themselves to be diuinely conſtituted Lords and Iudges of all Churches, Bishops, Pastors and Kings: Finally, of the whole Christian World, in all causes whatsoever: they forced Bishops to take the power of their administration from them; and to the Keyes they added new diuine worship, and the making of new Lawes, which whoſeuer should inſurre, it was lawfull for them to declare them members cut off from the bodie of Christ; ſeditious Hereticks, Schismaticks, and to damne them perpetually: Finally, by the weapon of excommunication, they haue vsurped earthly poſſeſſions, and haue ſettled and diſpoſſeſſed Kings.

The Emperour from thence went to Norrenberg, from whence he diſpatched the Popes Legates very well contented, with great gifts and preſents both for the Pope and themselves, and they returned to Rome: By reason whereof Pope CALIXTUS and all the Romish Court made ſhew of great joy, for the recovery of their loſt ſattee Sheepe: and truly they had great reason, for it much imported them; and they recovered him but by great good hap.

In this time ROGER Earle of Sicilia, who afterwards was King, and very mightie, being vncle to WILLIAM Duke of Pavia and Galabria, knowing that WILLIAM was gone to marrie with the Emperours ſiſter of Conſtantinople, came into Italy, and by force rooke all that his Nephew held there; and hauing made himſelfe Lord thereof, he was called King, of Italy; and afterwards leauing the title of Italy, he was called King of Sicilia: I haue reduced this to memory, to the end that the Reader may haue the better light of what ſhall be ſaid hereafter; and may alſo vnderſtand, that his ſucceſſors haue bene euer ſince called Kings of both Sicilies, which are Naples and Sicilia.

The Emperour HENRY being reduced to the Popes obedience; in liſtle more then two yeeres which he liued afterwards, he had two warres, the one againſt the Hollanders, and the other againſt LAWES the French King: Againſt the Hollanders he went with an Armie, and ſubdued them; againſt the King of France he leued a great Army, in the behalfe of his father in law, HENRY King of England; and marching towards France the warre ceaſed, and he returned: for the Citie of Wormes rebelled, and he went thither, and beſieging it, tooke it by compoſition, and puniſhed the offenders.

At this time in Remedied Pope CALIXTUS, when he had bene Pope fix yeeres, within two moneths; and in his place was choſen LAMBERT Biſhop of Hofia, and was called HONORIUS the Second. CALIXTUS before his death ſent a great Army, vnder the command of a Cardinal, againſt Pope GREGOIRE who liued in Sutria; which beſieging the place, tooke him priſoner, and brought him to Rome; where he was ſhamefully to diſgrace him) made to ride vpon a Cammell, and the Pope granted him his liſt vpon condition that he ſhould ſpend the reſt of his time in a Monafterie.

In Germany the Emperour applied himſelfe to purchase the good will of his ſubiects, and to make himſelfe well beloued; taking warning by his fathers ſucceſſe. But there befell in all that Countrie ſo great a peſtilence and famine, that it was thought (as all writers affirme) that the third part of the people periſhed: for which calapitrie and affliction, the Emperour being very ſorrowfull, fell ſick, and within few daies died, penitent for his ſinnes, deſiring God to forgive the ſame. And although it pleaſed God to giue him a good death, yet he left neither ſon nor daughter that might ſucceede him, but two Nephewes which were his ſiſters ſonnes, the mightie Dukes of Suenia, and of Franconia, the one called ROBERT, and the other CONRAD: ſome Authors call CONRAD Duke of Suenia, and others of Franconia. He died the firſt day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord one thouſand one hundred twenty and ſix, when he had reigned about twenty yeeres: and thoſe which account but fourteen, reckon but from the time of his coronation in Rome; but I euer make my account from the day of his Election: His body was embalmed and borne to ſpire, and there buried amongst his Anceſtors.

When the Emperour HENRY died, in Conſtantinople reigned CALIOIOANNES, who was an excellent Prince and very neceſſarie for that Empire. Hee was very liberal, loved iuſtice and equitie, and obtained many great victories in Aſia againſt the Turkes and Perſians; and recovered from them many Cities which his father and predeceſſors had loſt: His brother LAWES being General of his Armies, whom hee deereſly loved, and leued Italian ſouldiers in ſteed of Greekes. But with theſe vertues, enuying the Warres and Conqueſt which were made in Aſia, hee did greatly hinder the French and others which went thither; and for the ſame occaſion fell at variance with the Venetians, which

The Emperour
at ſecond from the Popes excommunication.

2509 Earle of Pavia and Galabria

The death of the Emperour Henry
the ſixt.

1724

The Emperour
reconciled to the Pope.

22

which tooke from him by force certaine Ilands in the Archipelagus : of his end shall be spoken hereafter.

At this time in Ierusalem beganne the order of the Knights Templers, and also the order of the Knights of Saint Iohn, called afterwards of Rhodes, and now of Malta, where they inhabit.

The beginning of the order of the Knights Templers, and of the Iohns of the Rhodes.

THE LIFE OF LOTHARIVS, THE
SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSORE AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN Emperour; And of CALOIOANNES, Emperour of Constantinople.

()

THE ARGUMENT.

HENRY the first being dead, Lothary Duke of Saxony was chosen Emperour; against whom Henricus Nepheues (aspiring to the Empire) in the beginning of his raigne rebelled, who after many fortunes of warres, in the end became his subiect. He came into Italie, to the aide of Pope Innocent, against a Pseudo-pope which had driven him out of Rome. The Emperour was no longer returned into Germany, but the other Anti-pope, whose name was Anacletus (through the fauour and assistance of the King of Sicilia) made Pope Innocent to flee : Whereof the Emperour being advertised, he returned into Italie, and restored Innocent to his seate, and named Roger King of both the Sicilies. But returning victorious towards Germany, he died in the Mountaines of Trent : when he had ruled the Empire fourteene yeeres, leaving neuer a sonne; that might succede him in the Empire.

same reason, the two brothers fought by all means that the one of them might haue bene Emperour, and with all their might withstood LOTHARY. These two brothers (as I said) were Nephews to the Emperour HENRY the First, and his sisters sonnes, who was the daughter

ter of the Emperour HENRY the Fourth. LEOPOLD Marquesse of Austria, and CHARLES Earle of Flanders, by reason of their estates and power, sought also to haue gotten the Empire. These foure great Princes being competitors, by the procurement and industry of ALBERT, Archbishoppe of Mentz, who remembering that he had bene imprisoned, and ill treated by HENRY, for contradicting his friends; found meanes to draw the Princes Electors to meete at Mentz, where they chose LOTHARY Duke of Saxony, Emperour. Where-with CONRAD and FREDERCK were so much discontented, that in lieu of doing him homage as to their Emperour, they rebelled against him as their enemy : and in him wanted neither will nor industry to persecute them.

Lothary the second chosen Emperour.

First, he sent to Pope HONORIVS the Second, to complaine of them; who approued, and was well pleased with the election of the Duke of Saxony; for as much as by that house the Popes had euer been relieved and supported; wherefore he might easily obtain of the Pope, to command them (by his censures) to yeeld their obedience. But these two brothers (taking Arms) found so many friends, and their Lands and Countries were such and so great, that a cruell warre began between them; which I omit, for that I finde it briefly written : yet it continued many daies, and came to that issue, that CONRAD the elder of these two brethren, with the help of his brother FREDERICK, and of GODFREY Count Palatine of the rhine, was called Emperour : and raising the greatest power that he was able (leaving his brother in Germany to make head against LOTHARY) he went into Italy, and took many Imperiall cities in the State of Lombardy; where the Archbishop of Adrian crowned him with the Crown of iron; by reason whereof, Pope HONORIVS afterwards depri'd him of his Archbishoprick, and set another in his place : and the Emperour LOTHARY being thus distressed, knowing that HENRY of Bauiere (who was called the Proud, and was descended from the lineage of the famous GYLFHONS; of which, the Abbat WESPERGANSIS and other Authors make so great account) was a mighty Prince and very valiant, he practised with him to marry his one daughter, whose name was GERTRUDE; and to the end that he should be a faithfull and loyall seruant vnto him, he gaue him with her for her dowry, the title and succession of the Duchie of Saxony, which after his death he enjoyed, and was Lord of both estates : yet afterwards in proceesse of time there were alterations in them, and in others; whereof I will make no speciall relation, for that it requireth too long a time : yet I will sometimes speak thereof as occasion shall be offered.

of the Duke of Bavaria for the Duke of Saxony

The Duke of Bauiere, and other Princes now helping the Emperour with all their powers, made cruell warre in CONRAD's Countries, whilst that he was buisie about his Coronation in Lombardy, with intent to haue gone to Rome. But as he had leuiued mo men than he was able to pay, and wanted meanes to giue them satisfaction, he was driven to return into his Country, and to join with his brother; and being returned, was not of power able to make head against the Emperour, or at the least to go through with what he had begun : whereupon he sought to make some agreement with him, and to obtain his fauour; which was effected (as faith the Abbat WESPERGANSIS) at the intercession of Saint BERNARD, he renouncing the name and title of Emperour, and giuing other security to serue him as a Subject: the like did his brother FREDERCK. And so ended the Emperour LOTHARY this warre, which (as he writeth) was very bloody : during the which, in Rome died HONORIVS the Second, hauing bin Pope siue yeeres; and to him succeeded INNOCENTIVS the Second, a Roman born, who as soon as he was Pope, resolved to haue driuen ROGER Earle of Sicilia out of Pulia, where ROGER was called King of Italy (as I said in the end of the life of the Emperour HENRY) hauing taken the same from WILLIAM, who was his Nephew, or (as some say) his cousin germane : and leuying a great Army for those warres, he went thither in person. But for as much as Authors differ in the recitall thereof (the Italians accounting it to be at this time, that the Pope was taken prisoner there : and the Germanes affirme it to haue happened in the time of CONRAD the Third, who succeeded LOTHARY) we will therefore leaue it vntill that time; in which it seemed most likely to haue passed.

But here we will speake of another disaster, which befell Pope INNOCENTIVS; which was, that with the fame of his imprisonment, or (as I rather beleue) of his death; a mighty Roman, of great power, whose name was PAVR LEO, came to Rome, publishing the news thereof; and procuring fauour and assistance, was chosen Pope, and called ANACLETVS; who taking all the Gold and Siluer out of the Temples and Churches, and giuing the same to his followers, grew to be of such power, that Pope INNOCENTIVS being returned to Rome, could could not make his partie good against him, but was constrained in a manner by flight, to get him into France, and from thence into Germany, to the Emperor LOTHARY; who by reason of the peace and agreement between him and Duke CONRAD, was growne very rich and of great power; who giving him very good entertainment, offered to goe in person to restore him to his estate: and although that the affaires of Germany were not yet thoroughly settled, yet he in short space made ready a faire Army, and they both together departed towards Italy, but by seuerall waies, diuiding their Army, to the end to march the more commodiously: and againe meeting neere to Rome, were there receiued; where Pope ANACLETVS durst make no resistance; whom his friends had hid so secretly, as at that time, he could not be found; which was in the sixt yere of the Emperours raigne: And so with great solemnity Pope INNOCENT was restored to his chaire; and with the like or greater, the Emperor LOTHARY was by him crowned; and within few daies after, returned with his Army into Germany, not finding any contradiction or resistance.

SC

The Emperour LOTHARY being arriu'd in Germany, and hauing by the consent of the Princes thereof summoned a Councell to bee held there: By the Authority of the Empire, hee resolved to goe himselfe in person against the Duke of Polonia, because hee refused to pay the Tribute, in acknowledgement of superiority, which he ought for the space of twelve yeeres behinde-hand, unpaid: But the Polacres not daring to stand to the hazard of Warre, the Duke accompanied with men of peace, came forth of his Countrie to receiue the Emperour; whom the Emperour would not see, neither admitte into his presence, before such time as hee had paid him all the arriereages due for so many yeeres past; and the Duke accomplishing the same, came to see the Emperour in the Duchie of Saxony; whither being come, and hauing promised to perform the premises, he return'd home in peace.

At the same time the King of Hungary sent his Ambassadors and presents, in acknowledgement of superiority. Pope INNOCENT in the meane time had ill successe; for within few daies after the Emperours departure out of Italy, and that he had called a Councell to be held in the City of Spire; Pope ANACLETVS aforesaid (through the fauour and assistance of his friends and kinsfolks, and of ROGER which was called King of the Sicilies) returned againe to Rome, and tooke vpon him as Pope, being already Lord of the Citie, and of some other townes: whereupon Pope INNOCENT sent to the Emperour, imploring his aide and succor, to restore him to his dignity.

The Emperour setting the affairs of Germany apart, and raising a greater Army then at the first, within short space came into Italy; with whom (besides those which the Abbat WESPERGONVS setteth downe) came his sonne in law HENRY Duke of Baniera, with great and very good troups of men of warre: OTHO FRISINGENSIS saith, that CONRAD Duke of Suenia, which in former time had bene his enemy, came with him also: and being arriu'd in Italy, entring Lombardy, he found great warre and dissension between the Cities of Cremona, and of Milan, and he as soueraigne Lord, tooke vpon him to decide the cause of their difference; and finding those of Cremona to be faultie, he proceeded against them; and they rebelling were by him subdued by force. From thence he went to the Citie of Parua, and so to Bolonia, visiting and pacifying the other Cities of Lombardy; which through ciuill contention, and the long absence of the Emperours, were in a manner at liberty, and tyrannized; all which he subdued and brought to subiection: and from thence (sending his sonne in law with the one halfe of his Army into Tuscane, to receiue the Pope, which lay in Pisa) he himself by another way went with the rest into the Marca di Ancona, wherein he assaulted and tooke many townes which rebelled; as well against him as against the Church of Rome; which he recovered and restored. Afterwards joyning with the Pope and with his son in law HENRY, he took his way towards Rome, where he restored the Pope to his seate and Palace; and thence marched forwards, to warre against ROGER, who with the helpe of his friends and subjects, had raised a great Army, vaunting in braue tearmes, that he would fight with the Emperour. But ROGER shamefully retiring without daring to meete him, put his men into garrisons, to defend his countries; but the Emperour followed the warres with such expedition and courage, that within short space he became Lord of Pulia, and Calabria, and of all the rest that ROGER held; and constrained him to flie out of Italy, and to get him into Sicily. And to the Emperour his being there came Ambassadors from CALOIOANNES Emperour of Constantinople, to congratulate his victories obtained against ROGER, whom he much hated, and against whom he had afterwards great warres.

Roger King of Sicily a German out of Italy.

At this time died the Antipope ANACLETVS. And so the Emperour finding no resistance in Italy (hauing subdued the rebellious, and rewarded and honoured those which had faithfully serued him, in such manner that they write of him, that since the time of CHARLES the Great, not any Emperour had euer liued there in so great power and authority) he returned into Germany: but before his departure, he bestowed vpon a great German Prince, who was his neere kinsman and favorite, whose name was RAYNOLD, the State of pulia, with the title of Duke thereof, which he tooke from ROGER. About which gift, notwithstanding that the Pope was well content therewith, OTHO FRISINGENSIS (who was an eye witness and an Author of those times) writeth, that there was some difference betwene the Emperour and the Pope: The Pope alleging, the Countreies of Pulia and Calabria to be subject and feudatory to the Church of Rome; and that the fauor and title which was giuen to RAYNOLD, should haue bene giuen by him, and not by the Emperour: but in the end, a meane was found, that it was done in both their names; and the Armes and Ensignes of Duke, were giuen to RAYNOLD by them both; and so RAYNOLD remained a Duke; and the Emperour departing, left many good men of warre with him, whereof he afterwards stood in neede, as you shall heare: And so leauing the Pope in Rome, he returned towards his countrey, triumphing of his victories. Vpon the way coming to the Mountaines of Trent, he fell so grievously sick, that vnable to trauell any further, he died in a little village, in the thirteenth yeere after that he was chosen Emperour, and in the seuenth after his coronation in Rome, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred thirty and eight: his body was carried into Saxony, and there most sumptuously entombed, and by his death grew great alterations, both in Italy and Germany, as shall be related.

He left no more children behinde him when he died, but his only daughter GERTVDE, who (I said) was married to HENRY Duke of Baniera; for his onely sonne called LOTHARY died a child before him.

In the time of this Emperour (as he was a great Iusticer) the lawes and institutions collected by the Emperour IVSTINIAN, were againe reuiued and tooke effect; which through the diuision and declining of the Empire, were growne out of vse, and in a manner quite forgotten; and VERNERVS whom ACVSIVS (a glosser vpon the ciuill law) calleth YRNERIVS, sought, and tooke out of the auncient Libraries, the bookes of the lawes which IVSTINIAN had compiled, and abbreuiated out of the institutions of the Pretors and Ediles, and auncient Emperours; which lay forgotten, and euen lost: and hee corrected and reduced the same into the best form he was able; which the Emperour LOTHARY commanded to be read in Schooles, and that all Pleas should bee determined by them; and so it is obserued vnto this day.

Within a while after this, these lawes beganne to be glosed vpon by Azo a famous Doctor; and afterwards succeeded ACVSIVS; and they haue still so increased, that since that time there haue been many great and famous men in that facultie; which hold the greatest authority and degree in the estate and government of all Common-wealths. In Constantinople yet reigned CALOIOANNES, warring against the Infidels, and against ROGER King of Sicily.

Roger King of Sicily a German out of Italy.

The death of the Emperour Lothary.

1133

A reformation in the ciuill law.

The beginning of the ciuill Lawyers.

THE

THE
LIFE OF CONRADE, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSORE AND SIXTEENTH ROMAN

Emperour. And therein is treated of CALOIOAN-NES, and of his sonne EMANVEL, Emperours of Constantinople.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

After Lothary succeeded Conrade, Nephew to the Emperor Henry the Fifth, who was chosen by the Electors, and confirmed by the Popes Legate. He was in the beginning of his reign disturbed by the sonne in law of Lotharius, who withheld from him the Imperiall ensignes; and not only refused to deliver them, but also to yeelde him any obedience; whereupon the Emperor proclaimed him Rebelle, and tooke from him by force many estates: but this war had so many variable accidents, that the Emperor therein spent seven yeeres, during which time, he took no great care how matters went in Italie. He went to the warres of the Holylands, and being comm into his enemies Countreys, received so great an overthrow, that scarcely remained the tenth man of those which went with him. After this rout, he prosecuted his attempt, in company of the French King, from whom he afterwards departed; holding his being with him for dishonourable. He returned thither the third time, and together with the Kings of France and of Jerusalem, did nothing of any account. Afterwards, fith it pleased not God to fauor the proceedings of the Christians in this enterprise, neither of the Princes returned into his Countrey: And the Emperor being comm into Germany, whilst he was making preparation for his going into Italy, he was crowned, died (as many men thought) of poyson, in the sixteenth yeer of his reign.

13
I haue already related how that the Emperor Lothary married his only daughter to HENRY Duke of Bauiere (called the Proud) who was a valiant and mighty Prince; and that he gaue him the title of Duke of Saxony, which was his house and patrimony; and that this HENRY did him great seruice in his journey into Italy, and also against the two mighty brethren, CONRADE and FREDERICK, Dukes of Suenia and Franconia, who were his enemies a long time: for when Lothary was chosen Emperour, they thought to haue had it for one of themselves, being Nephews to the deceased Emperor HENRY the Fifth, and Grand-children of the Emperour HENRY the Fourth. When-as the Emperour Lothary was dead, his sonne in law HENRY Duke of Bauiere, who came with him, and was already called Duke of Saxony, gat into his custody the Imperiall Ensignes; as the Scepter, the Croffe, the Crowne, and the Globe, imagining that he should haue had vse for them; for that he thought to haue bene Emperour, but they were of little vse to him: For the two brethren, CONRADE and FREDERICK Dukes of

of Suenia and Franconia (afore named) were of so great power and authoritie, as assembling the Princes Electors in Confluence (where the Riuer of Mosella joyneth with the Rhine, THEODORICUS a Cardinall and the Popes Legate being there present) CONRADE was chosen Emperour, and all the Princes swore to him homage and obedience; which the Saxons and Bauiarians only opposed with HENRY their Lord, and his brother GVELPHO, who was a great and valiant Prince. Whereupon the new Emperour called a generall Diet or Councell to be held in the citie of Bamberg, whither came the widow Emperesse, late wife to Lothary, and the Deputies of Saxony, to acknowledge and yeeld obedience vnto him: But Duke HENRY would not appeare, neither would he send the Imperiall Ensignes which he had in his power: and so by all the Princes there assembled, with the Emperours authoritie, he was enjoyned to appeare and to send the Ensignes afore said, by the feast day of Saint PETER and PAUL then next following; which he did (for he durst doe no other) but would not come himselfe in person: Whereupon the Emperour (desiring to be at peace) after two or three summons, enjoined him, within a certaine prefixed time, to make his appearance in the Citie of Ausburgh; for which purpose he presently caused a Councell to be summoned, and made great preparation, meaning to haue proceeded against him with all rigour and seueritie.

The Councell being assembled, HENRY accompanied with many men of warre, of Saxony and of Bauiere, came neere to that place where it was held, and lodged his Campe, and began to treat of meanes to come to the Emperours obedience; which treaty continued three daies without any conclusion: for the Emperour required him to resigne certain lands which his father in law the Emperor Lothary had given him: but the Emperour holding himselfe not in safety in that Citie, departed without any speech of his removing, vntill he was gone, and went to the Citie of Herbispoli: where many Princes meeting, by the generall consent of them all, he pronounced sentence against HENRY of Bauiere; whereby he condemned him in the losse of all his estates: and many great matters happened, which we will declare, when we haue told you what befell in Italie to the Pope and to Duke RAINOLD, whom the Emperour Lothary made Duke of Pulia and Calabria, with ROGER King of Sicily; which passed in this manner:

As soone as the Emperor Lothary was dead, there grew so great alterations and troubles in Italy, that ROGER in great haste raised his forces, and went into Pulia, with a resolution to haue reconquered those Countreys, whereof he was dispossessed: But RAINOLD had fogood men with him, that he fought with him in battell, and ouerthrew him; so as he was driuen to returne with losse of part of his Army: And being busied about making new preparation for the same enterprise, RAINOLD died in the time of his good fortune; so as without any great difficultie, ROGER recovered all the Countreys of Pulia and Calabria, which he first tooke from his Nephew, and which had been his grand-fathers. Pope INNOCENT seeing what passed, he sent to the Emperour to desire him to come into Italie, or to send an Army to driue ROGER out of that Countrey: but for as much as the succours came slowly (as writeth GOTHFREDVS VITERBIENSIS) the Pope leuied a great Army, and went against ROGER: but as he was no very expert man of warre, so by a deuce his Army was ouerthrowne, and himselfe together with his Cardinals taken prisoner. But ROGER making a conscience of the matter, set both him and all his Cardinals at liberty: for which his liberality and courtesie the Pope confirmed him King of Sicily; and ROGER as his liege man did homage to the Pope, calling his Countreys the Church Patrimony; and so remayned ROGER and his successors kings of Sicilia, and Lords of Pulia and Calabria, and was a very mighty Prince.

This being passed, ROGER fearing the Emperours comming into Italie, he sent to sollicite HENRY the proud, and his brother GVELPHO, with Letters and money to beare Armes against the Emperour CONRADE, with whom they already had great warres: for HENRY the Proud being condemned by the Emperour, in the losse of all his estates of Bauiere and Saxony; and the Emperour hauing giuen the Duchie of Saxony to ALBERT cousin-germane to the Duke; and Bauiere to LEOPOLD sonne to the Marquesse of Austria (who was the Emperours mothers brother) so as all was in combustion, and the warre was prosecuted with great crutchy, the one party seeking to hold and to defend their estates, and the other to get the same: and he which chiefly followed this warre was GVELPHO, brother to HENRY the Proud; for HENRY now by reason of his old age could not well beare Armes; and hauing provided a very good Armie, the Emperour went against GVELPHO, and fought a battaile with him,

Conrade chosen
Emperour.

Warre between the Pope and Roger King of Sicily: wherein the Pope was o-uerthrowne, and taken prisoner, with all his Cardinals.

Warre between
the Emperour
and the Duke of Baui-ere and Saxony.

Warre between
the Emperour
and the Duke of Baui-
ere and Saxony.

which was very doubtfull, for GVBELPHO was an excellent Captaine and very valiant: but he being ouer-matched, was ouerthrowne, and lost many of his men, both Banarians and Italians; which ROGER King of Sicilie had sent to his aide, and he himselfe escaped by flight. But he was a man of so haughtie a minde, and therewith vied such industry and expedition, that within few daies he reinforced his Army; and fought aide of the King of Hungary, who repined at the prosperity of the Empire, for that he would not acknowledge any superiour: and so to his aide came many Calabrians and Sicilians, sent by ROGER King of Sicilie: and the Emperour of necessitie was driuen to doe the like, and made his eldest sonne called HENRY General of his Army, who afterwards died before his father: and he besieged a Towne called Winperg. And lying before it, his sonne HENRY, neer to a place called Biosen, fought a battaile with GVBELPHO, in which, some of GVBELPHO his partie (which were Italians) cryed, GVBELPHO, GVBELPHO, after the name of their Generall; and the Imperialists cryed, GIBELLIN, GIBELLIN, for that HENRY their Generall was bred vp in a place so called.

The originall of the Guelphs and Gibelins.

Some Authors affirme, that vpon this occasion it afterwards followed, that in the controversies betweene the Emperours and Popes, the Imperialists tooke their name of Gibellins, and the Popes partie, Guelphs. And from hence sprang the cruell factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins in Italie: Heereof are other opinions, which import not much to be treated of in this place.

The battell was very cruell, but GVBELPHO his troups (being of diuers Nations and conditions) did not so well second and relieue one another, as HENRY's did; so as GVBELPHO was likely to haue been ouerthrowne. And finding no other remedie, to auoide a further danger, he abandoned the field, and HENRY apparently had the victory: who after that he left the pursuit, joyned with his father the Emperour at the siege of Winperg; which being greatly distressed, yielded to mercy. But all the grace the Emperour would grant to the inhabitants, was to permit all the women which were in the Town, freely to depart, and to haue to their owne vse whatsoever they could beare on their backs: Whereupon they vied a commendable and memorable deceit, which was, that as they went forth of the Towne, each of them tooke her husband vpon her back, and those which had none, tooke their children or brothers, and so comming into the fields, set them at libertie: and notwithstanding that FREDERICK the Emperours brother alleged that it was deceit and colouage, and therefore not to be permitted; neuertheless the Emperour held it for well done, and commended them for the same. And truly I hold it for one of the most memorable acts done by women that euer I read of.

A commendable deceit vsed by women in Germany.

Through these two ouerthrowes, the partie of GVBELPHO, and of his brother HENRY the Proud, was so broken and weakened, as ALBERT, to whom the Emperour had giuen the title of Duke of Saxony, had time and oportunitie to make himselfe Lord thereof: And LEOPOLD, to whom he had giuen the Duchie of Bauerie, made daily Conquest of more and more of that Countrey. Duke HENRY seeing this, came disguised to such places as held for him in Saxony, where he vied such effectfull speeches, and wrote so pittifull Letters to his friends and subiects, that they being moued therewith, repaired vnto him in such order, that ALBERT was driuen to flie to the Emperour for helpe; and HENRY the Proud hauing this good successe, and being in hope to haue preuailed, died; after whose decease, the Saxons in despite of the Emperour, tooke a sonne of his called also HENRY, for their Lord; and they recovered great part of that estate: But LEOPOLD was seised of the greatest part of the Duchie of Bauerie, who (as I said) was the Emperours mothers brother: GVBELPHO as soone as his brother HENRY the Proud was dead, was called Duke of Bauerie, pretending that it did belong vnto him by inheritance: and many friends repairing vnto him, cruell warres beganne between him and LEOPOLD, and GVBELPHO ouerthrew LEOPOLD in a battaile: The Emperour seeking redresse (to the end he would not at one time haue so many Irons in the fire together) compounded and made peace with the Saxons, marrying the widow Duchesse of Saxony, daughter to the Emperour LOTHARY, with whom HENRY the Proud had that Dukedome, of the greatest part whereof his sonne HENRY was then in possession: and this being effected, he resolved to aide LEOPOLD against GVBELPHO: but in the meane time LEOPOLD died, and with the same trouble his sonne called HENRY had the Duchie of Bauerie, against whom (with no lesse courage and diligence) GVBELPHO prosecuted the warre: But CONRADE assisting his cousin-Germane the new Duke, neither GVBELPHO nor his Nephew

phew HENRY Duke of Saxony, could preuaile against him; notwithstanding that GVBELPHO was a warlike and valiant Captaine.

CONRADE hauing spent fix or seuen yeeres of his raigne in these ciuill wars, a voyage was pretended to Ierusalem, which although it had no great good successe, yet it was good and commendable. And to the end that you may the better vnderstand the same, it shal be requisite briefly to set downe the most important causes thereof, and the estate wherein the affaires of Gracie, then stood, and of Italie also; which was in this manner: The Christians hauing possessed Ierusalem, and many other Cities in Syria and Mesopotamia, now about fixe and forty yeeres, and hauing performed wonderfull matters in their continuall warres against the Infidels, which they waged at what time as CONRADE was busie about this quarrell; FULCO sonne-in-law to BALDVIN, being then the fourth King of Ierusalem, and hauing done great exploits against the Sarazins; there arose some controuersies betweene some Princes, Dukes of certaine places in the East; and so betweene them, and CALOIANNE, Emperour of Constantinople; which gaue occasion to the King of Persia his Captaines, to doe much harme in the countries which the Christians possessed: against whom, FULCO King of Ierusalem made the greatest resistance he was able, and did many worthie exploits.

Then ensued the death of the Greeke Emperour, who had raigned fix and twentie yeeres: And although that hee had troubled the state of the East, yet neuertheless by reason of his great power he was much feared of the Infidels; and died of a small wound giuen him in the left hand with a poysoned arrow: by his last will and testament, he ordained his youngest sonne for his successor, for that his eldest sonne was incapable of the gouernment. The state of Syria being thus troubled, FULCO King of Ierusalem went to encounter a great Armie of Turks and Persians, which came against the citie of Antioch, and ioyning in battaile, ouerthrew and slew threethousand of them: whereupon the Soldane King of Persia, whose name was ALAPH, drew together all his whole power, and came before Edissa, a very mightie citie in Mesopotamia, which the Christians had held fixe and fortie yeeres; which citie by the Iewes is called Aracina, and is very famous, through the fertilitie and greatnes thereof, and for that it was the place, whither TOBIAS sent his sonne TOBIAS to GAERLVS for his mony, and the same was conuerted to the Christian faith by THADVS; and adorned with the bones of S. THOMAS the Apostle, and at this time was inhabited and frequented by excellent Christians: But ALAPH comming in person against it, King FULCO not being able to relieue the citie, it was taken and sackt; wherein the Infidels vied such cruelties and villanies, as haue not been heard of: some writers reckon the losse of this citie to haue happened after the decease of King FULCO: but PLATINA and BLONDVS relate it as I haue done.

After the losse of this citie, another great misfortune ensued, which was the unhappie death of FULCO King of Ierusalem in this manner: As he was busie, applying himself to recouer this losse, and to leue new troups of souldiers, being one day in the fields hunting the Hare, his horse fell with him, and his head fell vnder the backe part of the saddle, wherewith hee was bruised, and so sore hurt, that losing both his speech and senses, hee died within three daies, leauing behinde him two young sonnes, the eldest of which called BALDVIN, had the title and kingdom of Ierusalem; but through the want of FULCO, and other occasions, the Infidels daily took townes, and did much hurt to the Christians.

The death of Fulco King of Ierusalem.

Pope INNOCENT and the Christian Princes vnderstanding how matters went in the East, and being sorie to heare thereof (as in deede they had reason, especially for the losse of the great citie of Edissa) they began to consult of some redresse and reliefe for the same; and as S. BERNARD was then in great credit and very famous, he took vpon him to perswade the Christians Princes, to goe in person to this warre, Pope INNOCENT giuing him in charge to performe that action; which Pope hauing held that seate the space of fourteene yeeres, died (as saith PLATINA) in the yeere of our Lord 1144. and to him succeeded CLEMENT the Second, who was Pope but fixe moneths; and he being dead, LVCIVS the Second was made Pope, in whose time (as saith PLATINA and BLONDVS) S. BERNARD undertook this enterprise; and as others say, in the time of INNOCENTVS. This difference doth not discredit the authors: for the losse of the citie of Edissa, and the death of King FULCO, and other matters which happened in the East, passed at severall times, and might happen in the time of all these Popes, for the small time they liued: for LVCIVS the Second was not Pope fully one yeere, and this was in the time of his successor EUGENIVS. I say then that by meanes of the Popes Letters, together with the perswasion of S. BERNARD, LEUVES who then was King of France, taking for his deuice the signe of the Crosse determined with many great Lords and Knights of his countries, to goe to this warre in the East, in the behalfe of the King of Ierusalem; and leuying an Army, BERNARD went into Germany to the Emperor CONRADE (whose life we write) and obtained of him to doe the like, as the French King pretended to doe: where- to he willingly and speedily prepared himselfe; and it pleased God that this iourney was so well liked of by all men, that notwithstanding that there were very sharpe and hot warres betwene the Emperor, and GUYLPHO with his adherents, yet GUYLPHO notwithstanding offered to goe this iourney with him, and to do him seruice therein. And so the Emperor and the French King (by their Letters) agreed to goe to that enterprise personally. But forasmuch as they both could not conveniently march together in companie, by reason of the great multitudes of their people; it was concluded that the Emperor should first set forwards (and so he did) in the yeere of our Lord 1147, according to most authors, yet some write one yeere lesse; and he departed, accompanied by these Princes, FREDERICK Duke of Suenia, sonne to his brother FREDERICK deceased, the Duke of Lorraine, the Earle of Blanders and Friseland, the Marquess of Austria, and GUYLPHO his former cruell enemy, but then his seruant and companion, whome the Emperor in all that iourney called fellow fouldier, and made great account of his person, with many other Princes and Lords of great account. In this all authors agree, that of the Emperours owne forces, with the forces of these Princes, together with the adventurers, which came from all parts, vpon the report of so zealous an enterprise, his Army amounted to the number of threescore and tenne thousand horse, and (in a manner) as many foote: with which, marching through Austria and Hungary, he directed his iourney towards Constantinople; where he was very ioyfully and honourably receiued by the Emperor EMANUEL, son to CAEOLOANNE; and his troups were lodged in townes and places neere at hand, and staying there some few dayes, he crossed ouer the straight of Constantinople with his whole Armie, with lesse store of victuals then was needfull in such an action, through the Emperour of Constantinople his counsell and default, who promised to furnish him with all things necessarie, and so hee marched through the Emperours Countries, in Asia the lesse, and had Greeces for his guides, such as well knew the Country.

Passing through the Prouince of Liconia, which bordereth vpon Galacia, in the middelt of Asia the lesse, being in his enemies Country in great want of victuals, all his guides in one night forsooke him: which, as some write, was thought to haue been done by the direction of the Emperour of Constantinople, who of malice or enuie repined at this war. Others imagine that they stood in feare, and fled, for that they saw the Army so vnprouided of victuals, or for that they had mislaid of their way: but howsoeuer it was, the Emperour stayed neere to the Citie of Iconium, which is in Sicilia, and (as some say) besieged the same, for that it was rich, well furnished, and of great importance, thinking in short time to haue taken it. But forasmuch as victuals came not according to the trust he reposed in the Greeces, his people within few daies space endured extreame hunger and sickness; and falling sick of the chaule which (as some write) the Grecks did put into their meale, they dyed.

The Emperour seeing himself thus distressed in his enemies countrie, and his friends being doubtfull and variable in their opinions, whether they should goe forwards, or retire (either of which was perillous) in the meane time, so great a multitude of Turks, Persians, and other heathen nations (knowing the distresse wherein the Christians were) assaulted his Campe, in such manner, that his person and Armie were in danger to haue been wholly lost (God in his secret iudgement, permitting it): and the Emperour knowing no better course to be taken, came to a battaile with them; some say two, and that the fight continued two daies together, one after another; and as the greatest part of his Army was sickly, and almost hunger-starued; so after that they had done what they possibly were able, they were broken and ouerthrowne; and so many of them were slaine and taken prisoners, that there remained little more then the tenth man of his Army; with which he elaped by sight, and therein endured extreame hunger and many daungers, and stayed not any where untill he came to the citie of Nicea, in the prouince of Bythinia, in Asia the lesse, which was subiect to the Greeke Empire; where gathering together the remainder of his Army (which from many parts, held by Christians, came thither to him) he determined to attend the coming of LEUVAS the French King, who was alreadye vpon the way. This ouerthrow happened in the month of Nouember, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand, one hundred fourtie and seuen.

At what time as the Emperour CONRADE was thus ouerthrowne by the Infidels, the French

The Emperour
Conrade and Leues King of France went to Ierusalem.

Treatise of the Emperours
guides.

The Emperour
Conrade ouer-throwne by the Saracens.

French King was come from Constantinople into Bythinia; where he had been well receiued and lodged by the Emperour EMANUEL: and within few daies after that the Emperour CONRADE was departed from Germany, POPE EUGENIUS the Third, which succeeded LEUVAS, flying from Rome, came to him in France, by reason of certaine mutinies raised against him in Rome, for the people would haue placed certaine citizens in the government of the citie; and the Pope finding the King ready to depart, encouraged him to proceede in his iourney, and gave him his holy benediction; and the King in requital gaue him men and money, wherewith he returned to Rome, and was with much obedience there receiued.

King LEUVAS of France being arrived in Asia, and vnderstanding nothing of the Emperours misfortune, FREDERICK Duke of Suenia, Nephew to the Emperour, came to him, and certified him of their ouerthrow: wherefore the King hastened his iourney, and finding the Emperour in Nicea, he comforted and perswaded him to proceede in his companie; which he then willingly did, and so they marched together to the famous citie of Ephesus, which is the cheefe of all Asia the lesse, in the prouince of Ionia: where the Emperour considering that hee went not according to his estate and honour, going with so small forces, but rather as a subiect to the King of France, and for some other respects, giuing good words he tooke his leaue of the King, and departed; and drawing neere to the Sea, sent his people by land, and he by Shippe went to stay for them at Constantinople: where dissembling the iniurie he had receiued (or peradventure not suspecting any such matter) he remained the rest of the winter; to the end that reinforcing his Army, he might from thence the next Spring returne to his enterprise.

In the meane time the French King prosecuted his iourney, not without great trouble and losse of many of his men, in a battaile which he wonne; and in another, wherein part of his Armie was ouerthrowne: how it passed I doe not set downe, for that it appertaineth not to my Historie. After this, enduring great toile and dangers, by long iourneys he came to the citie of Antioch, in company of RAIMOND or REMON, Lord thereof, who came to meete him vpon the way, and to doe him honor, from whence he afterwards (as I will shew you) came to Ierusalem.

The Spring being come, and the Emperour CONRADE hauing leuiued new forces, which he ioynd with the remainder of his last Armie; in a great flecte which hee had prepared, with the helpe of the Emperour of Constantinople, he embarked, and came therein into Syria; and there disembarking in a certaine harbour, came with his Army by land to Ierusalem, where, by BALDVIN the King thereof, he was very ioyfully receiued; and within few daies they had intelligence, that the French King was coming thither also: whom the Emperour, and King BALDVIN receiued with great ioy; and then to auoyde losse of much time, they presently took counsell about prosecuting the warre against the Infidels; concluding to besiege the citie of Damasco, from whence (for that it was very puissant and populous) they daily receiued losse, preiudice, and ill neighbourhood: and so taking that obstacle, they resolved to haue proceeded further, which plot was presently put in execution; and the Emperour, and the two Kings departed, with a great and very well ordered Armie, with a resolution, and in hope to haue effected some great matters: but it pleased God otherwise to dispose of their purpose: for being come to Damasco, and hauing encamped themselves on that side of the citie, towards Mount Zibanius, they had many dangerous skirmishes: wherefore (through the aduice and counsell of certaine men of that countrie, which, being corrupted with money by the besieged, desired to deceiue these Princes) they removed their Campe to the other side, and abandoned the most fit place for their siege: whereof it ensued, that the Infidels taking the aduantage of an Hill (which they fortified) did greatly annoy them; and this Hill was so situate, that it stopp the coming of victuals to the Campe: and the besieged defended themselves so valiantly, and famine so much increased in these Princes armies, that it was impossible for them to liue, if they remained there any longer, so as they were perforce constrained to raise their siege, and returned to Ierusalem, sorrowfull and in ill plight, there to consult of what course was best to be taken. In this siege (as faith the Abbat WESPERGENSIUS) GUYLPHO, the Emperours antient enemy (yet then his good friend) fell sicke: and feareing to die if he had staid there any longer, he with his followers tooke shipping and sailed into Sicilia, where recovering his health, through the counsell and instigation of ROGER King thereof, he went into Germany, and there againe rebelling, made warres vpon the Emperours countries.

The Emperour and French King then resolved to returne into their dominions, seeing it pleased not God to prosper their proceedings; and the rather to the end to auoyde innovations

Damasco besieged by the Christians.

The returne of
the Emperour
and the French King from the

and waves of the Holy land.

and troubles that might grow in the countries, by reason of their absence; and they did so, leaving the affaires of the East in as ill estate as they found the same. The Emperor rigging vp his naue, embarked himself with his people, and again took land in Gracia (as saith THO FRISINGENSIS, who accompanied him in all this journey) and in the province of Achaia, met the Emperor of Constantinople: where refreshing himself awhile after his coming from Sea, he departed from the said Emperour, and took his way into Germany, and so ended this religious enterprise, in the fourth yeere after the same began. The French King, within few dayes after the Emperors departure from the Holy land, tooke shipping also; and after some adventures which befell him in the way, arrived in his countrie, in health and peace; and the Emperour againe warred against GVELPHO, to punish him for his rebellion in his absence: but at the entreatie of his Nephew FREDERICK, Duke of Suenia, who was likewise Nephew to GVELPHO by his mothers side, he pardoned him, and graunted him peace, and allowed him certaine lands and reuenues for his maintenance.

At this time came Ambassadors to the Emperour from the Christian Kings, and from the Pope, to congratulate his returne; and hee commanded a Diet or Councell to be assembled in the cite of Confluence, where, after many matters appertaining to the government of the Common-wealth, he concluded to come into Italy, to be crowned (being thereto invited by Pope VABANA before named) and making preparation for his journey, hee was intercepted by death; not without suspition of poyson, given him by an Italian Phisician, through the procurement of ROBERT King of Sicilia; he died in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred fiftie two, in the fiftieth yeere of his raigne (some reckon one thousand, one hundred fiftie and four) and left one onely sonne called FREDERICK, who afterwards being Duke of Suenia, died in Italy: which sonne he had by his wife the Emperesse, whose name was GISTRUDA, an Earles daughter which was a great Lord in Germany, by whom he also had had another son, called HENRY; of whom mention hath been already made, who died before his father the Emperour.

In Constantinople reigned EMANUEL, and held the Empire after this almost thirtie yeeres, this Emperour is reckoned amongst the wicked and vicious Emperors, and is greatly condemned, to haue bene the occasion of the losse of the two Armies, viz. the Emperors, and the French Kings, as we haue already related. For which cause, it is written that ROBERT King of Sicily warred against him: and having taken certaine Ilands from him, he came fo neere to the cite of Constantinople, that the arrowes which he shot, fell within his palace; and they affirme, that he gathered apples from the trees, growing in the Orchards and Gardens belonging thereto. This ROBERT died within a yeere or two after the Emperour CONRADE; and his sonne WILLIAM the First succeeded him.

In the time of this Emperour, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred thirtie nine, died in France, a man called JOHN du Temps, who (as many authors affirme) had liued three hundred sixtie and one yeeres, and had bene an Halberder of the Emperour CHARLES the Great his guard; it is a matter hardly to be beleueed, yet possible; and many authors write the same.

THE

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, SVRNAMED

BARBAROSSA; Fourrescore and seuenteenth Romane Emperor. And of EMANUEL, Emperor of Constantinople.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

After the decease of Conrade, his Nephew Frederick, Duke of Suenia, was chosen Emperour; a man endued with all excellencies, as well of body as minde, sating that he was bid to be more desirous of glory then was conuenient. In the beginning of his raigne he shewed himselfe verie desirous of peace: but afterwards, in proceesse of time, he undertook great warres; and hauing caused many combustion in Germany, he purposed to make a iourney into Italy, there to be crowned. Having leised a great army, and being past the Alpes, he much annoyed the Milanois, who made an insurrection against him; but spending no long time about those factions, hee went to Rome, where he was crowned by the Pope. In the time of his coronation many troubles arose in Rome; where with he was much displeased; which leaving imperfect, he returned into Germany, where he afterwards fell at variance with the Pope, by means of the King of Sicilia, who was his enemy: this controuersie was pacified by Christian Princes, which persuaded him rather to seek to be reuenged on the Milanois then to war against the Pope. Whereupon he resolved against to come into Italy, by reason of Milan, and came thither and ruined it, and made it to be razed by the Milanois themselves, who were the Citizens and Inhabitants thereof; and besides this, he did much more harme. He maintained schisme in the Church of Rome, and gave great ayde to the Anti-Pope, whose name was Victor: but all Italy was discontent, by reason of the cruell punishment inflicted upon Milan; so when as he was gone out of Italy, all the Cities of Lombardie uniting themselves together made a league against him; wherein was included the City of Venice, which took the protection of Pope Alexander. Which the Emperour hearing, he sent the Anti-pope into Italy, who dyed in Lucas where, by the Emperors consent, a successor was chosen, to maintain the schisme, and he in person came against the leagues wherein all Italy in a manner, being combined, bent against him; and coming to Rome, he contrayned the Pope to fly to Gaeta, hauing first done much harme in Tuscanie in the Marca, and particularly in the Citty of Ancona: and after many adventures, he went out of Italy, without effecting ought against the Pope as he desired. After some space, he againe returned into Italy: but, being abandoned by the greater part of his followers (instigated thereto by Henry Duke of Saxony) the Emperour was in such distresse, as he was contrayned to go sometime disguised, as another mans seruant; but he very severely punished Henry, for his mutining. He againe took his passage into Italy, and in a battaile, with his enemies, was vanquished, and belaid dead; but recanting his former proceeding, he sed to be recontrayned to peace. Afterwards he went to warre in the Holy land, and hauing done some matters worthy memorie, in the most flourishing time of his victories, going to refresh himselfe in a river, he was caried downe by the current, his people being unable to help him, and there was drowned, when he had reigned 28 yeeres.

Orwithstanding that the Emperour CONRADE, when he died, left a sonne whose name was FREDERICK, who was called Duke of Suenia; neuertheless, so great was the reputation of his Nephew FREDERICK, who was his brother FREDERICKS sonne, and Duke of Suenia, that the Princes Electors being assembled in Frankford, made him Emperour; and he presently went to be crowned, with the first crowne, in the cite of Aken, whither repaired all the Princes of Germany to see the new Emperour. For without doubt, FREDERICK (as all authors write of him) was a Prince of great valour, and worthie of the Imperiall dignitie, as well for the gifts of the body as of the minde. He was of more then a meane stature of great strength and agilitie, very well proportioned in body, and of a faire and pleasing countenance, accompa-

Frederick Barbarossa, chosen Emperour.

The death of
the Emperour
Conrade.

John de temps is reported to haue liued three hundred sixtie and one yeeres.

accompanied with grauitie and maieftie. His haire and beard were red, wherefore he was called BARBAROSSA OF ENOBARVS. With these corporall gifts, he was endued with a sharpe and excellent wit, and spake wisely and effectually; and was of so excellent a memorie, especially concerning the gesture and countenance of a man, that whosoever had once negociated with him, although in long time after he had not seene him, yet he would know him at the first sight. He was also of a milde and pleasant conuersation, very liberal and bountifull, and an enemy to couetousnes; vertuous, without any noted vice; most valiant in Armes, and a contemner of dangers, very active both on foote and horsebacke; and very expert, and well aduised in the warres and militarie discipline. These vertues were accompanied with a great desire of glorie and renowne; for he was very ambitious, coueting rule and commaund, which in my opinion was the cause of many mischiefs, of great warres, and of the effusion of much blood in his time: the wars he followed in his owne person, with great courage and valour, for the space of thirtie yeeres, that he held the Empire: and imitating HENRY the Fourth, he supported and maintained a schisme in the Church of Rome, for the space of twentie yeeres; and requied the emulation, and competence betweene the Emperours and Popes, which LOTHARY and CONRAD had pacified: as we will briefly recite. The first thing he did after he came to the Empire, was, to call a Parliament in the cite of Mesburgh, whither (amongst other Princes) came the King of Denmark, newly come to his inheritance, who there was crowned by the Emperor FREDERICK, and did him homage, as a King subiect to the Empire. And there also received the Ambassadors of other Christian Princes, which sent to congratulate his election, and he concluded peace with them all. So in his beginning, he made shew of a very peaceable Prince, but he afterwards proued to be one of the greatest warriors in the world: and it appeared, that in the beginning hee sought peace, thereby to be afterwards the better able to make warre.

At that time was great contention betweene the Dukes of Saxony, and of Bauiere (both which were called HENRY) which extended itself ouer all Germany; some fauouring the one partie, and some the other. HENRY Duke of Saxony made claime to the Duchie of Bauiere, which had bene his fathers: whereof he was deprived by the Emperour CONRAD, and now HENRY Marquess of Austria held the same, and was called Duke of Bauiere, for that his brother LEOPOLD had left it him; for to him had the Emperour CONRAD giuen it. The Emperour FREDERICK, for that he was neere of kinne to both these competitors (for the one of them was his Vncle, and the other his cosin german) reconciled them after this manner; that to HENRY of Saxony should be restored the Duchie of Bauiere (but yet he afterwards lost the same) and he made HENRY Marquess of Austria (who was called the Duke of Bauiere) Duke of Austria, and gaue him some other places; and to GUYLPHO, Vncle to the Duke of Saxony, he gaue certaine lands, and an estate in Italy, which he enherited from MAYD, often before mentioned.

This peace and agreement being concluded, and all other actions and debates in Germany ended, hee spent many daies in establishing peace, and in doing iustice. After which, HENRY Count Palatine of the Rhine (a prince of great possessions) died without issue or any of his howfe, that might succede him; but the Emperour found a meane to make his brother CONRAD his heire; who had that countie, and he afterwards dying, left it to his only daughter, which was married to HENRY Duke of Saxony, by which marriage he gat that estate. These and such like accidents and alterations which I finde in the Histories of Germany, written by the Germanes themselves, make me to doubt of these genealogies, and antiquities of families, which they so much celebrate, to be of a thousand, and of two thousand yeeres continuance; descended in line masculine from the father to the son without bastardie; and other matters whereof the Germanes vaunt; which are, in a manner impossible, or at the least improbable; for we know that all those great houses and estates began since the time of CHARLES the Great; and I see that in those principall houses there haue bin notable alterations, and chaunges, from one howfe to another; as heretofore hath bin seene in some of them; and now in this Count Palatine, which in this place cleerely passeth from the auncient lineage, to the house of Suenia, and to this Emperours brother which happened in the second yeere of his raigue.

This being past, the Emperour married the daughter of DIOPOLD Marquess of Bospergh, called Alada; but forasmuch as it was found that they were within prohibited degrees of consanguinitie, a Synod was assembled in the cite of Constance, in which he was divorced and separated from her; and then he married with the onely daughter of RAYNOLD Earle of Burgundie, by

by whom he afterwards had five sonnes; HENRY, FREDERICK, CONRAD, PHILIP, and OTTO.

These matters being ended, the Emperour resolved to goe to Rome, to be crowned by Pope ADRIAN the Third, who was an English-man; leuying a great Armie; and setting order for the affaires of Germany, he departed towards Italy: it behoued him to do so, for the cities of Lombardy and others subiect to the Empire, through the long absence of the Emperour (for CONRAD had neuer visited them) were accustomed to such libertie, that any kind of subiection seemed to them intolerable, especially Milan, which of them all was the richest, and most potent. And so FREDERICK being arriued in Italy, Ambassadors came to him from Milan, which after their due reuerence, entreated him to be pleased, to make Como and Lodi subiect to their cite, promising to giue him a great summe of mony: which request he held vniust, and therefore would not graunt it: which was the originall occasion of the rebellion of Milan, and of the euils which afterwards ensued: and the Milanois presently began to shew their discontent, for the Emperours Campe being lodged within a mile of the cite, they not onely refused to lodge or to entertaine him therein, but denied to giue him victuals for his people for mony: whereupon, taking this their contempt in very ill part (as he afterwards manifested) he presently battered certaine Castles within their iurisdiction: but holding it no fit time presently to besiege the cite, his souldiers ouerranue their fields, euen to their citie gates; and he passing forwards, went to Bercelli, and to Turin, and passed ouer the riuier Po; and by the way burned Aless, for that it stood at defence; and afterwards besieged the cite of Tortona, for as much as it refused to receiue him, which was a very strong hold. The siege continuing certaine daies with great loss of both parts; in the end he tooke it, and made so great a spoile in it, that he left it (in a manner) desolate and wholly ruined: whereupon those of Paula (for feare) receiued him, making shew of great ioy; and there he receiued the second Crown, and thence marched towards Rome, whither he went to be crowned.

Pope ADRIAN at that time was not well pleased with the Romane people, about certaine Consuls which they had chosen, a kind of government (which for a long time they had sought to introduce) greatly abridging the Popes power and authoritie: about which, great matters had passed between the citizens and some of his predecessors, as before hath been mentioned. Wherefore to auoide this trouble, and to preuent certaine practices, which WILLIAM the new king of Sicilia attempted against the patrimonie of the Church of Rome, the Pope absented himselfe, and with his Cardinals attended the Emperours coming in Sauria, from whence, with a shew of great loue, they came together to Rome; and the Emperour lodging his Army in the fields neere vnto it, he, together with the Pope (having a competent guard) entered the Vaticane, and the next day was crowned in S. PETERS Church with great solemnitie. But the coronation was scarcely ended, when vpon the same day all the Romane people rising in a vproare, without knowing any occasion thereof, together with their Consuls, put themselves in Armes, as men discontented with the friendship between the Emperour and the Pope, and coming into the Vaticane, they set vpon the Germanes which came with the Emperour; who hearing what passed, hee caused certaine companies of souldiers, of those which were encamped neere to the cite, speedily to enter, which fought with the Romanists, and many were slaine of either side: but in the end the Romanes were constrained to retire by their bridges into the cite (seuen hundred of them being first slaine and taken prisoners).

The Emperour remaining commaunder of the Vaticane, was so incensed, that but for the Popes entreatie, he would haue caused the cite to haue been assaulted, and would haue giuen the inhabitants a terrible remembrance for their mutinying: but the Pope mitigated his displeasure, and the Romanes stood all that night and the next day in Armes; wherewith the Pope being grieved, was little obeyed. The Emperour departed thence, and within few daies after his abode in that quarter, went into Germany (whereof the Pope complained, for that he left him at variance with the citizens) and by the way took some townes by assault; amongst which, Spolio was sacked and burnt for resisting him: and so he afterwards passed through Lombardy, without any stay, with a determination to returne with greater power; where befall him some notable adventures, which (the better to expresse such as are of greater importance) I omit. Being now returned into Germany, with great power and greater authoritie, for that he was crowned by the Pope; the Duke of Bohemia whose name was VLADISLAV, or LAVSLAVS, who came with him all this iourney, was (by reason of his great estate and the

Pope Adrian
the third an Englishman.

The Emperour
Frederick in Italy.

The people of Rome rose against the Pope.

The Emperour
Fredericks qualities.

ing of
the page

worthiness of his person) made King: yet I finde it written, that the Emperour HENRY the Fourth, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, eighty and six, gaue the title of King to BRATISLAV: Duke of Bohemia: but that title was then given to his person, and not to the countie; and so his successors enjoyed not the same, untill the time of this VLADISLAVS, which continueth untill this day. And the Emperour passing forwards, without discharging his Army, marched against the Duke of Poland; who for certain yeeres space had refused to pay the tribute, which he ought to the Empire: but he compelled him to pay the same.

The Emperour being gone out of Italy, great controuersie arose between the Pope and WILLIAM king of Sicilia; wherein the Pope recovered certaine places which WILLIAM had taken from him; EMANUEL Emperour of Constantinople (and WILLIAM's enemy) furthering those discords, who sent to the Pope, and made great offers and promises to aide and succour him: whereupon, after some conflicts which past betwene them, WILLIAM by all meanes possible sought the Popes grace and fauor, submitting himselfe to his obedience; and the Pope confirmed to him the title of King of both the Sicilies: wherewith the Emperour FREDERICK was much displeased, and greatly complained, for he hated WILLIAM; and at his coming into Italy, went of purpose to warre against him, although afterwards he could not effect the same as he thought to haue done.

For this cause and other which are not mentioned, in those daies great strife and contentions grew between the Emperour and the Pope; which neither PLATINA nor BLONDVS specifies, nor any other Italian Authors: but RYDERICVS FRISINGENSIS, who prosecuted the Historie which OTHO FRISINGENSIS left a little before, and other Historiographers, describe the same at large: the summe whereof is, that the Emperour began to doas some of his predecessors had done, in giuing Ecclesiasticall dignities, and inuesting Prelates without the Popes authority, or confirmation; and would not endure the Popes Legates in his countries, but when, how, and in what manner it pleased him, taking occasion hereof, that the Pope without his consent had made peace with his enemy WILLIAM: whereto the Pope answered, that he could doe no otherwise, for that the Emperour abandoned him in his distresse, when Rome rebelled against him. And the matter came to this issue, that the Emperour would not permit any appeals to be made to the Court of Rome; and about that matter he apprehended certain Bishops, which NAYCLERVS, and HENRICVS MCVIS, proue by certain Letters passing between the Emperour and the Pope: which Letters they affirme to haue seene in a Monastery of Germany. They also speake of certaine very sharpe Ambassages from the one to the other; and that in the end the Pope standing in feare of the Emperours power (being aduised by certaine Prelates) and also for that there was great discord between the Cities of Lombardy, whither the Emperour meant shortly to come; they came to an agreement of peace, which was concluded by Ambassadors in a Parliament, which the Emperour caused to be held in Ausburgh: where after this was ended, he made relation to all the Princes, of the iniurie which the Milanois, and certain other Cities in Lombardy had done him: And there it was concluded, that he should the second time come into Italy, with farre greater power then at the first.

And whilst he was busied about these matters, the Milanois (who at that time were of great power and very rich) being offended with what he had done in their fields and territoris, thought not only to free themselves from subiection, and to haue denied him their obedience, but also resolu'd to attend his coming in the open field with an Army, and to make themselves Lords of all that countie with the marches thereof, and to shake off the Imperiall yoke, presuming vpon their great power, and the aide of their friends and confederats: and so they began to leute men, and to make leagues and confederacies with other Cities, as with Crema, Brescia, Placencia, and other Townes: and they repaired and fortified Tortona, which the Emperour had ruined. Presently after this, they made cruell warre against Pavia, Cremona, and other places which held for the Emperour; and ruined the Cities of Lodi and Como, which of long time they had hated, and were vnder the Emperours protection. The chiefe Author hereof, was a man of great authority in Milan, whose name was GUALPHAGO, who (as a Lord or tyrant) was of such power in the citie, that all was done at his pleasure and by his direction; which made the Emperour the more to hasten his coming into Italy; two yeeres being not fully expired since his first coming thither: and with him came the king of Bohemia, LEOPOLD Marquess of Austria, his Nephew FREDERICK Duke of Suenia, and other princes, besides some which were sent before to guard the Citie of Cremona: The Emperour being in Italy, there came to doe him seruice, HENRY the Duke of Saxony with a thousand thousand and three hundred men at Armes, and GUALPHO with three hundred. The Emperours coming into Italy did put the countie in such feare, that Brescia (whither he sent the King of Bohemia, and his nephew the Duke of Suenia) yielded without assault, promising to be at his deuotion. From thence he marched with his Army towards Milan, and by the way had some skirmishes, which I passe ouer: being come into the marches thereof, he staid and took certaine Castles, which he did of set purpose, supposing that the Milanois would haue sued for peace, or haue vsed some submission: but they were now growne so proud, that they applied themselves to nothing else, but to fortifie their citie: whereof when the Emperour was aduertised, he commanded the cities which were vnder his obedience, to send him fouldiers; and so from Cremona (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIS) came to him thirrie thousand fighting men; so great was the enuie they bare against Milan: and from Pavia and Novarra, there came also great numbers; with which, and with his own Army he went to Milan: whither when he came, they sallied out of the citie into the field, in a very great number both of foote and horse; and a bataille began betwene them, one wounding and killing another in most cruell manner: but the Milanois being vnable to endure the furie of the Imperialists, they retired, flying to the walles of the citie; and those of Cremona were so greedy in pursuing them, that they slawe ouerwent the battallions of the Germanes: which when the Milanois perceiued, turning head, they charged them in such manner that they made them retire, and in their retreat slew many of their men: And FREDERICK who saw all this, charged with his squadron with so great force and furie, that he made them of Milan to turne their backs; and wounding and killing many of them, compelled the rest to fly to the gates of their citie, and he firing the Suburbs, presently besieged the same; and so he held it besieged for certaine daies, in which were many great and notable skirmishes. But the Milanois seeing the Emperours resolution, and great power, and the engines which he raised to batter their walles, were in so great feare, that they resolu'd to yeeld, vpon the best conditions they could get, and to send their Ambassadors to the Campe; which confessing their offences, and craving pardon, with a long let speech entreated the Emperour to admit them into his seruice; and afterwards in particular they treated thereof with the Princes in the Army, and (as some authors say) gaue great gifts and presents: finally, they obtained mercy, yielded the citie, and were pardoned. Milan being now brought to subiection (as it was the head of all the rebels) the rest of the townes in Lombardy presently yielded obedience, and gaue securitie, promising to serue the Emperour; and to doe what they should be commanded; and the Emperour in person visited many of them, and appointed Ronealis to bee the place whither they should send their Proctors or Agents with their authority; where hee determined to hold a Parliament, to treat of the common estate of these prouinces. Having in so short space had this good successe in Lombardy hee disannulled some of their lawes and customes, and prescribed other new, with greater rigour then (in truth) he ought to haue done: whereof many inconueniences ensued.

The time appointed for their meeting being come, and they making their appearance accordingly; after many matters which there were debated, by the aduice of some of his Council, he caused an Instrument to be made, concerning an vniuersall peace; which he enioyned all the cities, and principall men, Marquesses and Barres in all Lombardy, to obserue. This was done after the Germane manner, with penalties therein accustomed; which being published and made knowne vnto them, they all murmured, and held themselves wronged, principally the Milanois; and this discontentment encreased in such manner, that it was the cause of greater miseries then the former, by reason of the tolls and taxes which the Emperour imposed vpon all the countie, reseruing to himselfe the election and prouision of all officers: and although he did it by the aduice and counsell of learned men and Princes, which maintained that the Emperour might doe it in all those countries; yet the people being vnaccustomed thereto, took it very grieuouly: which was the occasion of the evils which ensued; although in the beginning they durst not rebell.

After this, the Emperour (for a trophy of his victories) made the citie of Lodi to be new builded, and with all speede and diligence to be walled and fortified; and the Castles, which had bin aduersaries to Milan, to be repaired and walled, wherein he placed gottensours and garisons, and did other things which my breuitie permitteth me not to recite. And setting all things in the best order hee could, notwithstanding that hee knew that Milan had not obeyed his lawes and ordinances, concerning the impositions which hee had set (as saith the

Vladislaus
Duke of Bohemia
made king.

William confirmed by the Pope king of both Sicilies.

The Milanois
reioice the field and triumph with the Emper-our.

Milan yielded to the Emperour.

Abbat WESPERGENSIS, and JOHN CUSPINIAN and others) he tooke his way to wards the countrie of Burgundy; which was an estate he held by his wife: other authors speake not of this departure, but recite what ensued, as though he had not gone out of Italy: but in my judgement, Milan, Crema, and Brescia, and the other cities, would not have dared to perpetually to haue rebelled, if the Emperour with his Army had continued in Lombardy: wherefore (holding with WESPERGENSIS, and such others as are of his opinion) I say that as soone as the Emperour was gone out of Lombardy, these things ensued, which we will presently relate.

The Milanois (which neuer yielded to obey the Emperours lawes) seeing themselves of great power, tooke the field with their forces, and went to a castle which the Emperour had built neere to Como, and assaulting it, took it by force; and so they began the warre, and did as much harme as at the first, but with greater resolution: presently the cities of Crema, Brescia, and Placencia did the like, and all the rest of their faction. IOHANNES CREMONENSIS in his fourth booke saith, that the Pope made a league with WILLIAM King of Sicilia against the Emperour, which was the cause of great hatred betweene them. The Emperour being aduertised of the bold attempts of the Milanois, and their adherents; with great celeritie (before that his whole Army was in a readines) returned into Lombardy, and went directly to Milan, and finding no resistance in the field, harried and spoiled the countrie, leauing nothing standing vnder destroyed; so great was the wrath and displeasure which he had conceived against it: and departing from thence he went to repose himself in Lodi (to be cured of a lame legge which he had) whither came Ambassadors from Cremona, to complaine of those of Crema, for the great wrongs they did them, and to craue succour: the harms don were the greater, by reason of the strength of the place, together with the aide and reliefe which they had from Brescia, and from Milan. As the Emperour was a man of a very haughtie spirit, so he seeking a redresse for all disorders, sent his brother CONRAD, Count Palatine of the Rhine, and some other principal men, with part of his Army, to besiege Crema; and the men of warre which were in Crema took the field, and gaue them battaile, which continued long, wherein many of both sides were slaine: but in the end the Imperialists had the victorie, and compelled their enemies to returne running to their towne; so as they durst saile forth no more: and so the siege continued.

At the same time new supplies came to the Emperour out of Germany; wherewith came his wife the Emperesse, with many men at Armes out of Burgundie, and with her came HENRY Duke of Saxony, and of Baviera, of whom we haue spoken much: with which, and with the rest which he had before, he laid a plot for those of Milan; whereby he took prisoners about three hundred of them, and slue about six hundred. But, houlding it his best course first to make an end with Crema (which by his commandement was already besieged) hee removed his Camp thither: and the better to iustifie his quarrell, hee sent to command them to receiue him into their City, as their Emperour and liege Lord; which they not onely refused, but gaue him many peremptorie proud speeches: whereupon he caused sundrie great engines & instruments to be made, therewith to batter the towne; and the besieged resolutely defended themselves, and all their prisoners daily taken of either side, were either hanged or slaine: but at length they were constrained of necessity to yeeld, and held themselves for happy, and charitably deale, withall, that the Emperour would vouchsafe to giue them their liues; and that leauing the citie, they might depart with their wiues and children, and such luggage as they could carrie on their backs.

Whilest the Emperour was at the siege of Crema, POPE ADRIAN, choakt with a Fly, died, after whose decease, the Cardinals, being in number five and twentie, assembling together in Rome, chose ALEXANDER the Third (before called ROVEAND) in a manner by a general consent of them all, excepting onely three which gaue said it, which stood for the Cardinal of S. Clement, whose name was OCTAVIANUS, whom the Emperour much fauoured; and this OCTAVIANUS (notwithstanding his few voices in the election) was so bold, as to proclaime himselfe Pope, and was called VICTOR; and there wanted not some to take his part, and to support him. The other Pope, ALEXANDER, seeing himself thus opposed, sent his Ambassadors to the Emperour, lying then at the Camp before Crema, whereby he requested him, that (vsing the authority of an Emperour) he would fauour the Church, by taking away the schisme. The Emperour for a while willed the Pope to come to the citie of Paui, whither he also appointed VICTOR to come, to the end he might there hear both parties, and so determine

The Pope made a league with William king of Sicilia against the Emperour.

Crema besieged and taken by the Emperour.

A schisme in the papacie.

of their controuersie: herewith ALEXANDER was much discontent, and resolved to seeke other redresse. The Emperour hauing raised his siege from before Crema, leauing to make war against Milan vntill the next Spring (which was after the Abbats computation, in the yeere of our Lord 1161) came to the citie of Paui, from whence he sent two Bishops in Ambassage to Pope ALEXANDER, aduising him to come thither, where he said, many Bishops would meete in the name of a Councell, to the end that the schisme might bee decided; which Ambassadors behaued themselves towards him, as to a Cardinall, but not as to a Pope: for the Emperour (as he disliked his election) desired to support Pope VICTOR. ALEXANDER taking this in ill part, dispatching the Ambassadors, commaunded them to returne, and they went to VICTOR with the same message, to whom they spake, and did reuerence as to a Pope; and hee presently departed, and went to Paui, and was by the Emperour very well entertained, and there was proclaimed for right Pope: and the Emperour kissing his foote, vsed other accustomed ceremonies, whereof when ALEXANDER was aduertised, holding himselfe intolerable injured, hee proceeded against the Emperour, and his Pope, whom hee excommunicated, and anathematized: and the Emperour sending his Pope into Germany, returned to the warres of Milan, wherein what passed, you shall vnderstand.

Pope ALEXANDER after his going to Rome, holding himselfe not in safetie, through the assistance of WILLIAM King of Sicilia, went by galleys into France, where he was very well entertained by PHILIP the French King (I say PHILIP, for that BLONDVS, and all those Italian authors call him so, but hereafter you shall vnderstand that it could not be PHILIP, but his father LEUES, comparing the times) and there he called a Councell in Chiermont, where he againe proclaimed the Emperour and his Pope excommunicate; what after ensued you shall heare.

The Spring of the yeere being come, the Emperour very resolutely returned against Milan, Brescia, Placencia, and such other rebellious cities as were in league with them: but first he overran and destroyed all the countrey round about Milan: before and after this time were many skirmishes and encounters, which for breuitie I ouerpasse, wherein for the most part the Emperour had the better, vntill that hauing withdraue his Army to take in a castle and fortresse at the passage ouer a riuer neere to Placencia, and the Milanois hauing a good Army, led by the tyrant GUALPHAGO, with the aid of those of Placencia and Brescia, went to assault a strong castle, called Carcano, or Coracio: whereof the Emperour being aduertised, hee speedily sent for men to Paui, Noiarr, and Lodi, with which, and with his ordinarie troupes, he put himselfe betwene Milan, and the said castle (before which the Milanois then were) in such a place, and in such manner, that of force they must fight, or not returne. The Milanois seeing themselves in this extremitie, sent some of the chiefe men amongst them to the Emperours Camp, to intreate him to suffer them to passe, for they would not fight with him for the honor and dutie which they bare to his person. And the Emperour presuming that hee already held the victory in his hands, or that they durst not fight, would not graunt their request: by reason whereof, his aduersaries drawing courage out of despair, seeing themselves lost if their passage were stoppt, and that they were vnable to relieue their houses and friends, or to be relieved by them, resolved either to make way, or to dye in the action, and so marched in good order against the Emperour, who likewise in very good order attended their coming, where there began a most cruell battaile, as betwene very expert and valiant soldiers, and men in despair. In the beginning, the Emperour apparantly had the better, and many of his enemies were slaine, and their standard taken: but the fight continuing vntill noone, there came certaine companies from the vnited cities to the aid of the Milanois, which charged with such resolution and fury, that the Imperialists retired, and their enemies (as masters of the field) slew and took prisoners very many of them: and the Emperour shewing the greatnes of his mind, drew together great part of his Army in the best order he could, and ranging his troupes into a round Battallion, most valiantly defended himself against his enemies; but truly he had bin either slaine or taken if the fight had continued any longer: but it pleased God that he being in this danger, there fell so much raine, and therewith the aire was so darke, that they neither saw, nor knew the one the other; and so the Emperour held it for his best course to retire towards Paui, and his enemies as conquerors, with spoils and prisoners went ioyfully to their houses, which afterward cost them very deare. This notable exploit, PLATINA, BLONDVS, and other Italian authors passe ouer in silence: but as they do not gainsay it, and the Abbat WESPERGENSIS and other

A battaile betwene the Emperour and the Milanois.

Germane authors report the same, I have thought good to make mention thereof.

Milan besieged and destroyed.

This adventure being past and knowne in Germany, some Princes and great Prelates, with many very good men of warre, came to the Emperours aid: with which, and with all the rest he left Pavia, and with a mightie Army besieged Milan, purposing not to rise from before it untill he had taken it; and the besieged being well fortified and victualled, were no lesse resolute to dye in their defence: by reason whereof, this was one of the most cruell and terrible sieges that hath bin seene before any citie, as well for the long continuance thereof, as for the skirmishes, sallies, assaults, losse of men, and effusion of blood, with the famine and other calamities which the besieged endured; and for the lamentable and pitifull end which it had. The siege continued two whole yeeres and one day: some authors reckon fivie, and some more, accounting (as I thinke) from the time the Emperour first made warre in the marches thereof. What skirmishes were betwixt the besieged and the besiegers, the Reader may conjecture, considering the power and splene of the Emperour, and the obstinacie and despaire ioyned with the great force and multitude of the Milanais. During the siege, there was so great want of victuals in the citie, that after they had eaten all the bealls, and other food that might be eaten, they dyed of hunger: but howsoever it was, the city came into the Emperours power, who conceiving, that enow of them were flaine, he gaue the rest their liues, but in that citie, and in all the rest, he did the greatest spoile he could possibly: for first he commanded all the men & women to depart the citie, & hisouldiers to sacke it; and then the buildings and wallies thereof to be throwne downe and laid waste; and this to be done by the inhabitants themselves, and by such as were borne therein: and whereas they sufficed not, he caused a great number of people to come thither from Pavia, and Cremona, which should wholly ruinate it, and leaue it waste and desolate, like to miserable Ierusalem: which truly should seeme to be one of the most lamentable spectacles that euer was seene in this world. Some writers affirme, that he made the ground to be ploughed, and sown with salt. The inhabitants thereof (as Gualphago the tyrant, the Bishop, and many of the most principall) he commanded to be sent prisoners into Germany: the rest of the People he permitted to dwell in certaine fields, which he appointed for them, farre from Milan, amongst bushes, in cabbins and cottages. The reliques and bodies of Saints which were in the citie, and held in great account, he diuided amongst the Bishops and prelates which were there with him: of which, the three Kings, which came out of the East to adore CHRIST in Bethlehem, were giuen to the Archbishop and Cathedral Church of Colen, where (it is said) they are at this day. In this manner was the citie of Milan laid waste, and left desolate: which a little before was so mightie, that it was of power able to fight with the Emperour in the plaine field, and to overthrow him: it having three hundred, three score and fivie yeeres (as reckoneeth Raphael Volaterranus, for so long was it after that the Lombards were expelled that Seigniorie) enjoyed libertie, with good successe, vnder the soueraigntie and name of the Empire: which happened in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, sixtie and two. Some say, somewhat more.

After this victory and terrible reuenge, the Emperour came to Pavia, where his wife the Emperesse then lay; from whence he sent to demolish and throw downe the wallies of Brescia, and Placentia; which (Milan being taken) yielded themselves. Blondys, Platina, Philippus Barboza, and other Italian authors say, that he also destroyed the citie of Cremona, which in my opinion seemeth not likely; for Cremona had euer serued him, and been obedient. I beleue it is taken for Crema, the error being the writers, or printers; and not theirs. And the Emperour having tamed and subdued all the other cities which rebelled against him, and made them to vield obedience to Pope Victor, he resolved to take his way towards Germany: for he vnderstood that the same yeere many alterations and troubles began, and that there was great want of Iustice, which grew principally through discord and enmities betweene a certaine Earle called Guido, Count Palatine of Turingin, and Guelpho the famous Knight of the Dukes of Baniere before named, by reason of some iniury done by the said Count Palatine, to the said Guelpho: whereupon young Guelpho coming out of Italy (as a valiant young man, desirous to reuenge the iniurie done to his father) raised a power against him, and the other in his defence, and many great Princes taking part with either side, a cruell battaile was fought betweene them, wherein Guelpho was ouerthrowne; whereof ensued great hurt, and the slaughter slaughter of many men, too long to be related: so as if the Emperour had any longer deferred his coming, the matter was come to that issue, that Germany was likely to have bene lost and ruinated: but as soone as he came, he endeavored by all meanes, to set peace betweene them: wherein he found great difficultie, by reason that so many men were slaine and taken prisoners of either partie. And notwithstanding that he had once concluded a peace betweene them, yet within one yeere it was broken, and warres were againe renewed: but the great valour and respect of the Emperour, was a sufficient meane to make an entire and perfect peace, and to pacifie all: wherein he was the more earnest, for that he knew what was daily practised in Italy against himselfe, whither he had a great desire to returne. For as soone as he was gone out of Italy, leaving Milan desolate; the people conceived a great feare and hatred against him: (as is viall against Princes which too severely, and with crueltie punish the offences of their subiects) and their feare and hatred increased in such manner, as they made new leagues and confederacies against him, casting out the gouernours which he had placed, and taking his rents and customes into their hands. In which league, besides those which before were friends, which were Brescia, Placentia, Crema, and the Milanais, there now ioyned with them Verona, and the Venecians, which greatly strengthened the league, theirs being a mightie common-wealth; together with Pavia and other cities: all which took part with Pope Alexander, against Pope Victor: and all these cities fortified and furnished themselves with men and munition.

*Ever since this warre, out of the cause of great offences.
A league made against the Em-
perour.*

The Emperour seeing how resolutely those cities were bent against him, and knowing the doubtfull issue of the warre, and that the name and authoritie of Pope Alexander was great, he resolved with himselfe to take another course, and by letters and ambassades dealt with Philip King of France, who supported Alexander (yet in my opinion it should bee Levy, for this was in the yeere of our Lord 1175, at which time, as it appeareth by all the French histories, Levy reigned) for a meeting betweene them two, whither he would bring with him Victor, whom he held to be Pope: for which purpose, a place was appointed on the frontiers of France and Germany, and there a Councell to be held, wherein it should be determined whether of these two should be Pope: which (as some say) the Emperour procured, by that meane thinking to haue depriued Pope Alexander. The King of France, at the Emperours request, consented that this Councell should be assembled: but Pope Alexander would not come, alleging that he held that for no Councell, which was not held by his authoritie. Finally, the French King and the Emperour grew iealous and suspicious the one of the other, which authors report diuersly: but the truth is that the Emperour came, and brought with him his Pope Victor; and with him came the Kings of Scots, and of Bohemia, and many other great Princes and prelates, with a very great Army: and the French King brought no lesse, with whom came Henry King of England with very choise men of war (from whom in my opinion he ought rather to haue feared warre, then expected or hoped peace) and these Princes encamped the one nere to the other, a riuer being betweene them.

1175

The Emperour vnderstanding that Pope Alexander came not, but had summoned a Councell to be held at Turren in France, was greatly displeased therewith, and resolved to depart: and the French King (to hold his word) without aduertising the Emperour thereof, came to the place appointed: and some say that he washed his hands in the riuer, and so returned to his Campe. To be short, howsoever it was, they both returned into their countries, without treating of any thing; and not well pleased the one with the other.

The Emperour, with the greatest preparation he could make, resolved to returne into Italy, whither he sent Pope Victor before him; who being come to the citie of Luca (which held for the Emperour and him) there died. And by letters and commandement from the Emperour (persisting in his determination) the prelates which accompanied Victor (he being dead) chose him a successor, whose name was Gvido, borne in Crema, and was called Pascal. Pope Alexander in France assembled the Councell which he had summoned; whither came many prelates and Bishops, out of England, Spain, France, Sicilia, Gracia, and many other parts: where they ordained what they thought good. The Emperours preparation for his coming into Italy being published, the aforesaid cities, which were in a league and confederacie against him, sought new succours, and provided an Army to make head against him.

It happened at this time, that in Rome died a Bishop called Iulius, who was Vicar or gouernour thereof in the Popes absence; who being dead, the Pope sent a Cardinal called

T 4

JOHN:

Factions in Germany.

JOHN: Who (notwithstanding a kinde of gouernement by Consuls; whereby the Popes power and authoritie was much diminished) vied such meanes, that Rome and many Cities of Italy sent to entreat the Pope to returne, and he knowing with what affection he was called, resolved to depart thitherwards: and for that he would not goe through Lombardy (which held for the Emperour) he tooke his passage by Sea into Sicilia, and from thence went to Rome; with great companie and prouision, which WILLIAM King of Sicilie gaue him. Some write that hee himselfe accompanied him; and that he was receiued into Rome with marueilous great joy of all the people. With his coming, the Cities which in Italy held for him, tooke such heart and were so much encouraged, that they (not contented to haue rebelled against the Emperour) beganne to make warre against the Imperialists, and tooke some townes; wherein one were so forward as the City of Verona: which gaue the Emperour occasion to hasten his coming; which he had prolonged, to come with the greater power, seeing that his enemies forces daily increased: and so he came into Italy with a greater Army then at any time before spoken of. What he did, and the effects which thereof ensued, I will recount as briefly as I may: for a raigne so long, and wherein happened so many and so great accidents, cannot be expressed in fewe words; neither reduced to a more breuitic. All this while reigned EMANUEL in Constantinople.

The Emperour FREDERICK's coming into Italy with so great power, did greatly terrify all the Countrey, considering what harme he had done there in former times: but the hatred of those which were his aduersaries was so great, as they would rather hazard any danger, then yeeld to his obedience. And he knowing by experience, that his rigour and severity had little auailed him, but had done him more harme then good, resolved now to make warre after another manner; at the least in Lombardy, wherein he pardoned those which submitted themselves vnto him, and would not permit the Countrey to be spoiled or wasted, vsing all men honourably; dissembling and making shew, that he vnderstood nothing of any conspiracy, or league made against him; and so drew neere to Brescia with his forces, where he gaue good entertainment to all such as from Crema, Verona, and Brescia, came to visite him (notwithstanding that those Cities were his greatest enemies, and had most praigised against him) and so passed on, without coming into any of them, or doing them any violence; and went to Ferrara, where he was receiued, and from thence passed peaceably through the territory of Bologna: so as (at this time) he passed through Lombardy without doing any harme; and there he diuided his Army, part whereof he sent to make warres in Tuscane, and the marches thereof, for that he fauoured Pope ALEXANDER, and rejected Pope PASCAL, which lay in Luca: and with the rest of his Army he marched towards the City of Ancona; for that it held for his enemy EMANUEL Emperour of Constantinople: Which he besieged and beganne to batter with great furie: But it was so well defended, that the siege continued longer then hee expected.

The Captaines and men of war, which he sent into the marches of Florence, Luca, and Pisa, after they had taken certaine Townes, marched through the territory of Rome, and made terrible war against all such places as held for Pope ALEXANDER; and in Rome wanted not some which fauoured the Emperours proceedings: yet the Pope left no meanes vsought, as well by gifts, as promises, to assure himselfe, and to haue all at his deuotion: wherein (it is written) he issued much treasure.

Whilest the warre was prosecuted in this manner, the Emperour lying before Ancona; the Milano, which after the destruction of Adrian, had for the space of five or six yeeres liued as banished men, in cottages, cabbins, and villages; gathering themselves together, being wonderfully ayded and relieved with all manner of materials, instruments, workemen, and labourers, from the Cities of Verona, Placencia, Crema, and other their neighbours and friends, began to reedifie their old ruined Citie; repairing what might be repaired, and the rest they new builded, and wrought with so good a will, that within two or three yeeres the Emperour could not hinder them: and they reedified it in such manner, as there feared nothing to be wanting. To all which (as writeth HENRICVS MCVIVS) the presence of GALPHAGO (called Earle of Angleria) was a great helpe; who escaping out of prison in Germany came thither. Whilest that the Emperour lay before Ancona, and cruell warre was made against Rome, WILLIAM King of Sicilia died; and his sonne of the same name succeeded him, who was an excellent man of warre, and a great friend to the Church of Rome. At that time EMANUEL Emperour of Constantinople sent a soleimne Ambassageto Pope ALEXANDER; whereby hee promised in person person with great power to come to his aide, and to driue FREDERICK BARBAROSSA out of Italy, and to conforme the Greeke Church, and to make the same subject to the Latine; conditionally, that he would reduce the whole Empire into one head, by taking it from the Germanes, and depriue FREDERICK, seeing that he had already excommunicated him, and that he was a schismatic and a rebell. But Pope ALEXANDER (notwithstanding that hee was much oppressed by the Emperour, reposing full confidence in the promises or power of EMANUEL) gaue a pleasing Equiuocall answer, and sent Ambassadors to temporize with him, but not to conclude any thing at all.

Ancona besieged by the Emperour.

Milano reedified.

It happened at this time, that the flower of all the men of warre in Rome, went to besiege the towne and Castle of Tusculano, which is neere to Rome, from whence they were much annoyed, that Towne holding for the Emperour, whereof a Germane Prince was gouernour; and the besieged seeing themselves distressed, sent to the Emperour (lying before Ancona) for reliefe: to be briefe, from the Emperours Armie came for Generall, CHRISTERN Archbishop of Antis; who with such troups as he brought from the Campe, and such others as hee could get by the way, came to fight with the Romanists which besieged that towne, being in number about thirtie thousand men; who fought with the Germanes (but not with order and valour like Romans) and as as they were fighting, the besieged gouernour with his Garrison sallied out of the Towne, and assailed his enemies at their backs, in such manner as the Romans were broken and ouerthrowne; and so many of them were slaine in the battaile and in the pursuit, as some Historiographers haue compared this ouerthrow to the battaile of Cannas, where they were ouerthrowne by HANNIBAL. Although the comparison be great, yet it is certaine that in a long time after Rome could hardly recover it selfe: and Pope ALEXANDER tooke in very grieuously, and fought by all meanes possible to encourage and animate the remainder of the Citizens.

The Imperialists, as Masters of the field, daily tooke townes belonging to the Church of Rome; and the Emperour (who still lay before Ancona) when as he vnderstood of this victory, knowing the time to be fit for his purpose, departed presently thence towards Rome, and made no stay vntill he came before the same; where the Pope and his friends had already set all things in the best order they could for their defence. The Emperour presently caused the Vatican to be assaulted; and notwithstanding that the assault was terrible, yet the place was so well defended, as it sufficed to keepe him from entering; wherewith he was so much enraged, that the next day he commanded a more terrible assault to be giuen, causing fireworkes to be throwne vpon Saint PETERS Church; in such manner, that the Pope being out of hope to defend the place, abandoned the Vatican, and fled into the Citie, to lodge himselfe amongst the Frangipanes, who were his trusty friends, and set great guards to defend the Citie, and made many bridges over the riuer of Tiber: the which the Emperour (being master of the field, and hauing the Vatican) greatly annoied and oppressed, with a resolution not to haue risen from before it, vntill it had yeelded, or that he had entered the same by force: and during the siege, he spoiled all the Countrey round about Rome.

WILLIAM King of Sicilie vnderstanding how greatly Pope ALEXANDER was distressed, and being willing to imitate his father WILLIAM, he sent to the Pope vp the Riuer of Tiber to Rome two Gallies with a great summe of money, men, and such other necessities as they could beare, to the end that the Pope might stie away, if he pleased. The Pope made great account of this reliefe, and presently diuided this money amongst his friends and seruants, wherewith they were greatly encouraged to defend the Citie: and he sent back the Gallies to the King of Sicilia, and in them two Cardinals, to conferre with him, and to aske his counsell what was best to be done concerning his person.

In the meane time the Emperour seeing that the Citie defended it selfe, and could not suddenly be taken by force, he laboured to perswade the Romans both by secret and publike messages, to giue vp the Citie, and then he would restore whatsoeuer he held belonging to the Romans; and that by them it should be determined, whether of the two ought to be held for Popes; to the end that he, generally by himselfe and by all others, might be respected and obeyed. With these practices which bare so great an appearance of a certaine peace, a great part of the Romane people were much moued, and were of opinion that these conditions ought to be accepted, whether the Pope would or not. The Pope vnderstanding hereof, held it for a great disgrace to his Holinesse, that he being Christs Vicar, should be judged by his enemies: and holding himselfe to be in no safety in Rome, he left the City by night and went downe the Riuer

Rome assailed by the Emperour.

William King of Sicilie assisted Pope Alexander against the Emperour.

Riuer of Tiber to the Citie of Gaieta, and from thence to Beneuent: from whence he wrote his Letters to the Emperour of Constantinople, and to the Kings of France and Spain, and to the Cities of Lombardy, which held for him, imploring their aide and succour. Some write that Pope ALEXANDER, flying from Rome, OTTO the Emperours sonne pursued him with seuenie fuelling ships or frigats, who coming to the coast of Elisria, he was encountered by the Venetian fleet commanded by CIANVS, who fought with him, defeated his Army, tooke OTTO prisoner, and carried him to Venice: at which time the Pope entering there in triumph, he cast a Ring into the Sea, and wedded it vnto him, ordaining that euery yeere on the Ascension day they should obserue the like Ceremony.

A great pestilence in Rome, and in the Emperours Campe.

Having in this manner abandoned Rome, within few daies after the Emperour was forced to doe the like; for it pleased God to send fo great a plague, both in his Campe and in the City, as there died daily thousands of the one and the other party: principally there died many Germane prelates, and some Princes, which came with the Emperour: Wherefore he hastily departed, leaving Pope PASCAL with a good guard of Souldiers in Saint PETERS in Rome: which was in the yeere of our Lord 1168, and he with his Army came into Tuscan, and the marches of Flouence, where he tooke some strong holds which held for the Pope; in which, and in many other he placed Garrisons of his owne souldiers: and in the marches of Ancona and in Tuscan, he gaue some places to certaine principall men of Germany, with titles of Dukes and Earles, to annoy and oppress Rome.

Whilest the Emperour was busied about these matters, Pope ALEXANDER procured aide and succour from all parts, and fought to support such as were his friends: And EMANUEL Emperour of Constantinople sent him an Ambassage, offering him a very great summe of money, desiring the same which we haue before specified, which was, that transporting the title of the Empire from Germany, by depriving FREDERICK, hee should giue the same to him, and to his house: But the Pope for many considerations would not yelde thereto, notwithstanding that he very pleasingly answered him: Within few daies after, Pope PASCAL died in Rome, where the Emperour left him: and the Emperour (persisting in his resolution) chose one JOHN borne in Hungary, who was called CALIXTUS, whom Pope ALEXANDER presently excommunicated.

The Emperour hauing remained some space in Italy, desiring to returne into Germany (for there was need of his presence) he sent a Bishop to Pope ALEXANDER with certain Articles of peace; what they were, Authors write not: but they all say that the Pope would not accept of them; and so they tooke no effect. The Pope laboured with the Romanists for his returne to Rome; but as then the Citie being gouerned by Consuls, which were odious vnto him, he could not effect the same according to his desire: And so went to other places in Romagna, and in the marches of Papia, where he was fauoured and supported by WILLIAM King of Sicilia. The Emperour came to Papia which held for him, where he fortified some Towns: and so much as a great part of his Army was sick and many dead, he could not make war to any purpose against Milan and the other rebellious Cities; but, after, he took his way towards Germany, hauing done in Italy such harm as is expressed; without effecting what he principally desired.

Being returned into Germany, his greatest care was to make peace betweene all men, and to purchase the good will of the people, and to make himselfe rich; to returne into Italy, which he resolved wholly to subdue. At this time he inherited all the Castles, lands and goods, which belonged to his Cousin-german FREDERICK, son to the Emperour CONRAD, who died of the plague at the siege of Rome: and he inherited also the lands and goods of some other Princes, which died without Heires, and he also rewarded some, giuing them Titles, and Castles, and to some others he gaue new Arms and dignities. To the King of Bohemia he gaue for his deuce, a red Lion in a silver shield; and to others he gaue many such like honors. But in the meane time, GYALPHAGO tyrant of Milan, and the Milanois, were not carelesse, but continually fortified the City which they had new built: besides which with the other Cities in Lombardy of their confederacy, in honour of Pope ALEXANDER (vnder whose title and name they opposed themselves against the Emperour) by a common consent and contribution they began to build another Citie, calling it Alexandria, after the Popes name, vpon the side of the Riuer of Tanaro, in a place which should serue for a frontier Garrison against Papia, Torina, and the Marquise of Monferrato, where they were loyall to the Emperour. And in this his absence they made such hate (but chiefly those of Milan, Placencia and Cremona) as they walled and peopled the same, in such manner as it became a very strong fortreffe; and many of those which lined in the borders thereof in villages, and vnfortified places, came thither to dwell, in such numbers, that the very first yeere it beganne to be inhabited, there were fifteene thousand men fit to beare Armes; so as at this day it is a good and a famous Citie, and is called Alexandria of Stuwa, which name the enemies thereof gaue it in the beginning in contempt. This alteration (added vnto the rest) made the Emperour to hasten his coming into Italy, when as he now had remained some time in Germany: And hauing disposed all things in good order, he set forwards and came with a mightie Army by sundrie waies, addressing his journey directly towards the estate of Monferrato, and those places which held for him: but he first took a Town at the foote of the Alpes, called Scusa, which he made to be throwne downe and ruined, for that it rebelled: and from thence he marched (not without trouble) towards Aste, which yielded vnto him, more for feare of the like fortune as happened to Scusa, then for ought it wanted wherewith it might haue defended it selfe. And hauing such successe in the beginning, he went to besiege the new Citie of Alexandria, against which he came greatly incensed, purposing to haue vterly destroyed and raised it to nought.

Alexandria in Lombardy built in honour of Pope Alexander, and so called after his name.

In Lombardy and in Piemont, the Marquise of Monferrato held for the Emperour, together with the cities of Papia, Niuaarra, Turin and their territories, subjects and friends, and some other Townes. He besieged Alexandria, and lay before it foure moneths, in which time were done many notable feates of Armes; at the end whereof, the Emperour was constrained to rise from before it, for that it was relieved by the Riuer with great store of prouision; and all the Cities which were friends to it, sent thither souldiers to defend it. But the principall cause was, that the great Duke of Saxony, of Baniere, and of many other estates, called (as was his father) HENRY the Proud, being at this siege before Alexandria, went from the Emperour with all his forces, alleging that he would not be excommunicate, and a rebell to the Pope. It was suspected that he was corrupted and did this for money: or (which I rather beleue) that he had some practice or conceite to haue made himselfe Emperour, vnder pretext that FREDERICK was disobedient to the Church of Rome: for which cause the Emperour raised his siege, and went to ouertake him, and fought by all meanes to haue stayed him; in so much that (as some write he would haue cast himselfe at his feet, if the other had not hindered him, and a priuate seruant of the Dukes called LODAN standing by, said to the Duke, My Lord, suffer the Imperial crowne to come to your feet, seeing that shortly you shall weare it vpon your head: Finally, Duke HENRY would not stay; and the Emperour had so few souldiers left, and was so void of all reliefe, that within few daies he was constrained to leaue the warres, for that time; and so left Italy, without effecting ought more then I haue said. And although that BLODY and PLATINA conceal this his departure, let the Reader neuertheless vnderstand that I draw the webbe of my History from all the best Authors; and therefore I say, that he departed in great danger of his person.

WESPERGENSIS, NAVCLERVS, and HENRICVS MYCIVS write, that he was aided and succoured by those of Niuaarra, and of Turin, in the passages ouer the Mountains, through which he took his way towards Burgundy, which was his wiues patrimony; and that vpon the way he was in some places in such danger, that he was driuen to goe disguised as another mans seruant.

After all these extremities, arriuing in Burgundy, he gathered together his souldiers, and raised some new companies, and so went into Germany; where the said HENRY had already practiced some Innuations against him, some Earles conspiring with him; for he was the greatest Prince in all Germany: But the Emperour brought him to be one of the least; for as he was much feared and very valiant, the Duke could do little against him. But the Emperour as soon as he came into Germany, assembled a Diet or Councell of all the Princes, whither he summoned HENRY to come: but he not daring to make his appearance, the Emperour proceeded against him (although not without contradiction and many difficulties) and in the end confisked his estate, and all his lands: which he might easily doe, by bestowing the same vpon men of great power, all which making warre against him at once, took the same from him: Yet some write, that this Sentence and confiscation was afterwards, in the yeer of our Lord 1180, when the peace was made between the Emperour and the Pope: It may peraduenture be, that at this time the process began, and iudgement was then giuen, but afterwards put in executions; which was in this manner.

The Dukedome of Saxony he bestowed vpon a valiant Knight, called BERNARD, Earle of Anhalt, whom the Arch-bishops of Mentz and Colem, and the Lantzgraue of Turingia holpe

Alexandria besieged by the Emperour.

Henry the Proud Duke of Saxony and Baniere for Pope the Pope.

The Emperour deprived Duke Henry of Saxony of his estate.

The Duke of Anhalt.

Count Saladin of Hilfepach

to take the same. The best and greatest part of the Duchie of Banerie he gave to one Otho Count Palatine, not of the Counties Palatines of Rhine, but of Wittelsbach, which he took by the helpe of two of his brothers, who were men of great power: another part of this State, which lay on the other side of Danubius, he added to the house of Austria: other his lands and Earldomes he diuided betwene HENRY Lantzgrau of Alsacia, *LEVE*s Marquis of Turingia, BARTOLD of Carinthia, and some others; all which together made waies against him; so as to him, his offspring and descendents, remained only the Countie of Brünswick, which afterwards in the time of FREDERICK the Second was erected to a Duchie; and that estate encreasing, great enmity continued between the Dukes thereof, and the successors of BERNARD, to whom was giuen the Duchie of Saxony.

The Emperor did not only apply himselfe to suppress this HENRY in Germany, but from the very first day of his coming thither, was carefull for the getting of money, and the raising of forces for his returne into Italy: and so, being assisted by all those Princes, to which he had giuen and promised to giue those estates, and by his owne house and kindred of Suenia, and his seruants and subjects; he in short space raised so good an Army, that he went very mighty into Italy, and carried his wife the Emperesse with him. Being come to the Citie of Como, in the month of Iune, notwithstanding that he wanted neither courage, discretion, power, or forces; yet matters prospered not with him as he expected, but rather cleane contrary: for the Milanois and their confederats had now taken such heart, and were in such readinesse, that they resolved to giue him battaile, after they had spoiled the fields about Pania, and such other Towns as held for him: and so they took the plaine field iust in the way which leadeth from Como to Milan, by which the Emperor was to passe; who had no lesse desire to fight: and was very glad, when he understood their resolution.

The two Armies being vpon a cleare day come within sight the one of the other, and the Squadrons and battalions of either side marshalled in very good order; the Emperor drew neere to the place which his enemies held; and (in a manner) with equall spleene, hatred and power both parties began to fight: first the horsemen brake; and then all the rest; and so there was fought a very fierce and bloody battaile, the one wounding and killing the other most cruelly. It hapned, that in this so great fury, he which bare the standard and Imperiall Eagle (through his rash hardinesse, and desire of victorie) advanced himselfe so farre forwards amongst his enemies, that he was slaine, and the Standard taken: which when the Emperor saw, who (as is felse-meth) was not farre from thence, he was therewith so much enraged, that encouraging his soldiers, with a new fury and resolution, he so oppressed his enemies, that he slew and wounded many of them with his own hands: but as this could not be done without great danger to his person; so in the thickest of the prease, and greatest throng, his horse fell with him; being as is thought, first wounded: and the charge on every side was so hot, that the Emperor was held for dead; which gaue the Italians cause to gather courage, and the Germanes to faint; for both parties certified the death of the Emperor, which so much discouraged the Imperialists, that victory apparently shewed it selfe for their enemies: and the Imperialists fled and abandoned the field, where a very great and cruell slaughter was made of them, besides those which thinking to escape by swimming, were drowned in the riuer Tesino, neere to the place where this battell was fought.

This battaile being lost, and all the Imperiall Army broken and put to rout; all men holding the Emperour for dead; and his wife the Emperesse, remaining in the Citie of Como, clad in mourning attire, suing to haue her husbands body, to burie the same, which she requested the Milanois to graunt by her Ambassadors: the fift day after the battaile, the Emperour appeared aliue, and in health, in his Imperiall robes, in the Citie of Pania: whither vpon the bruit of his being there, came all those which were dispersed and escaped from the battaile; and those which most desired to aide him, and to doe him seruice. In what manner the Emperour escaped aliue, it is not written; but it may be conjectured, that being faine, he remained in the field, although without hurt, and the night being come, escaped by secret and vnkowne waies. His enemies by reason of this victory gotte such credit and reputation, that many Townes and great men in Italy forsooke the Emperour, and went vnto Pope ALEXANDER.

The Emperesse with some Princes and prelates of the Empire, being come to Pania, boldly and plainly told the Emperor to his face, that for the schisme which he had made, and maintained in the Church of Rome, this calamitie was befallen him; for God would neuer giue him him any entire victory, and except he would submit himselfe to the obedience of the Church, they could not well doe him seruice: whereupon being moued with these admonitions, and knowing the time; (notwithstanding that his seruants and subjects daily repaied vnto him with many warlike troupes) yet he sent his Ambassadors to the Pope; vnfaignedly suing to him for peace: and so they began to treat thereof by Ambassadors. In this negotiation, and by what means this peace was made, there is great difference among Authors: some relating it after one manner, and some after another, which I recite not, auoiding the losse of time and labour: but they all agree, that after many daies spent in this treatie, the Pope went to Venice, whither the Emperour came, and that there with great solemnity the peace was concluded, and that the Emperour kist the Popes foot, and yielded him obedience. Some Authors write, that (among many Dukes and others which were present, when as the Emperour did in all humility prostrate himselfe at the Popes feet) THEODORA, Marquesse of Misina, seeing the tyrannous infolency of the Pope, setting his foot vpon the Emperours necke, moued with a generous disdain, with a threatening countenance, and eyes inflamed with furie, ranne to take him vp: whereat the Pope was so terrified, as he fled into the Emperours armes and kist him; neither could hee be drawne away, before he was secured.

A battaile betweene the Emperour and the Milanois wherein he was thought to haue bene slain.

Then a truce was granted by the Emperour to the King of Sicily, for fifteene yeeres; and to the Cities of the league, for fixe: which (according to most writers) passed in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred seuentie and seuen; and afterwards in the yeere, one thousand, one hundred eightie and three, the peace with Lombardy was concluded in the citie of Constance; but all in such manner as it pleased the Pope; and such townes as were withheld from him, were commanded to be rendred: and so the Emperour continuing there some few daies, returned into Germany, and the Pope to Rome, but he first granted to the citie of Venice, and the Dukes thereof, great priuileges, immunities, and exemptions. The Pope being come neere to Rome, before he entred the citie, some speeches were vied concerning the depoling of the Confuls, and that no more should be chosen: but as it was a custome of fiftie yeeres continuance, so it could not then be abolished; but order was taken, that none should be chosen, but such as pleased the Pope, and that before they executed their offices, they should sweare to be in all things seruiceable, and obedient to his Holinesse.

This being concluded, the Pope came to Rome, where he was received with great solemnitie: and the other Pope CALIXTUS, acknowledging himselfe to haue erred, cast himselfe at the Popes feete, crauing mercy (hauing first laid aside his pontifical habit) and renounced all the right and interest that he had to the papacy: and so ALEXANDER remained sole pope in peace all the rest of his life; and so this schisme (which had continued twentie yeeres) ceased.

The Emperour FREDERICK being come into Germany (now old and tired with fife and twentie yeeres warres, and combustions) spent his time in preserving the peace which he had graunted, and in establishing his fife sonnes in estates: which he did in such manner as you shall heare.

This peace being concluded in such manner as I haue told you, Pope ALEXANDER died, after that he had been Pope the space of one and twentie yeeres, the most of them, in troubles and contention, and LEO the Third succeeded him: the yeere before his death, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred and eighty, died EMANUEL Emperour of Constantinople, who reigned seuen and thirtie yeeres, and left a son who was a child called ALEXIS for his successor, appointing a kinsman of his, whose name was ANDRONICUS (a man of great parentage) to be his Governour and Protectour; who was so very a Villaine and so arrogant a Traytor, that after that hee had gouerned certaine yeeres, and committed many infolencies; hee killed the young Emperour, and made himselfe tyrant of the Empire, putting many great men (such as he feared) to death: against whom for his detestable treason, WILHELM King of Sicily made sharpe warre, and tooke many Townes from him; which brought him to such an end as hee deserved: for the Constantinopolitans seeing themselves thus oppressed, rose against ANDRONICUS, and made one ISACIUS or ISACIUS, defended of Imperial blood, Emperour: and ISACIUS prevailing, ANDRONICUS was apprehended, and hauing one of his hands cut off & one of his eyes put out, was carried through the streetes vpon a Camel, and by the general consent of all men had such a death as hee deserved, and as such deserue, as through ambition and desire to rule, are traytors and disloyall to their Lords. And so ISACIUS remained Emperour, and was an excellent prince: his end you shal know hereafter.

The Emperour FREDERICK enjoying peaceful times in his Empire, summoned a Note the pride of Pope Alexander the Third.

A peace concluded betweene the Emperour and the Pope in the citie of Venice, whither the Emperour prostrated himselfe at the Popes feete and the Pope in returne manner, setting his foot on the Emperours necke, as these words are:

Super aspidem & basiliscum ambulabo, & conculcabo leonem & draconem.

180

The young Emperour of Constantinople murdered by his protector.

Councell to be held in the citie of Mentz, where he settled his sonnes in such estates, as you shall heare. His eldest sonne he caused to be chosen King of the Romanes, and his successor: his second sonne FREDERICK he made Duke of Sueuia, which was his owne inheritance: to OTTO his third sonne, he gaue the title of Duke of Burgundie, appointing him to succcede his wife, the Emperesse, to whom that estate appertained: to his fourth sonne CONRAD, and to his fifth sonne PHILIP, he gaue other rents, and some townes wherein they might liue; but it afterwards ensued otherwise: for CONRAD succceeded FREDERICK in the Duchie of Sueuia, for that he died without issue; and PHILIP after the death of his elder brother HENRY, came to be Emperor.

Pope LVCIUS knowing there was great contention and discord betwene the Princes of the Holy land, and the states of Soria, and fearing the daunger that might ensue, endeouored by his Letters and Ambassadours to reconcile them, and to make them friends: and procured WILLIAM King of Sicilia, which then warred vpon ANDRONICVS, Emperour of Constantinople (who as I said made away the young Emperour ALEXIVS) to giue ouer his warres, and to relieve that countrie, which was oppressed by the Infidels; and so the King of Sicilia sent thither forie armed gallies; wherein went some principall men and fouldiers vnto that seruice.

The Emperour FREDERICK before that the time of the truce by him graunted in Venice to the cities which had rebelled in Lombardy, was expired; (desiring by faire and gentle means without rigour or Armes, to reduce them to his seruice) summoned a Councell, or Parliament, to be held in the citie of Constance; whither he willed them to send their Ambassadours, with sufficient power and authoritie to conclude a peace, shewing them signes of great loue and good will. The cities being wearie of the warres, imagining that there would be farre better conditions propounded, held it for their good: so as besides Pauiæ, Cremona, Aste, Alua, Torino, and some others which had still persevered loyall and in the Emperors seruice; the cities of Milan, Berecelli, Lodi, Bergamo, Brescia, Mantua, Verona, Nouarra, Vicencia, Padoa, Treviso, Bolonia, Paruentia, Modena, Rezzo, Parma, Placencia, and others sent their Ambassadours: with which the Emperour came to an agreement; granting them perpetuall peace and pardon for all offences past; leaving to them, their lawes, customes, iurisdiccions, ciuill and criminall, with authoritie to chuse Consuls and Gouernours, and commanded to be restored all whatsoever had been taken from them in time of war; and they acknowledging him and his successors for their foueraigne Lords, sware to him fealtie, and homage: and it was set downe, how, and in what manner they were to doe him seruice, greatly to their aduantage. And besides this, that whereas certaine appeales for certaine summes should come to the Emperour; he ordained therefore to haue his Agents in Lombardy, to the end that the people should nor be constrained to come to him into Germany: and that the Consuls and Officers to be chosen, before they did execute their offices, should do their homage and be sworne to the Emperour: setting downe likewise what seruices they should doe, at such time as the Emperour in person should be in Lombardy. Finally, there were new couenants and agreements made, which were sworn, and confirmed by the Emperour, and the Ambassadours. The Instrument of all which, as it passed, appeareth at large, and in particular, in the Ciuill Law, in the end of the Volume intituled (De pace Constantiæ.)

This peace being concluded in this manner, the Ambassadours with great ioy returned; and all the Townes approved and sware to obserue and keepe the same. Within few yeeres after this, in Verona dyed Pope LVCIUS the Third, whither he came to haue assembled a generall Councell, for the relieving of the King of Ierusalem, and the Christian Princes of those Provinces in the East, between whom was great combustion. And the potent King SALADINE did much oppress them, who by stratagems, and great batailles, had made himselfe Soldan, and Calipha of Egypt, King of Damisco and Aleppo, and held great part of Armenia, Licia, and the most part of Mesopotamia; so as on euery side he had means to make warre vpon BALDVIN the Fourth, then King of Ierusalem, who carried himselfe valiantly; and against the Princes of Antioch, Tripoly, and others which held, and defended those parts. And he so much oppressed BALDVIN (who in former time had been of such power, that Egypt was tributarie vnto him, and he held certaine cities therein, which his father and predecessor ALBERICVS had gotten, and had in person conquered Palestina, and other lands) that he now employed all his forces in no other thing, but to defend himself: and in the end what befell him, we will declare; for that it appertaineth to our historie, to shew the reason, moouing the Emperour FREDERICK to goe to the warres of the East, wherein he died.

Pope

Pope LVCIUS (as I said) dying in Verona, was buried there; and in his place was choosen VRBANVS the Third, borne in Milan. At this time, which was in the beginning of the yeere, one thousand, one hundred, fourescore and six, the Emperour FREDERICK came peaceably into Italy, and with the good will of the Milanois, and of all Lombardy, and at their especiall request and entreatie went to Atlan, and was there receiued, with the greatest ioy and solemnitie, that could be deuised; and there a marriage was solemnized, betwene his sonne HENRY, King of the Romanes, and the sister of WILLIAM King of Sicilia (yet some say that she was his Aunt, sister to his father King WILLIAM of Sicilia, and daughter of his grandfather ROGER) she was a woman of the age of thirtie yeeres, but very faire, and he of one and twentie, as GODFREY VITERBINGENSIS; and OTTO in the addition to OTTO FRISINGENSIS his Chronicle, and the Abbat WESPERGENSIS also write; which in my opinion is true; notwithstanding that PLATINA and BLONDVS say, that this marriage was made after that the Emperour FREDERICK was dead, by the procurement of Pope CALISTINE the Third, and that he was threescore yeeres old, and that WILLIAM King of Sicily dying without heyres, the Pope by this marriage made him King of Sicily. But in my opinion, the first Authors are to be belieued, for that they might be eye witnesses, and the others deceived, for as he was afterwards (through this marriage) king of both the Sicilies, they imagined it to haue been done then.

This wedding feast being ended, the Emperour, leaving his sonne HENRY for his Lieutenant and Gouernor of Lombardy, returned into Germany. Pope VRBANVS knowing what passed in the East with the King of Ierusalem, and the other Princes; when as hee was confirmed Pope, endeouored to perswade and encourage Christian kings and princes, to succour and relieue those places: but they making long delays (notwithstanding that they sent some supplies) it came to passe, that Ierusalem, and many other Cities held by the Christians were lost: the cause whereof (as well for that it was so great a matter, as also for that it appertaineth to our History) I will set downe, although it will be somewhat long; for I presume that the Reader will not be discontented therewith, which as briefly as I can expresse the same, passed in this manner.

BALDVIN the Fourth (as I said) reigning King in Ierusalem; and BOHEMYND who was a mighty Prince being Duke of Antioch; and RAYMOND, or REMON, Earle of Tripoly, who was also Lord of other Cities, and of the prouinces of Galilee, and Tiberiades, which hee had by the marriage of his wife, who was a great princes daughter, and Lord thereof, and foother Princes and Captains: which although they banded, and had quarrels with the Knights Templars, and of Saint JOHN, yet they joyntly together defended what the Christians held in the East (which was no small matter) against the foienamed SALADINE.

Matters standing in this estate, BALDVIN who was a man of great spirit and valour, being in the citie of Nazareth (wherein he then lay) was taken with such a leprosie, that he was not able to goe, nor to stand on his legges; whereupon he was carried to Ierusalem, and his disease held him in such manner, that he daily expected his end. Which being published, so much encouraged the Infidels, that they made continuall rodes and incursions into the countiees of the Christians. Hee seeing himselfe in this estate (hauing no sonne to succcede him, or to gouerne the countie for him) made a man of great fort, called GVIDO of LYSIGNAN, gouernour thereof; who was the second husband of his sister SIBILLA, who by her first husband, called WILLIAM LONGSVORD, Marquess of Monferrato, had a son called BALDVIN; and a daughter called SIBILLA. With this gouernment some of the Princes were much discontented, and SALADINE with a mighty Army invading their countiees, the Christians disagreeing amongst themselves, GVIDO the kings brother in law, and Captain generall of all his forces, desiring not to fight with him, the Christians daily lost Towns and Castles: whereupon the sick King BALDVIN resolved to take another course; which was before his death, to make his Nephew BALDVIN, who was his sisters sonne, King, notwithstanding that he was but a child, and RAYMOND of Tripoly, his gouernour and protector; and to put his brother in law GVIDO from the gouernment: by reason whereof, ensued new factions, after which followed the losse of those countiees, through conflicts, besiegings, assaults, and taking of towns, by SALADINE in six or six yeeres, that this was lasted, vntill the greatest losse of all; which was the death of King BALDVIN; which happed in the yeer of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, eighty five.

RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly, comming to gouern the kingdom, in the behalfe of the yong

Vv2

Exemptions granted by the Emperour to seuerall citiees in Lombardy.

Saladine Soldan of Egypt.

The death of Baldwin King of Jerusalem.

Guido Liguier brother in Law to King Baldwin deceas'd, & was chosen King of Jerusalem.

young King, GVIDO of LvsIGNAN and SIBILLA mother to the said King, were so in-uested therein, that he could not execute his office : whereof ensued new troubles, the one for private and particular passions and quarrels (forgetting the publike good) seeking the ruine of the other. In this confusion died the young King BALDVIN, eight moneths after the death of his Vncle, His father in law GVIDO, and his mother SIBILLA, concealing his death for feare that RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly, by means of his great power, would by the generall consent of the people, haue made himself King: the matter was caried so cunningly, that by means of gifts and faire words, the Patriarch, and other chiefe men of Jerusalem, chose him for their King; which was the occasion of the evils which afterwards ensued : for RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly, was so highly offended herewith, that (to the ruine of himself, and of all the rest) he made a league with SALADIN; promising and assuring him, that he would neither aide, nor relieve the King of Jerusalem.

This friendship being made, such courses were held, that after certaine truces and treaties of peace and breaches of the same, SALADIN began to make war against the King and kingdome of Jerusalem with greater furie then at any time before : and as GVIDO wanted the aide of the Earle of Tripoly, and BERNARD Duke of Antioch could hardly help him, by reason of the faire distance ; and for that he also had enough to doe, to defend himself against the Captaines of the said SALADIN, he was much distressed, and daily lost townes & Castles, neuer ceasing by Ambassadors & Letters, to sollicite the Emperor, the Pope, and other Westerne Princes for aide ; and they resolving to yeeld the same, and making preparation for the voyage, it happened, that RAYMOND Earle of Tripoly (either made a double league, as some write, or knowing that if the kingdome of Jerusalem were lost, he should be assured to haue an euill neighbour of SALADIN) agreed, and made a peace with the King of Jerusalem, and came with his power to aide him; whereupon SALADIN raised his siege from before Ptolemaide, and encamped himself before Tiberiades, which belonged to the Earle of Tripoly, strictly besieging the same.

The King of Jerusalem hauing drawne together all the power he was able to make, came with a great Army, the Duke of Antioch being with him, whither came with all their power, the said Earle of Tripoly, the masters of the orders of the Knights Templars, and of Saint JOHN, with other great men, Knights and Captaines, the Patriarches of Jerusalem, and of Alexandria, and certaine Bishops; so that (as it is affirmed) there were 30000. horsemen, and 40000. footes which was the vttermost of the Christians power in the East.

After many Councils and opinions, the King at the instance of the Earle of Tripoly resolving to free Tiberiades, and to fight with SALADIN, which lay before it, presently began to march, and the troups and men of warre which he had with him, which were such, as no man seeing them doubted of victory; but it pleased God to giue it an other successe: for SALADIN, who knew their resolution (as a man which wanted not courage, and had an Armie containing double the number of the Christians, of very well trained souldiers) resolved to fight with them; (but not neere to the besieged City) and to that purpose went to meet them upon the way : and it happened that the two Armies drawing neere together, and the King of Jerusalem
one day purposing to march with his people with great speede, and to lodge them in a place wherein was very great plenty of water (whereof in those countries is great scarcity) SALA-DIN by espiall or some other misfortune being aduertised thereof, marched thither with so great celerity, that before the comming of the Christians, his men had taken the same place; and the Christians comming extreemly wearie, and thirstie, by reason of their long march, and the heat of the Sunne, found enemies in the place where they thought to haue found water and ease; wherewith they were much troubled : Neuertheless, the King seeing there was no other remedie, commanded the place forthwith to bee assaulted, presuming thereby to haue repelled the enemy: but missing of his purpose, hee with his Armie was driuen to lodge all that night in the drie fields; where they endured intolerable thirst; and by the breake of day, SALADIN (who the most part of the night had been busie in ordering his troups) took the field with his squadrons, where the Christians (with tired and weak bodies through extreame thirst, and their horses being in the same extremitie) staid for them: and notwithstanding that they began the fight with great courage and resolution, yet their strength failing they were ouerthrowne by the Infidels; and there was the greatest and most cruell slaughter made of them, that in those daies had been scene, either in Asia or in Europe.

The King was taken prisoner fighting; and the Earle of Tripoly escaped by flight,
and

A battaile fought betweene Saladi-ne the Sol-dane of Egypt, and the Christians.

and some say that he made all the rest to flee, and that he afterwards died miserably. The Duke of Antioch was slain after that he was taken, with all the Knights Templars, and of Saint JOHN, that could be found. SALADIN hauing obtained for notable a victory, following his coultie, went to Ptolemaide, which he easily took; and did the like by Berite, and other Cities too long to relate. Finally, in his owne person (after the taking of many Towns, which, out of hope of any succours, or to be relieved, rendred; and the sooner, for that hee was a very iust Prince in performing his promise, and courteous, intreating those very friendly which yeelded) he marched forwards, and late him down with his Army before Jerusalem: and hauing fiercely besieged and assaulted the same for the space of thirty daies continually, they yeelded, vpon the second day of the moneth of October, in the year of our Lord, 1187. And so was this City lost; and at this day is in the hands of the Infidels, almost eighty nine years after that it was taken by GODFREY of Buillon, and the other Princes before mentioned: in which time had reigned nine Kings with him who then was, to wett, GODFREY of Buillon the first and only King of that name; and then after him, the two BALDVINS, and EVELCO, and BALDVIN the Third, then ALMERICS, and BALDVIN the Fourth, and BALDVIN the child, and GVIDO which then reigned: and notwithstanding that the name and title of King of Jerusalem continued a long time, and that the Christians held many Towns and Cities in Soria for the space of one hundred and odde yeers afterwards, and many Princes went thither to haue made a conquest thereof: yet in the City of Jerusalem they reigned no more, neither possessed the same, but a small time that the Emperor FREDERICK the Second was there. The East parts being brought to this estate, and Jerusalem lost; Antioch, and the Prouinces thereto belonging, together with Tyre, Sidon, and Tripoli, were in the like danger.

The Emperor FREDERICK vnderstanding these vnhappy newes (although now old and tired) resolved to aduenture his whole power with his person, for the recouery of what was lost, and to defend the remainder: and God did put the like resolution into the hearts of the Kings of England and of France, and of many other Princes. The fame of SALADIN'S acts daily increasing; it is written, that besides the estate of Antioch, he took one hundred and fue and twenty walled Cities, and that he made cruell warre ouer all the Country. Through sorrow and grief for so great losse, the greatest prouision and preparation was made to goe to the relief thereof, that hath been seen in Christendome at any time before or since. For, first the Emperor (leaving his sonne HENRY, who already was King of the Romans, for his Lieutenant, and with him his two brothers, CONRAD and PHILIP) prepared a great and excellent army both of foot and horse, and began to march through Hungary, Bulgaria, and Thracia, towards Constantinople, thence to passe ouer into Asia: and with him went his son FRED-ERICK Duke of Sucunia, and BERTOLD Duke of Moravia, and his brother the Marquess of Baden, and many other Dukes, Earls, Archbishops and Bishops.

A little before this, died HENRY King of England, who purposed to haue gone the same journey: for it was enioyned him for his penance concerning THOMAS BECKET, called S.
THOMAS of Canterbury, which I had no time vntill now to speake of. But his sonne RICH-ARD King of England, and PHILIP King of France, concluding a peace (for they were at warres about the Duchie of Normandy) cyther of them with the best Army that hee could make, went to this warre in the East. The like did OTTO Duke of Burgundy the Emperours son, and the Venecians sent thither a great fleete, and so did the Pisans, who then were mighty at Sea. To this seruice also went CONRAD Marquess of Monferrato, and HENRY Earle of Champania, and many other great Lords and Captains of Italy, France and England, whose names for breuity I leaue. That which now most maketh me wonder in this zealous voyage of the Christians, is, that from Denmarke and Frisland came fifty Gallies, it being so long a voyage from thence into Soria: and the Earle of Flanders sent twelue: and WILLIAM King of Sicilia did very well set-to his helping hand: for besides the forie Gallies which he sent before) hee furnished and relieved all such as went, and came by him, and wanted, with shipping, victuals, armes, and other necessaries, and maintained (for a long time) a great Navy, to assure all passengers that would go this voyage, from rouers and pyrats by Sea.

The successe which all these men had, and what befell them, aswell by the way, as in that war, is too long to be written (for they did great matters) and I should too much digresse from the history of the Emperours (which is my task) therefore it shall suffice that the Reader vnder-stand by me the issue of these proceedings, the rest let him read in the Authors which wrote therof, which I will name: I will conclude in the history of the Emperour, who comming

Jerusalem yeelded to Saladin

A voyage to Jerusalem.

with his forces to Constantinople, made a league with the Emperor ISACIUS; and being there, was given to understand, that GVIDO King of Lusignan, King of Jerusalem, was gotten out of prison, together with the Master of Saint JOHN; and that with such men of warre as repaired vnto him, he had renewed the warre, and determined to take the Field, in hope to haue recovered certain places: whereupon the Emperor in great haste passed his Army ouer the Streight at Constantinople, in the year of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, eightie nine, and began to march through Asia the Lesse, where passing in peace through the Countreies of the Christians, he entred the Countrey of the Soldan of Iconium, who was a mighty Prince in those parts, with whom he made peace; vpon condition, that hee should giue him victuals and free passage: which if he performed, then he would not warre vpon his Countrey. But, the heathen King not onely brake his promise, but gathering together a great number of Turks, stoppt his passage, and did him the greatest hurt he was able: wherewith the Emperor being very much incensed, made cruell warre in his Countreies; and coming to the mountains at the entry into Cilicia, he made his passage with great difficulty and danger: for, the Soldan had drawn a head of a great multitude of Turks and other heathen Nations, thinking to haue ouerthrowne the Emperor in those Streights. But it pleased God that hee passed, although with great danger and some losse: and, coming down into the Plains, he fought with the Infidels, and ouerthrew them, and slue a very great number of them. And so, taking and sackng Cities and Towns, hee marched forwards, and entred Armenia the Lesse, and by force took the greatest part of all that Prouince.

The Emperor Frederick his victory against the Soldan of Iconium.

The newes of his coming and victories strake so great fear into his enemies, and so much encouraged the Christians, that GVIDO King of Jerusalem, and his brother EMERICK, and other great men before named, which were there assembled, leauing the Cities of Tyre and Tripoli, whither they had retired themselves; with a well-ordered Army took the Field, and assailed Ptolomaida or Acan, purposing to haue the same, for that it was a Hauens of the sea, and of great importance; whither came the fleets from Denmark and Flanders, and from other parts. The siege was reinforced, and the Christians Army daily increased; and all men knowing the Emperor to be neer at hand, SALADIN thought himself vnable to defend what he had gotten: and King GVIDO, and those which were with him, recovered force and courage. But it pleased God in his secret judgement, that in the time of this hope and of good successe, there hapned so great a disaster, that all was changed and turned vpside down; which was, the death of the Emperor, which hapned by great misfortune in this manner:

The Emperor being very neer to Soria, vpon a very hot day in the summer time, desiring to wash and refresh himself in a riuer (as they write that at other times hee had done) the swiftness and depth thereof was greater than hee thought or mistrusted: and so in the presence of his people going into the water, without that any of them was any way able to saue or help him, he was carried down the stream, and therein drowned. And so in a little water died he, for fear of whom all Asia trembled; which hapned vpon the tenth day of Iune, in the year of our Lord, 1190, and in the eight and thirtieth year of his Raig: through whose death the enterprise was extremely hindered.

The Emperor Frederick drowned.

At the same time befell another misfortune, which was a controuersie and discord between the Princes of those parts; which hapned by reason of the death of SIBILLA, wife of GVIDO King of Jerusalem, and sister to King BALDVIN deceased. Whereupon, HERFRAND, who was married to ISABEL, sister to this Ladie, with the aid of some of his friends, would haue been King, by the right of his wife; which the widower GVIDO withstood, alleging that he was the sworn and obeyed King, and therefore ought not to be deposed. And it followed, that CONRADE, Marquess of Monferrato, took his Lady from him perforce, alleging that she was not lawfully married to HERFRAND: and so he married her, and in like manner challenged to be King of Jerusalem; which (besides that it was a vile deed) caused great trouble: for, this Prince held the City of Tyre. By which means, the widower King GVIDO lost much of his authority, for that he would not fall at variance with them: yet he still held the name and title of King.

The matter remaining in this great confusion, after the sudden and infortunate death of the Emperor, a man may easily conceiue the great grief and sorrow of the whole Army: neuertheless, his sonne FREDERICK, Duke of Sueuia, as a valiant and courageous Knight (being presently vpon the death of his father, as reason was, made Generall and their Head) incouraged his people, and taking the dead body of his father, marcht directly towards Soria; and sent certain certain

certain messengers to GVIDO King of Jerusalem, who lay before Ptolomaida, to aduertise him of the death of his father; and desiring him to send him such men as might guide and direct him what was to be done. Which although it was not to be effected without great danger (for, the most part of their way lay through their enemies Countreies) yet King GVIDO sent him two Knights well experienced in the warres, which guided him and his people to the City of Antioch, which lay neerest to his way: where, after that hee had (for some daies space) refreshed his Army, he thought to haue made great warres, and to haue recovered the Cities lost in that estate; and so to haue proceeded forwards. But his Armie of Germanes, which came wearied and tired of their long journey, finding there great abundance of victuals, by means of their forepassed hunger, so disordered themselves by sursetting (or, it was Gods will that it should be so) as there fell so great a plague among them, that within fewe daies most of them died; in such sort, that FREDERICK (with such as escaped the plague) departed from Antioch; and drawing neer to the sea, imbarked himself, and sailed to the City of Tyre, which (as I said before) was held by the Christians: and leauing there the dead body of his father, he went from thence with his people (but not without great danger of the enemy) to ioyne with GVIDO of Lusignan, King of Jerusalem, who lay before Ptolomaida; which, SALADIN had so fortified and garrisoned, that the Christians were much troubled in the siege thereof; and precluded them: vntill the coming of the Kings of England and of France, after many accidents befell them in the way, which was in the same year: but they continued the siege, accompanied with other Princes, notwithstanding that there was euer little conformity among them; where we will now leaue them, to make relation of the succession in the Empire, for this their historie appertaineth not to my charge: and how HENRY the Sixth, the Emperour FREDERICK's eldest sonne was chosen Emperour, who held his fathers place in Germany, being already made king of the Romanes, and what he did in Germany and in Italy. Yet forasmuch as this enterprise of Jerusalem was so notable a matter, and so great Kings came to the seruice, we will briefly tell you what end it had, though not the successe.

The siege of Antioch by Saladin.

In Constantinople all this while reigned ISACIUS: in Italy a little before this, died without issue, WILLIAM King of both the Sicilies: wherefore Pope CLEMENT the Third challenged those kingdomes for the Church of Rome; and HENRY King of the Romanes, and future Emperour, pretended to be his, by reason of his marriage with Constance sister to King WILLIAM. But the Sicilians and Neapolitans, against the Popes will, chose one TANCREDE, who was Vncle to King WILLIAM, a base son to ROGER King of Sicilie: who seized on the kingdom. In writing this Emperours life, I haue spent longer time then I ordinarily doe, for that many great accidents hapned in his time, and for that so much is written of him, I haue bin in a manner constrained thereto; and also as at other times I haue said, in matters which draw neere to our times, it shall not be amisse to make longer and more ample relation.

My authors in whose books the same may be seen more at large, are these which follow: OTHO FRISINGENSIS in the historie which he particularly wrote in two books, of the beginning of the Emperour FREDERICK's raigne, and RAYDAVICVS in what he added thereto, and GODFRY VITERBIENSIS, all eye witnesses, and the Abbat WESPERG, in his Chronicle, an author of the same time, wherein he writes his life; Abbat ROBERT in the addition which hee made to SIGBERT's Chronicle, OTHO of S. Blasie, BLONDVS of the declining of the Roman Empire, PLATINA in the liues of the Popes, JOHN COLYMAN in his Sea of histories, JOHN BAPTISTA IGNACIUS, JOHN EYITCHIUS, BENEVENT DE Rombaldiis, IOH. CARION, IOH. CUSP., RAPHAEL VOLATERRANVS, in their writings of the Emperours, HEN. MYCIVS, GASPAR CHVRRVS in his Affaires of Germany, in that part wherein he treateth of FREDERICK the first, FRANCISC. IRENICVS, PAVLVS CONSTANTINVS PHRIGIO, CHRISTIANVS MASEVS, MATHEW PALMERIVS, and the other generall Historiographers, treating of these times, as S. ANTH., ANTHONIVS SABELLICVS, IOH. NAVCLERVS, which best of all handleth the matters of Germany, PHILIP BERGOMAS; and besides these, PAVLVS EMILIVS, ROB. GAVIN, and other French writers, POLIDORE VIRGIL in his English History, Pope PIVS in his history of Bohemia, LA COE MIER in his abridgement of the history of Flanders, ANTONIVS SABELLICVS in the history which he particularly wrote of the Venecians, ALBERT CRANTZ in his history of Saxony, GEORGE MERVLA in the history of the Dukes of Milan, AVGUSTIN IUSTINIAN in his Annales of Genoa, MICHAEL RICIVS in his booke of the Kings, and some others which I now remember not.

THE LIFE OF HENRY, THE SIXTH OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRESORE AND EIGHTEENTH ROMANE EMPEROR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

After Frederick succeeded his eldest sonne Henry: who as soone as he had the gouernment of the Empire, went into Italy to be crowned, and to get the kingdome of Sicilia, which came vnto him, by the right of his wife; and was crowned by Pope Celestine. He would haue made a conquest of the kingdome of Naples, but the plague made him returne into Germany. He came into Italy, vpon the same occasion of Sicilia: wherein finding Tancredi dead, he easily obtained the kingdome, notwithstanding that hee committed some cruelties therein worthy of blame: Being returned into Germany, he sent many men to the warres of Iersusalem. And liuing in peace, he came in progresse to visit his new kingdome of Sicilia: where, for his pleasure riding on hunting (as his custome was) he fell sicke and died, when he had reigned eight yeeres.

Henry the eldest sonne of Frederick Barbarossa chosen Emperor.

His life time had been made King of the Romanes, and future Emperour: when as he understood of the death of his father, wrote to the electors, and to the other Princes of the Empire: and they yeelding him the obedience which they had promised in his fathers time, he took vpon him the state and maiestie of Emperour: which was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, nintie, and one, and was called HENRY the Sixt; yet the Italians call him the Fift, for that they reckon not the first HENRY. This man was awise Prince, of a sharpe and quicke wit, well spoken, of a pleasing countenance, but somewhat pale faced, of a meane stature, and tender and delicate of body; but of a fierce and cruell minde, and very valiant, wherefore he was greatly feared of his enemies, and was more addicted to hunting, then was fit for the good gouernment of his estate. In the beginning of his raigne, those of Colen rebelled,

led, and with them certaine Earls & other great men, but it was a matter of no great importance and so it was soone pacified. Being freed from this care, seeking the aid and fauour of his friends, he made preparation to go into Italy (which was the next yeere) with a desire to be crowned in Rome, and to get the kingdome of Sicilia, which fell to him by the right of his wife the Emperess, CONSTANCE, whereto he was invited and called by Pope CELESTINE the Third, who was newly chosen Pope (yet some authors say, that at this time, this CONSTANCE was giuen to him in marriage by this Pope CELESTINE, who gaue her a dispensation for that she was a professed Nunne, to the end, that they should haue the kingdome) for the bastard TANCERDE King of Sicilia and of Naples, who possessed the same, was odious and an enemy to the Pope.

The Emperour HENRY being comen into Italy, passing peaceably through the States of Lombardy (according to the agreement made between his father and them) went towards Rome to be crowned; but before the Pope gaue him the Crowne, he went against the City of Tusculano, which was situate in the Mountaines neer to Rome, which rebelled, and did and had done the Romanes much harm; and taking the same (for it yielded without any resistance) he gaue it to the Romanes (for so was he enioyned to do, before the Crown should be giuen him) and they presently raised the City, and vsed the Citizens with great cruelty, for which the Emperour was much taxed, and blamed to haue suffered so cruell a fact. This cruelty being executed, and the Emperour being with great solemnity crowned in Rome by Pope CELESTINE; and other couenants and agreements being made between them concerning the kingdoms of Sicilia, and of Naples, as feodatory kingdoms to the Church of Rome, and the fee and tribute set down to be paid for the same: The Emperour marching forwards, found all those Countiees in Arms against him, holding for TANCERDE, whom they had chosen, and held for King and their soueraign Lord; yet he took some Towns by force, and went as far as Naples, and besieged the same, as the head of that kingdom; and the Neapolitans valiantly defending their Citie, the siege continued the space of three monthes; in which time there fell in the Camp, so great a mortalitie, and so many of the Emperours souldiers died, that without effecting what he had purposed, he raised his siege: and returned into Germany: And as he arose from before the City, his wife the Emperess (some say going into Germany, which seemeth most certain, and others say, that she coming to her husband, to go with him to the wars) was taken by certain Captaines vpon the way; but so great diligence was vsed, and such a course was taken; that within few daies she was set at liberty; and they which tooke her, were severely punished: and so at this time, he returned crowned, but not victorious, into his Countrey. Two yeers of his raign were expired, and he frustrate of his purpose and desire to recover the kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia, but yet he still had a resolution to return thither again (as he afterwards did) where let vs leaue him: and I will tell you what hapned vnto his brother FREDERICK, and the other Princes which had continued in the East euer sithence the death of his father, the Emperour FREDERICK BARBAROSSA: wherein if all the skirmishes, encounters, battailes, and feates of Armes done by these three kings, of Iersusalem, France and England, in those two yeers warres, should be written, I should haue much to say; but the successe thereof was this, that the siege of Iolomaida continued two yeers, reckoning from the time that GYIDO King of Iersusalem first besieged it, vntill it was taken; during which time, many great matters passed between them and the besieged, and SALADINE's other forces.

At this time died the said FREDERICK Duke of Suecia, sonneto to the Emperour FREDERICK BARBAROSSA, and brother to the Emperour HENRY, and other great personages.

At the end of this time, the Citie was yeelded to the Christians, and the Kings were grown so mighty and so much feared, and the potent SALADINE had lost so many men, that thinking himselfe vnable to defend his countiees, he caused the wallies of Cesaria in Palestina, with Ascalon, Gaza, Porfiria, and of other Cities vpon the Sea-coast, to be thrown down: and the power of the Christians so much encreased, that SALADINE began to parle of the giuing vpon Iersusalem, vpon condition that he might liue in peace. But God otherwise disposed, for the Kings of France and England, were so ill met, that they could neuer agree vpon any thing: Wherefore the King of France resolved to leaue the warres, and to returne into his countiee, and did so, and left the greatest part of his people with the Duke of Burgundy; and so the opportunity of the taking of Iersusalem was lost; for by reason of his departure, SALADINE's minde altered: Neuertheless, RICHARD King of England was a Prince of so great a courage,

The Emperour Henry the first crowned in Rome by Pope Celestine the third.

The Emperour besieged Naples but could not take it.

Iolomaida yeelded to the Christians.

The French king left the wars in the Holy-Land.

Richard Coeur de Lion was King of England in warres
in Palestine.

rage, and carried himself so valiantly in those warres, as besides, that he new builded and fortified Japha (whilom called Ioppa) and some other Townes, he reduced the warres to as good order and estate, as they were in before the French Kings departure. It followed in this time, that CONRAD Marquesse of Manfratta, who was possessor of the great City of Tyre, and the marches thereof, and was called King of Ierusalem, for that (as I told you) he married with ISABEL sister to SIBIL, which was King GVIDO's wife, was in the same Citie slaine by certain fugitives, Turkes; and the widow ISABEL having one daughter by her husband, was married to HENRY, called Earle of Champania, Nephew to the French King; and he marrying her, had with her that Citie, and the title to the Kingdom of Ierusalem, against GVIDO, which held that name and title. Whereupon King RICHARD dealt with GVIDO to renounce the right which he pretended to the kingdom of Ierusalem, and he would give him the dominion of the Isle of Cyprus, with the name of King thereof; which Iland the King of England took in his way as he came to this warre.

GVIDO accepted this bargain, and providing men and shipping necessary, sailed into Cyprus, as King of that Iland, and reigned therein all his life time; and that kingdom remained in him, and in his heyres and successors, vntill the yeer of our Lord, one thousand, foure hundred and fixty, that the Venecians (I know not by what title) made themselves Lords thereof: and the house of England hath euer since pretended right to the kingdom of Ierusalem, as saith PLATINA, and other Authors.

This being past, and many other matters in this warre, amongst which was a great battaile which continued from noone vntill night, wherein the valiant SALADINE was overthrowen, and the King of England, and the Princes with him, had the victory; they resolved to goe and besiege the City of Ierusalem, knowing for certain that SALADINE durst not abide them, for he sued to them for peace, or truce, promising to render Ierusalem, and other places in those marches, to the end that he might obtain the same for some long time: but the Christians were of such power, that they were not therewith satisfied. But vpon a sodain the King of England (very vnadvisedly) gaue out in speeches, that he would return into his country, for that he was certified the French king had entred and taken his Duchy of Normandy: which if hee had conceived, he might haue had what composition he would haue required: but SALADINE knowing his determination, and that the fleets of Pisa and of Venice were already departed, by reason of discord and dissension between them, would not resign Ierusalem. In the end the king of England concluded a peace with him for five years; and leaving Garrisons and Gouernours in the Cities which the Christians had recovered (OTHO Duke of Burgundy, and HENRY the husband of ISABEL, which chalenged the kingdom of Ierusalem, remaining commanders thereof, with the Knights of Saint Iohn and the Templars) he departed homewards, in the yeer one thousand, one hundred ninety three, and by the way was taken prisoner by the Duke of Austria, and was ransomed, and other accidents afterwards befell him: and so hee left the affaires of the East, and more Townes, and better fortified then he found there: yet not so many as a man would haue thought that so great Kings, and such mighty Armies, might haue taken: what ensued, you shall vnderstand hereafter.

The Emperor HENRY (as some men write) was well relieved and furnished with the money which the king of England paid for his rancome, towards his iourney into Italie, for which he then made preparation but he first made his brother CONRAD, Duke of Suenia, for that his other brother FREDERICK died in the East without issue. He then marching towards Italie, to conquer the kingdoms of Sicilia and Naples, which fell to him by his wife, and the Popes grant; and having sent certain Captains before with an Army, by which the warres were already begun, King TANCRED which possessed those kingdoms died; and a little before him, his eldest sonne called ROGER, who was married to YRENE the Emperours daughter of Constantinople, and he left another sonne called WILLIAM (whom they presently made their King) and two or three daughters: by reason whereof the Emperor halted his journey, leading with him his brother PHILIP, and other great Princes: but for all this, the great men, and Cities of those kingdoms left not to rebell, and to withstand the Emperor HENRY, who with his men of warre entred the Countrie, besieging and battering Cities with such rage and fury, that whatsoever City resisted him, hee caused to be ruined and burnt; vsing greater cruelty then befitted a vertuous or Christian Prince: and so perforce, and for feare, all the cities in the kingdome of Naples, and the most of those in Campania, and Pulia, yielded; and thence marching into Calabria did there the like: and seeing himselfe Lord of the estates in the maine land, he passed ouer into Sicilia: wherein, as there was not any King, or head, to rule and command (for TANCRED's sonne was a childe, and his father had been wicked, and a Tyrant) in short space he became Lord of a great part of that Iland. Neuertheless, after this the prelates and great Lords of those kingdoms, with the greatest power they possibly could leuie, gathered head neere to the City of Catania, with a full resolution to try their fortune: where they fought with the Emperor (yet some say the Emperor was not in the battaile) and the Sicilians were ouerthrowen, the Citie taken, and of them was made great slaughter, in which was executed extreme cruelty, putting to the sword both men and women, not sparing those which had retired themselves to the Churches for sanctuary: and some Noble men and Bishops were taken prisoners.

estates

After this, many of the principall men conspired by any meanes howsoeuer to kil the Emperor; which being reuealed vnto him, he caused death to be inflicted vpon all those he could get, which had been accused to haue been of that conspiracy, with such cruelty and rigour, as he could not auoide blame for it: for some he made to be flayed aliue, others to be burnt; and of some he caused sharpe nayles to be driven into their heads: finally, he executed such horrible cruelty vpon them, that he made himselfe to be the most redoubted man in the World. By meanes whereof within short space he became Lord of the whole Iland, and comming with his forces to the City of Palermo (which was the richest and most populous Citie of the Iland) he was receiued without battaile or resistance, and made his entry most solemnly, with all the representations, triumph and shewes of victory that could be deuised: in that Citie (it is reported) he found many precious iewels, and great riches, which had bene the Kings of Sicilia, and there were kept.

He got also into his power YRENE the Emperours daughter of Constantinople, who was betrothed to the deceased King TANCRED's sonne, ROGER; which YRENE he married to his brother PHILIP, although against her will. And the childe whom the Sicilians had made their King, he made his eyes to be put out, thereby to make him incapable of the kingdom; and caused him to be carried prisoner into Germany, where he afterwards died miserably: and his mother the widow with her two daughters, he commanded to be put into a Monastery in Germany, so that hee left nothing forgotten that might assure him of those kingdomes.

This being done he went into Calabria, carrying with him for hostages, such men as hee held to be of great account in both the kingdomes: and for his better assurance, both in the maine land, and in the Iland, he placed Germane gouernours and captains: to some of which he gaue certain estates and titles. Before this, his wife the Emperesse, who was there with him, bare him a son called FREDERICK; at whose birth, by reason that some doubted whether that a woman of her yeeres might be with childe or no, he permitted all that would be present at the birth, commanding it first to bee published, at such time as it was thought she should bee deliuered. In this manner did the Emperour HENRY leaue the two Sicilies in peace and subjection: And with the hostages before mentioned, which were great Lords and Prelates, departed towards Germany (Milan and all Lombardy peaceably obeying him, both at his comming and going) which was in the fift yeer of his reign, and in the yeer of our Lord 1195.

It is true, that although the Emperor obtained his desire in the conquest of Sicilia and Naples, yet all writers affirm that he therewith purchased the name of a very cruel, and vindicative Prince, for the great cruelties which he committed. And PHILIP BERGOMAS affirmeth that through these cruelties, he fell at such oddes with Pope CELESTINE, that he excommunicated him, by certain Bishops and other men of orders, which the Emperor apprehended, and put to death: and that he afterwards suing to the Pope for pardon, was absolved. He was also noted and taxed of excessive couetousness, for the great loanes and imposts, which hee exacted from the people in those kingdoms: which gaue occasion that it was not long before that in Pulia, some towns and great men, began to mutin and to rebell against him: whereupon he put out the eyes of all the hostages, which he had sent into Germany; and sent Captains and soldiers to suppress the Insurrections; and they by his commandement, inflicted cruell punishment vpon the offenders. Being in this prosperity, so as no man rebelled, or held vp his hand against him, his brother CONRAD Duke of Suenia died, at such time as he began to warre against BERYOLD Duke of Zeringe, which then, and before that time was, and had been, a great house in Germany: and his brother CONRAD being dead without issue, the Emperor gaue the Duchy of Suenia to his brother PHILIP, who (as I said) married the Emperours daughter of Constantinople.

After

The cause why Richard was driven by the Saracians.

King Richard Coeur de Lion, was prisoner coming from his wars in the Holy Land
by the Duke of Austria.

Frederick the Emperours son being a child was chosen king of the Romanes.

After all these things, he sought by all means possible, that the Princes Electors should chuse his sonne FREDERICK (a child of little more then two yeeres old) for King of the Romanes: and forasmuch as he was of great power, and much feared, they did so; notwithstanding that it seemed to them, to be a matter very vnusult and vnreasonable.

At this time Pope CLESTINE very earnestly solicited the Princes of Christendome, and especially the Emperour (seeing that the time of the truce, made in the East by the King of England was expired, and that the great SALADINE was dead, but a little before, on whom depended the chiefest force of the Infidels) that they should not now forget the conquest of Jerusalem; seeing they had so fit an opportunitie. The Emperour (with the zeale of a Christian Prince, though a cruell one) seeing that he could not goe himselfe in person, by reason of his small assurance in his Kingdomes of Sicilia, and the tranquillitie of Germany: many Princes offering themselves to go that iourney voluntarily, and many souldiers and men of war, which he sent in his pay (at his own charges) provided a very great and good Army: wherewith went the Archbishop of Nemz, the Bishop of Ratisbone, BERNARD Duke of Saxony, CONRAD Chancelor of the Empire, LEOPOLD Duke of Austria, HARMAN Lantzgrau of Twinge, the Duke of Brabant and some other Marquesses, Earls, and men of estate; all which leaving their houses and countries, of meere deuotion, with valiant mindes, after long trauaile by land and sea (wherein they were much aided and reliued by ISACIUS Emperour of Constantinople) came to the coast of Palestina, to the citie of Tyre and Ptolomaida, which they called Acon; where they presently applied themselves to the warres; the truce graunted by the King of England being expired. In which time, GYDO King of Cyprus, who before had been King of Jerusalem, deceased; and forasmuch as he had no sonne, his brother ALMERICVS had that kingdom: and it also happened, that at that same season, HENRY, who was called king of Jerusalem, by the marriage (as I said) of ISABEL sister to SIBIL, in his citie of Ptolomaida fell out of a very high terrasse or gallerie in his palace, and so died vnfortunatly: and ALMERICVS king of Cyprus, sought to marrie with his wife, wherewith she was content; and so for a time he was called king of Cyprus and Jerusalem. But for as much as he was negligent, and of small experience in the warres, and in matters of government, he afterwards lost the title of Jerusalem, which was given to IOHND BARENA, a Frenchman, being a man of great worth and valour, who married the daughter of this ISABEL, which he had by her second husband CONRAD. The Germanes sent by the Emperour, ioyning with ALMERICVS his forces, became masters of the field; and marching forwards, besieged and assaulted some citices, took Berito, and reedified Joppa, now called Japha.

While the Armie did these things in the East, the Emperour HENRY setting all things in order in Germany, came with his wife and his young sonne into Italy, to visite his estate of Milaw; and from thence went into Sicilia, the better to confirme himselfe in his new Dominion; and the better also to provide for the warres and conquest of the Holy land, which was generally desired. He came into Sicilia, to the Citie of Mesuna, with his wife and his son, (who was already called king of the Romanes) and gouerned the Empire and those Kingdomes in peace, enlarging the same more then the Pope would he should haue done, for he held from him the Mare de Ancona, and some places in Tuscane. But it pleased God to frustrate all his designs by death: for being much delighted in hunting; it hapned, that hunting vpon an extreame hot day, in the month of August, he layd him downe one night to sleep in a greene field, neere to certain fresh springs of water: and awaking with the cold and the deaw of the night, he felt himselfe very ill, and was carried to Mesuna, where his infirmity increasing, he dyed; when he had reigned eight yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord 1198. hauing first recommended the protection and government of his young sonne FREDERICK, who was called king of the Romanes, and of the two Sicilies, to his brother PHILIP Duke of Suenia, vntill that he should come to age fit to rule; and wrot his Letters concerning the same to Pope INNOCENT the third, who succeeded CLESTINE the third, who died a little before him in the same year. This Emperour was a wise, a valiant, and a mighty Prince, but his ouer-much fiercenesse and cruelty blemished those vertues. All this while reigned ISACIUS in Constantinople, which he gouerned very well for the space of eleuen or twelue yeeres in peace; after the death of the tyrant ANDRONICVS, as we haue set downe in the life of the Emperour FREDERICK.

THE

THE LIFE OF PHILIP, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSORE AND NINETEENTH RO-MANE EMPEROR, AND OF ISACIUS AND ALEXVS Emperors of Constantinople.
()

THE ARGVMENT.

HE Emperour Henry being dead, the Empire was divided betwixt two competitors, which were Philip and Otho: and either of them marshalling the forces of his friends and assistants, many sad battailes were fought between them. They both were crowned: but Otho's coronation was ratified by the Pope, and Philip's reprobred, and himselfe excommunicate: but he making slight account of the excommunication persisted in his attempt, and having in a bickering overthrown the Lantzgrau, became very mighty, and Otho's power daily grew weake, and he himselfe, in the end, was drineto flee, and to goe into England. Philip afterwards sought to pacifie the Pope, and to be at peace with him: another reconciliation being made, a Peace was procured with Otho, which was concluded by making him his sonne in law, and his successor in the Empire: but this joy lasted not long. For Otho being come to the Court, the Count Palatine of Wistilsbach, who was Philip's secret enemy, upon a day (with a resolution to kill him) came to his chamber, desiring to speake with him, and being let in, he took his sword from his Page, and therewith slew the Emperour, when he had reigned ten yeeres.

IT is a common and vsuall thing through all the World, that after the death of great Kings and Princes, ensue great changes and alterations; which is verified by the death of HENRY the sixt, whose History we haue now ended: for by reason thereof, followed great innovations, and vnexpected accidents. First in the Army which he sent into the East, to the conquest of Jerusalem, and which had begun the warre with good successe, his death being published, the Princes and Prelates which went thither agreed together in all haste to returne home to their houses, and did so; nothing preuailling with them the counsell and entreaty of SIMON of Monferato, a most excellent souldier, who came thither with certain troups of Frenchmen to their aide: and so they left the countrey abandoned, and in such necessity, as the Infidels taking the City of Japha, destroyed the same, and laid it euen with the ground; and king ALMERICVS and the Christians were brought to such extremity, as they were drinuen to sue to the Infidels for peace: so as it appeareth, that it was not Gods will that the warres and conquest of the Holy-land should euer haue any good successe.

In Germany followed the greatest tumults, wars and battailes, touching the choise of an Emperour, that euer had been scene for the like cause. Pope INNOCENT began to recouer some places which the Emperour HENRY held from the Church. The Empreffe presently sued to the Pope, for the confirmation of Sicilia to her and her sonne, which she hardly obtained, but with the losse of lands and dignities. So great effect worketh oftentimes the absence, or X x presence

The death of great Princes cause great alterations.

The death of
the Emperour
Henry the
sixt.

presence, of one man only: for PHILIP Duke of Sueuia, whose History I now beginne to write, was inuaded by his brothers death in Italy, he going to visit him; from whence, as soon as he vnderstood thereof (for as some authors say he was not present when he died) he returned into Germany, and by the way past many dangers; with an intent (notwithstanding that he had the title of his Nephewes Protector) to get (if he might) the Empire for himselfe; whereto, being commi into Germany, as well by means of his estate and authority, as also for that he was the brother and sonne of an Emperor, he found great fauour, and great contradiction and resistance also, by many Princes which were enemies to his house and family; and for some other respects. Principally, the Electors voyces being diuided into two, the one part named the same PHILIP for Emperor; for of his nephew, by reason of his infancy, and also for that he was King of Sicilia (notwithstanding their promise made to his father) they made small account: and the other party chose OTHO, Earle or Duke of Brunswick, the sonne of HENRY the Proud, who had been Duke of Saxony, and was dispossessed (as we said) by the Emperor EDWARD, wherfore some authors call him Duke of Saxony: This OTHO's mother was sister to the king of England, by whose meanes (as some say) he was called to the Empire.

Philip chosen
Emperor.

Otho chosen
Emperor.

Bertold called
Emperor.

Between these two was cruell and sharpe warre and competency, hauing recourse to their Arms: yet the Abbat WASPERS faith, that BERTOLD Duke of Zeringe, before, or at the same time, was a third competitor, and was called Emperor: but Duke BERTOLD's challenge continued not long, for he soone agreed with PHILIP; and for that most authors write it not, I will passe it ouer, with the only remembrance thereof. PHILIP and OTHO being in Armes, each of them with his partakers and friends, began to warre, killing, robbing and imprisoning one another.

OTHO was holpen and supported by the King of England as his Vncle and friend, and by the Lantzgraue of Turinge, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Duke of Liconia, the Earle of Limburch, the Archbishop of Colen, and his Prelates and Suffraganes, the Earle of Flanders and his friends, and some other princes and prelates: Pope INNOCENT also fauoured his cause, calling to minde that the ancestors of this OTHO, Dukes of Saxony, had greatly assisted and defended the Church of Rome; and to the contrary, PHILIP's predecessors Dukes of Sueuia, had persecuted the same, causing schismes and diuisions; as HENRY the fourth, FREDERICK the first, and his brother FREDERICK had also held many places in Tuscany, and Athona, belonging to the Church of Rome.

Those which tooke part with PHILIP, wereth the King of France, the Archbishops of Mentz, the Dukes of Saxony, and of Austria (who then came from the warres in the East) the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Bauiere, the Dukes of Lorraine, and of Brabant; and all the rest of the Princes which took not part with OTHO (but yet the successe changed these fauours) and PHILIP for his person was better beloued and more esteemed then OTHO, for he was mild, of a noble disposition, discrete, and liberrall (wherby good will is principally got) very valiant, though but of a weak body, and of a meane stature; of a good countenance, and faire, white and red.

OTHO had not so good parts of a man in him; for he was held not very wise, rash, and without measure audacious. PHILIP hauing assembled his friends in the City of Mentz, he was there annoyed and crowned Emperor by the Bishop of Tarantasia; the Bishop of Sutrina, who was the Popes Ambassador and Legate, being there present, who came thither for another purpose; wherewith the Pope was extremely moued. OTHO and his friends, perceiving that PHILIP was crowned, went to Aken, which PHILIP had already taken; and besseging and scaling it, took the same vpon composition: and there ADOLPH Archbishop of Colen preposterously crowned him, and he therefore was held for right Emperor: which coronation was afterwards confirmed by Pope INNOCENT, who sent GUIDO Cardinall of Preneeste for his Legate to the Citie of Colen, for the same purpose, and to excommunicate PHILIP, and all his followers and abettors. PHILIP (as a man of great spirit) sought to fight with OTHO, and to that end entred his enemies countries, destroying the same with fire and sword, and took some strong Castles neer to Argentine, where between his and OTHO's troups, were many skirmishes and encounters, and many men were slaine of either side: and the next year following he came against the same Citie of Argentine, which held for OTHO; which yielded vpon composition, and he was therein receiued and obeyed.

OTHO in like manner with all his whole power came against PHILIP: and between the

souldiers

souldiers of the one and other, were some battels and skirmishes; wherein PHILIP for the most part had the victory, which made some to come ouer to his side: but yet the coming of the Popes Legate at this time, and the publishing of the excommunication, did greatly hinder PHILIP's proceedings, and was a great help to OTHO, with the Prelats and ecclesiasticall Personages. PHILIP hauing the greatest quarell against the Lantzgraue of Turinge, for that by his means principally OTHO was chosen; he therefore resolved to enter his Country, and to spoil it; and putting the same in execution, took one or two very strong Towns of his. The Lantzgraue railing his power, and sending for help to the Count Palatine of Rhine, and to OTHO CHARVS, King of Bohemia (who now joined with OTHO, by reason of the Popes excommunication) and to other his friends and kinsmen, leuied so great a number of good men of war, that PHILIP, not daring to fight with him, retired to a strong Town, wherein they besieged him: but he vsed such means, that in the night he got out of the Town, and put himself in safety. And within few daies after came OTHO to the aid of the Lantzgraue with his whole power, in hope to haue taken PHILIP; for, they had written to him, that he could not escape from the place wherein they held him besieged. So as OTHO, being then Master of the field, summoned a Diet or Councell to be held in the City of Mersburg, in the month of August, in the year of our Lord 1203: where, in the presence of the before named Princes, and of his friends, he was the second time crowned by the Popes Legat; and his first election was approved and confirmed, and many reuolted from PHILIP to him, by reason (as they pretended) of the Popes censures.

At this time the Empreffe CONSTANCE, Tutresse of the yong FREDERICK King of Sicilia, dying, she recommended the protection of the childe to Pope INNOCENT, who sent certain Legats to gouern those Countries in the behalf of the yong King, who afterwards was Emperor, as you shall hear. OTHO his fauourites & partakers being gone from this Diet or Councell with victory, the next year following their fortune altered: for, PHILIP with the aid of France, Saxony, Austria, Mentz, Wittenbergh, Sueuia, Bauiere, and the rest of those which held with him, came vpon the Lantzgraue and his confederates; and entering his Countries (as he had done the year before) took certain Castles. The King of Bohemia & the Count Palatine came to ioin with the Lantzgraue, and so to fight with PHILIP: but PHILIP met and sought with them before they could ioin with the Lantzgraue, and obtained the victory, although bloody; the Bohemians running away, and disordering themselves in the beginning, so as great slaughter was made of them in the chase. PHILIP through this victory won so great reputation, that many of those which vntil then had been silent and newters, came to serue him; and from his enemy came not a few. And the Lantzgraue, seeing his succours ouertowne and scattered, and his Country spoiled, sought means to come to some composition with PHILIP, and to serue him: and PHILIP (as he was a milde and courteous Prince) admitted him into his fauour and friendship; and the Lantzgraue with great humility came and yielded himself into his power.

The Bohemians
entered browns.

After him came ADOLPH, Archbishop of Colen, who nothing fearing the Popes excommunications, against such as took part with PHILIP, or defended his quarell, compounded with him also, promising to bring the Dukes of Lorraine and of Brabant to his deuotion; a thing which PHILIP much desired, and gaue him to effect the same a great summe of money: which was the cause that many others did the like. So as this party growing now to be strongest, a meeting was appointed to be had in Aken: and for as much as PHILIP had not been crowned there by a general assent, he was again with great solemnity crowned Emperor and King of the Romans by the hands of the said Archbishop ADOLPH, who depised and contemned his Popes censures: whereupon Pope INNOCENT deprived and deposed him from his Archbishoprick, and sent commandment to his Legat, who then lay in Colen, to cause another to be chosen: and the Chanons assembling, made choice of one BAYNVS, a man of great account; and OTHO took such order, that he was presently consecrated by two Bishops that came from England: wherewith PHILIP was so much enraged; that he presently went and serpon the City of Colen; and not being able to take it by force, he spoiled the fields; and put the deposed Archbishop in the possession of some Towns in the Marches and Territories of that City; in so much that neither the one nor the other party could rule or gouern that Church.

The like happened afterwards in many other Churches; some houlding of the one faction, and others of the other: and miserable Germany at this time endured grieuous calamities.

X x z

for,

for, besides the great wars and battails, the Churches and Monasteries were robbed.

After all this, the next year following, which was the year 1205, PHILIP, with a great power of Princes and marshall men, came to make warre vpon OTHO, who with his friends and allies was in Colen, with whom, amongst such others as came thither, was GUIDO the Pope's Legate, and BRYNN the Archbishop thereof. And with PHILIP came the deposed Bishop: but OTHO, having no sufficient forces to fight with him in field, held himself within the City, not daring to keep the field against him; which, PHILIP perceiving, he sent for all the forces he could leue, and besieged OTHO, and those which were with him in Colen: so as OTHO was in greater distresse than hee thought of in the beginning; and the siege was so sharp, that it was impossible for any man to get in or out without the leaue of the besiegers.

OTHO knowing that if he staid any longer there, besides the reputation which he lost, his person and life would be in great danger, resolved to make way through his enemies, or to dy in the action: and making choice of his best men, both of horse and foot, besides men of account, he one day suddenly sallied and charged into his enemies Camp, and in the beginning made great slaughter of them; but being oppressed with the multitude, he vsed the means hee had propounded, and so escaped by flight: yet in the chace, many of those which sallied with him were taken prisoners and slain. Among which, BRYNN the new Archbishop was taken prisoner, whom PHILIP held in irons about one whole year after: and in this flight, OTHO neuer staid till he came into Saxony, where hee was harboured and protected by Duke BRUNARD. PHILIP, thus preuailing, offered to honourable composition to those of Colen, that they yielded, and came all to his seruice; and restoring ADOLPH to his seat and Bishoprick, he wholly disannulled and made void the new election of BRYNN, without any regard of the Pope's commandments.

OTHO perceiving that PHILIP's power did daily more and more increase, and that hee had not any forces wherewith he might defend himself, took ship and sailed into England: and so for that time remained PHILIP peacefull Emperor, finding no man that in field made any resistance, but what the Pope did with his fulminations, whereof (as it seemeth) he made small account. And the better to assure to himself the loue of men (he naturally desiring to end matters by clemency) he gaue his eldest daughter in marriage to the King of Bohemia, and another daughter to the Duke of Brabant's eldest sonne: and so vpon other Princes he bestowed fauours and benefits; wherein (as saith the Abbat WESPERGENSIUS) he spent his whole patrimony, giuing Towns and Castles, yea, Churches and their reuenues: for, so much do men desire to raige, that, to bring the same to effect, there is no law but they will break and violate; yea, and they think they may lawfully do it: which may well and sufficiently be prooued by such matters as passed in these times in the Empire of Constantinople, which for that they make to our purpose and history, I will heere briefly recite, although so great accidents require a longer relation: and so for a while we will leaue OTHO fled and banished into England, and PHILIP to enjoy his victory.

In Constantinople then reigned ISACOR ISACIUS (of whom we haue made mention) as a iust Prince and good Governor; who with a great summe of monie redeemed a brother of his, a valiant and excellent Captain, called ALEXVS, who in the wars was taken prisoner by the Turks; to whom after his coming to his Court (besides the Lands & estate allowed him for his maintenance) he gaue so great authority and command in the government, that all matters of greatest importance were ordered by his direction; and he being in this fauour, the diuell ambition, and desire to raige, possessed him; so as, to bring his purpose to effect, hee resolved to break all lawes both diuine and humane, together with the bands wherein he stood bound to his Soueraign Lord and brother: for, in requital of the benefits received, with the help and assistance of such as himself, he apprehended his brother, and put out his eyes, and seised vpon the Empire to his owne behoof: and a son of ISACIUS, called after his treacherous Vncles name, ALEXVS, fled, and came into Germany to the Emperor PHILIP, whose wife YRNE was this young mans sister: but as PHILIP was not so firmly seated in his Empire, as to be able to succour and relieue another, by reason of his wars with OTHO, so he could not then doe as he would haue done.

At that time by chance (or else it was Gods will it should be so) were in Venice, BALDVIN Earl of Flanders, and his brother HENRY; and BONIFACE Marquesse of Monferrat; LEUVVS Earl of Savoy; and other Noble Personages, with many souldiers and men of war;

Noble men
of Venice.

induced to meet there, by Pope INNOCENT, for the conquest of Ierusalem and the holy Land: where they staid for shipping to go on their voyage; whither came, recommended to them by the Emperor PHILIP, this young ALEXVS. Whereupon these Princes (by the consent of the Duke and Senate of Venice, and of the Pope) concluded to go against the Tyrant ALEXVS: whereto the Venecians gaue great aid, sending an Admirall with a great fleet. The league and accord being made with the Nephew ALEXVS: hee promised, that being restored, he would reduce the Greek Church to the obedience of the Latin; and many other matters in recompense: and so they departed with a good and prosperous winde. And omitting such accidents as befell them in their voyage (wherein they took the Ile of Creta, now called Candia, and other places) it was so, that they arrived neer to the City of Constantinople; where the Tyrant ALEXVS in a readinesse awaited their coming, with a very great number of souldiers; and they, setting their men on land, had a battell with THEODORE LASCARVS the Tyrant's sonne-in-law, who sallied forth with an Armie to fight with them; and hee being ouertrowne, they pursued him to the gates of the City; which they besieged both by sea and land.

At the end of eight daies which they had been there (wherein were many braue skirmishes and fierce encounters) the Tyrant ALEXVS, seeing that he could not prevail, fled out of the City by night; and after him followed the most part of his complices: and the next day, the Citizens opening the Ports, took the blinde Emperor ISACIUS out of prison, and with him went forth to the Camp; where very willingly they took the sonne to bee Emperor, together with the father: and hee was with great solemnity received into the City, and crowned in the Church of Saint SOPHIA, in the presence of all the Latine Captains; wherewith the blinde father was greatly comforted; and it seemed that all went well, and to the contentment of all men: and the Knights and Commanders of the Latines, to avoid the scandalls which might arise between their people and the citizens, went to their Tents in the Camp.

In the mean while that the new Emperor and his father made payment to the Venecians of what they had promised, and had accomplished the same, the Greeks greatly murmuring for the naturall hatred which they bare against the Latines, the blinde Emperor ISACIUS died; and then presently began new scandalls and tumults in the City, they all exclaiming against the promises made by the young ALEXVS to the Latines; and alleging that they ought not to be performed, put themselves in Arms against them: but yet the new Emperor desired to haue throughly accomplished the same. Yet some Authors lay this breach to his charge, saying, that he would not hould his word. Finally, the matter fell so out, that the tumult infinitely increasing, one MARTILLVS, who had been a Favourite of the Emperor ISACIUS (beeing the chief occasion of this mutiny, and whom the Greeks chose for their Generall, calling him Emperor) went to the Palace where the new Emperor ALEXVS was, and with his owne hand slue him, within one month after his coronation: and the new vpstart Traitor MARTILLVS was set in his place, who presently studied how he might get the fleet of the Venecians, and of the Princes of the Latines, on fire, and to cut off all victuals from them, and by assaulting them in their lodgings, to haue ouertrowne and defeated them; but the effect ensued after another manner: for, after many skirmishes, slaughters, and effusion of much blood (which for breuitie I omit) the Latines had the victory, the Tyrant fled, and they were Lords of the City, together with all the country round about it. And so much as the Empire was without any lawfull successor, and that they had made a conquest thereof, by a generall consent they resolved to chuse an Emperor; and, making among themselves fifteen Electors, BALDVIN Earle of Flanders was chosen and created Emperor; and for such was sworn, received and obeyed: and the Patriarch, THOMAS MOROSINI, a Venecian Gentleman, presently went vnto Rome; where his Prelacy, and the Emperor's election, and all the rest, was approved and confirmed by the Pope; and he with his owne hands inuested him, and gaue to him for the Emperor the Imperiall Ensignes.

This great attempt being attatched by these Captains, according to their first agreement they diuided what they had gotten; and the Ilands of Creta, now Candia, and Euboea now Negropont, were giuen to the Venecians, which they haue held vnto this day: and for as much as the Ile of Candia was first giuen to BONIFACE, Marquesse of Monferrat; the Countrey of Thessalia, which is a Prouince of Macedonia, was giuen him, with the title of King; with other rewards and shares giuen to other Princes, aswell in the Ilands, as in the Main; of which remained estates, and houses, which I omit: and so the Empire continued BALDVIN's and his successors, for the space of more then 60. yeers; with such adventures, as you shall heare hereafter: but Adrianople rebelling, inflicting it self all this while; THEOPHILAS the Emperor ALBXV's son in law, who (as we said) sailed out to fight with the Latins, being gotten into the same, The new Emperor, BALDVIN, besieged that Citie, and died before it, and his brother HENRY succeeded him in the Empire: the rest you shall vnderstand when the time commeth.

Now let vs returne to our storie of PHILIP Emperor of Germany, whom we left victorious; and to OTHO fled into England: yet let the Reader remember and abhorre the treasons of ALBXV and MIRTELVS; whereof the one put out the eyes of his owne brother; and the other murdered his soueraigne Lord: and let him consider what ends they had; and therewith, how little stabilitie and assurance there is in the Empires and principalities of this world; and with how vniust titles they are oftentimes gotten and possessed; of all which, there hath been a sufficient and apparant example, in that which hath now been spoken of the Grecke Empire. The Emperor PHILIP having expelled OTHO out of Germany, he and his followers imagined that their aduersaries should not be able any more to molest him: neuertheless in regard of peace, he being in disgrace with the Church of Rome, by the aduice of the Princes which were assembled for that purpose, sent his Ambassadors to the Pope, excusing his doings, alleging the equity of his cause, entreating him to establish some peace in the Empire, to absolve him, and to confirm his election; and therewith yielded himselfe to his obedience. The Pope hearing the Ambassage, gaue also care to the treatie, and sent, for his Ambassadors, Cardinals, Legates of great account, to the Emperour, to treat of a peace: which being come, and with much honour receiued; among other motions, one was, that the Emperour should marry a daughter which he had, to RICHARD the Popes Nephew, and should giue him therewith the estates of Spoleto in Tuscane, and the Marca de Ancona, which belonged to the Church of Rome, and were in the Emperours possession.

This motion (as saith ABBA SPIROGENSI) was made by the Emperour, by that meane to win the Popes grace and fauour: yet some attribute it to the Pope. These and many other matters were motioned, and there were many meetings of Princes; whither his competitor OTHO also sent his Ambassadors; and afterwards came out of England into Saxony. And of the one side and of the other, many demands and offers were made (the Cardinals Legates being vmpiers and mediators between them) in the end, in a general meeting which was held in a Towne on the borders of Saxony, OTHO being in a Castle nere vnto it, security being giuen by cyther party, a general peace was concluded, vpon condition that OTHO should marrie with the daughter of the Emperour PHILIP, and be held for king of the Roimans; and future Emperour after the decaie of PHILIP: Which agreement was confirmed & sworn, and a general pardon was giuen by one to the other, and the Pope dispensed with their neer enemie of blood; and all such as were excommunicate, were absolved by the Popes Legates: and so all was in peace and quiet, and OTHO remained the Emperours son in law, and heire apparant; and for such was presently sworne, and the Legates returned to Rome: All which passed in the yeere of our Lord 1207, wherewith all men were very glad and well contented, hoping that it would haue long continued; for PHILIP was an exceeding liberrall and courteous Prince, and deerey beloued generally of all men. But if otherwise happened: for the yeere following, the Emperour being in the Towne of Bamberg, for the recovery of his health; OTHO Count Palatine Wilsbach, who had been his deadly enemy (and was so still in secret) came to the Emperours court, shewing himselfe publicly to be his loyall seruant. His comming (as it afterwards appeared) was but to practice the Emperours death, and as a traitor to kill him, which PHILIP nothing suspected.

The Emperour being one day after dinner in his chamber reposing himselfe vpon his bed, for that he finding himself somewhat ill, had been let blood that day; the Count Palatine called at his chamber doore, accompanied with some which were acquainted with his presence: and the Emperour vnderstanding who he was, made the doore to be opened, notwithstanding that none were with him but his Chancellor the Bishop of Spire, and a page which waited on his Cup, called HENRY of Wilsbach, without any weapons: the Count Palatine at his entrance, imagining the time now fit for him to execute his diuillish intent and treason, at the doore took his sword from a page which carried the same; and suddenly drawing it, before that the Bishop or page could rescue him, wounded the Emperour in the throat: which wound, although it were not great, yet it was mortall, and he presently died thereof, the organ pipes being cut.

The

The Page, making a lowd outcrie, would haue shutte the doore, to the intent that the Count Palatine should not haue gotten for it: but he gaue him afore wound ouer the face, and opening the doore departed; and ioyning with the Bishop of Bamberg, and the Marquess of Burgundy, which were his confederats in this treason, they all together fled from the Court, vpon post horses which they had layd for that purpose.

This murder was committed vpon the 22. day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord 1208 in the tenth yeere of this Emperours raigme: Great was the tumult which grew hereby: and the course of the people which ranne to the Emperours chamber: who finding him dead, made great moane and lamentation for him (for he was a Prince well beloued, for the nobleness and libralitie of his mind) all men abhorring the Count Palatines treason: for which he escaped not vnpunished; for he was slaine by the Emperours Steward HENRY, in reuenge of his Lords death. The Emperour PHILIP had neuer any forine, but foure daughters then married; one with OTHO the King of the Romanes, when the peace was made betwene them, which OTHO succeeded him; and another with the King of Bohemie, another with the Duke of Brabant eldest sonne, and the fourth with RICHARD Earle of Tuscane; nephew to Pope INNOCENT. In Constantinople reigned HENRY the brother of BALDVIN, of whom we of late made mention.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND HVN- DRETH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

After the death of the Emperour Philip, Otho without any contradiction was taken for Emperour; and notwithstanding that he was chosen for his successor in Philips time, it pleased the Electors to chuse him anew: and he being confirmed, was crowned by the Bishop of Colen. After the ceremonies were ended, he applied himself to persecute the murderers of Philip; and notwithstanding that hee was well pleased with his death, neuertheless he made this shew of reuenge. He came afterwards to be crowned in Rome: but a great tumult arising between his people and the citizens, he departed in choler with the Pope, and made warre vpon him: so as the Pope excommunicated him, and deprived him of the Empire. Whereupon, many Princes of Germany, denying him their obedience, chose another Emperour, which was Frederick, King of Sicilie: and although that Otho sought by many means to recover the Empire; yet he could neuer attain thereto; and so died a private Lord in Saxony, when he had reigned five yeeres.

Y how much PHILIP was a better Emperour then his competitor OTHO, it was not long before the same OTHO made it apparant; notwithstanding that in the beginning he gaue some signes to the contrarie: so as we may hold the old prouerbe to be true, which saith, that Authoritie will manifest a man. As soone as the violent death of PHILIP was published, the agreement being yet fresh in memorie, that OTHO should succcede him; by common consent he was held for Emperour; yet he held not the dignitie long, being cast downe by the Popes sentence which had rayled him: and notwithstanding that in the life time of PHILIP he had been twice crowned, neuertheless the princes, electors (according to the ancient custome) met at Franckford; and he being there cho-

According to the Germane Emperours the Otho should be the fourth: but holding the ordinary course he was the Fifth of that name.

X x 4

fen

ſen againe went to Aken, and there was crownd by the Archbishop of Colem, although with ſome delay; for the Archbishop of Spira, who was Chancelor to the late Emperor PHILIP, and was preſent (as we ſaid) when he was ſlaine, had lodged himſelfe in a very ſtrong Caſtle, and would not deliuer the Scepter, the Croſſe, the Crowne, and the Imperiall enſignes, which remained in his cuſtodie; except he were firſt confirmed in his office of Chancelor: whereupon the new Emperor confirmed him; and ſo was crowned peaceably with great ſolemnitie: which being ended, Pope INNOCENT's Legates came to him (who had euer been his friend) to congratulate his gloſſion, and to approue and confirme the ſame: the coming of which Legates, the Emperor attended in the citie of Siporbo; and they deliuered their ambafſade, and treated of other matters concerning the general peace and publike good: and offered the Emperor in the behalfe of the Pope, that if he would come to Rome, the Pope would crowne him with his own hands, as his predecessors had done.

O T H O having diſpatched theſe Legates, he took his way towards Suenia, to take poſſeſſion thereof, in the right of his wife the Emperor PHILIP's daughter, with whom, at the concluſion of the peace he was married; and to whom (he ſaid) that ſtate did appertain: yet FREDERICK, King of Sicilia, PHILIP's nephew, who afterwards was Emperor, was called Duke of Suenia; and was ſo afterwards. O T H O coming into Suenia (profeſſing his coming thither to be, to quiet the troubles, by ſuppreſſing robberies and violences committed in that countrey; much whereof he redreſſed) gaue ſo ill entertainment and countenance to the Earles, Barons, and Gentlemen of that great Duchie, that many of them abandoned the countrey; and he made himſelfe to be generally ill beloued: yet there wanted no ſome, which to flatter him, commended his doings (a thing which maketh Kings and Princes moſt to erre, and to continue in their errors). And within few daies after he went to Augsburgh, which is in the ſame province; whither he ſummoned the Princes to come; and with their conſent he proceeded againſt O T H O, Count Palatine of Wittſpach, (who murdered the Emperor PHILIP) and againſt ſuch as were his complices in the murder: all which were condemned, being abſent, as guilty of high treaſon, and were deprived of all the dignities, goods and lands which they poſſeſſed; of which, ſome he beſtowed upon others, and part hee conſiſked to the chamber of the Empire. And notwithstanding that all men preſumed that hee was well pleaſed with the death of PHILIP, yet he inflicted this puniſhment; and outwardly made ſhew of much ſorrow for the ſame: and ſome were of opinion that the Count Palatine murdered the Emperor PHILIP, in hope that his ſucceſſor O T H O would haue rewarded him for the fact. But whatſoeuer any man thought, he did as I ſay, and well might he be pleaſed with his death; and diſpleaſed with the treaſon. By meanes of this puniſhment, and for righting ſome other wrongs he began in many mens opinion to be reputed a good Emperor, and a great Iuſticer: yet amongſt men of the better ſort he was blamed, for the oppreſſion which he vſed, both in Suenia and in other places: but in the beginning hee was without contradiction obeyed of all men.

Few daies after this, in the moneth of March, in the yeere 1209, hee ſummoned a generall Parliament or Diet, to be held in the citie of Maguenz; where the principall point that was handled, was how to get aide and reliefe from the Princes and eſtates of the Empire, towards his journey into Italy, to be crowned in Rome; and it was concluded, that he ſhould doe ſo; and many offered him their ſeruite, and to accompanie him in that journey: and ſo he, and they which were to go with him, leuied their forces, and put themſelves in a readineſſe, with ſuch expedition that in the beginning of Iuly following, they all met in the citie of Augsburgh; from whence he took his way towards Italy: firſt leauiſg his wife the Empreſſe in Saxony, in the citie of Brannſchael, which was his inheritance; which, with other townes, he held and defended, being part of the eſtate of HENRY the proud, when he was depoſed; and deſcending downe through the valleys of Trent, he went directly to Verona; where he was receiued and obeyed as their Lord: and from thence went to Milan, and by other cities of Lombardy, to Bologna; whither he ſummoned the cities of Lombardy, and all the townes and cities ſubiect to the Empire in Italy, to come to a Councell: wherein he was ſo fortunate, that all obeyed, and came at his ſummons peaceably, and furniſhed him with men and money for his journey; and many Earles and Barons accompanied him in perſon, in ſuch ſort, that he departed thence very ſtrong towards Rome, where Pope INNOCENT attended his coming, and he and all his Nobles which came with him, were there receiued with great ioy, and he himſelfe was crowned in S. PETER's Church by the Pope; who had much deſired to ſee that day, perſwading himſelf that he ſhould

A Councell held
by the Emperor in Bologna.

hate

haue had a great friend of him, ſeeing that he had euer procured his greates againſt the Emperor PHILIP; and the Emperor, after the accuſtomed manner, ſware obedience to the Church of Rome, and to enlarge, and not to vſurpe the patrimonie thereof: which he afterwards hardly performed.

The ſame day, betweene his ſouldiers, which remained in his Camp neere to the walles of Rome (part whereof were come to ſee the citie) and the citizens, aroſe ſo great a tumult and bickering, that about a thouſand of the Emperours men were ſlaine; wherewith hee was very much incenſed; and ſo was the Pope, who indeede was his friend: And ſeeing that greater inconueniences were likely to haue enſued, he departed, and came directly to Milan with his Army, accuſing and blaming the Pope for what had paſſed; and in Milan hee was receiued and obeyed, and lay there all the winter, which was very tempeſtuous. Leaving there his Imperiall enſignes (wherewith the Milanois held themſelves greatly honoured) reinforcing his Army (for that he had diſcharged a great part thereof) he departed in the Spring, to make a conqueſt of the Church lands; firſt in the province of Tuſcane, where he took many places: and thence he went into the Marca de Ancona, where he did the like, and could not be reſiſted: and from thence it was thought that he would haue made warre in the territorie of Rome, and haue beſieged the citie. The Pope ſent his Legates vnto him, putting him in mind of the fauours and good offices which he had done him; and to require and admoniſh him to deſiſt from his enterpriſe: but the Emperor making no account thereof, leauiſg garriſons in thoſe townes, marched towards the kingdome of Naples, and began to make warre againſt FREDERICK king of Sicilia: and took (the young King miſtruſting no ſuch matter) the citie of Capua, and many others in thoſe quarters: wherewith the Pope was no leſſe diſpleaſed then with the former, but rather more, for that he held thoſe kingdomes as feodatorie to the Church of Rome; and alſo for that the Pope had the protection and gouernment of the young King: ſo that the Pope, ſeeing that all his Ambaſſages and admonitions preuailed not, reſolved to vie a more violent courſe, proceeding againſt him by cenſures and excommunications, and by his Letters and meſſengers excommunicated him through all Italy and Germany: and he alſo excommunicated all ſuch as followed him, or did him ſeruite: which excommunications ſome prelates obeyed, whereupon new troubles began. But the Emperor regarded it not, but was rather therewith the more incenſed, and proſpered well in the warre, taking all Phia, and Calabria; and placing garriſons in the Caſtles and fortrefſes, made account to haue bin King thereof. Whereupon the Pope leuied ſouldiers, and fortified the citie of Rome, fearing to haue been beſieged; and againe ſent into Germany, to proclaime and publiſh the Emperor for deprived; and to releaſe his ſubiects from the homage and faith which they ought him. CARION writes, that Pope INNOCENT the Third ſeeing that all Italy in a manner had yeelded voluntarily vnto O T H O, and fearing that the Popes power & command would be thereby much ſhortned and reſtrained, for that he could not ſo ſuddenly repulſe the victor by Armes, hee flew to the weapon of excommunication, in which alone (whileſt that ſuperſtition ſwayed and ouerruled mens conſciences) they repoſed all their ſafetie. This, being fearefull to men grownded in ſuperſtition, not onely expelled O T H O out of all Italy, but vtterly ouerthrew him and ruined him; the Princes of Germany being perſwaded by the Archbishop of Mentz (who was the chief Inſtrument of the Popes tyranny in Germany, and the executioner of his vniuſt decrees) to reiſt O T H O, and to ſend for FREDERICK the ſonne of HENRY, to whom they had promiſed the Empire being a child before PHILIP and O T H O. O T H O being aduerted hereof, and that the Archbishop of Mentz, the Lantzgrau of Turinge, and ſome others, claue to the Pope; and that there were both priuate and publike treaties and practices againſt him, with the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Auſtria, and other Princes, he was much afraid: and leauiſg garriſons in ſuch places as he had taken, in great haſte he left the kingdome of Naples, and marching by long journeys, came into Germany, in the yeere of our Lord 1212, and called a Councell in the citie of Norimbergh; in which Councell it was decreed, that he ſhould make waite againſt the Archbishop of Mentz, and the Lantzgrau of Turinge; and ſo the war began; and was very cruel.

At this time died his wife the Empreſſe, daughter to the Emperor PHILIP. Notwithſtanding all this, HARMAN Lantzgrau of Turinge, SIFRID Archbishop of Mentz, the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Auſtria, the Archbishop of Treuer, and others which reſolved to take Armes with them, and to obey the Popes cenſures, and to denie their obedience to the Emperor; taking the Popes aduice in the matter, who in all interpoſed his authoritie, choſe FREDERICK King of Sicilia for Emperor; who was but a youth, little more then eightene yeeres old;

The Emperor
made waite againſt the Pope.

old : and sent their Ambassadors vnto him, with their authoritie, soliciting him to come into the Empire ; alleging that in right he was and ought to be Emperour , for that he was chosen and Iworne King of the Romanes, in the time of his father HENRY the Sixt : the like reason they gaue to the other Princes in Germany : wherat Pope INNOCENT greatly reioyced, and in word and deed approued the same. O T H O herewith was very much troubled, and seeking meanes to defend his estate, made terrible warres against his aduersaries. The Germane Ambassadors were well receiued by the King of Sicilia, who was in great doubt to undertake so great an enterprise ; but being perswaded by them, and by the French Kings Letters (who was O T H O's enemy, for his strict allyance to the house of England) he consented thereto, and was called Emperour.

Frederick King of Sicilia chosen
Emperour.

FREDERICK hauing in this manner accepted the Empire ; he first applied himself to recover such townes as O T H O had taken from him in the Kingdom of Naples ; which being done, with the greatest power he could raise, he tooke his way towards Germany ; and in his journey went to kisse the Popes foote, and to intreate him that he might be crowned Emperour of the Romanes, seeing that he was called and chosen : but the Pope resolu'd him that his request could not be granted, for that thereby the ancient custome in the election and coronation of Emperours should be peruered : and so encouraging him to proceede in his enterprise, he sent his Legat with him, to be present at his Coronation in Germany ; and therein to vse his authority, and to proceede against such as were disobedient, or rebelled against him. Herewith the Emperour elect continued his journey, wherein the cities of Pavia and Cremona, and some other, ayded and assisted him ; Milan and the rest being against him.

Finally, with much trouble and danger he arrived at the citie of Constance in Germany, whither many men of warre repaired to him, together with some Princes which were of his faction : which, O T H O vnderstanding, as he was very valiant, so with the greatest power he could leuie he went to that citie, thinking to haue been able to haue either slaine or ouerthrowne this new Emperour FREDERICK : but the men of warre which he brought with him, daily forsooke him and went ouerto FREDERICK ; in such sort, that seeing himselfe abandoned, he retired into his countie : and FREDERICK, very mightie, and accompanied with a great Army, marched along the riuier of Rhine, to the citie of Mentz ; where many prelates and Princes were assembled ; all forsaking O T H O, holding him for deperied, in performance of the Pope and his Legates commandement : amongst which, thither came the Archbishops and Bishops of Mentz, Treuer, Cole, Constance, Basil, Spire, Hipergola, the King of Bohemia, the Lantgrau of Turinge, the Count Palatine of Rhine, besides those which were already come with him, from whence, after the handling and concluding of many matters, FREDERICK departed towards Aken, where he was crowned with the first crowne, in the presence of the Popes Legate, who approued and confirmed his election ; and so he attained to the Empire : and for his better assurance in that estate, hee procured peace and a league with PHILIP, then King of France.

Frederick crowned with the first crowne in Aken.

The Emperour O T H O seeing himself in Saxony thus forsaken, got from England, and other parts, such forces as he could, and came into the countie of Gulders, where hee made cruell warre, for that it held with FREDERICK ; and from thence, together with the Earle of Flanders, who was of that faction (for that he married with IOHN daughter to BALDVIN Earle of Flanders, which held the Empire of Constantinople, and at that time ioyned with England against France, and with the Earle of Boleyna in France who had rebelled) they went to ioine with the King of Englands forces, to fight with the French King (which O T H O did for the alliance betwene him and the house of England) thinking, by ouerthrowing the King of France, who was enemy to them both, he should be restored to his Empire. But his conceits deceived him : for the King of France came and fought a battaile with them, neere to the citie of Tournay ; which is recorded to haue been very bloudie and cruell, wherein the French king was in great danger to haue been slaine by the Emperour O T H O, who dismounted him : but he being rescued, encouraging his people, obtained the victory ; and O T H O escaped by flight, but the Earle of Flanders was taken prisoner, and some other principall men : and O T H O in the best manner that he could got into Saxony ; void of all hope to recover the Empire, when he had bin Emperour the space of five yeeres, and they not fully expired ; and there with sorrow and anguish he ended his daies. How long he liued after that he was deposed, authors write not : but true it is, that his raigne as Emperour, ended in the yeere of our Lord 1213.

In Constantinople (as writeth BALDVIN) the same day that O T H O was ouerthrowne, HENRY

11

RY (brother to the Greeke Emperour BALDVIN) died ; who being Earle of Flanders obtained that Empire ; and hauing made warre with the Duke of Walachia (which is part of the ancient Dacia) he made a peace with him, marrying himselfe with his daughter, and he gaue his owne daughter to PETER, Earle ALTIODORENSIS ; and he (as I said) dying at this time without any heire, the said Earle PETER had the Empire, and came afterwards to Rome, and was crowned by the Pope.

In the time of the Emperour O T H O (by whose aide, and the assistance of HENRY Emperour of Constantinople, an excellent French captain, called IOHN de Bregna, had the kingdome of the East, with the title of King of Ierusalem ; being called thereto, onely for the valour of his person ; marrying him with the daughter of ISABEL, to whom that kingdome appertained, as is aforesaid) the Captaines and masters of those parts denyed their obedience to ALMEYS King of Cyprus, of whom particular mention hath bin made. And so IOHN de Bregna had that kingdome, of whom we must of necessitie speake hereafter for which cause we remember him in this place.

THE
LIFE OF FREDERICK THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THE HUNDRETH AND FIRST ROMANE EMPEROUR:
(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

FREDERICK hauing obtained the Empire, made a solenne vow to goe to the warres of the Holy Land ; and coming to be crowned in Italy, was earnestly perswaded thereto by the Pope's wherein he entred into the Croisade ; and deferring his going, many Lords went into the East without him. In the meane time there grew discord between him and the Pope, for that he withheld certaine lands belonging to the Church, and for deposing certaine Bishops from their Bishopricks in Sicilia, and placing others at his pleasure ; upon which occasions the Pope proceeded against him with his pontificall Armes ; and excommunicated him : But the King of Ierusalem coming afterwards into Italy, and giuing the Emperour, his daughter to wife, he was absolved, and he againe promised to goe to the warres in the East : but delaying the time, and finding daily new reasons to deferre his going, he was in the end againe excommunicated by reason whereof he resolved to goe : but being arrived in the East, he procured an agreement with the Soldan, and obtained the citie of Ierusalem, and therein was crowned ; but this satisfied not the Pope, neither the Christian Princes ; and then he returned into Europe with small reputation, and went into Germany, where his soune (through his Fathers absence) had taken upon him very great authority, whereof grew some suspitions between them, which were soon ended ; neuertheless, the Emperour coming into Italy (by reason of Lombardy) and finding that his sonne was his enemy, he causing him to be apprehended, made him to die in prison, and bending his forces against Lombardy, principally against Milan, he used such rigour, that the Pope became his open enemy and calling a Conncell to be held in Lion in France, he excommunicated him, and induced the electors to chuse a new Emperour : which was the Lantgrau Henry, who liued but a while after, and then the Earle of Holland was chosen, against whom his sonne Conrad continually warred, although with no great success. But

Frederick

Frederick being in Italie, seeking to be revenged of certaine Cities which rebelled; and seeing that his enemies came daily more mighty, by reason of an Overthrow given him, he with drew himselfe with disposure into Etna, where falling sick he dyed (as it was thought) through the practice of his base some Mantriede, when hee had held the Empire, about five and thirty yeeres.

Discord between the Pope and
the Emperor.

Frederick the second time crowned.

A Councell held by the Pope in the city of Rome

In such manner as I have declared, had this second FREDERICK the Empire, and therewith the Duchie of Sardinia, having first been King of Naples, Sicilia and Sardinia, and held the same the space of thirty and odde yeeres, with great revolutions, warres, battails and troubles, as you shall hear: wherefore I must spend more time in writing the history of his life, than of some others. He was at no lesse variance with the Church of Rome, than the other FREDERICK his Grandfather was before him; and it now seemed to be an hereditary malady, through which the Emperours and the Popes neuer failed to bee at contention and discord; for the Popes would vphold their Supreme Authoritie, their Lands also and Patrimoine; whose only study and care was to make all old Italy which is diuided from Lombardy by the river of Rubicon, subject to the Citie of Rome, from whence they had excluded the Emperours; The Popes knowing that what they attempted, they should neuer attaine unto, nor long maintaine the authority which they had gotten, vnlesse they should suppress the Emperours growing power in Italy, neither could the warres be euer pacified, vntill they had gotten all they desired, or wrested away part: Neither did they as Popes doe in these daies, enrich their kinfolks with the goods of the Church, but to settle and enlarge their dominion. This CARION writes, and this experience hath been verified.

The Emperours after they had obtained the Empire, and were established in their thrones, pretending that all the iurisdiction and supreme power in temporall causes, both in Germany and in Italy appertained to them, could therefore endure no superiority; and there wanted not men of either side to perswade them that they had reason: and sometimes ambition and couetousnesse of eyther side were the occasions of the miseries before mentioned, and of such as we will relate.

FREDERICK seeing himselfe freed from his aduersary ORTHO; the better to iustifie his title and raigne, caused a new assembly and meeting to be held of the Princes of the Empire, and of the deputies of the Imperiall Cities, and went to Akon, where he caused himselfe to be the second time crowned with great solemnitie; and then he made a publike solemn vow, within a certaine time to goe in person to the warres and conquest of the Citie of Ierusalem, for the victory which God had giuen him: and in requitall of the ayde and fauour received from Pope INNOCENT, he gaue for euer to the Church of Rome the Citie and Countie of Fondi; with all which the Pope was very glad.

After this coronation, FREDERICK went through sundry prouinces, and making himselfe absolute Lord thereof, brought them to his obedience as to their Emperour. And for as much as HENRY Duke of Brabant had not yet done him homage, he with all the speede possible, with a great Army, marched into that prouince: and the Duke seeing himselfe in danger, sought his fauour, offering to obey, and to doe him seruice, and was admitted, he giuing his son and other Noble men of his house, for hostages and assurance thereof. Few daies after this (by the Emperours consent) Pope INNOCENT called a generall Councell in the Citie of Rome, whither came from all parts of Christendome, Greeke and Latine, the Patriarchs of Ierusalem and Constantinople, three score and ten Archbishops Metropolitans, foure hundred and twelue Bishops, eight hundred and odde Priors and Abbats couentuall; and Ambassadors from the Emperour FREDERICK and King of Sicilia, from the Emperour of Constantinople, from the Kings of France, England, Spain, Aragon, Hungary, Cyprus and Ierusalem; and from other Kings and Princes: in which Councell were condemned certaine sects newly risen in France; but the chiefe matter that therein was handled, was for the warres and conquest of the Citie of Ierusalem, whereto they all gaue their consent, promising ayde and assistance. The Pope sent his Letters into all parts of Christendome, inciting all men to this holy war: graunting large Indulgences and Pardons to such as dyed in that action: and all such as gaue their names to goe to that war, took for their deuice the signe of the Crosse of Ierusalem, which they wore vpon their garments, and were called Croisats. And so an infinite number of men, and many Princes tooke the same: amongst which in Germany the Emperour FREDERICK took it, and HENRY Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Moravia, the Duke of Sulzers, the Count Palatine of Tubingen, the Marguise of Baden, the Earl of Nassau, the Duke of Limburgh and other Princes with the Archbishop of Mentz, and many other Bishops: and in France, were many which prepared and armed themselves for this expedition, which afterwards took no such effect as the preparation seemed to prognosticate. Amongst other matters, the great warres betweene the Pisans and the Genoyses (then two mighty common wealths by sea) was a great let and hinderance; wherefore the Councell being ended (which was one of the most famous that euer had been) the Pope went from Rome to Perugia, that by his authority he might settle some peace or truce betweene these two Common-wealths; where, within few daies, without concluding ought, he died, having governed the Church of Rome eighteen yeeres and a halfe. He being dead, HONORIVS the Third was chosen, who in the beginning of his Papacy crowned PETER, and his wife, Emperour of Constantinople; who (as I have heretofore told you) succeeded his father-in-law HENRY.

warre,

The death of Pope Innocent and the election of Honorius.

A voyage into the holy land.

While these matters passed, the Emperour FREDERICK applied himselfe to settle and confirme his estate in the Empire; and to prouide for his coming into Italy to be crowned in Rome, deferring his journey to Ierusalem vntill this were done. But Pope HONORIVS (having a propheticke revealed vnto him, importing that in his time the Citie of Ierusalem, (should be recovered) vsed all means possible to cause those which had vnderaken the same to depart into the East, and neuer ceased to vige the Emperour FREDERICK to accomplish the voyage which he had made; threatening him with censures if he performed not the same: but the Emperour delaying his going, by the Popes perswasion there went into the East, ALEXANDER King of Hungary, the Dukes of Baviera and Austria; and out of France, the Earl of Niuer, WALTER, the Kings chamberlain, and other great men; and with them went JOHN de Colonna the Popes Legate, with so many good men of warre, that it was hoped they would haue effected some great matter: who being arriued in Palestina in Asia, in the harbour of Plophaida, others, which called Aron, after certain consultations, ioyning themselves with JOHN de Bregna, King of Ierusalem, and with the Masters of the Knights Templars, of S. Iohn, and the Dutch, ordered all their forces, whose number was great; they departed thence with a prosperous winde to the City of Damietta, called in ancient time Pelusium, on the coast of Egypt, in one of the mouthes of the riuer of Nilus where it falleth into the sea, which they besieged the space of eighteen months: in which time many accidents befell, which the Authors write, and I will passe as nothing to my purpose. The Soldan of Egypt was heere with so much put to his shifts, that he offered to giue vp the City of Ierusalem and the Territories thereof, vpon condition, that they would raise their siege from before Damietta: and notwithstanding that, there were sundry opinions between the Kings and Princes concerning the same, yet in the end it was concluded not to accept thereof, wherein they greatly erred, as by the sequell it appeared. In the mean time, the Soldans sonue CORDIVS, who was in Ierusalem, seeing what distresse Damietta was in, and that both he and his father were out of hope to defend Ierusalem, threw down and ruinated all the wals thereof. In the end, the Christians took the City of Damietta, and certain other Towns in that Quarter, and in all things had then good success, although after wards the contrary ensued.

Ierusalem dismantled by the soldan son of Egypt.
The city of Damietta in Egypt taken from the Soldan by the Christians.

At this time, which was in the yeere of our Lord, 1220, the Emperour FREDERICK came into Italy; and by Letters and Ambassages vnderstanding the Popes mind, came to Rome, and was therein received and crowned, with the ceremonies and solemnities accustomed; and there he againe vowed and bound himselfe, to make his voyage into the East, promising also great matters to the Pope: but being out of Rome, their friendship continued not long, for he presently seized certaine townes into his hands, pretending that they appertained vnto him. CARION writes, that FREDERICK, coming into Italy certain Noblemen of Thracie and Asiatic with some Bishops falling from their allegiance to the Emperour, by the Popes instigation invaded both what belonged to the Empire and to FREDERICK by inheritance, whereof some places they took and held, others they spoiled and burnt: the Emperour being incensed with their perfidious treacherie, came to Arms; and having happily subdued his enemies he displaced the Bishops and subrogated others in their places. The rest which had fled vnto the Pope (the Author of the sedition) depriued both of dignity and estate he condemned to

perpetuall

Y Y

perpetual banishment. The Pope requiring to have these restored, the Emperor in a grave Oration refused him, inveighing bitterly against the ambition, pride, fraude, and practices of Popes; whose speech is yet extant. This bred a bitter hatred between them, which burst forth into cruel wars.

Then the Emperor came into Lombardy, to settle that estate; and passing through Tuscany, there arose some controversy between his soldiers and the inhabitants of that country: the like happened afterwards in Lombardy, so as he began to grow odious, and ill beloved: and from thence he gave a turn to visit his kingdoms of Sicilia and Naples; where, besides the taking of some towns and places from the Pope, he placed certain Bishops, in some Churches displacing such as the Pope had entailed therein; alleging that the Kings of Sicilia had a privilege to do so. Whereupon the Pope and he fell at open variance; and the Pope proceeded against him by his fulminations, commanding him particularly to accomplish his vow, for the conquest of the Holy-land; and pronounced him for excommunicate, if within a prefixed time he restored not what he had taken; and performed not his vow: and so this contention continuing, he seizing many towns into his hands (which he left garrisoned and fortified) returned into Germany.

Whilest these matters passed in Italy, great discord and dissension arose in the East, between the kings and princes, and the Popes Legate about the superiority, and at what time, and in what manner the warre was to be made; but finally, the Christians agreed to take the field, and to besiege the great city of Babylon in Egypt, called Cair, and other Towns thereabouts, in the month of July, in the year 1221, with an Army of three score and ten thousand excellent men of warre, foote and horse, besides groomes and horse-boyes. And notwithstanding that the Soldan had an exceeding huge Army, yet he durst not, or would not fight with them, of purpose prolonging the warre, untill that about two moneths after (the Christians having not encamped themselves in such place and order, as was convenient; and as they ought to have done) the river Nilus swelled and overflowed, as it usually doth in that country yearly in August: Besides which, the Soldan caused the dikes and banks thereof to be broken and cut, which in ancient time were made for a defence, and to keepe in the waters of that river: so as the Christians Campe was enuironed with water, in such sort that they could not forage or get any victuals: finally, they were so distressed, that they sent to the Soldan (who lay not farre from them) offering to come to a composition with him: In conclusion (to be briefe, and to return to my History) after many treaties between the Kings, the Legate, and the Soldan; a peace or truce was concluded for eight yeers, and that hee should suffer them freely to depart; and that thereafter they should presently render the City of Damietta, and such other townes of lesse importance, which he held in Egypt; and that all Captives of eyther side should have liberty; and that the Christians should depart with their troups, to the Cities of Ptolomaida, Tyre, and such other places as they held in Soria.

These conditions being agreed upon, the Soldan made provision for them, and help them upon their way, untill they came to Damietta; where the Christians againe fell at variance amongst themselves, about giving up of the City: but in the end it was yielded, and the Christian Army returned into Palestina, part by land and part by sea. And from the port of Palestina the king of Jerusalem returned to his country; and the king of Hungary, and the other Dukes, into Europe, unto theirs, with little contentment and lesse ioy, extreme sad and sorrowfull for their ill successe; having done little or nothing to any purpose: by reason whereof, there was great sorrow and heaviness through all Christendome; and all men murmured against the Emperor FREDERICK, for that he went not that journey. In the next yeere, which was the year of our Lord 1222, the Emperor summoned a Councell to be held in the City of Heidelberg, where he procured the electors to make his yong son HENRY of the age of sixteen yeers, King of the Romans; and so he caused him to be crowned in the City of Aken.

Presently after this, TOBIAS de Breganz King of Jerusalem, seeing the small power of the Christians in the East, resolved to come in person to seek reliefe, leaving the best garrisons in the country that he could (notwithstanding the truce) and came from Soria into Italy and went to Rome, where the Pope gave him honorable entertainment; and he presently undertook to be a mediator between the Pope and the Emperor, who then was a widower, whereby a peace was made in this manner: The King of Jerusalem gave his only daughter in marriage to the Emperours son; with the right of inheritance to the kingdom of Jerusalem. And the Pope absolved him of his excommunication: Whereupon he promised presently after the marriage goe with his whole power to the warres in the East, and to reforme all matters whereof the Pope accused him; and to restore such lands as he held from his Church. Upon this agreement he came from Germany to Rome, whither the kings daughter of Jerusalem was brought; and the marriage was solemnized with great ioy and feasting. By this title, and by the marriage of this Lady with the Emperour FREDERICK, CONRAD their sonne, and those which untill this day have succeeded in the kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples, have been, and still are, called Kings of Jerusalem. This being ended, the king of Jerusalem went into France, where he received a great summe of money, which King PHILIP left him by his last will and testament, towards the warres: there he staid certaine daies for the Emperor, whom all men beleaved (for that the inheritance of that country belonged to him, and for the great power and fit opportunity which he had, being King of Naples and Sicilia) would now have performed his vow and promise. But departing from Rome, he went with his spouse into the provinces of Pulia and Calabria, visiting his kingdomes, not caring to proceed on his journey, in more then two yeeres space: For which cause, and for that he had not fully performed the agreement with the Pope, they againe fell at variance.

After this, his eldest sonne HENRY (who was in Germany) held a Councell in Frankford; vnder pretext to procure certaine Princes to goe with their power to the conquest of Jerusalem, to which the Emperour sent his Letters, certifying his speedie coming into Germany, to the end to goe that journey: wherefore many Princes gave in their names, promising to goe with him. At this assemblie was HENRY King of the Romans, the Emperours sonne, married to MARGARET, daughter to the Duke of Austria. The yeere following, most of the cities in Lombardy made a league, and rebelling against the Emperor, denied him their obedience, alleging the principall reason thereof to be, for that he was disobedient to the Church: where-with he was very much displeased; and many ambassages were sent from the one to the other; and there were many tumults, and much leuying of men, which continued many daies; the Emperor pretending it to be the cause why he deferred his journey.

At this time died Pope HONORIUS the Third, having bin Pope tenne yeeres and halfe; in the end of the yeere 1226. This Pope is held for a very good Pope. The greatest reason why he is so esteemed, is, for that he solemnly confirmed the orders of the Franciscane and Dominican Friars. After HONORIUS succeeded GREGORY the Ninth, an Italian borne, nephew to INNOCENT the Third. The first matter he took in hand, was to require the Emperour to restore what he detained from the Church of Rome, and to goe the journey which he had vowed to Jerusalem; publishing him for excommunicate, if within a certain time limited he did not put the same in execution; which he afterwards incur'd: yet he presently answered; he was content to go from Sicilia, where he then was, and sent to his son to call a Councell in the City of Aken in Germany; where (through his perswasion and the Emperours letters) many Princes offered to go that journey: and the Emperor sent to them, that (with the greatest expedition that might be) they should repaire into Italy, to the Port of Brundisium, which is in the remotest part thereof, whither he promised presently to come: whither repaired many men of war, Princes and Prelates, attending the Emperours coming all the summer: but he came not, pretending that he was sicke. Which (as most Authors affirme) was but fained; and as BLONDVS and others affirme, he treated vnder hand with the Soldan of Egypt, hoping to have concluded some peace with him before his going out of Sicilia into Italy: so as by reason of the great heat of the summer, the most of the men of war at Brundisium, and the Countie thereabouts, attending his coming, dyed, together with many great Personages, amongst which was the Lantzgraue of Turinge, a rich and mighty Prince: which when the Emperour understood, he came to Brundisium, where he seized into his hands all the gold, silver, Armes and other things which the Lantzgraue brought with him; and it was sayd that the Emperour came thither for no other purpose. But the sickness increasing in the Army & Letters coming daily from the Pope, the Emperour, to performe his promise, departed with all his Army towards the East: but within few daies failing he returned, and arrived in Italy, alleging that contrary winds had constrained him so to doe. But this was held but for fained, and he was therefore ill spoken of by all men: and Pope GREGORY holding himself to be abused by the Emperours promise (other discord and disagreement remaining betwixt them) sent to declare him excommunicate, and for such proclaimed him throughout all Germanie and Italy. At this time dyed the Emperesse, wife to the Emperor FREDERICK, and daughter to the King of Jerusalem, who left behind her one sonne, whose name was CONRAD.

Yy 2

CARION

The death of Pope Honory and Gregory
eleven.

The Emperour
Frederick the Second excommunicate by the Pope.

Babylon besieged by the Christians

A peace between the Christians and the Soldan.

THE DEATH OF PAPES HONORIUS
AND GREGORY
ELEVEN.

CARION writes, that the Emperor lay sick in Brundisium, when as the Lantzgrauce and diuerse others died; and that contrary winds draue him back, being in the Streights of Relopnefus and Crete: yet the Pope began to thunder against him, taxing him with the crimes of perjury, adultery, cruelty to his wife, and with the losse of Damiata, for the which he did excommunicate him. He sent IOHN de Bregna, the Emperors father-in-law, into Romagna, with the title of Exarch, and commanded the Earls of Tuscanie, with the Cities of Lombardy, to take arms.

These matters which we have related being past; the Emperor, seeing himself in a streight by reason of the Popes censures on the one side; and the intreaty of many of his friends on the other, with the greatest power that he could make, and with a great number of ships, sette his course towards Soria, and landed in the City of Ptolomaida, otherwise called Acon: yet BEONDVS and some other say, that he first staid in the Ile of Cyprus, and from thence sent a Captain with the greatest part of his Army to Acon; who by his commandement began a treaty of peace with the Soldan, before that he himself came to the war. FREDERICK coming afterwards thither, the Masters and Knights of the Orders of S. IOHN and the Templars ill agreed with him: for, they furnished he had intelligence and treated of a peace and agreement with the Soldan. And in Italie he was in no better terms with the Pope: for, RAINFOLD, the Dukes son of Spoleto, whom he had left for Captain and Gouverner in the Kingdome of Naples, began to make war, and took certain places from the Church of Rome, in the Mare di Ancona and other parts. Whereupon, the Pope called to his aid IOHN de Bregna, King of Ierusalem, who then was ready to haue taken shipping, to haue gone to defend his countries in the East, and to haue holpen FREDERICK in the warres; which (it was thought) he would haue done: and so open war began between the Pope and the Emperors Captaines and Countries. I haue not read in any Author, in what manner hee began and continued the warre, during his abode in Palestina; onely they say, that prosecuting the treaty of peace begun with the Soldan, it was concluded, and that they came to an agreement; which was, that the Soldan should deliuer vp the Cities of Ierusalem, Nazareth, Tapha, and other places in that Kingdome; and should retain to himself certain fortresses of greatest importance, and that ther should be peace & truce betwixt them for ten yeers.

An agreement between the emperor and the Soldan.

Many daies were spent about this matter; and on Easter day, in the year of our Lord 1229, the Emperor entred Ierusalem, and made himself to be crowned therein, and was called King of Ierusalem. Then he presently sent an ambassage to Pope GEORGY, giving him to vnderstand of all that had hapned; therewith requesting him, seeing that he had accomplished his vow, to declare him absolved a pena et culpa, for his long delaying the same, and for some other matters. But when his Ambassador came, the Pope holding the peace and agreement made by the Emperor, dishonourable (sith the Soldan should continue in the possession of the fortresses and strong holds; presupposing, that as soon as the Emperor should haue left those countries, the Soldan would presently resume them into his hands, as he afterwards did) protested that the Emperor had done this but onely to make a shew to haue performed his vow: wherefore, and by reason of the wars which his Captains then and before that time had made against him; hee affirmed, that the Emperor had made no satisfaction, nor was freed from the excommunication: and so practising with the Emperors lubbeeds in Palestina to renounce their obedience to their Soueraign, he recovered some Towns which had been taken from him; which when the Emperor vnderstood, with the greatest speed that he possibly could make, he embarked himself, leauing part of his Army in Palestina, and the Towns fortified and garrisoned in the best manner he could; and with a fair gale of winde landed in Palestina, so as this enterprize of the Emperor FREDERICK the Second had no better success than the rest.

Being arriued in Italy, those places which had rebelled and had held for the Pope, reuolued and held for him; and he sent for men into Germany and into Sicilia; and began to warre vpon the Popes townes, and took many of them: and notwithstanding that he seemed to haue sped well in the warre, yet he sought to be at peace with the Pope, by reason of some tumult and combustion in Germany. And by the intercession of the Master of the Order of the Knights and Friars, called Teutonicis (which like the Knights of S. IOHN and the Templars, lay in the East) and the Archbishop of Messina, a peace was concluded betwene the Pope and him: LEOPOLD Duke of Austria, with other Princes and Prelates of Germany, being there present. CARION writes that those Prelates and Princes of Germany were a whole yeere before they could pacifie the Popes displeasure against the Emperour: but in the end his choler was appeased with a hundred and twentie thousand ounces of gold; and so hee was absolved and

TOWNS

A peace concluded between the Emperor and
the Pope.

townes were restored, and the Pope absolving him, proclaymed him King of Ierusalem, Naples, and Sicilia; and they met at a place appointed, and with great shew of loue and good will dined together at one table, and so a peace was concluded betwene them for that time; wherein, and touching that which I haue already written, were sundry opinions, as the custome is in this world, some excusing the Emperor, and others imputing the fault to him, for what had passed: and others attributed the fault to the Pope, for practising against him in his absence. This peace being made, the Emperour returned into his Kingdome of Naples; and the Pope to pacifie matters in Perugia (where had been great tumults and contentions) went thither; what befell in Rome in the time of this his absence, I will presently tel you; first bringing in few words to minde, the estate and successe of the Empire of Constantinople; where I am also bound; for as the Emperour FREDERICK reigned long, it is not conuenient to leaue this, to make mention of another matter, wherein were great changes of Emperours, through the small time of their continuance: and thus it was.

By the death of HENRY Emperour of Gracia (as we haue aboue said), PETER had the Empire, for that he married his daughter IOLA; who returning crowned by Pope HONORIUS to his Empire, had warres with THEODORE LASCARVS; who holding the Citie of Adrianople, was called Emperour, for that he married the sister of the Emperour ALEXIS, who killed his owne Brother, as is before declared: and a peace was made between them, wherein PETER being circumvented and taken prisoner by LASCARVS, was afterwards put to death in prison, when he had reigned three yeeres onely: which when his wife IOLA vnderstoode, she making her sonne, called ROBERT, to be proclaimed Emperour, vndertook the government, vntill that he should come to Constantinople: (for hee was in Italy when his Father dyed) and he being come, was obeyed, and began to gouerne the Empire. Within few daies after this, dyed LASCARVS the Tirant of Adrianople, and left the vsurped name of Emperour to his sonne in law, IOHN de Plebanacio, who married his onely daughter, called YRENE; by whom he had already one Sonne, called THEODORE LASCARVS, as his Grandfather. ROBERT hauing made shew of a good Prince (by the duels instigation) fell in loue with a faire young damsell, which was betrothed to a Burgonian Knight (a man of great fort, and which had serued the Emperour) and by the consent of her mother, brought her to his court, and married her, and made her to be honoured and held for Emperesse: which did so much grieve the Burgonian that should haue been her husband, that after some daies dissembling, he took a terrible reuenge, which was, that ioyning himself with his friends and kinsfolkes, together with many Greekes, which hated this ROBERT's government; accompanied with them all, with armed hand he came one night into the Emperors Palace, to the Emperesse which should haue been his wife, and cut off her nose: and her Mother which had been the causer of the marriage, he threw out at a window into the sea, wherein she was drowned: and hauing done this, he departed, and put himself and his friends into a place of safetie, so as the Emperour ROBERT could not punish the fact: who shortly after came to Rome to be crowned, and returning homewards, fell sicke in Alacedonia, and dyed, leauing behinde him one Sonne, called BALDVIN; others say, a Brother, who was presently receiued for Emperour and his successor. And for as much as he was very young, by a generall assent IOHN de Bregna King of Ierusalem was sent to be his gouernour and assistant in the Empire, who then was in the Popes seruice in Italy; and he with the Popes leaue and consent came into Gracia, and tooke vpon him the government of the Empire of Constantinople; and betrothed a daughter which he had, to the young Emperour BALDVIN; and gouerning that Empire whilst he liued (which was some fix or seven yeeres) he left it in peace to his sonne in law: but in what manner he lost the same, you shall know hereafter.

Peter Empervntill that he single put La-cous the Tirant of Adrianople to death.

This coming of IOHN de Bregna to Constantinople, was about the same time that the peace was made betwene the Emperour FREDERICK the Second; and Pope GEORGY the Ninth: which being concluded, Pope GEORGY went to Perugia to pacifie the Citie and the marches thereof: and the Emperour went to his Kingdome of Naples. During the time that the Pope was absent from Rome, the government of the Consuls being abolished, (which was so hateful to the Popes) and now the government of a Senour being brought in, sometimes one, and sometime five, which gouerned the body of the Citie; a man of great power, called HANNIBAL, was advanced to that dignity, who incensed the people against the Pope, he being absent: and the Pope coming to Rome at that time, many combustions ensued; but in the end, this HANNIBAL was deprived of his office, and one IOHN de Poli, a seditious fellow fellow also succeeded him, who put the City in Armes against the Pope, and against such townes as held for him, and open warre began between them, yet the Pope by all means that could be imagined fought peace.

Y y 3

The Emperor FREDERICK being in Pulsa, and aduertised hereof, offered to come to his aide, and came to speake with him (and as saith BLOMVS) gaue him for a pledge of his friendship a bafe son which he had, whose name was HENRY, whom he had made King of Sardinia, the Germans call him ENCYS, and so do some authors; but the Emperor performed not what he had offered; for within few daies after, he departed for Germany; the Pope remaining in the heate of his troubles with the Romans; wherewith he was much discontent, but yet not so as to breake the peace between them. But before the Emperors departure, the Pope with his money drew the Germane souldiers to his seruice, and with them recovered certain Townes which rebelled; and his Army ouerthrowing the Roman forces, he made quiet; yet for that time he could not safely come into Rome. The peace betweene the Pope and the Emperour lasted about eight yeeres, although there were little loue between them.

The Emperour being come into Germany, from whence he had been long absent, where his eldest sonne HENRY King of the Romans commanded for his father, and had taken greater authority vpon him, than his father would he should haue done: there grew some suspitions and jealousies between his father and him, and many Princes held with the Sonne, against the Father: Vpon this occasion many Meetings and Councels were held; but in the end, FREDERICK forced his sonne to leaue the countrey, and to go as his Lieutenant and Vicetoy, into Sicilia and those Countreys.

After this, the Emperour being a widower, he married with the King of Englands sister. In this journey, the Emperour gaue to FREDERICK, Sonne to LEOPOLD Duke of Austria, the title of King, and that his eldest sonne and his posterity should so be called: but his successors haue not enjoyed this priuiledge, the cause whereof I thinke to be, for that this Duke FREDERICK died without issue that might succede him; and there was great contention for his estate; but in the end, RODOLPH Earle of Habsburg enioyed it, who was afterwards Emperour, and gaue the estate of Austria to his eldest sonne ALBERT, as when time cometh shall be declared.

This being past, the Emperour made no long abode in Germany, but as soon as he could, leued an Army and went into Italy: for many Cities in Lombardy rebelled, and some men waxing mighty, tyrannized the same, and many of them maintained the old league and confederacy, which they held in the time of FREDERICK the first; as Milan, Brescia, Mantua, Bologna, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Triuigi, and many others, which being assisted by the Venecians, made head against the Emperour: and for the Emperour, Cremona, Bergamo, Parma, Modena, and Reggio, continued in their obedience, and bound the one to the other. The Emperour being come neere to Verona, after some skirmishes, the Towne was forced to yeeld, through the policy and power of one ENCELINVS, called by his surname ROMANVS; who was the mightiest man in all those parts, and by descent a Duch-man, Nephew to another of the same name, who came into those parts in the time of OTTO the Third. From Verona, the Emperour went into the territory of Mantua, where he took and sacked two strong Townes, the one of which was called Marcaria, and the other Claro. From thence he went to Cremona, where he was joyfully receiued, and made his abode there the space of nine moneths: at the end of which, giuing it out, that he would go to besiege Mantua; he sodainly returned and came before Vicenza, which he besieged: the inhabitants being taken vnwares and vnprovided, offered to yeeld vpon composition; and the Emperour gaue eare to this parle, giuing them good words: but vpon a sudden he commanded the City to be assaulted; and entering by force, he set it on fire, and did much harme, passing forwards and spoiling the fields and marches of Padua: thinking to haue taken Triuigi, he besieged it, and put it to such distresse, that if from Padua had not come reliefe, he had entred, and ruined it.

As he lay before Triuigi, he had certain intelligence that his sonne HENRY, King of the Romans, whom (for that in Germany he had practised against him) he had made Governour of Sicilia, was confederate with the City of Milan, and the rest of that faction, and that some Princes of Germany were of that league, and that they leuiued their forces to succour those Cities. The Emperour stood in such fear of this practice, that he resolved for his refuge to flee to Pope GRIGORY (notwithstanding that he knew him to be displeased, for abandoning him when he had warre with his Citizens of Rome) and by Letters and Ambassadors complained

The emperor
Fredericks son, Henry conspi-red against his father.

to the Pope of the perfidy and disloyalty of his son, humbly intreating him to grant his Letters against him, as against one that was disloyall and disobedient to his father: and the Pope, knowing that it was true, did so, thinking it a iust request; or else for fear of the Emperours power. He wrote his Letters to the Princes of Germany, commanding them vpon pain of excommunication not to ioin with HENRY, King of the Romans, against his father the Emperour, neither to obey his commandements. The Popes command was of such authority, that none durst come into Italy, as they promised; and the Emperour vsed such means, that hee apprehended his sonne, and sent him prisoner to a Castle in Pulsa, where he afterwards died; some men were of opinion, that he was poysoned by his fathers commandement: and he inioyned the Dukes of Bohemia and of Bauiera, to make warre vpon FREDERICK Duke of Austria (whom he had made a King) for that he had conspired with his sonne against him.

The Emperor
committed his son to prison,
where he died.

Within few months after that HENRY King of the Romans was taken, his father the Emperour leauing the affairs of Lombardy in the best order that he could (notwithstanding that Milan and other Cities still continued disobedient) doubting of the estate of Germany, went thither; and making warre in Austria, took the City of Vienna, and many other Towns: so as, taming and punishing the Duke of Austria, he was much feared, and generally obeyed. And knowing that his sonne HENRY was dead (who left a lawfull sonne called CONRADIN, of whom hereafter much mention shall be made) he vsed the means to assemble the Princes Electors, and that they should chuse his sonne CONRADIN (whom he had by his second wife IOLE, and whom he had already made Duke of Sueuia) for King of the Romans; and notwithstanding that the Electors did it in his absence, yet for the better assurance of what was done, he and his sonne called a Councell in the City of Ratisbone, where what was already done was approved, and CONRADIN was againe chofen and crowned King of the Romans: from whence they both sent their Ambassadors to the Pope, for a confirmation of the title to the Kingdome of Ierusalem, which his father-in-law LOHN de Bregna had resigned vnto him. The Pope granted his request: for, the Emperour was of great power, and it was said that he would return into Italy; which put him in fear, notwithstanding that the speech went, that he came but against Milan, and the other Cities of that faction, with which he was much displeased, and resolved to bring them to subiection: but the Cities alleged, that they were content to serue him according to the agreement made with the Emperour FREDERICK the first, called the peace of CONSTANCE, as we haue declared in his history; wherewith he held himself not satisfied: and so raising a very great power, he came again into Italy, leauing his son CONRADIN, King of the Romans, in his place in Germany.

Vienna in Austria taken by
the Emperour.

The Emperour, coming into Italy, took his way directly towards Padua; and the Padoans, being induced thereto by ENCELINVS (who bare a great sway in Lombardy) receiued him into their City, assuring themselves, that the liberty and priuiledge which the Emperour FREDERICK the first had giuen them, should haue been maintained: but this FREDERICK was of another humour; for, when he was within the City, he prescribed them such lawes as pleased him, as to his vassalls and subiects.

Pope GRIGORY, hauing intelligence of the Emperours coming into Italy, sent a messenger to meet him, called GRIGORY de Monte longo, by whom he both desiring and requiring him (in requital of the benefites which he had receiued from the Church, as well in the peace and absolution granted him when he came from Ierusalem, as in the fauour which he had shewed him against his sonne, and in dispensing with his marriage in England) that his now coming might be for the good and peace of the countrey; and that he would maintain that peace and agreement which was granted by his Grandfather to Milan and to the other Cities, and which was confirmed by the authority of the Church. And after this hee sent three Cardinals with the same message: but to neither of them he gaue any good answer; so as they conceiued, that he was no good friend to the Pope; and they all feared that he came no lesse against him, than against Milan; so as without any conclusion they returned to Viterbo, where the Pope then lay. It is written, that FREDERICK and his sonne CONRADIN did require the rights belonging to the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicilia; which, the Pope, contrary to couenants, vnjustly detained from them: And the Pope, to arm himself with a faction, commanded the Emperour not to molest the confederate Cities of Lombardy, with whom he was in league: but the Emperour giuing him reasons why he could not do it vnlesse they would giue ouer their conspiracies against the Empire, and return to their obedience; the Pope, fearing the event, bent all his forces to this common warre.

Isabel, daughter of Iohn king of England, married to the emperor Frederick the second,
died in childbed.

The Emperor, leaving Padua garrisoned, marching through Lombardy, took his way towards the City of Brescia, which was of the league, and besieged a Town called Claramonte; and taking it by assault (the more to terrifie the Brescians, and to make them to yeeld) he destroyed and burnt the same. But, the Brescians for all this were not dismayd, but made shew of greater obstinacy. FREDERICK at that time besieged not their City, but marched towards Milan, the Captain and Head of all the Rebels: and the Milanois (with the help of the Venecians, and of other Cities their friends) had an Army in a readinesse; whereof, PETER TRYPOLLO, the Duke of Venice his Sonne, was Generall, together with CHARROCHIO a principall citizen of Milan, and other primemen of other Cities: all which with great courage (for that not long before they had overthrowne his Grandfather FREDERICK) itaied to fight with him in the field, and met with him near to a place called Crotana, and he marched with as great a desire to fight with them; so as they fought a very cruell battell, the Armies being in number and in force (in a manner) equal: but, after they had fought many houres, the Milanois began to shrink, and the victory shewed it self on the Emperors side; and PETER TRYPOLLO their Generall and other Captains were taken prisoners: all which, the Emperor commanded to be put to a shamefull death. After this victory he came to Cremona, to refresh and reinforce his Army, having had some losse in the battell; where some cities which had rebelled, compounded, and yielded their obedience.

The Pope being aduertised of the calamity of the Milanois & of those of the league (whose cause he seemed to protect and defend) fearing the Emperors greatnes (whom he knew to hate him) made a league with the Venecians (which he knew to bee much grieved for the pitifull death of their Dukes sonne) and refused to succour Milan and their confederates. And the better to bring this to passe, he made a kinde of peace and truce for ten years, between the Cities of Venice and Genoa, which at that time were at warres; and vsed such means, that he himself was received into Rome, having euer since the last troubles liued out of it. Being in Rome, hee sent out his Bulls against the Emperor, which he published to all Christendome, and excommunicated both him and all such as took his part; who then from Cremona (where he had refreshed his Army after the battell) came to Padua, leaving Milan, to make warre vpon the Venecians. And there he was aduertised of the Popes fulminations, and of the great preparation made by the Venecians against him, both by sea and land. Vpon this he raised new forces, and so with a great victorious Army (wherein many Moors of Africa, which they called Sarazins, serued him on horseback) he took the field, and ouerran the Territories of the Venecians, waisting and spoiling the same; and incamping himself by the waters side in the fight of Venice, the Venecians sallied forth with a great number of Archers and others, in barks and boats, their with to annoy his Camp as much as they could from the water.

The Emperor, seeing how little he profited by lying there, returned to Padua, leaving ENCELIVS to warre against Trinigi and the country thereabout, carrying with him some principall men of Verona and Padua, for hostages; giuing it out, that he went to besiege Manisa: and passing by it, he went to Parma, and from thence to Luca, and from Luca to Pisa, with a resolution not to stay till he came to Rome.

At this time GREGORY de Monte longo (who was the Popes Legate in Milan) came to Bologna, and from thence took the field with the troops which came to him from Milan and other parts: and ioyning with the Venecians, and others of the league (first taking Berrara by force) euery where began a most cruell warre, which was the greatest that of long time, either before or after, had bin seen in Italy; some houlding for the Pope, others for the Emperor. This war was so great, and so many and so great accidents hapned, that if I should relate what I find written, I should spend a great part of this volume in this relation: wherefore I will onely writte the summe thereof.

The Emperor being in Pisa, with a resolution to besiege Rome, then began the great and fatal factions in Italy, between the Guelphs and the Gebelins; the Guelphs houlding for the Pope, and the Gebelins for the Emperor: of the originall of which factions authors write so confidently, that I will not enter into disputation concerning the same. Let their beginning be what it will: I thinke it was the inuention of some duell, as it should seeme by the sequell: for within short space, these factions extended themselves so farre ouer all Italy, as no place was free from this infection (Venice except) wherein this pestilence took no hold: all the rest was diuided into these two names and factions, without any other foundation of loue or hatred, but only for the names sake; and there daily ensued scandalls and slaughters; and in families addi-

nages

nages it often happened that the father was against his sonnes, and brothers were against brothers; which fighting slue one another, ransacking townes, burning and rinating houses; in worse sort then if they had been traytors, or Infidels, with so great rancor and hatred, as the like thereof before that time had neuer been seen nor heard of. And truly it was a strange thing and to be admired: these two factions were so contrary the one to the other, that they could nor in any thing endure any conformity or resemblance: for they differed in their enignes, in their colours, in the fashion of their apparell, in attiring themselves, in their disports, in their feasts, yea, even vnto their very manner of going, speaking, feeding, riding, and in all things that mans wit could inuent.

The Emperor and his adherents were called Gebelins; and he proclaimed that all such as took part with him should be so called, which was performed throughout all Italy: and all the Guelphs held with the Pope. With this name the Emperour departed from Pisa towards Rome; wherein the fire of these factions was already kindled, and the greatest part of the people were Gebelins, who were ready to haue set vpon the Guelphs; and to haue spoiled and killed them, without any redemption. The Pope seeing himselfe in so great danger, took the heads of Saint PETER and Saint PAUL (as they say) and made a solemm procession, and therewith a long oration to the people; shewing them how vaine a thing it was for men to kill one another, for that they had only taken contrary names; and dissuading them from their intent he perswaded them to defend his Church and their countrey against his enemy FREDERICK, who was coming thitherwards: and of his bountifull liberality he gaue to all such as in his quarrell would take Armes, and would beare the signe of the Crosse, plenary Indulgence, and absolution.

The people were herewith so much perswaded, that when the Emperor with his Army came before Rome, presupposing that the greatest part of the Citizens had been Gebelins; hee to the contrary found them all markt with the signe of the Crosse, in Armes against him: and coming with his people to the gates of the city, some companies sallied to skirmish with him: and so some were slain of eyther side, which made him to vse extraordinary cruelty; for all those of the City which were taken with the signe of the Crosse, he caused to be slain: some of them had their heads clouen acrosse; and of some others hee made crosses in their foreheades with hote irons: and priests hee made to bee crossed vpon their crownes: and after three daies (despairing to take Rome by force, spoyling the countrey round about it) he went into Campania, and gaue a sudden turne and came to Beneuent, which he took and sacked, and commanded the same to be dismantled and razed: and so marched through many parts of Italy, waring vpon the Popes Townes, and such as took his part; wherein he took Ravenna, and besieged Fauencia. And in Sicilia he confiscated the goods of many Ecclesiasticall persons, and apprehended and put some Bishops to death: others he banished out of that countrey; and he particularly caused all places, which appertained to the order of the Knights Templars, to be sacked and spoyled; vsing herein the seruice of his horsemen, which were Moores of Africa, which serued him in that war, to whom he gaue many prebendances and double payes, and the City of Nuceria in Pulia to inhabit, which they possessed many years after. Pope GREGORY seeing himselfe so distressed, sent his Legates to the kings of France, England and Spain, bewailing his misery, and complaining of the Emperour, he implored succour, aide, and councill: whereto they gaue him gentle answers; and by their consent he called a generall Councill, for the reformation and preservation of the Church, and for a conquest to be made of the Holy land, which was now in greater distresse then euer.

The Emperour having intelligence that a generall Councill was summoned, and imagining that the chiefest intent thereof was against himselfe; he resolved by all means possible to disturbe it, by stopping the passages, and apprehending such as went to it; and sent his son ENCIVS (king of Sardinia) to Pisa (which then was of great power by sea) where he armed a great number of ships and gallies, to stay the coming of the Cardinals, the Popes Legates; which with many prelates of Spain and France came to the Councill: they being vpon the sea, in a fleet of Genoacs of 40 Gallies, between Corsica and Pisa, within sight the one of the other, the Legates would haue fled, and so auoided the sight: But the Admirall who was a Genoais, would not alter his course, so as they fought a most cruell bataille, which lasted the greatest part of the day: But in the end, the King of Sardinia had the victory, and the Cardinals and Legates being taken prisoners, were carried into Pulia, except some which were slain or drowned.

The

A battell between the Emperor and the Milanois.

The factions of the Guelphs and Gebelins between the Emperor Frederick the second and Pope Gregory the ninth.

The originall of the Guelphs and Gebelins in Italy

The French Bishops and Abbats which were taken, the Emperor set at liberty, at the request of the French King: the rest lay long in prison; so as the Council could not be held or begun as the Pope would have had it: wherewith he was so much troubled, that with very rage and anger he fell sick and died; having bene Pope about fourteen yeers, whereof the most part was in trouble and contention. He died in the year of our Lord 1241. This Pope in his life time first canonized S. FRANCIS and S. DOMINICK for Saints; and afterwards Saint ANTHONY, called Saint ANTHONY of Padua, although a Portingall, and born in the City of Lisbon. He compiled also the Book of the Decretals, and instituted the singing of Salve Regina at certain times and hours, with the ringing of the facing Bell; and that our Lady should be prayed vnto in the night, with Aue Maria, which should agree with the ringing of the Bell; and did many other things like a Pope.

Pope GREGORY being dead, by the general consent of all the Cardinals which were in Rome, GAVINREDE de Castillon, a Milanois born, was chosen Pope, and called CELESTINE the Fourth, a good man and very learned, but old and sickly; who presently sought to bee at peace with the Emperor, and to that effect sent his Legates to his Camp, hee then lying before Bavencia: but this Pope could not tarry for an answer; for, he died the eighteenth day after his election.

CELESTINE being dead, the Cardinals could not agree about choosing him a successor: some say, that for fear of the Emperors threatnings, they durst not chuse whom they would have chosen. PLATINA saith, that the Cardinals of Rome determined to chuse no Pope at all, vntill that the Emperor released those which he held prisoners. BLONDVS following his Author (who as he said was an ey-witnes) affirmeth the cause to be, for that the Cardinals who were prisoners, sent to require, and therewith protested, that no Pope should be chosen without their voices. So as vpon some of these occasions, or for all together, for the space of twenty months Rome was without a Pope. And in all this time the Emperor would not release those Cardinals which were his prisoners; neither would those of Rome chuse a Pope. In which time the Emperor took the City of Bavencia (which held out against him about one year) and came before Bolonia: but seeing that he could not take it, he spoiled the country, and transferred the Vniuersity from thence to Padua; and afterwards went to Modena, and to Rezzo, which also flood vpon their guard, and took Towis appertaining to the Church of Rome; so as there were great wars in all parts of Italie, which cost many men their liues.

At the same time, when the Emperor thus warred in Italy against the faction of the Guelphs, the Tartarians invaded Hungary. These Tartars are a barbarous Nation in the North, which came out of Seythia Asiatice (as some say; and VOLATERANVS saith, out of Taurica Chersonesus in Europe) about the year of our Lord 1202, and made an irruption into Asia, and subdued some Provinces therein, vnder the leading of their King and Captain, called CANGYS: and they afterwards so increased in the beginning of the Emperour FREDERICKS Raig, about the year 1222, that they conquered Georgiana, Armenia the Lesse, and other provinces in Asia, and suppressed the power of the Turks (which I for breuity sake passe over). And coming afterwards into Europe by the Caspian sea, crossing the mountains Rhiphei, became Masters of those countries, and made wars in Russia and in Polonia, and subdued a great part of Sarmacia, which at this day is called after them, Tartaria; and their King is called the Great CAN: they received the sect of MAHOMET, through their first conuincing with the Turks; and in such manner they made war, that they put the world in fear of them. And the Emperor now making warre in Italy against the Guelphs, the Tartars, vnder the leading of their King called BATVS, came into Hungary, and warred therein three yeers, and did much harm; VELA the Fourth being then King thereof: at the end of which time they returned to the countries which they before had gotten. And so Hungary, a Province of the Empire, endured as great misery as Italy.

And it hapned also, that the Emperour of Constantinople liued not in peace in those daies: for, JOHN de Bregna, King of Ierusalem (who was Gouernour of the Greek Empire, with young BALDVIN who married his daughter) being dead, the Empire remained in BALDVIN against whom JOHN LASCARVS (nephew to the other of that name, who was called Emperour in Adrianople) raised such power, and found so many friends, that he took Smirna and Satilia, with other cities, towns and Ilands: so as the Emperour BALDVIN, accompanied with the Earl of Tolosa (who had bene with him in all his wars and troubles) came into Italy to sue for aid and relief against his enemies: and finding it in such estate as you haue heard (imagining that that in time of such confusion he should not get any) hee sought means to haue a Pope chosen, and so came directly to the Emperour; who hauing then taken the citie of Parma, and driven the Guelphes out of it, went thence to Placencia. And BALDVIN coming thither, and being well received and entertained, vied such means to the Emperour FREDERICK, that at his request all the Cardinals were released and set at liberty, whom he had long detained prisoners in Melphi: and the Emperour of Constantinople with the good leave of the Emperour FREDERICK, went to Bologna, where the Cardinals were, to treat with them concerning the election of such a new Pope, as might be acceptable to the Emperour FREDERICK; to the end that peace might be maintained between them. Where he was with great joy honourably received, in June, in the year 1244. and they presently conferred about the election of a Pope, and one SINOALDVS, Cardinall of S. LAURENCE borne in Genoa, was chosen, and called INNOCENT the Fourth; who was the Emperours greatest friend of all the Cardinals: which when the Emperours friends and seruants vnderstood, with all possible speede they gaue him to vnderstand thereof: when the newes was brought vnto him in the citie of Parma, it is reported that he presently said, (presaging what would follow) I haue exchanged my best friend, being a Cardinall, for my greatest enemy, being Pope.

Pope Gregory the Ninth died for anger.

The original and true effe of the Tartarians.

Hungary invaded by the Tartarians.

After the election, the new Pope, the Emperour of Constantinople, and all the Cardinals came together to Rome, where they consulted of a peace to be concluded with the Emperour FREDERICK, and Ambassadors were sent from the one to the other: but the Emperour in the time that the Papacie was void, was growne so great and so mighty a Lord in Italy, that he would not accept such conditions as were propounded; and so gaue ambiguous and vncertain answers, such as they knew not how to resolve: foure months being spent in this party, the Pope was certified that the Emperour had secret intelligence with Iudric in Rome against him: the effect whereof was, that in a place called Cassella amar, whither it was agreed that the Pope should come, to yield his resolution concerning the peace, and there expecting the Emperours coming, should be seized on.

This being discouraged, and the Pope seeing how small power he had in Italy, speedily went to Russia, and there embarking himself in certaine galleys of Genoa, which he had secretly caused to be brought thither for that purpose, went to Genoa, where hee fell sicke, and recovering health hee there againe shipped himself, and went into France; and arriuing at Aigues mories, and coming vnto the river Rodanus, the French King received and entertained him with great solemnities: and then he went to the citie of Lions, where hee complained of the Emperour, and within some few daies after, proclaimed through all Christendome, a Councell to be held at Lions in France, in the beginning of the yeere 1246, whither he cited the Emperour to come, and to make his personal appearance; and in many his sermons and orations which hee made to the people, hee with a lowd voyce summoned him to appeare: and so prelates from all parts of Christendome repairing thither, the Councell began; and the Emperour sent his Ambassadors to make his excuse; and otherwise made many large offers. But the Pope would accept neither his offers nor excuses; but published, that if within a certain time limited hee appeared not, he would then pronounce Sentence against him; as is contained in the chapter Ad apostolicam sedem, de reuindicta, libro sexto: wherein he condemned him in the loss of his depriuation of the Empire, and of all the other kingdoms and dominions which hee enioyed, and presently proclaimed the same throughout all Christendome, and commanded the Princes Electors with all speed to chuse a new Emperour, releasing them from all allegiance and othes made to the Emperour FREDERICK whatsoever. At this time, BALDVIN Emperour of Constantinople, vnderstanding that his enemy ROBERT LASCARVS was dead, returned, and had such success as you shall heare.

So great account was made of the Popes sentence pronounced against the Emperour in Germany (it being approved by the Councell) that the Electors began to treat of the choosing of a new Emperour; and notwithstanding that his sonne CONRAD the King of the Romans, was therewith much grieved, and by all means sought to haue prevented the same, yet they met at Speier, and chose HARRY Lantgrau of Turinge Emperour: and he according to the accustomed manner went to Aix, where he was crowned; whereupon presently betwene him, and CONRAD the Emperours sonne, began a cruell warre: the end and success whereof we will report hereafter, when we haue related what FREDERICK did when he vnderstood that he was depriued. As soon as he heard thereof, in extreme choler he caused the houses of the Popes friends and kinsmen in Parma to be thrown downe, and their goods to be spoiled;

and

Pope Innocent went into France, where hee excommunicated the Emperour, and released his subjects from their othes to him.

Henry King of Germany was chosen Emperour.

and wrote his Letters into Germany, excusing and iustificyng his proceedings, and to animate his sonne, But conceiving his estate to be in great hazard, he resolved to goe in person to the Council at Lions in France; and to that effect he first made a league of friendship with the Duke of Burgundy, and had a safe conduct and assurance from the French King, for his going, abroad and returne. And leaving his son ENCIVS (King of Sardinia) in Parma, he commanded him not to fall out of that City, for that he held the same and the situation thereof to be of great importance; and so being accompanied with men both of peace and warre, he took his way towards France; and having past Turin, messengers overtook him, which gaue him to understand, that Parma (whereof he made so great account) was lost, through his sonnes oversight: for he through a greedy desire to have taken Brescia, which was of the contrary faction, by the advice and procurement of those of Cremona, went from Parma with part of the garrison which lay therein; and in the meane time that he was about this exploit, the Popes friends and kindred, which lived in Placencia, having intelligence with some which were within Parma, came thither, & by surprise took it, but not without shedding of much blood. These ill newes touched the Emperor FREDERICK to the quick; and he fearing on the one side, his vn safe going into France, and on the other side, that other Cities in Italy following the example of Parma (he being absent in a strange country) would also rebell, resolved therefore in great fury to returne: and raised forces in Sicilia and Naples: and from Triuigi came his great friend ENCIVS with a great troupe of men of warre; all which he sent against Parma, whither he himself marched with a full resolution to have ruined the same, and to have laid it waste, and vied some speeches to the same effect: but he failed of his expectation; for GEORGE de Monte lungo, who from the time of GEORGE the ninth had been the Popes Legate in Milan, and in the other Cities of that faction in Lombardy, getting souldiers from Milan, and other Cities of the league, put himself with them into Parma: and furnished and provided it with all things requisite to endure a siege.

It was not long before the Emperor came before it with his Army (wherein were three score thousand men) and besieged it, with a full resolution not to rise from before it, untill that he had taken the Citie; and so he began to assault it on euery side. But the besieged defended themselves so well, that they daily sallied out and skirmished with their enemies, in such manner that it beuolued the Emperor to withdraw his Campe a little further from the City, and the war continuing, he compassed the City round about with a wall: and as hee purposed wholly to have ruined Parma, so he caused a new Citie to be built in the same place where his Army lay; which he presently enuironed with walles, and made market places, Churches, and houses in it, and appointed lands for those of Parma, which would come thither to inhabit: so as within short space the city was built, and peopled, and he named it Victoria. And as the Emperor had lien about two yeeres before Parma, and the news of this new Citie, and the distribution made by him was bruited abroad, many came thither from all parts to dwell; in so much that PLATINA affirmeth, that therein were as many faire gardens and orchards, with birds and beasts in them, and so great concourse of men and women, as in any the most peopled ancient cities of Italy.

While the Emperor lay before Parma, his son CONRAD and the Lantzgraue HENRY, made cruell warres; which Lantzgraue through FREDERICK's depriving, was chosen and called Emperor: and he raising the greatest power he could (therewith to make himselfe Lord of the Empire) he met with the Emperors sonne CONRAD, neere to Frankford, who had as great an Army as his; and there they two fought (as some authors write) one of the most cruell battailes that of long time had been seen, wherein CONRAD being overthrown, he fled into Suenia, and HENRY remaining master of the field, was held for Emperor. And for as much as he understood, that the Emperors sonne CONRAD leuied new forces, and gathered head in Suenia, he went thither with his Army, and besieged and tooke some cities, and continuing his course of victory, laid siege to the city of Pime; and holding it very hardly besieged, at a time when he thought that nothing could haue offended him, or defended it selfe against him; an arrow shot at randome out of the city (which was thought to be poysoned) wounded the new Emperor HENRY, so as within few daies after he died thereof, within one yeere after his election: and the princes and men of war which were with him dispersed themselves, so as it presently appeared, that the party of the Emperour FREDERICK and his sonne CONRAD would againe preuaile. But yet the electors of the Empire, within few months after (by the procurement of the Cardinal of Saint G called called PATER Image of gold, whom the Pope (being aduertised of the death of HENRY) sent from Lions thither, the Emperors sonne CONRAD not being able to stay or hinder the same) they met at Waringen, and chose WILLIAM, Earl of Holland, for Emperor: who, accompanied with the Electors, and other Princes and Prelates, went to Frankford, and there was crowned. And for as much as he understood that CONRAD leuied a power against him, he called a Councell in the City of Precht: whither came the Archbishops of Meitz, Trier and Colen, and other Prelates; and LEVY, Count Palatine of Rhine, with many other Earls and Deputies from more than twenty feuerall Imperiall Cities in Germany, and from some Princes also; where they handled some matters concerning his confirmation in the Empire. But CONRAD, raising a great power in Suenia and in other parts, began to war against WILLIAM; and WILLIAM leuied an Army to do the like by him: in which warre we will leaue them for this time, to speak of the Emperor, and of what successe he had in Italy; and then afterwards, when time shall serue, we will againe return to this subiect.

Two yeeres were now expired since that the Emperor FREDERICK came to lie in his new City Victoria, before Parma; daily expecting when it would haue yielded (for, the Besieged endured extreme famine): by reason whereof, there was not so good guard held in the Camp as there was wont to be. And GEORGE de Monte lungo, the Popes Legate, who had the command of the City, as he had valiantly defended it, so he neuer let slip any opportunity to do any notable seruice; who perceiving, and being also aduertised, what manner guard was held in the new City (without attending any other forces to ioyn with him) he resolved to sallie, and to attempt it; and laid such a plot, that he performed one of the strangest exploits that hath bin seen or heard of; which was in this manner:

Certain companies of Moors and Germanes, coming from the Camp, drew neer to the City, expecting that some would come forth to skirmish with them, as at other times they vsed to do. The Legate, perceiving this, and thinking it now a fit time to put in execution what he before had proiected, with all possible speed made all his Troops to be armed; and setting them in order, when the skirmish in the field was most hot he commanded the Ports to bee opened, and salying suddenly, charged with such resolution, that without any great adoo or difficulty hee ouerthrew those Troops; that presently reuiewing they turned their backs and fled: and hurrying them came to the new City (wherein was the Emperor FREDERICK in his palace disarmed, suspecting no such matter, and so was the greatest part of his Army) and charging with such fury that the Guard could not withstand them, entered the City, putting to the sword as many as they found to bear Arms against them: and so the fight began on euery side. But as the attempt was sudden and vnexpected, so great a fear surprised them, that without making any great resistance they all fled: and the Emperor, knowing no better course to be taken, took horse, and so escaped with such as could keep with him; and all those which remained, were either slain or taken: and the Legate and his people had one of the richest preies and booties that had been seen, as well of such things as were the Emperors and of the Army, as of the Inhabitants of the City; which they presently razed and made leuell with the ground, executing as much therein as the Emperor thought to haue done in Parma. And heere was slain JOHN TVARIO, one of the heads of the faction in Milan, who kept with the Emperor: and with the Legate was one MATHEW VISCOUNTY, who was the other: for, these two, namely, Viscounts and Turrons, were the two factions, then in the City of Milan. As soon as the fame of the taking of Victoria was spred ouer Italy, those which held for the Pope were greatly encouraged.

The Emperor in his flight staid not in any place vntill he came to Cremona; but hee trusted them not so well as to come into their city, notwithstanding that they earnestly intreated him: but raising men from all parts (besides that many of the Gibelins cam voluntarily to serue him) within a small time, as a valiant man, and as if he had had a great Armie, hee came to Placencia, but besieged it not, onely spoiling the Countrey. And leaving his sonne ENCIVS, King of Sardinia, for his Lieutenant in those Towns which held for him, hee went into Tuscane, in hope to haue taken Florence, which in that Prouince was against him. But as his faction was now but little regarded or feared, so the Florentines would in no wise receiue him; but agreed with him to put all the Guelphs, which were his enemies, out of the Town, wherewith it was contented: and staying in the Countrey neer Florence, in hope to haue leuied some new Troops, and so to haue recouered the honour which he lost, newes came how that his sonne ENCIVS, with the greatest power that hee could leuie, thinking to haue done some notable peece

William, Earle
of Holland, chosen
Emperor.

The city of Victoria taken and destroyed by the Parma forces.

of seruice, went towards Bologna; and the Bolognois, being aduertised thereof, with the aide of their friends, sallied forth to fight with him; and ouerthrowing him, had taken him prisoner. Which when the Emperour vnderstood, he was extremely grieved and offended; and seeing that in Lombardy his enemies were too hard for him, and that out of Germany he was out of hope that any succour could come, for that therein his sonne CONRAD made warre against WILLIAM, Earle of Holland, who was called Emperour; he therefore resolued to go into his kingdom of Naples, in hope there to reinforce his Army, and to take some other counsell. And coming into Pulvis with greater wrath then honour, by reason of such aduentures as were befallen him; he made a bafe sonne of his, call MANFRED, Prince of Tarent, and gaue him many places in subiection.

Within few dayes after, he fell grievously sicke, and his discafe held him long, whereof in the end he dyed: which Historiographers relate after sundrie manners, so as it seemeth that the truth can hardly be known. Some say, that his discafe killed him: others say, that beginning to recouer health, he was poisoned: others say, that his sonne MANFRED practised his death, with desire to raigne; as it after appeared. Some write, that when he saw that not only his friends failed him, who commonly change their mindes with fortune, but that also fortune had abandoned him, which hitherto had fauoured him, and vnderstanding that there were practices to poyson him, hee resolued to returne into Sicilie: but vpon the way hee fell into a burning feuer through poyson, and ended his dayes in a certaine Castle of Apulia. Some affirme that his bafe son MANFRED (hearing that the Physicians had abated the force of the poyson, and that there was hope of his recouerie) smothered him with a pillow. But howsoeuer, he dyed at this time, which was in the yeere of our Lord one thousand two hundred and fiftie and in the six and thirtieth yeere after his election. In the time also there is euer some difference for there bee some authors which doo reckon, but from the time of his coronation, and not before.

He was when he dyed seuen and fifty yeeres olde, and left behinde him, three sonnes, two bastards, and one legitimate: his eldest sonne CONRAD he had by LOLS, daughter to the King of Ierusalem, who in his fathers time was King of the Romanes, and inherited the Kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples, and the Duchy of Sapua. And his bastard sonne ENCIVS, whom he made King of Sardinia, liued, and died prisoner in the power of the Bolognois: whom they would neuer set at liberty for any ranfome. Some authors write, that he was prisoner there twenty and oode yeeres, very well vfed, and dyed in Bologna, and there was buried: and MANFRED, the aforesaid Prince of Tarent; he also had two daughters, ANNE and CONSTANCE, which married with seuerall Princes.

This Prince was adorned with sundry vertues, and excellent graces: and so likewise infested with dangerous vices: but he was very valiant, and of a strong constitution, able to endure trauell, very wise, and expert in the warre, desirous of glory and fame, very liberall, and enclined to learning, and skilfull in the tongues, and could speake Greeke, Latine, Arabick, French, and Dutch very well, and delighted much in the reading of Arts and Histories. But these vertues were greatly obscured, through his vnmeasurable desire of honour, and his ambition to command and to be Lord ouer all men, and through his cruelty vfed in many exploits in the wars, destroying and raising townes, and in shedding blood, for he was very vindicative and fuddain: and, about all, was an enemy to the Popes, and scorned their command. Hee was likewise noted of incontinency: for, besides that he had sundry wiues, he kept many concubines, and accompanied other women; all which, in Princes deserue greater reprehension: for In the higher degree, the lesse liberty. What things followed after his death you shall knowe in the next.

CARION, writing of this Prince FREDERICK, saith, that he was of a noble and generous spirit, neuer dejected nor daunted in danger, constant and temperate in all fortunes, valiant and warie in battell, actiue both with hand and counsell, bountifull, and most free from cruelty. And when as the Popes by open force, secret fraud and treachery, had sought his death, yet he suppress his indignation, and desire of reuenge, as much as might be, being Victor; and did moderate the offenders punishments. But his many crofles and homebred conspiracies in the end did much alter him, and made him bitter, when as he was deuiued of the Empire, not finding any one among his owne whom he might trust: and being often vexed and v wounded to the very heart vvith the fear of his friends falling from him, and of new conspiracies, euery thing grew suspicious vnto him, and age did make him more apt to iealousie; insomuch that he spa-

spared not those who were neerest and most faithfull vnto him. But as there is no humane vertue, how great and glorious soeuer, that is perpetuall and without some blemish, the which is more apparant in great Personages than in priuate men: so I will not deny but FREDERICK was subiect to some vices, whereof I may partly impute the cause to his afflictions; the which errors at his death he did much lament.

In Constantinople BALDVIN was Emperour, who had great warres with MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS, who was called Emperour, and succeeded ROBERT LASCARVS before mentioned, who left him Tutor ouer his sonne JOHN: but hee took the Empire to himselfe, murdering the pupill, and warred to make himselfe absolute Lord ouer all. In France at this time reigned King LAMBERT, called Saint; who, vnderstanding that the City of Ierusalem, after that the Emperour FREDERICK had recovered it, was againe lost, and that the Christians in the rest of the Cities were greatly distressed; providing a great Armie and Nauy, departed therewith in person, and sailed into Egypt to warre vpon the Soldan; and, taking land, besieged the City of Damietta before named, and after some skirmishes and conficts took the same, and performed other worthy aduentures, in the yeer of our Lord one thousand, two hundred, forty and nine. But, prosecuting the warre, it pleased God that in a battell hee was afterwards ouerthrowne, and by the Soldan taken prisoner, with two of his brethren; and, to recouer his liberty, he gaue vp the City of Damietta, and the rest of what he had gotten; and so returned to his Country, hauing effected as little as those which went before him. The Kings of Spain, with equal courage to any of the other Princes (but with better fortune) reconquered the countries which the Infidels held in Spain. At that time reigned King FERDINAND, who wonne Seuil and Cordoua, and many other Towns and Cities.

THE
LIFE OF CONRADE THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SECOND ROMAN EMPEROR; AND OF THOSE WHICH WERE called Emperors till that RODOLPHVS was chosen Emperour.
()

THE ARGVMENT.

FREDERICK being dead, the Empire being diuided between two Emperors, was infested many yeeres each of vsing all means to suppress the other. First, Conrade determined to go into Italy to take possession of the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia: and going with a mighty Army, hee took those Kingdomes by force. After which conquest he died, and William remained sole Emperour; who desiring to go into Italy to be crowned by the Pope, was hindered through a tumult raised by the Frisians: and going against them with an Army, he was by them vnfortunatly slain. The death of William was the occasion that the seat of the Empire was void, and that the Electors were diuided, and could not agree among themselves: for, almost euery one of them would haue such an Emperour as was best to his liking; whereof ensued great trouble and much preiudice to the Country of Germany. In Italy also were great warres between Manfred and the Pope, King Charles and Conradin, whereof in the end King Charles had the victory. And in Germany the the Electors being a long time at variance, in the end agreed to chuse Rodolph Earl of Habsburgh, when as for a long time they could neuer agree upon any other man.

THE greatest part of the Authors which wrote the liues of the Emperours, account all the time from the death of FREDERICK (whose life we haue now written) vntill that RODOLPH, Earl of Habsburgh, was chosen Emperour (which were 23 yeeres, beginning in the year 1250, in which FREDERICK died, and ending in the year 1273, in which RODOLPH was chosen) for an interregnum and vacation of the Empire; accounting none of those for Emperours which in that time were chosen and so called, for that they were chosen in competency one against another, and were not crowned by the Popes; which were WILLIAM, who was Emperour in the time of FREDERICK, and FREDERICK's son, CONRAD, who was King of the Romans; and RICHARD, brother to the King of England; and ALONSO, King of Castile, whom the Spaniards call the Wife: all which were chosen in contention, and were competitors; wherein (in my opinion) they haue no reason, especially in what concerns WILLIAM, sixth he before FREDERICK's death was in name and possession Emperour; and albeit he was not crowned by the Pope, yet his election was approued and confirmed by him: wherefore (to yeeld euery man his title and dignity, howsoever it were, as also to keep the course of our history) I haue determined to treat briefly of all in such matters as concern the Empire, which is the subject of my trauell. I will likewise in summe relate what pass in Italy, that to the history following may be the better vnderstood: I say then, that the Emperour FREDERICK's death was soon published (as that of Emperours and Kings is vsuall) and caused new accidents.

In Germany his son CONRAD, who in his fathers life time was Duke of Suenia, and King of the Romans, and his heir in the Kingdoms of Sicilia and Naples, and by his mother pretended title to the Kingdome of Ierusalem, took vpon him as Emperour against WILLIAM Earle of Holland, who by the Popes commandement was chosen against his father, and possessed the empire. WILLIAM, seeing that his competitor was dead, made account to haue defeated and supplanted CONRAD; whereto he was presently countenanced and encouraged by Letters from Pope INNOCENT, who all this while was in France, and was supported by many Princes of Germany; which, forasmuch as CONRAD was excommunicate (as well as his father FREDERICK) WILLIAM pretended that CONRAD had lost his right to the Empire, and was deprived thereof by the Pope, as indeed by the Popes Sentence he was. Neuertheless, CONRAD was still called Emperour. And so they were diuided into two factions: yet WILLIAM was the mightier, for he commanded (in a manner) all the cities in Germany.

In Sicilia and Naples, FREDERICK's base sonne MANFRED, who (some say) smothered his father, had a conceit in time to make himselfe King of Naples and Sicilia: but being a bastard he knew that the lawfull inheritance appertained to his brother CONRAD, who was in Germany, in whose name (as gouernour for him, and to his vse) he possessed himselfe of those kingdomes, excepting Naples, Capua, and some other townes, which would not receiue him: whereupon he proclaimed them traytors and rebels, and began to warre against them. In other parts of Italy the warres ceased not, notwithstanding that the Emperour was dead: for malice and hatred had taken fo deepe roote betweene the Guelphes and the Gibelins, that they were neuer without warres and troubles, murdering one another: and ENCELIVS (who as I said before was of great power in Lombardy, and a faithfull seruant to FREDERICK) took part with CONRAD, as with the Emperour, and so did some others: yet the contrarie party which held for the Pope was more mightie.

CONRAD seeing the affaires of the Empire to stand in this estate, and considering that it was doubtfull holding of Germany against WILLIAM; and that Naples and Sicilia was a good portion, & came to him by inheritance from his father, raising the greatest power that he could in Suenia, leaving garrisons therein, and in such other parts as he held of the Empire, with the aid of the Duke of Bauiere, with whose sister he was married, came to take possession of those Kingdomes, as most certain and assured; and with a very good Armie came to Verona, houlding still the name of Emperour, where he was receiued: and afterwards (being assisted and guided by ENCELIVS, Gouverner of Lombardy) he came to certain Harbours vpon the coast of the Venecian Sea; where he was shipped by the Venecians, and thence sailed into Pulia (for, from thence there was no safe passage for him by land) and taking land with his people, he was obayed by his brother, and receiued into the Towns of Naples and Sicilia. And notwithstanding that those of the Cities of Naples and of Capua alleged, that in that they refused to be commanded by MANFRED, it was not in respect that they had any meaning to haue rebelled against him, but for that they vnderstood that MANFRED meant to become a Tyrant; Yet MANFRED carried the matter so cunningly, that his brother was perswaded to the contrary, and therefore highly offended: by reason whereof, the Neapolitanes and Capuans durst not put themselves into his hands, but stood vpon their guard; and CONRAD with great fury held Naples besieged the space of eight months: in the end whereof he took the same through famine, and executed cruell punishment therein; and thence went to Capua, where hee did the like, and in some other places which were of their confederacy: so as from thenceforth, where-soeuer he went he found no resistance, neither by Cities, Princes nor Lords.. And those which heany way suspected, he banished, and then began to war against the Lands and friends of the Church of Rome.

After this (two yeeres after his coming into Italy) he fell sick and died, being poysoned in his medicines (as it was then thought) by the practice of his brother MANFRED, who did it of purpose to haue been King. NAUCLERVS and HENRICVS MVCIVS write, that the Emperour CONRAD before he died went into Germany, leaving garrisons in Sicilia; for that he vnderstood, the Emperour WILLIAM made himself strong, and was possessed of the whole Empire, by the means of the Legates which the Pope sent thither for that purpose; and that CONRAD, coming into Germanie, ioynd with the Duke of Bauiere, and with an Army entered the iurisdiction of Ratisbone, and afterwards took the city it self, where he committed great spoils; and that WILLIAM, vnderstanding thereof, leued such forces, that CONRAD durst not giue him battell; and that he then abandoning Germany, went to Naples, where he died. Heerof other Authors make to mention: wherefore I am of opinion, that it was before CONRAD's first coming to Naples, and that after his coming thither he returned no more into Germany. But whether he returned into Germany or no (for, it might be) he died in the Kingdome of Naples, and left his sonne CONRADINE (who was in Suenia, being very young, and whom he had by the Duke of Bauiers sister) for heir of his estate and Kingdomes; wherein also is difference between the Authors: for, some say, that he was his sonne (which is the most likely) and others say, that he was his nephew, and the son of his elder brother HENRY, who (as we said) died in prison in the time of his father FREDERICK. But I finde it written, that HENRY married MARGARET the daughter of LEOPOLD the Glorious, Duke of Austria, by whom he left two sons, FREDERICK & HENRY, whereof one was poysoned by CONRAD; the other by MANFRED a bastard, as competitors to the kingdoms of Sicily & Naples. His sonne CONRADINE remaining his heir, and not of age fit to gouern his Kingdomes, he left him vnder the tutele and protection of his mother, and of certain Dutch Princes, And MANFRED (as some write) for certain daies space concealed his brothers will; and though as yet he durst not take vpon him as King, yet in his nephew CONRADINE's name he sought by all means to possesse himselfe of the whole Country.

As soon as the death of CONRAD was published in Germany, all those which had taken this part, fought to be friends with WILLIAM; who being freed from his competitor, friendly receiued them, and fought (by force or policy) to draw them to him, to the end to haue made a generall peace. At this time Pope INNOCENT (who had made his abode in France for the space of nine yeeres) vnderstanding that CONRAD was dead, came presently into Italy: And MANFRED (as he knew him to haue bin an enemy to the Emperours, FREDERICK and CONRAD; and that he alleged, that their wils and testaments were of none effect, seeing they were by him excommunicate and deprived; and that the Kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples belonged to the Church) fainedly took part with him in Otranto; purposing to exclude those which came to gouern for the childe CONRADINE, who remained in Suenia, and by fishing in troubled water, to get the Kingdome for himselfe.

The Pope being ioyfully receiued into most of the Cities in Italy, with the greatest power that he could make, took his way towards Naples, where hee was receiued; and to that place came MANFRED, and some other Princes and Gouernours of Cities, to yeeld their obedience, as feudatories to the Church of Rome: and he, excluding CONRADINE's tutors, sought

The death of the emperor Conrad the fourth.

Pope Innocent returned out of France into Italy

within short time to be Lord of the greatest part of the rest. And as this was his drift, so after that the Pope had confirmed him in his estate, and had bestowed other favours vpon him; hee began to publish the discord openly, which he before had sown in secret, and to shew himselfe enemy to the Pope: but before that it took any effect, the Pope died in Naples, having bin so cleuen yeeres and halfe, in the yeere of our Lord 1254.

This Pope gaue order that the Cardinals should ride on their foot-cloathes, and weare red Hats and Robes, which they vse at this day; to the end that as they did excell other men in dignitie and preheminance, so they should goe different in apparel, and thereby be knowne from other men. Presently vpon the death of Pope INNOCENT, MANFREDE publishing that his Nephew CONRADINE was dead, cladding himselfe in mourning attire, proclaimed himselfe King of Naples and Sicilia; and raising forces, drew the Africane Moores, which dwelt in Nuceria, to his seruice; and suddenly set vpon those places which held for the Pope: so as ALEXANDER succceding INNOCENT the Fourth, sent a Cardinall whose name was OCTAVIUS to Naples, against MANFREDE, who proceeded so farre as to excommunicate him; but MANFREDE, who now was called King of both the Sicilies, took such order with the Legate that he constrained him to shut vp himselfe in Naples; and so was he Master of the field, and not onely in that prouince, but in all Italy fought to raise dissension and discord, shewing himselfe to be of the faction of the Gibelins, with whose aide he made himselfe mightie, and was principally assisted by the great tyrant ENCLINVS. In Florence, in Lombardy, and in other parts, happened many great accidents, which I haue no time to relate, being to returne to my History of the lines of the Emperours: neuertheless it shall be expedient to declare what end MANFREDE and his Nephew CONRADINE made; who was also called King of both the Sicilies; and at that time, by reason of his nonage, was in his mothers keeping in her estate of Suenia; which gaue oportunitie to MANFREDE to rise, as he did, with the king-dome.

The Emperour WILLIAM, seing in what estate Italy stood, and being now Lord of all Germany in peace, desiring to come into Italy to visit the lands of the Empire, which had recovered liberty through the long absence of the Emperours; and likewise to be crowned by the hands of Pope ALEXANDER, he summoned a Councell to be held in the cite of Colen; and hauing therein determined of his iourney, he was aduertised that the prouince of Erifeland was vp in Armes, and rebelled against him; and that not content therewith, they had invaded Holland, where they had done great harme, by taking and carrying away whatsoever they found. WILLIAM, to suppress this rebellion, resolved to goe in person to bring the Frisons to obedience, which were such men, and so many, that he otherwise knew not how to bridle them; and it seemed no found course for him to goe into Italy, and to leaue Germany in an vpror. And so marching with his Army against the Frisons, which lay encamped not farre from him, as it was in the winter, and in that country are many Lakes and Moorish places, which then were frozen, the Emperour with one or two with him, or else alone on horsebacke, went to view his enemies Campe, or to view some ground where his own Army might lodge: and passing ouer a lake, his horse slipped, and fell with him, and the Ice breaking, his horse and himselfe were so pressed in the water, that they could not get out of it: which a company of Frisons (which lay vndiscovered in an ambush) perceiving, sallied out, and vnknewne slew the Emperour, thinking that they had slaine but some meane horseman, without being perceived by any man in his Camp, neither by them which were with him, or else they durst not reueale it: and so he lay vnder the water, vntill that afterwards he was found and knowne by his enemies.

This happened in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, two hundred, fiftie and six: in the eight and twentieth yeere of his age, and the seuenth of his raigne. And as he was mist in his Campe, and no man knew what became of him, nor what was befallne him (men being of sundrie opinions) some imagining that he was gone, and had abandoned them, and others were of other opinions; at last they were certified of the truth by their enemies. Whereupon the Army disbanded, and went euery man whither hee listed: in this manner ended the aspiring thoughts, life, and raigne of the Emperour WILLIAM, whom his sonne FLORIS, which then was a child, succeeded in the estate of Holland, and the rest: who afterwards made cruell warre against the Frisons, in reuenge of his fathers death; who vntill then lay in a poore Sepulture. In Sicilie and Naples MANFREDE grew daily more mightie, and was called King.

The discord and diuision, which (as we sayd) was in the Empire between FREDERICK and

The institution of the Cardinals Hats and robes by Pope Clement, and riding vpon foote-cloathes.

The Emperour
William, Earle
of Hollaue slaine and drowned.

was crowned 1254
at Aachen

and WILLIAM, and afterwards between WILLIAM and CONRADE, FREDERICK'S sonne, and that which we will declare which hapned after his decaise, was the beginning and originall cause why the Empire lost in those times great part of the authority, power and reputation, which it before inioied, and that some Cities in Italy recovered liberty, and were exempt from the Empire, and that others fell into the hands of Tyrants, as it afterwards ensued. For notwithstanding that there afterwards were valiant and mighty Emperours, yet all matters were so corrupt and out of order in the Empire, as it could not be reduced to the ancient policie; neither did the Electours and Princes of Germany (in whom consisted the chiefest strength of the Empire) yeeld such obedience and fealtie to them, as their ancestors had done, making themselves through these vacancies and dissensions, free, and of greater power, and the Emperours became poore, of lesse account, and were lesse respected by them. I say then, that as the Princes Electours of the Empire were certified of the death of the Emperour WILLIAM (which were as all men knowe) the Duke of Saxony, the Count Palatine of Rhine, the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, the Archbishops of Mentz, Colen and Treuer, and (when they cannot agree) the King of Bohemia, they began to consult about chusing of a new Emperour, first writing the one to the other, and afterwards meeting in Frankford, where they could not agree, for there were many Competitors, and the matter was carried by bribes, gifts and sinister means.

Commig in the end with great difficulty to make the election, vpon Twelfth day, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, two hundred, fiftie and seauen: the voices were diuided into two parts; the Duke of Saxony, the Archbishops of Treuer, and the Marquesse of Brandenburgh chose ALONSO King of Castile: and EBERARD Archbishop of Mentz, CONRADE Archbishop of Colen, and LEVVE Count Palatine of the Rhine, gaue their voices to RICHARD Duke of Cornewall, brother to the King of England. In this manner they parted diuided, either party holding him for Emperour whom they had chosen: but most men affirmed that it was no election, for it seemeth not that the King of Bohemia gaue his voice, or was present at the election, or would ioinc with either of the parties, but was singular in his voice, seeking to haue been Emperour himselfe. Those which chose ALONSO and held with him, sent him their Ambassadors (which were the Bishops of Spire and Constance) to giue him intelligence of his election, desiring him to prepare himselfe to come into the Empire: at their comming into Castile they were ioufully receiued by the King, who being very glad of their Ambassage, accepted the election: but he being busied in the warres against the Moores (from whom hee had a litle before taken the Towne of Nigbla and other places) hee could not then come into Germany: but writing his letters to the Princes Electors, he dispatched the Ambassadors (giuing them and sending to the rest many iewels and great rewards) and so they returned very well content. But King ALONSO his going into Germany, through many occasions which were offered in Castile, as well against the Moores (from whom hee twice won the Citie of Xeres, the Citie of Murcia and other places) as for that his brother PHILIP with-drew himselfe from his seruice, his iourney was a long time deferred. The other part of the Princes Electors, which had chosen the King of England's Brother, sent him also a solemne Ambassage, and he came into Germany, and with the ayde of his Brother the King, came to Aken, and there was crowned by those which had chosen him, and he afterwards was possessed of some Townes and Cities vpon the Rhines side: and so began very great warres and troubles in Germany, some holding for RICHARD, and others for ALONSO; others (which were the greatest number) admitted neither the one nor the other, holding the Empire for voyde: and so miserable Germany was set on fire with cruell warre, which continued the space of fiftene or sixteene yeeres, in which time, RICHARD dyed out of possession of the Empire, and King ALONSO could neuer come thither, by reason of sundry accidents which happened in Castile, as in the Spanish Chronicles doth appeare.

At the same time BALDVIN the Emperour of Constantinople being vnable to make his partie good, against MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS, (who by making away the two sonnes of THEODORE LASCARVS, gat the Empire to himself) fledde from Constantinople, and MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS had the Empire, and so it returned to the Greken nation, hauing bin aboue seuentie yeeres gouerned by the Latins: the first that had the same was called BALDVIN, and so was he which lost it, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1260.

At this time also came Ambassadors to Pope ALEXANDER, from CONRADINE Duke of Suenia (who was called, and ought to haue been, King of Sicilia and Naples) entreating his

The cause of the declining of the German Empire.

Princes Electors.

Disagreement in chusing of
the Emperour.

Alonso King of Castile chosen
Emperour.

Richard Brother to the King of England crowned Em-perour in Aken in Germany.

The death of Richard, Brother to the king
of England.

Baldwin deposed from the Greke Empire by Michael Palaeologus.

his fauour in his behalfe against MANFRED, who vsurped the said kingdomes; but it could take no effect at that time; for MANFRED was now growne so mightie, that the Pope was not able to make head against him: and besides the kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia, he was Lord of Florence and other townes in Italy. Within few daies after this dyed Pope ALEXANDER, hauing held the chayre about seuen yeeres, with troubles and warres in little prosperitie. This Pope canonized Saint CLARE, of the order of Saint FRANCIS, for a Saint: and he being dead, the Patriarch of Ierusalem (a French man borne) was chosen Pope, and called VERNAN the Fourth; who considering what great power the Tyrant MANFRED had got in Italy, (for what his father held therein, was at his deuotion.) And seeing that there came no sufficient ayde from Germany, and moreover hauing no meaning to approue the succession of CONRADSON CONRADINE, for that his ancestors had bin ancient enemies to the Church of Rome, but chiefly for that he had small confidence in his power, and for other occasions which I forbear to write; by the aduice of his Cardinals he sent his Ambassadors to LEVVS the French King, desiring him to send his brother CHARLES Earle of Provence and Aniow with an Army in reliefe of the Church, and to expell the Tyrant MANFRED out of the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia, and that then he would giue the same to him in fee, as the Churches inheritance. The French King willingly gaue eare to the Popes Ambassage, and yielding to his demand, offred aide, and to send him into Italy: and so CHARLES began to provide necessaries for his iourney, which Pope VERNAN could neuer see take effect, for he was intercepted by death in the citie of Perugia, in the third yeece of his papacy: in all which time (by reason of factions and partialities) he neuer came to Rome.

This Pope instituted the feast of Corpus Christi, which is celebrated by the Church of Rome with great solemnity, vnto this day, being first inuented by the famous Doctor THOMAS of AQUINA, a Frier of the order of Saint DOMINICK, who flourished in those times. At that time also flourished S. BONAVENTURE, a Doctor and Frier of the order of Saint FRANCIS. VERNAN being dead, GUIDO Cardinall of Sulconia borne in Narbonne in France, was chosen Pope, and called CLEMENT the Fourth; in whose time at his instant entreatie, the French Kings brother, or cosine germane, Earle of Aniow came into Italy with a great Army, to make a conquest of the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia from MANFRED, who was already called king of Naples and Sicilia; and there passed betwene them many conflicts and encounters, which I ouerpasse: CHARLES being assisted by the faction of the Guelphes, at length nere to the Citie of Beneuent, MANFRED and hee, with power against power fought a battaile, wherein MANFRED was ouerthrowne and slaine, after that hee had scene CHARLES cast to the earth, and his Army in a manner wholly ouerthrowne, but yet in the end CHARLES had the victorie; wherein he was much assisted by the counsell and help of JOHN de RASA, Earle of Caserta, who fought reuenge for that MANFRED had rauished his wife. Thus MANFRED lost his life with his kingdomes, the which he had gotten by fraud, treachery and parricide.

This ouerthrowne and death of MANFRED caused a great alteration in Italy, for the faction of the Guelphes euery where prevailed (in a manner) in all the cities of Italy, being fauoured by the new king of Sicilia, against the Gebilins. And in short space king CHARLES was possessed of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicilia, being first crowned in Rome king of both the kingdoms; and in acknowledgement of the fee, he was bound to pay yeerly to the Church of Rome, threecore thousand ducats, or crowns of Gold. In this manner, the state of Provence, whose head is the City of Marselles, was vnitd to the kingdom Naples, which was in the yeece of our Lord 1266.

In the time of these alterations in Italy, Germany was still troubled about the election of an Emperour: and whereas the king of *England*s brother RICHARD, who contended with ALONSO for the Empire, at this time died, if ALONSO had then come into Germany he might easily haue obtained the Empire, seeing his competitor was deceased: but by reason of ciuill warres against the Moores, he could neuer haue opportunity to come thither: and his brother PHILIP, and other great men of Casile, left his seruice, and ouerran his country. Germany being thus without an head, endured great misery, aswell for this cause, as through the great warres which the king of Hungary made against the king of Bohemia, and other Princes, vpon sundry occasions. CHARLES the new king of Sicilia liuing in this prosperity, all those which in Italy were of the faction of the Gebilins, sent to sollicite CONRADINE Duke of Suenia, who was also king of Naples and Sicilia, (as sonne of the Emperour CONRAD, and Nephew to the Emperour FREDERICK) to come, and reconquer his kingdomes, and that they all would helpe and serue him in that action: whereto CONRADINE (as a courageous young man) soon agreed, and began to gather forces and to trie his friends, whereto he was also persuaded & encouraged by HENRY the king of *Casile*s brother, who was banished from his brother for some factions and confederacies which he had made against him; And at that time was gouernor, and a Senator of Rome, made by Pope CLEMENT; which dignity he obtained (after that he had wandred through England, France and Germany) at the request of king CHARLES of Naples, by reason of his affinity, and the Popes fauor, to whose court he came, lying then in Viterbo, and the Pope made him a Senator of Rome, which then was the highest dignity and command therein.

This HENRY was a man of so great valour, and therewith so politick, that he wholly commanded the City; and being so, he induced CONRADINE to come into Italy (for hee was his kinsman, and had found him his friend at his being in Germany) promising and putting him in hope, that he should not only haue the kingdomes of Naples and Sicilia (which were his by inheritance) but should also be Emperour of Rome, for he would receive him into the Citie. Finally, CONRADINE moued by these Letters and messages, but reposing pert men of warre that hee could get; to whom many of the Gebilins resorted, and hee was receiued and lodged in Verona, whither the Sienois and Pisans sent their Ambassadors (and many other Cities wherein the Gebilins were masters) exhorting him to proceede.

When King CHARLES was aduertised hercof, he went from Tusane, where he then remained, into his kingdoms; leaving good garrisons in those townes which held for him; and a gouernour with the title of Marshall. And HENRY the Kings brother of Casile, who was then in Rome, whither CONRADINE was traualling, openly shewed himselfe for him, being of power able to doe so, whether the Pope would or not; who fauoured CHARLES his party, as a King whom hee had made. But the factions in Italy made all poore, and inconstant. To be short, after other matters which befell CONRADINE by the way, he being come neere to the City of Arezzo, fought a battaile with the Marshall whom King CHARLES had left in those parts. And notwithstanding that the Marshall and his people fought valiantly, yet CONRADINE was Victor and the Marshall was slaine in the battaile, and his party ouerthrown; wherby CONRADINE wonne so great credit and reputation, that if he would haue stayed in those quarters, many townes would haue yielded vnto him: but being solicited by Letters, and messages from HENRY in Rome, he took his way thitherwards, passing neere by Viterbo, where Pope CLEMENT lay, who as an enemy to wars, and bearing of Armes, was very fory for what passed: and comming to Rome, he was solemnly receiued with all the ceremonies accustomed, and HENRY calling him Emperour, lodged him as one in the Capitoll.

After some few daies stay in Rome, he departed towards Naples, accompanied with the said HENRY, to finde out king CHARLES; and HENRY left in his place and office in Rome, one GUIDO FERRETANY, a man whom he much trusted. King CHARLES hauing already intelligence of CONRADINEs comming, and seeing that by delays he daily lost more and more, notwithstanding that he had no equal forces, yet he refused to end the controversy by a battaile, which by CONRADINE (who presumed much vpon the multitude and valor of his soldierys) was chiefly desired, so as the one Army drawing neer the other, neer to Alua, CHARLES knowing how to take benefit of the ground where he was encamp't, marshalled his troups in such manner that he might shadow the greatest part of his Army behinde a Hill, and so the fight beganne and continued aboue three houres: in the end whercof CHARLES his troups being neer ouerthrowne, he brake out of his Ambuscado, and charged with such fury, that he forced his enemies to turne their backs, and obtained the victory: And CONRADINE, HENRY and FREDERICK, who (I know not by what title) was called Duke of Austria, escaped by flight. But through sundry casualties they all three within few daies after fell into his hands, and he cruelly executing the law of Armes, made the heads of king CONRADINE, and of FREDERICK Duke of Austria to be striken off, contenting himselfe to hold HENRY prisoner for their neere enemie in blood.

Some Authors write, that when these Princes were brought before CHARLES, he not content with the glory of the victory (which had been the part of a noble and generous mind)

Pope Alexander canonized Saint Clare for a saint.

Pope VERNAN the fourth called the Duke of Aniow into Italy, to make warre with Naples and Sicilia.

The Feast of Corpus Christi instituted by Pope VERNAN the fourth.

Manfrede king of Iob Sicilia, ouerthrowne and slaine by Charles duke of Aniow.

Conradine his comming into Italy against the Duke of Aniow.

A battaile between Charles and king of Sicilia, and Conradine duke of Suenia.

Conradine duke of Suenia and king of both the Sicilies put to death by Charles duke of Aniow.

insulted

insulted proudly ouer them. Then by the barbarous and wicked cruelty of Pope CLEMENT the fourth, who being demanded his aduice touching the prisoners answered; The life of CONRADINE is the death of CHARLES, and the death of CONRADINE is the life of CHARLES: whereupon, by a neuer heard-of example of cruelty in the Christian world and vnworthy the name of a King, he put them to death, as hath been said; The Earle of Flanders telling him in vaine, that moderation and clemency did become a generous conqueror. So in the end by the execution of CONRADINE, a most generous and innocent young Prince, the most ancient and noble family of the Dukes of SUEVIA hauing managed the affaires of the Empire and their owne at home and abroad, both in peace and warre, wisely and valiantly, was by the practice of Popes extinct, when it had reigned in the Empire, one hundred and fifteen yeeres, and held the realmes of Sicilia and Naples, 76.

By this meane king CHARLES wonne great reputation, for he had ouerthrowne and slain two kings, MANFRED and CONRADINE. And within short space all those towns which held for CONRADINE hearing of his death, reduced themselves to CHARLES his subjection: and so in Sicilia, Pulia, Calabria and in all Italy, the faction of the Guelphs recouered the vpper hand. So as poore CONRADINE in hope to haue gotten the kingdom of Naples, lost his life, and therewith his estate of Sueuia, whereof he was assured: and in him ended the line of the house of Sueuia, for he left no heire; and that state was lost, most of the Cities therein making themselves Imperiall: yet RODVLPH and his soane JOHN were afterwards called Dukes of Sueuia.

The victorious triumphant king CHARLES, with Pope CLEMENT's leaue and authority, went to Rome, to execute the office of Senator, which HENRY had lost, and to pacifie the factions which were in the City; and the Pope from Piterbo where he made his residence, neuer ceased to procure peace and concord between the Cities of Italy, and to pacifie king CHARLES: but his desire took no effect, for he was interrupted by death, which ouertook him in the end of the year 1278, hauing been Pope little more then 3 yeeres, and was recorded amongst the Saints.

Pope CLEMENT the fourth being dead, the Cardinals agreed so ill about chusing him a succellor, that for the space of two yeeres there was no Pope. What hapned in the meane time, is too long to be written, wherefore I leaue it apart: amongst which Saint LEVVES King of France went against the kingdom and Citie of Tunis, where he died of the Plague. His going thither was with an intent to haue gone from thence to the conquest of Ierusalem, whereunto hee was induced by Pope CLEMENT before his death. Before the Popes death, EDVVARD King of England went to the same seruice with about two hundred thousand men, which from all parts of Christendome vowed to goe that voyage, but all was afterwards. Two yeeres being past that the Cardinals could not agree, by their common consent in the year 1270, THEOBALD a Cardinal was chosen, and called GREGORY the tenth, who was a Legate with King EDVVARD in that enterprise: which EDVVARD performed as little in that action, as well by reason of King LEVVES his long abode before Tunis, where he died, for whom King EDVVARD stayed; as also for that the Popes feare was voided the space of two yeeres, which put all out of order, and caused him and such as were with him, to endure great want and penury: and for that at this time also died the Patriarch of Ierusalem; by whose counsell he began and continued that warre, and in the end THEOBALD: who was the Apostolick Legate in this journey, came to be Pope, wherefore King EDVVARD also returned to his country, without effecting what he desired.

When THEOBALD, or P. GREGORY the tenth, being in Aken was advertised of his election, with the aide of King EDVVARD, who furnished him with men and shipping, hee came into Italy, and was joyfully receiued and entertained by King CHARLES of Naples, through whose country he passed, who accompanied him some daies journeys; and coming to Piterbo, where the Cardinals attended his coming, he was crowned after the accustomed manner: and he then presently summoned a generall Councell, first to procure the reformation and peace of the Church: Secondly, that an Emperour should be chosen; for Germany was brought to ruine through ciuill dissension and war of iustice: and Thirdly, to take order for the conquest of the Holy-land, appointing Lions in France to be the place where this Councell should be held; whether he presently went, first settling the best peace he could in Italy, principally between the Genoais and the Venecians, two mighty Common-wealths in those times who made most cruell warre. This being done he came to Lions, from whence he sent to the Princes Electors, commanding them to meete, and to make choise of an Emperour. To this Councell at Lions, came PALBOLOGVS the Emperour of Constantinople, whom the Pope confirmed in his Empire, notwithstanding that he obtained the same by indirect meanes; and hee and the Prelates which came with him, in the name of the Grecke Church, submitted themselves to the Councell in certaine pointes, wherein the Grecks differed from the Latines: but they obserued the same as little as at other times they had done.

The Princes Electors met at Frankford, to treat of the election of an Emperour; seeing how many yeeres the Empire was voided, for now twenty yeeres were fully expired since the death of FREDERICK, in all which time, Germany was neuer free from factions and partialities about the Empire, and thirteene or fourteene yeeres since the Emperour WILLIAM died, so that Germany lay abandoned without an head or soveraign Lord: for RICHARD brother to the King of England, and ALONSO King of Castile, were chosen in discord and dissent of voyces; and RICHARD within short space died, and King ALONSO could neuer come to enjoy the Empire.

All the Princes Electors meeting, spent three yeeres before they could agree about the Election; for either of them would haue him to be Emperour in whom they thought to haue greatest interest: some alleged that no election could be made, for that King ALONSO of Castile was chosen; and the same King sent his Proctors to protest that he prepared himselfe speedily to come vnto the Empire: there were others that hindred the election, for that they had vsurped the lands and possessions belonging to the Empire, and were in feare to lose the same: finally, the matter was very confused and out of order, but in the end they agreed: and notwithstanding that OTHO CARVS King of Bohemia, had won the most part of the Electors, and assured himselfe that he should haue been chosen in this great confused Anarchy during the vacancy, Italy being on fire with intestine combultions and seditions, and Germany with old hatreds and new alterations, when as all things threatned a fearefull ruine, then did the Electors chuse RODVLPH Earle of Habsburgh and Hefisia, who in line Masculine descended lineally from the father to the sonne, from PHAROMOND King of the Francons: others haue written (amongst which is VOLATERANVS) that this RODVLPH was descended from the house and family of the PERLONES, or LEONES in Rome, an ancient house of Earles, and that one of them vpon certain occasion left his country, and went into Ergonia, and there built the Castle of Habsburgh, from whence descended the Earles of Habsburgh: which they say was in the year 1150. But it cannot be so, for the Towne and Castle of Habsburgh, from whence these Earles are descended, is not in Ergonia, but another much more ancient, and faire distant from that, whereof long before the time that they speake of, the Earls of Habsburgh were Lords: And JOHN STABVS setteth down a pedigree of nine Kings and fourteen Earles before this RODVLPH, of whom we now treat: who besides that he was chosen and crowned Emperour, and gouerned the Empire the space of eighteen yeeres, came (through want of Heires) to be Duke of Austria; and that house hath continued in that linage from that time vntill this day, and hath produced nine Emperors, and a great number of dukes: from which RODVLPH the first, is descended RODVLPH the Second now reigning in the yeere one thousand six hundred and foure. In Constantinople still reigned MICHAEL PALBOLOGVS.

The Earle of Habsburgh, and Hefisia chosen
Emperour.

THE LIFE OF RODVLPH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND THE HVNDRETH AND THIRD

Romane Emperour; And of MICHAEL

PALEOLOGVS, Emperor

of Constantinople.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

Then Rodulph's election was published, all Germany reioycied, seeing an end of so many troubles: he was according to the custome crowned in Aken, but would neuer go to be crowned in Italy, alleging that all the Emperours which went thither, either died there, or returned with great losse. He had great warres with the King of Bohemia, who by his wifes persuasion, violating his faith, rebelled against the Emperour to whom he had sworn fealty and obedience. After this warre, the Emperour addidit himselfe to maintaine iustice, and taking no care to come into Italy, contenting himselfe with their tribute, he held all Germany in peace, a thing which no Emperour euer bad done. Hee subdued all those which rebelled, and being old departed out of this life. Hee made alliance with many great Lords by meanes of his daughters, for in his sonnes hee was not very fortunate.

Soon as it was published that R O D V L P H was chosen, there was great ioy in all the towns and Cities of Germany, and by all men which desired peace and iustice, as well through the desire they had to haue an Emperour, as for that R O D V L P H was a man much esteemed, and the hope they conceived that he would prouea good Prince; for he was held to be a man of great iudgement and very valiant, whereof he had made great prooffe both in peace and warre, in the seruice of F R E D R I C K the Second, who was his God-father, and afterwards in the warre against the King of Bohemia. But the Ambassadors of the King of A L O N S O, and likewise of the King of Bohemia, departed very much discontented from Frankford, making first their protestations. Earle R O D V L P H had little apprehension thereof when the newes was brought him of his Election, who at that time lay before the City of Basil, besieging the same, wherein were two factions of the Pstici and the Stelleferi, whereof the one had driven the other out of the City: and he tooke vpon him the charge to restore the banished to their houses, with whose ayde, and the ayde of his friends and subiects, he besieged that City: but being aduertised of his election, he came to the Citie of Aken, and there according to the accustomed manner was crowned; whither came Ambassadors from the Princes of Germany to congratulate his election: but neither the King of Bohemia, nor the Duke of Baviere would obey; or hold him for Emperour. What ensued, you shall vnderstand hereafter. After the coronation, he and the Electors sent their Ambassadors to Pope GREGORY the Tenth, who then was at the Court of Avignon in France, who being very glad of his election, confirmed the same, and promised to give him the Imperiall Crowne, if he would come into Italy; but he would neuer go to be crowned in Rome; neither come into Italy: It is written that being demanded wherefore he would not go thither, for as much as he recited one of his excuses, saying that the Lyons king of all other beasts being sick, would have them all come to visit him, and they went to comfort him; but the Fox of purpose staying to be last, and being come to the mouth of the Cane wherein the Lion lay, would not enter; and the cause being demanded, answered, that the most part of the footsteps which he saw, were of such as went in; but he could hardly perceiue that any of them came forth againe; whereby he knew that the most part of them remained food for the sick Lion; wherefore he would not put his life in such hazard. After this manner said R O D V L P H, it befell the Emperours his predecessors, in their iourneys into Italy; for they either died there, or returned with great losse; wherefore vpon this consideration, he would neuer come into Italy to be crowned, which was the cause that many Cities exempted themselves, and became free.

King

A tale of a Lion

The cause why the Emperour Rodulph would not come into Italy.

The new Emperour through a desire to reforme the estate of the Empire, summoned a Diet in Parliament to be held in the City of Norembergh; whither came all the Princes in person; for as much as could not come, sent their Agents or deputies, excepting the King of Bohemia; and the Duke of Baviere, who neither came nor sent; neither would they acknowledge him for their Emperour: Whereupon R O D V L P H by the consent of all those which were present, prescribed them a certaine time, within which they should discourse and deliuer vp the Lands and possessions which they had vsurped in the time of the Empires vacancie; as well such as appertained to the Empire, as to other particular persons; and charged them to make their appearance within the time limited, in the Citie of Augsburch. The time being expired, and the Emperour being come thither, all came or sent their lawful excuses: And notwithstanding that the Duke of Baviere came not, yet he sent by his Agents, to yeeld his obedience to the Emperour; but in the behalfe of the King of Bohemia it was not so; for he sent his Ambassadors, amongst which was a Bishoppe, to whom publicke audience being giuen, the Bishoppe began a long Oration, wherein he sought to proue, that the election of R O D V L P H was of no effect; and that the King of Bohemia was not bound to yeeld him obedience, neither to acknowledge him for his Lord: Wherewith he and the Princes present were so much displeased, that without permitting him to end his discourse, they commanded him presently to depart: the Court and City; and so he and his associates departed. In that Councell the King of Bohemia was proclaimed a Rebelle and disobedient, and as such, they were to proceed both against him and his estate: The Emperour presently sent the Burgeaue of Norembergh (which is a dignity in Germany) to require him to surrender the Duchy and staires of Austria, Carinthia, Carniola, and Stiria, which he vsurped. But the King neither would, neither had any meaning to do so, and therefore tooke Arms to make resistance: And the Councell being ended, the Emperour likewise leued an Army against him: What ensued, wee will tell you after that we shall haue related what end the King of Castile had in the Empire, which passed in this manner.

ALONSO King of Castile vnderstanding that R O D V L P H of Halsburgh, was chosen Emperour, was very fory; and after many consultations held, and a peace established with the King of Granada, he departed from Spaine, purposing to haue been Emperour, and sent souldiers and other prouision before him, by sea and land to the City of Marselles, for he held the Kings of France and of Naples for his friends and kinmen: and so departing from Castile; accompanied with his brother E M A N U E L, and other great men in the month of March in the year 1275, leaving his eldest sonne HERNANDES Gouverneur in his absence, he came into France, with an intent to haue proceeded on his iourney. What ensued; and how he passed, Histories record not: the effect is, that at the same time the Pope GREGORY having dissolved the general Councell, and returning into Italy, met with King A L O N S O, at a place called Bellocadero, where the King shewed himselfe discontent, for that the Pope (to his prejudice) had consented to the election of an Emperour, he pretending to be already lawfully chosen: but the Pope so excoiled himselfe, and gaue the other so good counsell, that he perswaded him to giue ouer his challenge challenge

Aaa

Pstici and Stelleferi, two factions in Basil.

The Emperour Rodulph crowned in Aken.

challenge, and returned to Cassile, which was greatly furthered, through the newes of the death of his eldest sonne, and of the incursions made into his Countrey by the Mdores, and of the promises of his second son called Charles, (who afterwards was King) who then took vpon him the government of the Kingdom, and sought to haue succeeded by depriving the sonnes of Don Henric, and by those and other great difficulties wherewith the King was afflicted, he returned into Italy; where he afterwards liued in great trouble, for his son Shaw rebelled with the Kingdom; only the Cities and Kingdoms of Sauil and Moravia were faithful vnto him; and about 16 years after he died in Sauil, in the year 1284; and the said Shaw succeeded him in the Kingdom. Pope Gregory after his departure from King Adolph, travelling through Italy towards Rome, died in Arrezzo, and in his place was chosen Peter Tarentius Cardinal of Hosina Dominican frier, and was called John to the first: In whose time the truce between the Venetians, and Genoais being expired, cruel war began betweene them: the Pope sought to make peace between them and the other cities in Tuscane, Pisa, Florance, Lucca, Siena, and the rest which were in arms; King Charles of Naples also incorporating his authority. But before he could effect it he died, having beene Pope 8 months and two daies only, to whom succeeded John Bonifaz, a Cardinal, and was called Adrian the first, who was Pope but forty daies: after him was chosen one Petrus, born in Uzbin, and was called John the 12; who was a great Physician, and wrote of Physick; and although he was a great clerk, yet was he nothing expert in governing his charge: so as if he had liued long, he would haue shewed his imperfections, but in the 8 month of his Papacy (he being in Rueto) the stroke of a chamberfell vpon him: and although he was taken out alive, yet he was bruized, as he died within 7 daies. He being dead, Cardinal John Gayetanus was chosen, and called Nicholas the third, with whom, and with all the rest, the Emperor held friendship, whom we left making preparation for his wars against the king of Bohemia, which he was constrained to defer for a space; for that John Count Palatine of the Rhine, and the Marquess of Baden, would not (within the time limited) surrender such lands and towns as they had taken; at what time the Empire was void: wherefore he went in person to recover them by force with much trouble and danger: This being done, he marched first with his forces to mole war against the D. of Bavaria, for that he performed not what he had sworn by his Ambassadors and Proctors, but aided and favored the K. of Bohemia. The Emperor with a mighty Army entering his countrey, slew many of his people, and by force took and ruined some towns, so as he compelled the Duke to submit himselfe. The Emperor marching further, entered Austria, which Otto the Count had taken, and therein had placed Bohemian garrisons: neuertheless some castles yielded, and others were taken by force; and he afterwards besieged the city of Vienne, to the relief whereof, after the siege had lasted the space of 7 weeks, the King of Bohemia came with a great power, which he had leuied in his kingdom, and in Moravia and other countries: and to the Emperors campe came against him the King of Hungary, who was an enemy to the King of Bohemia, and had taken some towns from him: the two Armies being come, the one neerer the other; and in a readines to haue fought; certain Monks and Friers became mediators between the King and the Emperor, who used such means, that a peace was concluded: and the Emperor pardoned the King, vpon condition that he should presently surrender the estates of Austria, Carinthia, Siria, and Carniola to the Emperor; and to the King of Hungary, what he had taken from him; and that the Emperor should confirm vnto him the Kingdom of Bohemia, and Moravia, for which he should come in person to yeeld obedience; and to be sworn after the accustomed manner: All which the King (seeing no other remedy) yeelded to performe, being at the point to haue lost all the rest: but he instantly requested, that he might doe his homage in some secret place; for as he was a very haughty minded man, so did it extremely grieve him to kneele to a man to whom he had given pay; and thinking that the Emperor would haue performed what he requested, forasmuch as he stayed for him in a close Tent, hee came; and kneeling downe before the Emperour to doe him homage, the Tent was so artificially made, that it fell open, in such manner, as he was seene by the whole Army, where with he was much discontented.

This agreement being made, and the King returned into his countrey, he was by his wife the Queene very ill entertained; for being a vaine proud woman, she told him that hee was not worthy the name of a King, neither to weare a crown, since he had lost so great estates without the hazard of one battaile; and had humbled himselfe disarmed, before him who had been his

seruant

seruant; having an Army of so good men to take his part as he had: and since that he had made so shamefull a peace, he should now let her haue his Army, and the would by war recover what he had lost by auoiding it. These his wines speeches, and such like, which she used at other times, added to the sorrow for what he had lost, did so disquiet him, that he repented him of what he had done; and rebelling, meant to wipe away this reproach by Arms: Whereupon he drew his forces to an head, and such places as were not resigned, he repayed, and fortified; and went into Austria to recover what he had already surrendered; which he did with such expedition, that he took many places there. When the Emperor vnderstood of the King of Bohemia's proceedings, he with no lesse expedition raised his forces, and with some Princes of the Empire came against him with a great power; who resolutely stayed in the field to giue him battell, which befell vpon the six and twentieth day of August, in the year of our Lord, 1277: which battell was sharpe and cruel, and the king in the midst of the troups, being deadly wounded by one Barold, a favorite of the Emperors, fell from his horse: Which sudden accident, together with the enemies force, was the cause of his peoples ouerthrow, and that the Emperour being victorious was master of the field; and the King was afterwards found there, as naked as he was born of his Mother.

The Emperour hauing obtained this notable victory, followed not the same with such rigor and cruelty as he might haue done; for the King leauing a sonne called Wenceslaus, the Emperor married him to his daughter Iudith, and inuested and confirmed him in the kingdoms of Bohemia and Moravia: and for as much as he was but a child, he gaue the government both of his person and estate, to the Marquess of Brandenburgh: and so had Rodolph the Duchy of Austria, and other estates thereto appertaining, which hee afterwards gaue to his eldest son Albert, who in proceesse of time came to be Emperour.

After the war of Bohemia, the Emperor sought to settle iustice, and to free the country from theues and rebels, by reason of the late troubles; amongst which, one was so audacious that he shamed not to say that he was the Emperor Fredrick the Second, who died in Italy, stoutly maintaining himselfe to be the same: the cause whereof was, for that the common people neuer certainly knowe what passeth; and some reported that the Emperour Fredrick was not dead but lay hidden. This rumor was so generally diuulged and beleued, that this man gathered so many vnto him, that he took some Cities, and so much troubled the Emperour, that he was constrained to leuie an Army against him, by which this counterfeit Fredrick was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner; and afterwards burnt by the Emperors commandement, and the rest of his confederats were severely punished: and so he was generally obeyed. But as for matters of Italy, he tooke no care to goe thither in person, but sought to gouerne by his Vicars and Lieutenants, euer maintaining peace with the Popes; contenting himselfe that some Cities in Lombardy, and others which acknowledged the Empire, repaired vnto him and paid their customes and tributes, whereof he was very greedy: for in truth, notwithstanding that this Prince was adorned with many great vertues, yet he was much noted and taxed for being couetous and greedy of money, as he afterwards shewed. And in regard of peace betweene him and Pope Nicholas, he freely granted to him Rauenna, and the other Townes of that gouernement, which the Pope challenged to be the Church inheritance; vniing thereto the City of Bologna, which of later time held for the Empire. Pope Nicholas hauing the Emperors friendship, and for that he was a Romane borne, was of greater power then any of his predecessors had been; and took from Charles King of Naples the office of Senator, and made a Law, that from thenceforth no king or Kings sonne should be Senator: he also tooke from him the Lieutenantship for the Church in Tuscane, alleging that it was not the Emperors pleasure that he should hold that dignity; and so ialousie and suspition grew betweene them: for it was odious to the Pope to see that Charles was of such power; wherefore he procured Petrus king of Arragon, to make challenge to the Kingdome of Naples and Sicilia; affirming that they appertained vnto him, by reason of his marriage with Constance daughter to Manfred king of Sicilia. All this the Pope durst to doe, hauing the fauor and friendship of the Emperour Rodolph, whom they knew to be of great power in Italy, and obeyed in Germany.

About this time the Emperour sent one to be his Lieutenant in Italy, whom many Cities received and obeyed, and others would not. At this time also died Pope Nicholas, hauing held the sea foure yeers, sauing foure moneths; and vpon some occasion, that Sea was voided five moneths; and then was chosen Simon Cardinal, of S. Sicilie, a French-man borne, who was called MARTIN the Fourth. In those times, the Popes made their abode in Viterbo but he would not be sacred there, but went for that purpose to Cinilia Velina, whither came to see him CHARLES King of Naples, who (for that they both were French-men) was very joyfully received; and afterwards much favoured; which was in the yeere of our Lord 1281. In the same yeere, the Emperour settled WENCESLAUS King of Bohemia (whom he had married with his daughter IVDITH) in the government of his kingdom; free from the tutorship of the Marquess of Brandenburgh, to whom he had given the same. And the same yeere he had warre with the Countesse of a people called Ethni, inhabiting a province in France about Lionois, who rebelled, and would have made himselfe Lord of Burgundy, and of part of Suenia; whither he went in person, obtained victory, and left the country in subiection. And returning from his journey, he came into the province of Alsacia, where were many factions, and many great men rebelling; disobeyed his commandements: but with his presence all was still and in quiet: so as in all Germany he was both obeyed and feared, and reigned in prosperity. But as in this life no estate high or low is free from disasters and misfortunes, so a sonne of his whom he much loved whose name was HARMAN, passing the river of Rhine, in a boate, was drowned, together with certain other eminent men, and his wife the Emperesse also died; and about three yeeres after he married again, with the daughter of the Duke of Burgundy: and so he passed five or six yeeres without any accident worth the writing. In Italy, CHARLES, King of Sicilia and Prouence, being rich and of great power, through the fauor of Pope MARTIN, had a concite to haue deposed MICHAEL PALOLOOVS, and to haue restored BALDVIN to the Empire of Constantinople; who marrying his daughter, was deputed: and although hee pretended this title, yet it was thought that he would haue had the Empire for himselfe.

A Battelle betwene the Emperour and the King of Bohemia, wherein the Bohemians were ouerthrowne, and their King slain.

A counterfeit Emperour.

The Pope was author of all the warres between the French and Spanish for the Kingdom of Naples.

This being done, he thought to haue recovered the kingdom of Ierusalem, whereof he intituled himselfe King: whereupon he practised with the Pope, perswading him to excommunicate PALOLOOVS, for that he had not obserued what was decreed in the Councell lately held at Lions, whither he came to Pope GEORGE the Tenth, concerning the vniing of the Greeke Church with the Latine. He had also intelligence with certain Cities in Gracia which rebelled against PALOLOOVS, and began to provide men and gallies for that enterprise. But all these purposes were frustrate: for whilst he sought to depose another from his Empire, he within few daies lost great part of his owne: for all the Cities in Sicilia, vnable to endure the violence and oppression vsed by the French, rose and rebelled, and slew all the French-men which were in the Island, in two houres space: hauing first had intelligence with PETER King of Arragon, who lay in waite for Sicilia (vnder this title, that he married the daughter of King MANFRED) and came in great haste with a flecte of fifty gallies and ships, sailing that he had rigged the same, to haue passed over into Africa; and so became Lord of the whole Island. Afterwards there were great wars between them both by sea and land, during which, King CHARLES falling sick, of an infirmity and of sorrow, died; leaving his eldest son CHARLES prisoner, in the power of PETER King of Arragon. Pope MARTIN sent his Legate to Naples, to hold that kingdom in subiection to CHARLES who was in prison, whom he proclaimed to be his fathers heire and successor: the French King sent also to the same effect. Finally, at this time the Kingdom of Sicilia was diuided from the Kingdom of Naples, and the King of Arragon held the same; and afterwards followed other alterations. Returning to my History, I say that the Emperour RODOLPH, through the counsell of HONORIVS the Fourth, who succeeded Pope MARTIN, in the yeere of our Lord 1286, sent for his Lieutenant-generall, an Italian Earle called PINGNAGLIA di Fisico (a man very priuate with the Pope) who coming into Tuscane, Florence, and many other Cities which were of the faction of the Guelphs, would not obey him; and there passed many treaties and demands; but in the end, he hauing made his protestations, and condemned some cities, returned into Germany: and the Emperour sent thither another Lieutenant, who (hauing commission) gaue care to certain cities, which offered to compound for money; and so by the Emperours consent, Florence, Luca, Fisa, and some others, bought their liberty, whereby the Emperour gat little honor; notwithstanding that in all the rest he was a good, a valiant, and a prudent Prince: but the greediness of money, and his resolution not to come into Italy, made him to vse this baseness.

In those daies, EBERARD Earle of Wittenbergh, being assisted by some other Princes, rebelled: but the Emperour entering his countrie, besieged him in a strong Castle, and compelling him to sue for mercy, at the entreaty of the Archbishop of Mentz, he pardoned him: and although that he afterwards made some alterations, yet in the end he persued in his seruice.

At this time died in Rome HONORIVS the Fourth, hauing been Pope two yeeres and one moneth, and after his death the chaire was void ten moneths; and then was chosen the Cardinal of Saint Sabina, a Frier, and Generall of S. FRANCIS Order, called NICHOLAS.

All this while the Emperour RODOLPH governed Germany in peace; yet in the prouince of Turinge, many insolencies and robberies were committed, by reason of the factions and contentions, betweene the Lords of the Castles there: wherefore the Emperour called a Diet to be held in the citie of Esfordia; and by the consent of the Princes, made thre score Castles in that prouince to be throwne downe, and laid leuell with the earth, whereby he brought all Germany into quiet subiection; which continued so, vntill his death, which was within a little while after. So as it cannot be denied, but that this Emperour was a good Prince, and a prudent gouernour, both in peace and in warre, and in all things (wherein hee would intermeddle, which was but in Germany onely) desiring as a wise Prince to rule and gouerne the same well, rather then to seeke to subdue Italy, and other countries, and so to lose both the one and the other; and to avoid contention with the Popes, which in Italy he could not elchue. One thing made his reignie infortunat, which was the losse of the Holy land; the Christians losing all the cities which they held in Soria, and Palestina: for the Souldan of Egypt being Lord of Ierusalem, seeing the warres betweene the cities of Italy, and the Christian Kings of Arragon, and of Naples; and also betweene the Kings of England and of France; came with a great Army of foote and horse, and besieging the citie of Tripoli in Soria, took the same by force: and presently did the like by the cities of Tyre, Sidon, and Briis, with their confines; which he destroying, slew and captiuated an infinite number of people. The Christians which escaped, retrying themselves by sea and land to the citie of Ptolomida, whither came the King of Cyprus, the Masters and Knights Templars, of S. JOHN, and of the Duch order, together with the Patriarch of Ierusalem; they fell there at variance amongst themselves, who should be Gouernour, and haue the command: which the Souldan vnderstanding, and a certaine truce which he had granted them being expired, he came with 150000 men before the citie; and taking and destroying all the countie round about it, sent his sonne with his whole power to besiege the citie: who continued the siege, notwithstanding that his father died in the meane season.

After fundrie accidents which happened, the greatest part of those which were in the citie, abandoning the same, fled by sea; and neere to the coast of Cyprus were overtaken with such a tempest, that the greatest part of them were cast away and drowned: and the next day, the Souldan entering the citie (some few which had no meanes to depart, being left to defend the same) commanded first all those which he found therein, to be slaine; and then the citie to be ruined, leaving no house or wall standing: and so the Christians were wholly expelled out of all which GOFFREY of Buillon and other Christian Princes had gotten 196 yeeres before: which was in the yeere of our Lord 1290: for which as soone as it was published in Europe, the Emperour, the Pope, and generally all the Princes Christian were very forie; knowing that by reason of the wars betweene them, those countries could not be relieved.

The next yeere after this, the Emperour falling fore sicke, was carried to the citie of Spire, accompanied with the Emperesse and his sonne in law, the King of Bohemia and his Queene, the Duke of Bauiere, and many other Princes: and dyed the same day that hee came to the citie. This Prince may well be accounted for one of the most valiant and excellent of the world; for that being but a meane Lord, and finding the Empire diuided, rent, and tyrannized, without an Emperour, and at libertie, for many yeeres space, he pacified and brought the same fully into subiection and obedience, and maintaining iustice and equitie therein, left the same in peace. His house and estate he so much encreased, that he left to his sonne ALBERT, the Duchies of Austrich, and Carniola. He was twice married: first with a Countesse of Suenia called ANNE; whom he made Lord of part of Suenia, who was father to JOHN the paricide, who slew his vnkle, as hereafter you shall vnderstand. He had also (as writeth JOHN CUSPINTIAN) seuen daughters, which he married to mightie Princes: the first was EVELMIA, which was a Nunne; the second was IVDITH, married to WENCESLAUS King of Bohemia; the third was MARY, married to the Count Palatine of Rhine; the fourth was YNE, married to the Duke of Saxony; the fifth was KATHERINE, married to HARMAN Marquis of Brandenburgh; the sixth was ANNE, married with OTTO Duke of Bauiere; the seventh and last was called

A a a 3

The last of the Holy Land.

The Emperour Rodolph dyed in this yeere 1291.

The Frenchmen slaine in the Ile of Sicilia.

Florence, Luca, &c. Pisa bought their freedom of the Emperour Rodolph the first.

called CLEMENCE, and was married to CHARLES the Second, King of Naples; from which issued great Kings and Princes.

The same yeere that the Emperor RODOLPH died, MICHAEL PALEOLOGVS Emperour of Constantinople died also, and his sonne ANDRONICVS had the Empire: and the next yeere following died Pope NICHOLAS, having bin so foureyeres, and through discord betwene the Cardinals, that Sea was void two yeeres and three moneths.

THE LIFE OF ADVLPH, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THE HUNDRETH AND FOURTH RO- MAN EMPEROR.

()

THE ARGUMENT.

A L L men thought, after the death of the Emperor Rodolph, that the Electors would have chosen his sonne Albert: but, through the cunning of the Bishop of Mentz, Adulph Earle of Nassau was chosen which, Albert disdain (with the aid of the French King) bare Arms against him, purposing to depose him. Heir to the Electors consented, and repented that they had chosen him, deprived himself the Empire, and chose Albert; who, going to be crowned in Aken, came to a battle with Adulph, and slew him.

A policy used by the Archbishop of Mentz.

He Empire, through the death of the Emperour RODOLPH, being void, all men were of opinion that this sonne ALBERT Duke of Austria should have succeeded him: and (in a manner) all the Princes Electors desired the same. But GERARD, Archbishop of Mentz (which was one of them) used such policy, that at the Princes meeting at Frankford, he (cunningly) got their voices, and made ADVLPH, Earle of Nassau, who was his neer kinsman to be chosen. The mean which he used was this: Hee having already gotten to this effect the Archbishop of Colen voice, used the same policy in obtaining the rest of their voices. First, conferring with the Duke of Saxony, he told him that he had some of the Electors voices to chuse the Duke of Brunswick (who was his great enemy) but yet he would forbear to do it, if he would give him his voice. The Duke fearing that this had been true (for, he had heard that the Bishop of Colen, and the Marquis of Brandenburg, had granted their voices to the Bishop of Mentz) perswaded him not to consent thereto, for if he did, it would be his ruine if he were chosen: so as whosoever were chosen (were it not the Duke of Brunswick) he should have his voice presently.

The Duke of Saxony being thus deceived, with the like wile he gat the voices of the Archbishop of Treuier, and of the Count Palatine of Rhine; propounding in secret, to the Count Palatine time

time, the King of Bohemia, and to the Bishop of Treuier, the Duke of Gueldres; whereto each of them answered him, that if he were not chosen whom hee named unto them, they would give him their voices: this they did, supposing that he would have chosen ALBERT the Duke of Austria, for so hee made shew in outward appearance: so as by this device hee gat all their voices, the one not knowing what the other had done: and the Marquis of Brandenburg promised him his voice also, for that he had fauoured him in the controuersie betwene the vnicle, and the nephew, Marquises, whether of them should be Elector: so as the day of the election being come, they all referring their opinions to the Archbishop of Mentz, by common consent the Earle of Nassau was chosen; whereto they all marvelled, as well for that they expected that ALBERT should haue bin chosen, as also for that ADVLPH was a man of meane estate, and of too poore a reuenue to maintaine the imperiall dignitie; notwithstanding that for his owne person hee was valiant, greatly esteemed, and held for an excellent man of warre: but as his reuenues were small, he presently began to be held in contempt, especially by the Duke of Austria and his adherents.

Adulph Earle of Nassau chosen for Emperor.

ADVLPH being thus chosen, by means of the Bishop of Mentz, and of his other friends and kindred, went to Aken, and there was crowned with great solemnitie; and then called a Councell to be held in a citie in Suenia: and from thence, (for that there were then great wars betwene the Kings of England and of France) hee sent to offer his ayd to the king of England against the French King; and the King of England lent him a great summe of money, to the end that with an Army he should in person haue come to his ayd; wherewith the Princes of the Empire seemed to be much grieued, alleaging that it was a great dishonour to the Empire, that the Emperour should take pay of any forraigne Prince: and the Duke of Austria said, that seeing the Emperour receiued pay of the king of England, he might as well take pay of the French king. The Emperour hauing receiued this money, and knowing that the Lantzgrau of Turinges sons made war upon their father, hee went in person to ayd the Lantzgrau; who to obtaine his fauour, and for the hatred which he bare against his sonnes, sold to him the Earldome of Turin-gia, for part of the money which the King of England had giuen him. It seemes the Author was not truly informed of this historie: and therefore (for that it is a memorable action) I will borrow so much liberty as to set it downe as I finde it in an approoued Author. ALBERT Lantzgrau of Turinge, married MARGVRRIT daughter to the Emperour FREDERICK the Second, a very vertuous Lady, by whom he had two sonnes FREDERICK and TICHEMAN: ALBERT fell so passionately in loue with a strumper, as he sought his wifes death, who being aduised by her wife and faithful friends to flee the furie of her wicked husband, retyred by night out of his Castle, and got to Brackford, where spending some yeeres in mourning and deuotion in a Nonnerie, she dyed. Soon after the Mothers escape, DITTRICH Marquis of Misnia, brother to ALBERT, a wife and a iust Prince, called the two sons to his Court, lest they should be spectators of their fathers villanie, and also to free them from daunger, breeding them vp ver-mously in the feare of God. This Marquis had one son who dyed, and therefore being loth his brother should succede him, and fearing that he would chase away his children, for that he more respected a base son, as also for that he hated his conditions, he made his wil, by the which he adoped his brothers sons, and made them heires of Misnia: and calling together the principall men of the prouince, hee acquainted them with his testament and the reasons thereof, requiring them to protect his heires, which they promised, and not to receiue any other Lord.

The Emperour
Adulph offered to serue the the King of England in his warres against the French.

DITTRICH being dead and the heires in possession and much beloued of their subjects for their vertues, the father ALBERT challenged the estate, as his brothers next heir: but the estates of the countrie would not accept of him, saying that they had allowed of DITTRICH's piete and the reasons of his last will, and that they would defend them who were recommended to their protection. ALBERT flies to armes, and in the beginning took his eldest son FREDERICK whom he kept in prison a yeere: but his keepers pitying the young mans estate, assisted him in his escape.

The Emperour RODOLPH being dead, who had inioyned them to peace, ADVLPH succeeding, ALBERT takes Armes againe, and to ingage him in this warre, he fels him Turin-gie, to deprive his heires: so as the warres grew hot in Misnia both during the six yeeres raigne of ADVLPH, and in the time of ALBERT of Austria his successor, but God protected the brethren and expelled the Emperours Army both out of Turingia and Misnia.

The Emperour ALBERT put FREDERICK in hope of peace, but finding Misnia and Turingia

Aaa 4

Turingia fit for him to make warres against the Bohemian, he deceiued FREDERICK and entred the Countrie with an Armie. They write that FREDERICK was called to a counter-fet treatie; where being inuited to a banquet by the Emperour, a souldier steep forth with his sword, drawne to strike FREDERICK, but a Citizen of Strasbourg, being among the guard, receiued the blow that he might escape. The Emperour excused himselfe: yet all men thought that he had suborned the murderere.

TICMAN the younger brother was soon after treacherously wounded in a Church at Lipsie, on Christmas eue at night being at his deuotion, and died within two daies after; It was thought that PHILIP of Nassau had employed this murderere, of whom FREDERICK vowed to be reuenged, and meeting him in a battaile, he slew him with his owne hand.

ALBERT the father a breaker of wedlock, cruell to his wife and children, who furiously drew ruine vpon himselfe and his Countie, suffered bitter punishment by the Iustice of God, dying in extreame want and contempt in the yeare 1315.

The Emperour spent two yeeres in those warres, desiring to aduance his house, and to enlarge his possessions, as he did: and this time being expired, he desiring to satisfie the King of England, and being vnable to perform the same (for, the Princes were much discontented for that hee gaue them no part of the gold which the King of England lent him) open enmity brake out between him and the Duke of Austria: and the Duke practised with the other Princes to depose him from the Empire, by the consent of the same Archbishop of Mentz who had chosen him; so as the Emperour ADVLPH was of no such power or authority as was his Predecessor: and men began to stand in fear of what afterwards ensued. While these matters passed in Germany, which were of great moment, I will tell you what passed in Italy, touching the Papacy: which was in this manner;

At the end of two yeeres and three months after the death of Pope NICHOLAS the Fourth, in all which time he had no successor, in Perugia (whither the Cardinals repayed to make their election) was chosen a very zealous man, who was both a Monke and an Hermite, called PETER MURON; who thinking himselfe to haue bin called of God accepted the Popedom, and was named CELESTINE the Fifth: in his beginning (as it was written) he was so highly honoured, that vpon the day of his sacrificing, there came to Perugia (as to lea wonder) 200000. persons: but as this man had wholly secluded himself from the world, and giuen himself to contemplation and prayer; so the world could not well like of him, nor of his fashions; neither knew he how to deale in the world, for his small vnderstanding, and lesse experience in worldly matters; which was the occasion that he gaue credit to what was told him; by meanes whereof he did sometimes one thing contrary to another: whereupon some of the Cardinals cunningly counselled and perswaded him to renounce the Papacie, whereto this good man willingly agreed, accounting himselfe incapable of that charge, and so oftentimes protested, and in conclusion (notwithstanding that CHARLES King of Naples would haue hindred him, and to that end induced him to come to Naples) did so, and in a solemne act renounced the Popedom; five months after that he had accepted the same: and vpon his renunciation, was chosen Cardinal BENEDICT, who was called BONIFACE the Eighth, who was the man which chiefly perswaded CELESTINE to renounce the Papacy: and this deuout man being about to returne to his hermitage, BONIFACE fearing that the people would againe haue restored him, made him to be apprehended and detained in prison vntill he dyed, which was within short space after: whose successor BONIFACE was farre vnlike vnto him, for he was ambitious, proud, factious, and a great persecutor of the Gibelins, yet very learned, politique, subtil, and of great experience; whose end was such as hereafter wee will tell you.

Returning to the Emperour ADVLPH, vnderstanding that the Duke of Austria practized against him, and sought to depriue him of the Empire, he made warre against him, to whom the French king vnder hand gaue secret ayd, to the end that the Emperour should not be able to ioyne with the King of England against him, as he purposed to haue done.

Vpon this occasion all Germany was in combustion, some holding with one partie, and some with the other: and ADVLPH's friends daily forsooke him, through his vnequall cariage towards them, for in his fauours he was partiall, a thing which maketh Princes to be hated: by meanes whereof ALBERT's party became so strong, that the Princes Electors (excepting the Archbishop of Treuer, and the Count Palatine of Rhine who would not be there) met in the citie of Mentz, where alleaging such reasons as they thought good (which in my iudgement were were very insufficient) they depriued ADVLPH of the Empire, and chose his enemie ALBERT; who with the greatest and most flourishing power that he could procure, of his owne, and of his friends, went to be crowned in Aken: whom ADVLPH (who was not a coward, or any way pusillanimous, notwithstanding that his power was vnequall) went to meet: and the two Armies ioyning nere the citie of Wormes, in the month of Iuly in the yeere of our Lord 1308, there began between them a most cruell and bloody battaile; the despaire wherewith ADVLPH and those of his party fought, making their inequality equall. The battaile continued about six houres, either party fighting most cruellly, before that it could be perceived whether Army should haue the victorie; and each General hauing lost great part of his people: ADVLPH fighting with his face against the sunne (which did greatly annoy him) in the midst of the throng where the fight was most cruell, was in a great charge ouerthrowne from his horse, whither (by chance) came his enemy ALBERT, who (before that he could be able to avoid his thrust) with the point of his sword gaue him so great a wound in the face, that it be-yeaued him of his senses, so that he was slaine in the place. Some write, that whilst that he was in this fight, ALBERT cried vnto him alowd; Here ADVLPH shalt thou lose the Empire; whereto he answered, This (O ALBERT) is in the hand of God.

As soone as the Emperour was slaine, and being perceived by his souldiers, they (without making any more resistance) were ouerthrowne, and ALBERT remained victor, although it cost him deere, for a great number of his men were slaine and wounded. In this manner was this Emperour murdered by the hands of a Prince subiect to the Empire; in the seventh yeere of his raigne: whether the cause mouing him thereto were right or wrong, I leaue to God, who is the righteous iudge; but the reasons which they alleaged, were that he took pay of the King of England, wherewith he was grown so proud, that he caused a Masse priest to be beheaded; that he had caused false money to be coyned, and had degraded certaine Ecclesiasticall persons: that he had forced certaine damfels: and such others which they alleaged: which whether they were true or false, it pleased GOD that hee dyed in this manner. Some authors write that all those which conspired against him, and were accessarie to his death, had euill endes: how ALBERT sped, I will tell you hereafter.

Of ADVLPH's sonnes small mention is made, excepting one who with many Earles was taken prisoner in the Battaille, and the Duke of Bauire escaped by flight; other men of great account in this cruell battaile were slaine. In Constantinople, ANDRONICVS, sonne to MICHAEL PALOLOGVS, was Emperour.

A battaile betwixt the Emperour ADVLPH and ALBERT Duke of Austria.

The Emperour ADVLPH slaine.

THE LIFE OF ALBERT, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND FIFT RO- MAN EMPEROR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

ALBERT would not accept of his first election: but Adolph being dead, he caused it to be renewed, and was confirmed by the Pope, who was easily drawne to confirme him, so the end he should make warre open to the French King: which he would not doe, neither enere came into Italy. Germany then enjoyed peace, and it was his first battaile he ever had the victory by reason whereof he was called Albertus Triumphans. Many notable matters happened in his time, as the translating of the pontificall seate from Rome

Pope Celestine the Fifth renounced the Papacy.

Rome to Anisio; the saluerfion of the Knights called Templars; the beginning of the house of the Ottomans in Turkey, and many other things worth the reading. He died unfortunately through the conspiracie of a nephew of his who flew him nere to the Rhine, in the tenth yeare of his reigne.

Albert Duke of Austria, the second time chosen Emperor.

And the chief right to Kingdoms and Empires many times consisteth in Arms: for ALBERT (who was, as it hath been often recited, sonne to the Emperor RODOLPH, Duke of Austria, and Lord of other estates) remaining victor, and the Emperor ADOLPH (who was his riuall) being dead, he finding no man in field to make head against him, remained sole Emperor. But forasmuch as his election was made in the time of the Emperor ADOLPH, in discord (many contradicting the same) hee sought to legitimate and assure his estate. For which cause (accompanied with many Princes) he went vnto the City of Frankford: where, in the presence of the Princes Electors assembled, he renouncing his first election, and holding the Empire for void, was the second time by common consent chosen Emperor; and from thence went to Aken to be crowned, together with his wife ISABEL, daughter to the Earl of Tirol and of Carinthia, by whom he had many children, whose brother married ALBERT's sister. Which Coronation was performed with great solemnity, and so many repaired thither to see the same, that vpon the coronation day there was so great a throng and prease of people, that the Duke of Saxony (who married another of the Emperors sisters) and many others were smothered to death, and no man could rescue them; which was a great disgrace to the Feast.

After this Coronation, a Diet or Councell was held in Norembergh, wherein he took order for such matters as appertained to the Empire: and thence sending his Ambassadors to Pope BONIFACE, he gaue him to understand of his election, and intreated him to confirme the same; which the Pope at that time would not grant, but like a proud priest (as it is written) answered, that he was not worthy the Empire who had murdered the Emperor. But hee shortly after confirmed him: for, as this Pope was of an high minde and presumptuous, so vpon some occasion which hapned (which I haue no time to relate) he fell at such oddes with PHILIP the French King, that the King apprehended a Bishop which was his Ambassador: and such other matters passed between them, that the Pope summoned a Councell to proceed against the King of France; who would not permit any his subiects to sue to the Court of Rome, neither to carry or send any rents or reuenues to the same. Whereupon the Pope, meaning to vse the Emperors aid against the French King, very willingly confirmed his election; and perswading him to take vpon him the title of King of France, he promised to deprime the King, and to giue him the Kingdom: about which matters were many treaties, and in the end the Pope pronounced Sentence against the French King; whereby he deprimed him of his Kingdom, and gaue the same to the Emperor. Heerein is great difference between the Historiographers: for, they report this after sundry manners. But the truth is, that the Emperor was the Kings friend, and had married his eldest sonne RODOLPH, whom he had made Duke of Austria, to the Kings daughter BLANCH: for which cause, or for some other (for, many are alleaged) he accepted not the title to the Crown of France; but was contented with his confirmation in the Empire, wherein (following his fathers counsell) he raigned in prosperitie, without any desire to go into Italy; and so neuer went thither.

The hatred betwixt the Pope and the King so much increased, that the King, deadly hating the Pope, practised with a Noble-man of Rome, whose name was SARRA, of the house and family of the COLVMOIS (who was Lord of many Towns and Castles, and was of the faction of the Gibelins) whom the Pope had banished: for this cause hee abode in France, and was highly fauoured in the French Court. The conclusion was, that this Lord should apprehend the Pope; which he undertook, vnto such means as you shall hear. This Lord SARRA COLVMOIS, hauing many friends of the faction of the Gibelins in Albania, where the Pope was then resident (for, it was his natie Countrey) departed France disguised, hauing first agreed with a Captain called NOGARBY, to lodge himself with two hundred souldiers in a place which he had appointed; and he himself went into Albania, where hauing secret conference with with his friends, he shewed them the French Kings Letters and fauours; and so carried the matter, that one day he assaulted the Popes Palace, and took him prisoner, and presently took his way with him towards Rome; which he entered with the aid of the Gibelins, and of his owne family of the COLVMOIS, which lived there. But the Pope within five and thirty daies after died, hauing been Pope the space of eight yeers and nine months, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1302.

In this manner ended the high designs of Pope BONIFACE, who wrote the first booke of the Decretals. What the Lord SARRA meant to haue done with him, is unknowne, yet it is written that he purposed to haue carried him into France, which hee then could not, or durst not put in execution. After that BONIFACE was dead, NICHOLAS Cardinall of Hostia was chosen, and was called BANCIOT the Eleventh, who was born in Treuigi, and was a Dominican Friar.

While these matters passed in Italy and France, ALBERT raigned happily in Germany: but in Hungary were great combutions about the title to that Kingdom: for, ANDREW their King dying without issue, VENCESLAVS, son to the King of Bohemia, aspired to that Kingdom; and afterwards, OTHO Duke of Baviere, and CHARLES, sonne to the King of Naples; but in the end CHARLES was King, and VENCESLAVS inherited Bohemia, which was his fathers inheritance, who was of the same name: but hee prouoed to be so wicked (notwithstanding that he was but a yong man) that his subiects, conspiring against him, slue him in a City of Moravia. And forasmuch as he also had no issue, the like controuersie aroose in Bohemia, as was in Hungary, notwithstanding that he left a sister whose name was ISABEL; which the Emperor ALBERT vnderstanding, he resolved to procure her for his sonne RODOLPH, by reason of a certain couenant and agreement made between the houses of Austria and Bohemia; which was, that the one wanting heirs, the heirs of the other should succeed in the estate. But the greatest part of the Bohemians resolved to chuse a Lord of their owne nation for their King, whose name was HENRY, who was Earl of Carinthia and of Tirol, and was the Emperors brother-in-law: neuertheless there was euer some dislike and discord between them; and HENRY, desiring to raige, without any intermission halted into Bohemia, and there was receiued and obeyed for King. But the Emperor, presently leuying an Army, entered the Countrey with so great power, that HENRY durst not abide his coming; and he put his sonne RODOLPH in possession (who was a widower, hauing buried the French Kings daughter); and the better to assure him, and to make him the more acceptable to the Bohemians, he married him to the widow ISABEL, late wife to VENCESLAVS deceased: which took such effect, that he was presently obeyed by all men, and began to raige in peace. But it pleased not God that he should long enioy that Kingdom: for, within fewe months after, when he was tired from all his enemies, he died suddenly in the yeer of our Lord 1306. By reason whereof, the old discord and contention was renewed, some desiring to haue the deposed HENRY, Earl of Carinthia, and others would haue FREDERICK, the Emperors second sonne, to beech their King. But the Earl HENRY's party being the stronger, he was receiued and established in the Kingdom: which the Bohemians did so willingly, that the Emperor (within fewe daies after) coming thither in person with a mighty Army to haue preferred his sonne FREDERICK; they all so resolutely serued their new King, that, after much harm done in the Countrey, the Emperour was forced to return without effecting what he came for, seeing how constantly the Bohemians stood to their defense. In which warres and others, which he first had with the Emperour ADOLPH and other Princes, it is written, that he fought in person twelue severall times, and in them all had the victory, and therefore was called ALBERTVS Triumphant.

In the time of this Emperor ALBERT, Pope CLEMENT the Fifth, leauing three Cardinals to govern Rome, removed his seat from thence to Anisio in France, where he and his successors made their abode for the space of seueny and odd yeers, whereof ensued many inconveniences. In the beginning of the Emperor ALBERT's Raige, in Asia the lesse began the Empire and dominion of the great Turk, which is now so mighty and powerfull: the head and fount of which Empire was one OTTOMAN, of the same nation; a man of base parentage, but of a great spirit, and very politick; who of a small beginning grew to bee so mighty, and brought so many nations to his seruice and subiection, that he conquered many Countries, and made himself a King, and laid the foundation of that Empire, which his successors haue from time to time enlarged, and brought to that estate wherein we see it at this day: and from him is descended in line masculine, to the great Turk now rainging, in the yeer of our Lord 1604.

Pope Boniface apprehended by Santa Columa.

The death of the King of Bohemia.

The Pope removed his seat from Rome to Anisio, in France. The beginning of the Turkish Empire, anno 1307.

The Pope deprimed the King of France by his censures, and gaue his Kingdom to the Emperor.

In the tenth year of the Emperor ALBERT's Raigne, which was in the year 1307, the Knights of the Order of S. JOHN took the Ile of Rhodes from the Infidels, where they made their seat and principall residence, and therefore were afterwards called Knights of the Rhodes; and performed many maruels in Arms both by sea and land, untill (in our time) that Iland was taken by SOLIMAN the great Turk, who conquered the same.

In the time of the Emperor ALBERT, in Lombardy neer to Nouarra, began a sect of Hereticks, which vnder colour of Religion and charity, made all things common: and women in like manner moued men to carnall conjunction, alleging it to bee a deed of charity; and did many other things. This error dispersed it self into sundry parts, and many thousands of people followed the same. But the Pope and other Princes vsed such diligence in punishing these Hereticks, that in the end it was suppressed, yet not without great difficulty.

In the time of the Emperor ALBERT's Raign, the Heluecians (now called Swissers) began to bee famous: all which ioyning together, made a league to enfranchise themselves, and to defend their liberty, and gouerned and ruled their state by their Heads or Cantons; which they haue maintained untill this day, and haue done many singular feats of Arms against the Dukes of Austria and other Princes; and from that time hitherto haue been accounted for a very valiant Nation.

Towards the end of this Emperors Raign, Pope CLEMENT, by the counsell and consent of the King of France, dissolued the whole Order of the Knights Templars, and condemning their bodies, confiscated their goods; which were of so great value throughout all Christendom, that what was taken from them, was sufficient to haue enriched many Princes, and the other Orders of Knights whereunto they were applied. In his time also Sardinia was taken by the Moors: which Iland Pope CLEMENT bestowed vpon the King of Sicilia, to the end that hee should recover the same.

About the end of the tenth year of this Emperors Raign, hee hauing leuied great forces to haue gone into Bohemia, with an intent to haue made his sonne FRIDERICK King, wherein then reigned HARRY, Earl of Carinthia; a nephew of his, beeing his brother RODOLPH's sonne, whose name was JOHN, through secret hatred which hee conceived against him for not giuing him any estate (he withholding from him in Sueuia, what to him by inheritance from his father appertained) resolved to kill him: and vpon this occasion, conspiring with other Barons, which were RODOLPH, VLERICH and WALTER, in the month of April, in the year 1308, the Emperor being in Austria, purposing the next day to haue passed the Riuer of Rhine; he after dinner for his pleasure taking horse, and riding ouer the ploughed fields between two little riuers called Rifa and Arula, neer to the Rhine, accompanied onely by these conspirators, who were his great Familiars; his nephew JOHN with his confederates, and others which followed him for the same purpose, getting before him, RODOLPH laid hand vpon his horses bridle: his nephew JOHN stabd him in the throat; and VLERICH with a blowe claued his head; and therewith wounded him, some with blowes, some with thrusts, so as he was soon slain: and the murderers, setting spurs to their horses, left the miserable Emperor dead in the place; in which, his sonne the Duke of Austria afterwards built a stately Monastery: his body was carried to Spire. The conspirators were fought out by his sonnes, and most of them found and put to death. This death was reputed to happen in this manner to him through the iust iudgement of God, for killing his Predecessor the Emperor ADOLPH: the truth is knowne vnto God onely, who orders all things according to his good pleasure. All that I can say, is, that the highest estates are in least safety, and most subiect to danger both bodily and ghostly. What appertaineth to the soules hard to be proued, for that it is secret, whereof God onely can iudge: but, as it appereth, in great estates liberty to sin maketh it doubtfull, and mens weakness is alike as well in the great as in the small; which is an argument of the greater danger, as our Saviour plainly expresth in the Gospell; wherein he sheweth how hardly rich men inherit the Kingdom of heauen: wherefore great Princes ought to be circumspect concerning bodily dangers. I will not wearie the Reader with other examples: those shall suffice which I haue written of Emperors; on whom (as I haue declared) there is no kinde of death that hath not befallen. And, to the contrary, in many mean estates we finde not any that in many yeers space haue died of a violent death, but that most men of mean fortune haue died naturally: but pride and ambition do so blinde mens eyes, that what is most hatefull is most desired; and we euer seek to attain to that wherein is greatest danger: yet some haue been of so good an vnderstanding, that they would not accept, but haue refused Empires and dominions when they haue been offered them, although the number be but small. But returning to the Emperor ALBERT, he had by ELIZABETH his wife one and twenty children, sonnes and daughters, whereof tenne died in their infancy: and his eldest sonne RODOLPH died in his time King of Bohemia; so as when the Emperour ALBERT died, he left fise sons, and as many daughters: his daughters names were ELIZABETH, ANNE, GVTTA, KATHARINE and ISS, all which were married to sundry Princes: his sons names were FRIDERICK, LEOPOLD, HENRY, ALBERT and OTHO, which OTHO married the Duchesse of Bauiera, all which (after the German manner) were called Dukes of Austria, which causeth a great confusion in histories; but the house of Austria rested in ALBERT, who (for that he had the gowt) was called the lame; and was the item & original of the house of Austria, from whom are descended his successors.

At what time as the Emperor ALBERT was slaine, ANDRONICVS was Emperour of Constantinople: of whom I finde little written, and therefore make no particular relation of him.

Pope CLEMENT the Fifth making his aboad in Auinion, gouerned Rome and his estates of Italy, by his Legates; by reason whereof, and of the Emperours long absence, many cities in Italy took for their Lords, the heads and leaders of their factions, which they possessed a long time, and to this day some remaine, which of tyrants, haue in proceesse of time made themselves absolute Lords; as in Perona, those of the house of SCALA, in Ferrara, the house of EST, extending it selfe afterwards to Modena, whose descendents at this day enioy that estate; in Padua those of CARRARA; in Mantua the PASSERINI were expelled by the GONZAGHI, who afterwards were, and to this day are, great Lords: and others in other parts,

THE LIFE OF HENRIE, THE SEVENTH OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SIXT RO- MANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGUMENT.

Henry being chosen by the Electors was confirmed by the Pope, with an insinuation that hee should come into Italy, by reason of much discord which was there: the French King was greatly displeased with his election, for that he pretended to haue been Emperour. The first enterprise he took in hand was against the King of Bohemia, and against the Earle of Wintzenberg, against both which he had good success: he came afterwards into Italy, as well to satisfy the Pope, as to visit the Countries vnder his iurisdiction: hauing past the Alpes he found no great resistance by reason of the factions in Rome, where he was crowned with more aduantage than hee expected; the Citie being divided betweene the Colonnels and the Priests, who daily fought together. The Florentines would not yield vnto him, nor lose their liberty: and hauing endured a long siege, in conclusion they defended themselves bravely, so as the Emperour changing his minde went to the conquest of Naples, and while he made preparation for the same he was poisoned, and dyed in Buen Comento, leaving Italy in greater combustion then before. Hee reigned seven yeeres.

Ruly I coniecture, that in writing the life of the Emperour ALBERT, I haue made too long a digression, by reason of the recital of other matters which happened in his time: but yet neuertheless I did it, for that I was briefe in writing his life; holding it necessary, to the end the rest may be the better vnderstood, and to explaine what is already sayd: and also for that the accidents were notable, if it was not fit to passe them ouer in silence. The Emperour ALBERT being slaine through the treason of his Nephew JOHN, and his death being generally published, his sons sought reuenge, and to get his goods and estates, and some of them to haue the Empire.

The princes Electors, to make choise of a new Emperour, retired themselves (according to custome)

custom to the city of Frankford. By the translation of the Popes seate from Rome to Avignon, the French conceived no small hope to obtaine the Empire, as the Councils of PHILIP the father, the French King, and CHARLES of Vallois his brother did discover. For, having him in their power, who did arrogate unto himselfe a right to give the Empire to whom he pleased, they perswaded themselves that they should recover it by him without any opposition: Wherefore, when as they were to go to an Election after the murder of ALBERT, CHARLES of Vallois by his brothers aduice drawes an Army together, that he might wrest away the Empire, even in spite of the Popes, who although he were no enemy to the King, yet foreseeing that this alteration would be fatal to Italy, and to the Roman Hierarchie, he would not suffer it, but prevent the French.

The Pope being secretly advertised of his purpose (and being together with the greatest part of his Cardinals, of opinion, that if the French King were Emperour, he would by that means make himselfe Lord of all Italy, and so his patrimony should be oppressed, and brought to subiection, and that many other inconveniences would have ensued) by his Letters and Bulls enjoyned the Electors presently without any delay to chuse an Emperour, such a one as should be most fit for the state and common good: and they knowing his minde notwithstanding that they were solicited and urged to the contrary by the French King, by common consent chose HENRY Earle of Luxembourg, vpon the first day of Nouember, in the year of our Lord 1308: Wherein his brother BALDWIN Bishop of Treuire, and one of the Electors did greatly assist him. When his Election was published, and notice giuen to the French King, he was much discontented (for he desired himselfe to haue been Emperour) and much more after that he understood that the Pope had hastened the Electors, and had authorised them to make the Election; for which, afterwards grew some discord between them. The new chosen Emperour, well accompanied, went to the city of Aken, where with great solemnity hee was crowned; and thence sent his Ambassadors to the Pope, entreating him to confirme his Election: which the Pope gladly performed, inioyning him within the terme of two years to come to Rome, there to be crowned by his Legats.

This the Pope did to the end that the Emperour should haue endeouored to make peace in Italy, for there were then many factions and tyrannies; HENRY accepting these conditions, resolved to come into Italy, and began to provide for his journey, which neither RODOLPH, ADOLPH, nor ALBERT, his predecessors would doe; and to this effect called a Diet to be held in Spire, whither came (in a manner) all the Princes. At the same time new cares and troubles arose, besides his journey for Italy: the first was, that understanding that HENRY Earle of Carinthia, was king of Bohemia, and that the same Earle was in possession of the kingdom, the new Emperour (wanting none to incite him thereto) resolved to depose the said Earle, and to make one of his own sonnes King: whereupon he caused the daughter of WENCESLAUS king of Bohemia, and of the Emperour RODOLPH's sister, to be brought to Spire, and notwithstanding that she was four years elder then his sonne JOHN, yet he married him unto her, and with this title leuied an Army and sent him to the conquest of Bohemia, whither he was solicited to come by many of that Kingdom. At the same time also a second occasion of care was offered, which was, to leuie an Army and to send the same against EDWARD Earle of Wittenburgh, who being discontent with HENRY's election refused to come to his obedience, and being contumacious by the French King, took many townes in the Empire. The enterprise of Bohemia had good successe: for the said Earle hauing (as writeth HENRICKS MERICVS) raised a power to fight with the Emperour; and the two armies being encamped the one neere to the other, between them many notable skirmishes were maintained; but in the end the Earle of Carinthia, who was called King, was constrained to retire, and the Emperours sonne assaulted the City of Prague, which is the head of that kingdom, and taking the same, was therein crowned by PETER the Archbishop of Mentz; and his power presently so much encreased, that the Earle of Carinthia abandoning the Kingdom, went home into his own country; and the Emperours sonne JOHN remained King of Bohemia. If he sped well in Bohemia, the Army had no lesse good fortune, which he sent against EDWARD Earle of Wittenburgh, for the greatest part of his castles were taken, which (as saith NAUERVS) were fourescore: and in the end hee himselfe in the best manner that hee could, was constrained to compound, not without great losse of his estate; which notwithstanding after the Emperour was dead, he recovered againe.

During the time of these troubles, the Emperour forgot not within the time limited by the Pope to prepare for his journey into Italy (where, when his coming was certainly known, it caused so great feare, as though it had been a matter the like whereof had neuer been seene; for three score yeeres were now expired since that any Emperour had bene there, even from the time that FREDERICK the Second died there, who also was King of Naples: that time being spent in contention and discord in the Empire, by reason of the death of the said FREDERICK; and afterwards in the time of the Emperours ADOLPH and ALBERT, neither of them would euer come into Italy. The Emperour HENRY being in a readines to march with his Army, he first sent his Ambassadors to the Cities in Italy, and to their Gouvernours, giuing them to vnderstand of his coming, and of his Army, exhorting them to peace, and to lay down their Arms, for to that purpose he principally addressed his journey into that country; and he further required them to receive him and his Army into their Townes and Cities: His Ambassadors were very honorably received, and answered generally by them all: for as there were many factions and partialities, each party desired to win the Emperours favor: onely the Florentines holding themselves free (having bought their liberty of the Emperour RODOLPH, and being then very mighty, having at that time made a league with ROBERT King of Naples, and lying then encamped before Arezzo) answered the Emperour that they would not, that so wilke a Prince as he was, would come into Italy with so great a number of barbarous people, as it was said he brought with him, seeing that the Emperours office and duty was to take care to purge that country of barbarous nations, and not to bring them thither. And whereas he said that they should leaue to make war against the Aretines; they answered, that it also was against his Imperiall office, for it was his part to right wrongs, and to redresse injuries: and whereas those of Arezzo had banished the Guelphs from their houses, he ought to command them to be restored; and as for receiving him into their City, they would be auided and consider what ought to be done, and in time would answer him accordingly. The Emperour took this answer in very ill part: BLODVS, PLATINA, and others write, that DANTE an excellent learned Poet in that time, vnderstanding of his country-mens answer in his absence, said, that the Florentines were blind and saw not the present estate, seeing they had giuen such an answer.

The Emperour hauing past the Alps, the Earle of Sauoy and the Marquels of Monferrat came to receive him, and went with him to Turin, where he and his wife the Emperesse were quietly received: with him also came RODOLPH Duke of Bavaria, and LEOPOLD sonne to the Emperour ALBERT, who (as were his brethren FREDERICK, ALBERT, and HENRY) was called Duke of Austria: and the Archbishop of Treuire, with other Princes, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1312. At that time Pope CLYMENT called a generall Council to be held in the cite of Vienne in France, whither came three hundred Bishops, besides many other prelates, wherein the Begardes were condemned for heretikes. From Turin the Emperour came to Aste, whither came vnto him some principall heads and Lords of cities, offering him their seruice and to receiue him into their gouernments. And so came to him PHILIP who was called Earle of Paui; SYMON COLLVIANO of Bercelli; ANTHONY VISERRAGO from Lod; to all which cities, and to Turin and Aste, the Emperour sent his Lieutenants to gouerne in his name, who were receiued.

From Aste he went to Milan (the head and strength of all Lombardy) wherein were two houses & factions of great power: viz. the Visconti from whom descended the Dukes of Milan, and the Turriones which were of the faction of the Guelphs; and as these two were then of chiefest authority, so they sought to hinder the Emperours coming into their cite: so as there was a great tumult about the matter: but either party fearing that their aduersaries would ioyne with the Emperour, they both receiued him into Milan, and he made many of the Viscounts which were expelled by the Turriones, to come in with him: and the Emperour to content both parties, and to make them friends, to GUIDO TERRIO, he gaue the cite of Bercelli; and made GALBAZZO Viscount, his Constable of the cite; and left LEOPOLD of Austria with certaine companies of Germanes to keepe the cite in peace: CARION writes, that before the Emperour came to Milan, he reconciled the Turions, and the Visconti, inioyning them to liue with equal rights in their country which was now restored to their ancient liberty, and to be content with their patrimonies: but when at the Emperours entring into Milan, MATHIEV VISCONTI went on the right hand, and GUIDO TERRIO being commanded to go on the left, he grew discontented; and fearing the losse of his authority, and that his faction would be expelled, he flew to turbulent courses, causing a tumult in the City after the coronation of HENRY, so as the Emperour was in no small danger, but the losse fell vpon the Author.

The Florentines
answer to the Emperour
Henry the 7.

The Emperour
Henrick comes into Italy.

Henry Earle of Luxembourg chosen Emperour

The Emperour
Henry made his son John X.
of Bohemia.

The other cities of Lombardy vnderstanding that the Emperour was possessed of Milan, sent their deputies vnto him to offer him their obedience, and receiued such Lieutenants as he sent them: and so did those of the contrarie faction, excepting Alexandria and those which were further off, as Padua, Ferrara, and Bolonia, which being of the faction of the Guelphs, and in league with the Florentines, sent not to him. The Emperour within few daies after was crowned with the iron Crowne in Milan, which was wont to be done in Menza: for which and for other occasions, a certaine contribution of mony was leuiued in the cite, which (as they thought which paid it) was too excessive: by reason whereof and of the Germans ill behauiour, the people murmuring, took Armes against the Imperialists and fought with them; and the Emperour sending for his souldiers into the cite, Galazzo Viscount, head of that faction, vied a notable (though doubtful and dangerous) stratagem; which was, that he leauing his father in his house, together with the greatest part of his adherents, went to Leopold of Austria (who was with the Imperialists) and told him that Guido Tyrion and his adherents had caused that tumult, to make themselves Lords of the cite, as they already were: but as for him and his friends, they were still ready to doe the Emperour seruice in ought they should be commanded. It was an easie matter to perfwade him, who had all men in suspition, to giue credit hereto: and so Leopold and the Imperialists ioyning with Galazzo, set vpon Guido and the Turriones, who suspected no such matter, (yet armed and in order, expecting the issue of that tumult) and wounding and killing many of them, they draue them from the place which they had taken: and Guido Tyrion (surmising what the matter might be (seeing the Imperialists ioyned with his aduersaries against him) abandoned the cite, and in the best manner he could, with the greatest part of his faction, retired to Beregli: in this manner were the Turriones (who were of the faction of the Guelphs) driven out of Milan: wherefore as soone as this was knowne, some other cities which were of that faction, forsooke the Emperours seruice, amongst which were Crema, and Cremona, which presently by force thrust out the Emperours Lieutenants, together with the faction of the Gibelins: the like was also done in Brescia and in Parma. The Emperour leauing Milan vnder the gouernment and guard of the Viscounts, which (as he thought) had done him loyall seruice, marched with his Army against Crema and Cremona: but as soone as those of Cremona vnderstood that hee was entred their confines, without making any resistance they submitted, and yielded themselves and their cite, and the Emperour receiued them to mercie. But those of Crema suffering themselves to be besieged, were taken by force, and had the walles of their cite rased and dismantled, and the Emperour otherwise punished them for an example: whereupon Parma fearing the like, sued to him for pardon. But the Brescians trusting in the strength of their cite, chose rather to hazard themselves like those of Crema, then to follow the example of Cremona, and so had the like successe: the Emperour besieged them long, and many were slaine both of the besiegers and besieged, but in the end the cite was yielded to the Emperour; who commanded their gates and the most of their Bulwarkes to be thrown downe. By these two enterprises the Emperour wanne so great reputation, that the cities of Verona, Vicenza, Padua, and Trenigi, sent their Ambassadors, and entreating for peace, offered him their seruice, and to receiue any garrison that he should send them. His Ambassadors also which he had sent to Venice, returned, certifying him that the Venecians were willing to do what he required of them, which was, to furnish him with shipping to conuey his Army (if he pleased) to Rome.

The Emperour having taken order for the affaires of Lombardy, desired to see the cite of Genoa, and being there his wife the Emperesse fell sicke and died; and thither came to him Ambassadors from Robert King of Naples, and from Frederick King of Sicilia; both to desire peace and his friendship: but the request of the King of Naples was held for counterfeite for that he maintained three thousand horse in Tuscany, in fauour of the Florentines: & of Lucia, who pleading liberty rebelled against him; and to the end also to relieue Bolonia and Ferrara if need required. The Emperour dispatched them, some with fained, and others with vained kind speeches of loue and good will, according to their ambages; and within few daies after departed from Genoa by sea, and sent his Army by land, which making great spoyle in the territory of Lucia, came to Pisa, a cite at that time very friendly and much deuoted to the Emperours seruice, wherein hee was receiued with great ioy, and continued there aboute two moneths. There hee was aduertised of the estate of Rome, and how that therein were great factions and combutions, some desiring his comming, and others seeking to hinder the same. Those which fought to let his comming were the Lord John, who was brother to the King of Naples, who came thither with some troups, and with him came all the faction of the Vrins, and were seized of the Castle S. Angelo, the Capitoll, the Vaticane, and other Holds, and of all Rome beyond Tiber: against whom the Colonoi and their faction held the rest of the citie, between whom was daily skirmishing and slaughter of either side: for which, Pope Clement, by whose counsell and instigation the Emperour came into Italy, was much blamed: for it appeared that where he thought to haue established peace, he kindled warre.

The Emperour departing from Pisa towards Rome, and (for that he would not be pestered with the Florentines) taking his way neere to the sea side, sent the Earle of Sauoy before with part of his horse troups: finally, after some daies lay in Viterbo he came to Rome, where by the Cardinals Legates, and the Colonoi, he was receiued with great solemnitie; the Kings brother of Naples together with the whole faction of the Vrins hauing fortified themselves in such places as they had taken. The Emperour being entred Rome, how long he remained there, and what befell him, is not distinctly written: some say that he staid there three moneths, in all which time were daily skirmishings, the king of Naples sending valleys and souldiers vpon the riuer of Tiber to relieue his brother, who with the Vrins, held the Vaticane, and the Castle S. Angelo; and that the Coronation was deferred vntill they might send to the Pope to appoint the place wherein it should be solemnized, for it could not be done in S. Peters Church (for that it was held by the enemy) and that the Pope was in doubt to giue order for the Emperours coronation, for that many of his friends and seruants were of a contrary opinion. Others for lesse time, and write not that the Pope stood in any such doubt: but they all agree that the Emperour (for that he could not get into S. Peters Church) was crowned by the three Cardinals which were the Popes Legates in Rome, in S. John de Lateran; and that during the time he continued there, his people fought daily with the Neapolitans and Vrins, not only in the streets, but even in the houses also wherein they dwelt: during the time of which skirmishings he left Rome.

The Emperour being highly displeased with Robert King of Naples, leauing Rome went to Arezzo, which being at his deuotion was enemy to the Florentines and Lucois; whither all the Gibelins which were expelled Florence, Lucca, Siena, and other cities in Tuscany, repaired vnto him, and from thence he went to besiege Florence, in which siege many notable adventures passed: but the cite was with their owne people (together with the Sienois and Lucois which came to their aide) so well fortified and manned, that it sufficiently defended it selfe: whereupon the Emperour hauing lien six weekes before it, raised his siege, hauing first built a fortresse on a mountaine neere to the citie, wherein, and in other Castles and places of greatest importance, he left munition and garriisons to ouerrunne the Florentines cuntry, and to make warre vpon them; and so marching vp and downe their cuntry for the space of two moneths, in the end he went to Pisa: where vying more then ordinarie authoritie of an Emperour, he summoned Robert King of Naples to make his appearance before him, as before his Emperour and foreraigne Lord, and to answer to such matters as should be objected against him, for that hee meant to proceed against him, and to cause him, for such matters as he had attempted and done against him, aswell in Rome, as in other parts of Italy, to be indicted of treason. But King Robert making no account of this summons, the Emperour (lying at the siege of Florence) procured Frederick King of Sicilia (with whose sonne he purposed to marry his daughter) to make warre against him in Pulia: which Frederick putting in execution rigged a fleet, wherein he sent great forces, which began the warre. And in the meane time the Emperour left not to prosecute the warre against the Florentines and the other cities of their faction; and the Florentines seeing in what distresse they were, and fearing that the Emperour would the next Spring in person againe returne to the warre against them, sent to yeeld themselves subiect to the king of Naples (releuering certain preheminences and exemptions) vpon condition that he in person, or some other either his sonne or his brother should come to relieue them.

The Emperour having made his aboad in Pisa, many daies, in the midst of sommer (as writeth S. Anthony) departed thence very ill at ease; and passing through the territory of Siena (wherein he did much harme) he went to the cite of Arezzo; whither being come, and the time limited to the King of Naples expired, he pronounced sentence against him, whereby he deprived him of his kingdome of Naples, and releasd his subiects from the homage and allegiance which they ought him; and gaue authoritie to his enemy Frederick King of Sicilia, to make a conquest thereof for his sonne, and sonne in law, which should be, to the Emperour: which sentence, as soone as Pope Clement vnderstood, he presently protested the

The Turriones
driven out of Milan.

The Emperour crowned in Rome.

Florence besieged.

The Emperour summoned the king of Naples to appear before him in Pisa.

Robert king of Naples condemned by the Em-perour.

fame to be of no effect, alleging that the Emperor neither could, or had any authoritie to commend King ROBERT; for that kingdom was neither subject nor feudatorie to any but to the Church of Rome; as appeareth in the Clementines, in the chapter, Papalis de Sententia & re iudicia, and made other protestations contain'd in that chapter. With what leuitie the Pope did it, and with what impudencie he doth make other Kingdomes of the christian world subject to the Romane Hierarchie, the forme of the decree doth shew.

The Emperor departing from Arezzo, with a resolution to haue besieged Sienna, imagining that the Florentines seeing themselves on euery side oppressed, would haue come to some composition: and being by the way aduertised; that in Naples and in other parts of that kingdom after the publication of his Sentence pronounced against the King, were some Commotions and Insurrections against him: he thereupon with a desire to haue been reuenged of king ROBERT, and to haue made a conquest of that kingdom, resolved to goe thither with all his whole power; and coming within three miles of Sienna, he lodged his Army in a place called Monte aperto, where feeling himself ill at ease; (by the aduice of his Physicians) he went thence to the Bathes of Macerata, and then (feeling no amendment) went to Buonconuento, directing his journey towards Naples, whercon he had ferted his thoughts: all which, together with his other designs were made frustrate by his death, which thorough his infirmities overtook him in the same place; which happened upon the day of the Assumption of our Lady, he having the same day receiued the holie Sacrament of our Lords Supper, wherein (as some say) hee was poisoned by a Frier of the Order of S. DOMINICK, called BERNARDIN, and died thereof the same day: which was so wicked and so odious a fact, that a man would thinke that no Christian would haue committed, much lesse a religious man. The same Historians write, that the Pope vnderstanding that a religious man was accused thereof, wrote his Letters and Bulls by which he published him for innocent and not guiltie.

This Emperour died in the yeere of our Lord 1313. in the seuenth yeere of his raigne. Most authors which write of him, say, that he was a louer of iustice and equity, of a pleasing conuer- sation, amiable, valiant, expert in the wars, of an honest life, a deuout Christian and one that feared God: yet BLONDVS taxeth him of indifferencie, and couetousnes. He had by his wife the Emperesse one son and three daughters; his sonnes name was JOHN, whom he had already made King of Bohemia, and was likewise by inheritance from his father, Duke of Lutzelburgh. The eldest of his daughters called BEATRICE was married to CHARLES King of Hungary, brother to ROBERT King of Naples, who within one yeere died in childbed: the second was MARY, and he was married to CHARLES King of France, who also died in childbed: the third was married to RODOLPH Count Palatine of the Rhine. His body was carried to Pisa, and there with great lamentation solemnly entombed. The Emperor being dead there ensued a great alteration in all Italy, his Army was disperfed and came to nothing: and great and cruel wars ensued between the Florentines and Pisians.

There is so little written of the Emperors of Constantinople in these times, that it is hard to accord one History with another: what I can gather out of the authors is, that the Emperour ANDRONICVS, of whom we haue before made mention, by reason of his great age, made his sonne MICHAEL his companion in the Empire, who presently dyed, and left one sonne called ANDRONICVS, after the name of his Grand-father, who rebelling against the olde ANDRONICVS after six yeeres warre bereaued him of the Empire, causing him his life, and the Title of Emperor. This ANDRONICVS was called the yonger, and was a great warrior, and very valiant. He that will know more of this Emperour, let him read GEORGE MERULA in his seuenth and eighth books of the History of Adrian, and LEONARD AR- ETIN in his fourth book of his History of Florence.

THE

THE LIFE OF LEVVES, THE FIFT OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND SEVENTH

Roman Emperour; And of his Competitor,

FREDERICK.

THE ARGVMENT.

HENRY being dead, and much time spent before the Princes electors did meete, in the end they were diuided, and chose two Emperours, and each endeauoured to defend and maintaine his party by Armes. They both were Crowned, and all Germany was diuided into two factions; Frederick was fauoured by the Pope yet he would not confirme any of them. This diuision increased the troubles in Italy, wherein were long and cruell warres, and no lesse in Germany between the two Emperours, which fought a battail continuing 12 houres; at the end whereof LEVVES was Vittor and Frederick taken prisoner. LEVVES being sole Emperour he warred against the Pope, who excommunicated him: so that he was constrained to set Frederick at liberty; who together with his brother Leopold dyed shortly after. So as he remained without any rival, and without suspicion not without griefe, for that he was constrained to come into Italy, called thither by those of his faction, where ensuing many innovations, by reason of the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins. After many accidents hee came to Rome, where he was crowned by Stephen Colonna, hauing an intent to haue gone to Naples against his enemy Robert. Upon certain occasions he made a new Pope in Rome by whom he was absolved: which the other Pope in France vnderstanding, excommunicated him againe with greater vehemency, and the new Pope after the returne of the Emperour into Germany fell into the old Papes hand, and this Emperour could neuer agree with the Pope, neither could he be absolved from the Papes curse, so much were they incensed against him. And so the Electors fearing the Papes fulmination chose another Emperour, which was the occasion that Germany was again diuided. So as this Emperours raigne was in the beginning and ending after one manner: and he in these troubles, overcome with griefe, dyed suddenly, when hee had reigned in company and alone thirty three yeeres.

AFTER the decease of the Emperour HENRY (who died in Buonconuento and was buried in Pisa) the Princes of Germany which were with him, returned home with some part of his Army, for the most of his souldiers remained in Italy to get pay and entertainment in the warres, which were already begun, and as it seemed would neuer haue been ended; the rest were disperfed into sundry parts. But it was one whole yeer after his decease before the electors chose him any successor, by reason that it was long before they met, and also for that they could not agree in their election; so as (the Empire being without an head) there was in all things a great confusion, and the worst of all was, that in all their treaties and negotiations, they could neuer agree (as reason required) but were still diuided: at length meeting, it seemeth most of them made choice of FREDERICK Duke of Austria, for HENRY Archb.

Bbb 4

of

of Colein. ALBERT duke of Saxony, and VALDEMAR Marq. of Brandenburgh, though absent, by his Agent, took his part; all which were his consins-germans, his fathers sisters sonnes and Nephews to the Emperour RODOLPH, and RODOLPH Duke of Baviere and Count Palatine of Rhine, had promised him his voice: but JOHN King of Bohemia, PETER Archbishop of Metz, and BALDVIN Archbishop of Treuire, were so contrary vnto him, that thinking to get the voyce of RODOLPH Duke of Baviere & Count Palatine on their side (procuring also the voice of the Marquess of Brandenburgh deputy to that effect) they resolved by all means possible to make LEVVS Duke of Bavaria, Emperour: and eyther party was so obstinate in their resolution, that making their election with the accustomed solemnities, upon SVNS day, which was in the year of our Lord 1314, in steed of one Emperour, they chose 2. The K. of Bohemia, the Archb. of Treuire & of Metz, & NICHOLAS de Boco (who was deputy for the Marquess of Brandenburgh) chose LEVVS Duke of Baviere: And the Archbishop of Colein, the Duke of Saxony, and RODOLPH Count Palatine of Rhine and Duke of Baviere, to hold his word (notwithstanding that LEVVS was his owne Brother) chose FREDERICK of Austria, and so there was a diuision in the election; and either party maintained that he whom they had chosen, was and ought to be Emperour. LEVVS his party alleged that he was chosen by most voices, for of ieven he had foure. FREDERICK and his friends pretended that the Marquess of Brandenburgh proctor had falsified his authority, who bringing in writing the hand of the Marquess for FREDERICK, raised it out, and wrote LEVVS in the place; wherefore hee was the man that was chosen: So as all Germany, the Princes and Cities, was diuided into two factions, the one holding for the one party, and the other for the other: and from contrary of opinions, they came to blowes, and the warre continued betwene them for the space of eight or nine yeers, vntill it ended in such manner as hereafter you shall heare.

LEVVS departing from Frankford with the aide of those which tooke his part; went to the City of Aken, where he was crowned by the Archbishop of Colein: but for as much as FREDERICK could not get into it, (which was the right place) he was crowned in another Citie. The solemnity of the Coronations being ended, they could not send to the Pope for that the Sea had been voyde about two yeeres, through the death of CLEMENT the Fifth, but eyther of them sent to the Princes, Cities, and Potentates, signifying by their Letters and messengers, the equity of their causes, and to iustifie their election. And some being perswaded by the one party and others by the other, the most part of the Cities of the lower Germany as farre as Colein, held for LEVVS; and so did (in a manner) all Sueuia, excepting the City of Pime, and some Townes which were of the contrary faction: and in high Germany and in Switzerland, almost all the Cities held FREDERICK for Emperour; and either of the Princes Electors took his part whom they had chosen, and so they were diuided: yet the greatest part fauored LEVVS more then FREDERICK; but his brethren ALBERT and LEOPOLD did so assist him, that leuying an Army and taking the field, he besieged Smia in Sueuia, and brought it to such extremitie that the inhabitants sent to LEVVS for reliefe, who raised his whole power, and with the aide of the King of Bohemia, and the Archbishop of Treuire, came to free the City: FREDERICK being aduertised of his comming, went to meete him, and neer to the Riuer of Nechar, ioyned battail, where both the Emperours fought in their owne persons: and the battaile was so furious that it lasted the greatest part of the day, so as the darke night parted them without any appearance of victory; yet HARRICVS MVEIVS saith, that LEVVS lost more men then FREDERICK: and so FREDERICK returning to the siege which he had begun, LEVVS went to the City of Strausburgh which held for FREDERICK, and was recieued into it by means of the great priuiledges and exemptions which he gaue and promised them; which FREDERICK's brother LEOPOLD vnderstanding, hee raised a great power of his subiects and friends, and came to make warre against such as held for LEVVS, and encamped himselfe before Spire, whereof as soone as LEVVS was certified, he departed from Strausburgh and with his greatest forces went to seeke LEOPOLD, with a desire to haue fought with him before he ioyned with his brother; but FREDERICK made such speed that he ioyned with LEOPOLD before they could meete: Whereupon LEVVS not daring to fight with them both together retired, with some losse both of his people and reputation, resolving to make warre after another manner without hazarding any battaile, and so tooke his way into Baviere, to warre against his owne brother, for that he hauing chosen FREDERICK took his part, who, being expelled Germany, fled into England, where after some

yeers

yeers he died in banishment. His wife MARGARET, daughter to the Emperour ALBERT, remained in Austria with her sons, where she also died. Soon after, LEVVS called home his brothers sons, and restored vnto them Heidelberg with some other Townes: so as, according to the custome in ciuill discords, the beginning of the warre was the expulsion of his Brother.

This hapned in the year of our Lord 1310: and in the same year Pope IOHN the thirte and twentieth was chosen at Lions in France, after two yeers and oddemonths: that the seat had been void, who, presently coming to Auinion, fauoured the party of FREDERICK of Austria; but for that time he confirmed neither. The warre betwene these two Emperours (notwithstanding that in the space of foure or fve yeers the one fought not to giue the other battell) was so cruell and generally through all the Countrey, and betwene the Cities and some Princes, as the like had not been seen, whereof ensued many violencies and robberies by the high-ways: insomuch that for redresse thereof, the Cities of Strausburgh, Spire, Worms, Munich, and others, made a league, and agreed to raise certain companies of foot and horse to guard and assure the waies and passages for merchants and trauellers, whither soeuer they went. And so was Germany afflicted with combustions and misery, without any battell or exploit of Armes worth the writing betwene the two Emperours, vntill the year 1323; in which time what hapned in Italy, from the time of the Emperour HENRY the Seuenth vntill then, we will briefly relate; especially in Lombardy, being a matter concerning the Empire.

When the Emperour HENRY died, the Viscounts (from whom descended the Dukes of Milan) were so absolute Lords thereof, that they being no longer content with that City, MATHEVV Viscount, GALBAZZO and the rest, took Pavia and other cities; which they might easily effect, hauing the aid of the Germanes, which had been left there by the Emperour; they also taking part with the Emperour LEVVS: and as the Empire was diuided and in strife, LEVVS, to haue of his side so puissant a people and family, sent him Ambassadors and verie kinde and friendly Letters. But Pope IOHN being of the contrary faction, as soon as he was chosen, perswaded FREDERICK to send his brother HENRY into Italy; who, in hope that the Pope would haue confirmed his election, did so: But his going was to small effect, for hee came but neer to the City of Pavia, and from thence returned: for, as the Imperialists euer maintained the faction of the Gibelins, and the Pope the Guelphs; so he, for that he could not hold with both parties, returned into Austria: by reason whereof, the Gibelins preuailed in Lombardy against the Pope, and against King ROBERT of Naples, who were of the contrarie faction; insomuch that MATHEVV Viscount of Milan, being of the Gibelins, with the aid of CANNIS SCALIGER, Gouernor of Verona, purposed to haue taken Genoa, vnder colour to haue restored the SPINOLAS and the *DORIA*s, who were banished thence for that they were Gibelins (the Guelphs being of greatest power in that City) and sent his sonne MARK Viscount thither with an Army, who besieged the City; and aid coming to either side, the war was very sharp, and the siege was one of the most cruell that hath been seen; insomuch that the Genois, to obtain aid and succour, became subiect to the King of Naples for ten yeers. Before and after which siege there was cruell warre betwene the Pisans and the Florentines; the King of Naples assisting the Florentines; and other Princes and Cities, the Pisans: a matter too long to be related.

The power of the Viscounts daily increasing in Lombardy, the Pope, who was their enemy, sought a means to draw the French King to send his nephew PHILIP with an Army into Italy; which he did: and coming into Lombardy, many things hapned which I haue no time to relate; but the conclusion is, that he returned again into France, without doing any thing worthy memory. The siege of Genoa continuing, MATHEVV Viscount besieged Berelli, and took it, expelling the Turrones, who were his antient enemies: so as at this time the Viscounts were Lords and in possession of the Cities of Milan, Pavia, Placencia, Lodi, Cremoina, Bergamo, Nobara, Berelli, Terdona and Alexandria, besides others which were his confederates; as, Luca; and CASIRVCHO the Gouerner thereof, the Cities of Pisa and Arezzo, and the Marquess of Ferrara, a City belonging to the Church; and SCALIGER of Verona: against whom ROBERT King of Naples, the Florentines, the Pope, and all those which were of the faction of the Guelphs, waged warre. The siege of Genoa continued fve yeers, wherein many accidents befell both by sea and land; whither the King of Naples and the Pope sent three score gallies to the relief thereof: and in the end the City was not taken, but the siege was raised; and many matters befell which I cannot write, for that I am to return to my history of LEVVS and FREDERICK;

RICK;

Lewes Duke of Baviere, and Frederick Duke of Austria both chosen Emperours
by the Electors.

A battell between Frederick & Lewes

rick; both which were called, and pretended to be Emperors.

The eighth year being now expired since theſe two made warre; and FREDERICK pretending to make a conquest of the Country of Baviera, whereof the Emperor LEVVES was called Duke, and was in poſſeſſion (as Protector to his nephew, through the death of his brother RODOLPH) he levied 200 armed pikes, and a great number of other footmen which were his ſubjects, and of the King of Hungary, and other his friends: and therewith (being accompanied with his brother HENRY, and other Princes and great men, daily expecting the coming of his brother LEOPOLD our of Suevia to ioyne with him, with eight hundred men at Arms, and a great number of foot) he departed from Austria, and entered Baviera, wherein hee took Towns and Castles.

Being there for a time maſter of the field, his enemy LEVVES in the mean time was not idle; but of his owne forces, the Kings of Bohemia, the Archbishops of Treuer, and other of his friends which being abſent ſent their aid, he levied an Army containing about thirty thouſand foot, and about two thouſand men at Arms. With theſe forces he went to ſeek his enemy, with a reſolution to give him battell before that his brother LEOPOLD ſhould ioyne with him, which FREDERICK purpoſed to have deferred untill his brothers coming: but LEVVES came ſooner him, and gave him ſo many occaſions, that, contrary to the opinion of moſt of his friends, he reſolved to hazard a battell, and ſo vpon a morning, in the moneth of September, in the year of our Lord 1233, each of theſe competitors marſhalling his ſquadrons, and both the one and the other aſſuring himſelf that in the victory conſiſted the poſſeſſion of the Empire, with equal power and courage moſt valiantly beginning the fight, they maintained the ſame with great fury untill it was dark night; that Auctor which ſeteth down leaſt time, ſaith, that the battell laſted twelve houres: and in the end LEVVES hauing the victory, FREDERICK and his brother HENRY valiantly fighting were taken priſoners, and many others of great account were taken and ſlain.

It is written, that in this battell were ſlain foure thouſand horſemen, and ſo great a multitude of foot, that they number them not: ſo as the victors received no leſſe loſſe than the vanquiſhed. After this notable victory, the moſt of the Cities and Princes which held with FREDERICK (conforming themſelves with the time) yeilded obedience to LEVVES: and ſo he remained ſole Emperor, whom all men imagined would haue put FREDERICK to death; but he, receiving him to mercy, ſent him priſoner to the Caſtle of Triſſin. FREDERICK's brother LEOPOLD (who as I ſaid came to ioyne with him) vnderſtanding that his brother was overthrowne and taken, was wonderfully grieved, and the more, when he knew that if he had forborne to fight untill his coming, he might haue obtained the victory. This paſſion continuing in him, hee neuer left to moleſt the Emperor LEVVES during his life; fiſt procuring his brothers liberty, and afterwards in reuenge to execute the wrath and diſpleaſure which he had conceived.

In this manner LEVVES, by the overthrowne and imprifonment of his enemy FREDERICK, remained ſole Emperor: but he was not therefore free from troubles and warres; for, as he was choſen in diſcord and controuerſie, ſo his Raig (though of long continuance) was euer vnquiet and full of croſſes and troubles: wherefore the hiſtory of his time will be longer than ordinarily of others. When he had obtained this victory, he ſent an Ambaſſador to Pope JOHN the 23 (who then lay in Auinion) and deſiring him to confirm his election, yeilded apparent reaſon for the ſame. Pope JOHN, who had euer been his aduerſary, would not grant his requeſt, whereof FREDERICK's brother LEOPOLD was the principal occaſion, who leauiſg his eſtate of Austria to his brothers OTTO and ALBERT, came into France to the Pope to incenſe him againſt the Emperor LEVVES, and to intreat him to command him to reſigne the Empire, and to releaſe his brother: and thence he went to the French King to procure the like; in both which places hee found good entertainment and fauour: and they ſent their Letters and Ambaſſadors to the Emperor, requeſting and requiring him to releaſe FREDERICK, and preſently to ſet him at liberty: but he, making his excuſes, would not perform what they requeired; and knowing that the Pope was his enemy, he wrote his Letters of fauor, and ſent authority to MATHEW Viſcount, and to his ſon GALBAZZO, Gouerners of Milan and of other Cities in Italy, to gouern the ſame for him; and he ſent ſouldiers to them, and to others of the Gibelins.

The Pope being hereof aduertized (aſſembling many Biſhops in Auinion, together with his Conſistory of Cardinals, by the conſent of the French King, and through LEOPOLD's entreaty, creaty, which ſolicited the ſame) excommunicated the Emperor, and alledged for his reaſon, that he fauoured ſuch as were enemies to his Church in Lombardy and in Italy; and therewith aſſigned him the term of three moneths, within which, he renouncing the election which was made of him, ſhould appear before him, to anſwer to what ſhould be objected; and ſhould recall the forces which he had ſent to the Viſcounts in Italy, and other enemies to his Church. The Emperor LEVVES answered modeſtly, that he had ſworn at his election to maintain iuſtice, and therefore he had aſſiſted Galace in a juſt cauſe. Moreover, by the ſame oath hee was bound, that being choſen he ſhould perform the office of an Emperor. Therefore the election was made, that he ſhould be a true defender of iuſtice, and maintainer of peace in all his dominions; the defence whereof was recommended to the Emperor, and euery Power was bound by the word of God to do that which belonged to his office. Neither was the power to carry the ſword, giuen by the Pope, but by God: wherefore he maintained, that hee neither could nor would renounce the Empire which was giuen him from God; and if his anſwer would not ſaſiſie the Pope, he would appeal to a lawfull Councell: and when he publiſhed his reaſons and excuſes through all Italy, where at that time were moſt cruell warres made by the Popes Legates and Captains, and the King of Naples, againſt the Viſcounts, the Piſans, the Lucois, and other Cities and Princes Gibelins, whom the Emperor LEVVES fauoured and aſſiſted; whereof GEORGE MARYLA, LEONARD ARSTIN, ANTHONY and MADON D'ARVAL, haue written at large.

The hatred between the Emperor and the Pope ſo much increaſed through the inſtigatiſon of LEOPOLD of Austria, for that he would not releaſe his brother FREDERICK, that the Pope, meeting the French King, conſulted with him how he might depoſe the Emperor; and giue the Empire to the King of France: but the Emperor LEVVES was of ſo great power in Germany, that this parley took ſmall effect; neuertheleſſe, to pacifie LEOPOLD, and FREDERICK's other kiſmen and friends (taking FREDERICK's oath, and ſuch other ſecuraty as he could giue him, that he would no more take vpon him the name of Emperor, neither praſſe or procure the ſame) he releaſed him out of priſon, and ſuffered him to go at liberty into his Country of Austria, where heaſter for a ſmall ſpace liued in peace and ſorrow. Some write, that after three years imprifonment he was releaſed vpon theſe conditions, that it ſhould be lawfull for him to bear the name of Emperor while he liued, but not to ſuſtain any authority or iuriſdiction. HENRY his brother, who was taken priſoner with him, freed himſelf by the ſloring of certain Towns and Caſtles in Moravia, which the Austrians had in this warre taken from the Bohemians; and LEOPOLD, notwithstanding that he ſaw his brother at liberty, neuer deſiſted from moleſting LEVVES, but yet could doo little for the ſmall time hee liued; and both of them dying without iſſue to ſucceed them, with their death the controuerſie ceaſed.

LEVVES being freed from this quarrell with FREDERICK and LEOPOLD, and Letters coming daily to him from the Gibelins which took his part in Italy (ſoliciting him to come thither) and from the City of Rome it ſelf, hee with a deſire to rule and command, and to be crowned there, reſolved to go: wherefore, cauſing a Diet to be held in Spire, he gaue the Princes of Germany to vnderſtand of his reſolution, who, moued with his reaſons, conſented to his going, and ſome offered to ſerue and accompany him; and all, to aid him with men and money. And loeuſing an Army he departed out of Germany, carrying with him his ſecond wife called MARGARET, daughter to the Earl of Holland, and came to the City of Tuſcan (in the year of our Lord 1237, and in the thirteenth of his Raig, reckoning from the beghining of him and FREDERICK) where he ſtaied; for thither he had appointed all the Cities which were at his deuotion to ſend their Agents, to treat of what waſt to be done. Thither came Ambaſſadors from GALBAZZO Viſcount of Milan, and from his brothers, JOHN, MATHEW, LEVIN and STEVEN (for their father MATHEW was dead) and from the Marquiſſe of Monferrat, and from him of Verona, and the cities of Piſa and Lucca, and the reſt within Lombardy which were in league with Milan, and from many others; who, making great offers to aid and aſſiſt him with men and money, counſelled him preſently to march forwards; and he did ſo, and came direſtly to Breſcia, and thence to Milan, and there was crowned with the Crown of iron: where he ſtaied about thirty daies after his coronation: And from thence, as ſome ſay, ſending to entreat the Pope to confirm his election, and to abſolute him of his excommunication, hee ſtaied there longer than he thought to haue done, to get money to pay his ſouldiers: by reaſon whereof a greater contribution waſt to be ſeeked in Milan, and in other cities of the league, than they will.

A battell between the Emperors Lewis and Frederick, wherein Frederick was overthrowne taken

The Emperor Frederick ſet at liberty by the Emperor Lewis

willingly would have paid : and GALBAS Viscount, sometimes by en treaty, and sometimes by counsel, fought to have avoided the tribute which was to be leuied vpon his country : whereupon the Emperor made him, his sonnes and brothers, to be apprehended, and deposed them from the government of the City ; and, to win the good will of the people, and to shew that he gaue them liberty, he granted that they should chuse among themselves 28 Citizens and one President, which should haue the government thereof. With this bait hee obtained what hee desired, and the tax which he had laid vpon them : which deed (although it is written after sundry manners) was the cause of great alterations ; and that the Emperor was noted of ingratitude and excessive cruelty, so to deal with those who had called him into the country, although it cannot be denied but that they were Tyrants.

Having dispatched his businesse in Lombardy, he took his way through Tuscane towards Rome, by the procurement of CASTRYCHO, who was one of the most valiant Captains of his time, and commanding in Luca, maintained the warre against the Florentines, and against CHARLES the sonne of ROBERT King of Naples, who with a great garrison defended that City by his fathers direction, to whom it was becom subiect : and he carried with him CALBAZZO Viscount and his brethren, prisoners.

The Emperor, being come to Luca, was by CASTRYCHO receiued with very great ioy and solemnity : and from thence desiring to go to Pisa, the Pisans were in doubt whether they should receiue him or no ; but in the end he was entertained, and made his abode there about two months. During which time, CHARLES of Naples being with great forces in Florence, the Emperor refused to hould on his journey without troubling himself with him ; and being in Pisa, released GALBAS Viscount of Milan, and his sonnes, AZZO and MARK, vpon their oaths ; and at CASTRYCHO his intreaty, whose authority (gotten by his valour in Armes) was then very great : who afterwards were released from all, in such manner as you shall hear. The Emperor going from Pisa, accompanied by CASTRYCHO with 1500 horse of his own, went along the sea coast towards Rome, purposing (as some write) after his coronation to haue gone against the King of Naples, who was his great enemy : whereupon, as soon as the Emperor was come neere to Rome, CHARLES departing from Florence towards Naples to the aid of his father, left an excellent Captain called PHILIP CARNOTSENSE in Florence : and within short space after, this CHARLES dying (his father having no more sonnes) left two daughters.

The Emperours coming being knowne in Rome, caused great dissension and tumults ; but as the greatest part was willing to receiue him, and the rest to the contrary, in the end he was solemnly receiued : but his coronation, and who crowned him, where, and vpon what day, is diversly written ; which often happens among those which are present, much more among Historiographers : the truth is, that LEVVS was crowned in Rome by the hands of STREPHON COLONNA, who at that time was Vicar of Rome (an office and government then newly erected) yet LEONARD ARBTIN and ANTHONY say, that his son SARRA COLONNA crowned him, and that he was crowned against the will of the Pope or his Legates, yet with great applause of the people both secular and regular.

It is written, that being in Rome, the Emperor would not be crowned before hee had deliuered vnto the Cardinals and Bishops, and then vnto the Senate consisting of many worthy men, the injuries which Pope IOHN the 23 had done him, and had understood that they approved his cause and affection to the Common weale, referring the businesse to them, and promising to obseue whatsoever they should decree. He affirmed, that he did constantly beleue the doctrine of the Catholick Church, and did alwaies with a generall peace : whereto both the clergy and Senate answered, that they held that Pope IOHN the 22 had not done rightly, for that he had made decrees in to great a businesse without a Synod, or knowledge of the cause, and had followed them with excommunications, and therefore (knowing he was free from all false opinions) they would ioyne with him.

LEVVS being crowned, together with his Emperesse, he was called Emperor and Sempiternus, and the newes being dispersed ouer Italy, there repaired to him many chief men of the Gibelins : and he being very puissant, and accompanied by the valiant CASTRYCHO (of whom next to the Emperor was made chiefe account) to iustifie his coronation and his other actions in the iudgement of the people, maintaining that Pope IOHN the three and twentieth, who then was in Arimino, neither was, neither ought to be held for Pope, hee of his owne authority created one PIERRE de Germania, a Franciscane Friar, Pope ; which PIERRE (as was written PAVLIN) had been a married man, and in his wifes time took that habite : and he

The Emperor
Leues the Fifth crowned in Rome.

hee, accepting the Papacy, was called NICHOLAS, and made Cardinals and Bishops, and held a pontificall Court ; and the Emperor gaue him the obedience and honour, as to a Pope ; and being absolved of his excommunication, was confirmed in his Empire, and had else what he would desire : which was done against the will of many Priests & other regular persons, who therefore left Rome ; yet there were others which, approving the same, took part of the benefit.

When these newes were brought to Pope IOHN, he aggravating his censures and excommunications, proclaimed him for no Emperor, but a Tyrant and an Vsurper of the Empire. The Emperor being in Rome, the Emperesse bare him a sonne, called LEODOVICVS ROMANVS ; and making preparation to go in person against the King of Naples, hee practised with FRABERTICK King of Sicilia to do the like : but, staying longer in Rome than was expedient, it hapned that the Captain whom CHARLES of Naples had left with the garrison in Florence, together with the Florentines, surprised the City of Pistoia, which was at CASTRYCHO his deuotion, and in league with Pisa and Luca : whereof when CASTRYCHO (being then with the Emperor in Rome) was aduertised, he for feare to lose the rest, presently departed, and coming thither, found great resistance ; but in the end hee valiantly recovered the City. CASTRYCHO his departure from the Emperor made him so to alter his resolution, that, giuing ouer the enterprise of Naples, he departed with his Pope from Rome (wherein he left the best order that he could for his purpose, first establishing two Gouerners, one of the family of the Viscons, and the other of the Colonnois, which were called the Emperors Vicars) and then hee took his way towards Florence ; where when it was knowne that he was coming, all men were of opinion that he would haue taken that City by force, holding it not possible to bee defended, since that CASTRYCHO was in his seruice, against whom alone the Florentines could hardly make their party good : but it pleased God to dispose thereof after another manner ; for, CASTRYCHO (in whom he reposed his chiefe trust) died, and his death caused so great an alteration, that the Emperor by his death, and through the losse of many of his people, and also for that others mutined, resolved to return into Germanie, first placing his Lieutenants in Pistoia and in Luca, out of which he put the sonnes and kinsfolks of CASTRYCHO : such are the rewards which ingratefull Princes vse to bestowe vpon the children of those which haue done them good and faithful seruice. At the same time also died in Pisa, GALBAS Viscount (tyrant of Milan) deprived of that dominion ; and the Emperor for a great summe of money, gaue leaue to his sonne AZZO to return to Milan, which he promised the Emperor towards the payment of his souldiers before his departure, and left his brother MARK in pawn for the same. Coming to Milan, he was receiued with great affection into the same place and authority his father held ; and recouered in Milan the money promised, and deliuered the same to the Germans, sent by the Emperor ; who, forgetting to come therewith to Pisa, returned to their houses.

The Emperor leaving Pisa, resolving to continue his journey into Germany, left his Pope there behinde him ; who after, by the practice of one BONIFACE of Pisa, was taken and brought to Alimino, and coming in a priuate habit before the Pope, dyed in his power a prisoner. The Emperor passing through Lombardy into Germany, AZZO Viscount would not receiue him into the City, nor was the Emperor able to assault it. And so, leaving Italy, he left neither the peace nor the good government which he found there : but the City of Pisa, and others which had held for him, when he was gone, cast out his Lieutenants and Gouerners ; and the former tyrants therein, took mo Towns and Cities, most of which were Gibelins : and those of the house of GONZAGA then made themselves absolute lords of Manzonia, which they hold till this day.

It seems that the long continuance of their possession hath made their title iust & lawfull, adding thereto the confirmations made afterwards by Emperors & Popes after sundry sorts : and some Captains also had tyrannized ; as, GALEOTTO MALATESTA in Arimino ; MANFREDO PIO in Carpi ; RICHARD MANFREDI in Fanencia, and others in many other places. But for all this, the factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins was so rooted in Italy, that all the Gibelins which took his part presently solicited the Emperor for his speedy return : for, by his absence, the Guelphs, with the aid of the Florentines, the King of Naples and the Pope, warred vpon them : but the Emperor, being otherwise busied in Germany, could not return, though hee desired the same. But IOHN King of Bohemia by his direction leuied an Army and came into Italy ; who past many adventures which for breuitie I omit : in fine, he thinking to please both parties, was called Italies peace-maker : and hee procuring many parties with the Popes Legates, thereby displeased both the one and other party, as it ordinarily happens to those who seek to pacifie two contrary factions, and fell into suspition with the Emperour, but much more with communicated

The Pope
the Emperor.

the Lords of Italy: whereupon, Azzo Viscount Lord of Milan, MASTINO de la Scala, Lord of Verona, PHILIP GONZAGA Marquisse of Mantua, VEBERTINO di Carrara Lord of Padoa, the Marquisse of Ferrara, and some others, as ROBERT King of Naples, and the Florentines which vntill then had been their enemies, joyned together in a league and confederacy, promising that they would protect and defend the one the other against the whole world: for the which not only the Emperor, but the Pope also was very much discontented; and there ensued great changes & alterations in all matters and affairs in Italy, which I haue now time to relate.

The Emperor seeing himself excommunicate, and that the Pope desisted not from proceeding against him, perswaded all men that he was vniuſally accused; and fearing some alteration, with fair words, large gifts, and good entertainment, satisfied the Lords and Princes of Germany, seeking otherwise to be absolved, and some means of reconciliation, which was a matter almost impossible to be effected: for, the King of France, in whose country and (as we may say) power the Pope and his Cardinals then were, notwithstanding that the Pope would, yet he would not consent thereto; and so the matter continued till the death of Pope IOHN, which was in the year of our Lord one thousand, three hundred, thirty and foure, hauing been Pope 19 years and foure months: at which time the States of Carinthia and Tirol came to be vnitied to the house of Austria.

Matters being in such confusion as we haue declared, and Pope IOHN being dead, the Cardinal of Saint Prisca, whose name was IACOB, born in Tholouse in France, was chosen Pope; who was a Monk of the Order of CISTRAY, and was called BENEDICT the Twelfth. Being installed, he ratified and renewed the Sentence pronounced by his Predecessor against the Emperor; which he did so speedily, that it was thought to haue been done through the instigation of the French King: but within few daies after, the King desiring the Pope to make him his Vicar or Lieutenant General in Italy, and to giue him the tenth part of the Church revenues and first fruits throughout all Christendom (therewith to make a conquest of Ierusalem) he so much troubled the Pope with that request, that he made shew to be much discontented therewith; and began in secret to giue ear to the Emperors party: whereof he being aduertised, sent him a solemn Ambassage, praying and intreating him to absolve him, and to approve his election; whereto the Pope made a pleasing answer, and the matter was at the point to haue been concluded: but the Kings of France and of Naples (enemies to the Emperor) so terrified the Pope and his Cardinals, that he durst not perform it; so as the Emperors Ambassadors returned with good words of no effect: and the like hapned to the Ambassadors sent by the Princes and Cities of the Empire, the next year following. Whereupon, forasmuch as at that time there were great warres between EDWARD King of England, and PHILIP the French king, about the succession and right to the Crown of France, the Emperor entred into league with the King of England; so as there was great trouble and dissension betwixt the one & other party: but in the end the French King, seeking the Emperors friendship, promised to cause the Pope to absolve him, to the end that he should stand his friend; so as the Emperor, through the great desire he had to be confirmed in the Empire by the Pope, came to a composition with him. With this confidence in the French King, the Emperor sent his Ambassadors into France, the which, together with the Kings Ambassadors, went to Auinion to treat of the matter: but the Pope with diuerſe reasons so prolonged the conclusion, that it plainly appeared that it would take no good effect; which made the Emperor to suspect the King: for, it was held for certain, that the Pope would therein haue satisfied the King, as in many other matters he had done, even against his owne will; which was so euer as long as the Court of Rome remained in France, and is the reason why the Germane Historians, treating of the Emperors affairs, say, that the King of France made shew to desire that which he would not haue, and the Pope to haue that which he desired not.

The Emperor despairing to come to any agreement with the Pope, seeing that his Ambassadors returned without any such end or conclusion as he expected, returned to his former rigour: and assembling a generall Diet or Councell, he sought out learned men to pen his resolution; and finding such as were for his purpose (as Princes neuer want) after many matters treated of, he seeking to get the good will of the Princes, caused an injunction to be dispatched, wherein he affirmed the Sentence pronounced against him by Pope IOHN to be vniuſal and of none effect, and that his excommunication did no way binde him: wherefore he commanded, vpon great penalties, that no man should obey his interdictions and censures in that be-behalf, alleaging other matters contained in the said injunction, which the Popes friends would not should be revealed in any publicke history: which injunction (being published, and commanded to be obserued) caused great alterations in Germany, especially amongst the Clergy; some holding with the Emperor, others with the Pope. But DANTZ, a man at that time, of a most excellent wit and profoundly learned, wrote a Book called The Monarchy, wherein hee seemed to fauour the Emperor; for which he was afterwards condemned, and his Book held for heresie: and other great men wrote Books and Treatises defending the Popes supreme authority, alleaging the same to be aboue all principalities and powers; which (besides other reasons) they sought to proue by histories: as, how that Pope ADRIAN translated the Easterne Empire into the West, in the person of CHARLES the Great; and after, in proſeſſe of time, the Popes removed the same out of France into Germany, in the person of OTH the First; and how that many Emperors were excommunicated by them, yea and deſtroyed of their Empires; and how that the manner and authority to chuse them, was giuen by the Popes, and from them was deriued the power and authority of the Princes Electors; and that the Emperors were confirmed and crowned by the Popes. Yet there wanted not some which defended the Emperors cause; and so the Popes curses and excommunications were contemned and rejected; but hee knowing that the Emperor had published the said Letter against him, renewed the same; and imploring his whole power, alleaged the Empire to be void, and that the government thereof belonged vnto him vntill that a new Emperor were chosen, according to the declaration made by CLEMENT the Fifth in the Councell of Vienne. And vnderſtanding that the Emperor purposed to come into Italy, he did one thing which then was held for a point of wisdom, but experience teacheth, that it was very prejudiciall to his estate; which was, that he made those Tyrants or Princes which in Italy held the Towns of the Empire, his Vicars or Lieutenants in the same Towns they held; to the end they should be resolute enemies to the Emperor; and, commanding that they should neither receiue or obey the Emperor, gaue them power and authority to defend and maintain the same, as Lieutenants to the Church: which were, LYCHINO Viscount, Tyrant or Gouerner of Milan, and other Cities; MASTINO SCALA in Verona and Vicenza; PHILIP GONZAGA in Mantua and Reggio; ALBERTINO di Carrara in Padoa & other places; ORIZO da Este in Ferrara and Modena; and forasmuch as these were the Churchlands, he enjoined them to pay him yearly ten thousand Ducats of gold; with which tide they were the more strongly possessed of those estates.

This contention continuing between the Emperor and the Pope, there failed not some who vsurped the Popes Towns: to which, or to the most part of them, in requital of what the Pope had done to him, and to binde them to do him the better seruice, and the more to incense them against the Pope, the Emperor gaue and sent titles and charters, making them Lieutenants for the Empire in the cities and lands appertaining to the Church of Rome: which they accepted and held, and the of-spring of many of them haue continued therein vntill this day. Amongst which was GALEOTTO MALATESTA in Armino; ANTHONY FERRARANO in the City of Perlin; GENTIL VARANO in Camerino; GUIDO POLENTA in Rauenna; IOHN MANFREDO in Fauencia; ISMADETO in Sansouero; and NICHOLAS BOSCARO in Esso: and in like manner others had the government of, and continued by succession in, other Towns and Cities.

These matters passing in this manner in Germany and Italy, Pope BENEDICT being dead (who had held that sea the space of seven years and three months) in his place was chosen in Auinion, in the moneth of May, in the year of our Lord 1342, Pope CLEMENT the Sixth, in whose time were great alterations as well in the Cities of Lombardy as of Tuscane. The Emperor sought to come to some composition with the new Pope (as the Germane Authors write) but there was no peace to be expected: for, the Pope alleaged, that the Emperor sined not for peace in such humble and submissiue manner as he ought to haue done. But CYEPINTAN, NAVELERVS and MVCIVS write, that by means of the French King, who failed to be good mediator between them, the Emperor sent his Agents to Pope CLEMENT with full authority, to accept of any condition of peace that he would propound vnto them: to which the Pope gaue a certain note in writing, wherein they in the name of the Emperor were enjoined to confess the Emperor to haue erred, and to haue been a schismatick, and disobedient to the Church; and moreover, that the Emperor should presently renounce his right to the Empire, together with the possession thereof; and that he should not intermeddle therein without the Popes permission; and that the Emperors person, together with his sonnes, should be at the

The Emperor again excommunicated, and deposed by the Popes confutes.

The intolerable pride of Pope Clement the Sixth.

Popes disposing: all which Articles the Emperors Ambassadors accepted and granted in his name; whereat the Pope wondred.

These rigorous and terrible Articles and conditions being brought to the Emperor, he holding them for vnjust and intolerable, sent the copy of them to the Princes and Cities of the Empire; and therewith summoned a generall Diet or Parliament to bee held in Frankford, where with a graue speech he complained of the Pope, and shewed what his Ambassadors without his knowledge or consent had yielded vnto; alleaging these demands to be made but onely to ruinate the state of the Empire, with other matters which hee thought might cause greater indignation against the Pope, and moue the Princes the more to fauor his proceedings. And his words wrought such effect, and the Popes demands seemed so dishonest and intolerable, that they adiudging the same to be reiected and not to be allowed, made great offers to the Emperor for the defense of his person and estate: yet some were of a contrary opinion, who affirmed that the Pope ought to be obeyed, and that the matter ought to be referred to him, as it was sworn and promised. Hee which held this opinion, was IOHN King of Bohemia, and his sonne CHARLES, who were discontent with the Emperour for some other causes: but the Councell refused to send Ambassadors to Pope CLEMENT, to shew him that the conditions ought not bee performed, and so Ambassadors went: what ensued wee will soon tell you; which was, that the Pope holding himselfe for deluded, was so enraged, that hee againe proceeding against the Emperor, sent to all parts copies of the fulminations and censures given by Pope IOHN, with a relation of his offenses, including the same within the compass of heresie; and also that he had chosen and installed another Pope, and that he was not according to due order chosen Emperor, but by deceit and bribery; and that he neuer was Emperor, neither ought to be so called; and that he gaue Bishopricks and Prelacies at his pleasure, placing such as pleased him, and displacing such as were preferred by the Pope; and that he making marriages, dispensed like a Pope with such as were married within prohibited degrees of consanguinity, as he had done by his sonne LEVVES and the Countesse of Tirol, being allied vnto her within an vnlawfull degree; and the hauing an husband aliue, which was the sonne of the King of Bohemia: for which cause the Pope, sending his generall edicts against him, enioyned the Electors, vpon pain of excommunication, to meet and chuse a new Emperor; excommunicating all such as followed the Emperor LEVVES, or obeyed him. So as the Popes edicts, and the Emperors contradictions caused many infolencies and combustions in Italy and Germany. As the King of Bohemia and his sonne were his aduersaries, so they procuring the good will of the Duke of Saxony, and of the Archbishop of Colen, by bribes and large promises, fought to procure a meeting, and so to elect and chuse an Emperour. At the same time there were two which pretended to be Archbishops of Mentz, the one called HENRY de Viern (whom the Pope condemned and depriued, for that he defended the Emperors cause) the other was by name called GERRASS of Nassaw, whom the Pope had appointed to enioy the others place.

This GERRASS, to shew his authority, and to accomplish the Popes commandement, summoned the Princes Electors to meet in the City of Rens, in the year 1346: where met the Duke of Saxony, the King of Bohemia, the Archbishops of Mentz, Treuer, and Colen: and so by reason of the Popes decree, alleging the Empire to be void, they chose the King of Bohemia's sonne CHARLES for Emperour; LEVVES being then in Bavie, busie in leuying forces to stay the same. The new elect CHARLES would presently haue gone to haue been crowned in Aken, but could not: for, that City held for the Emperour LEVVES, and was sufficiently fortified, Pope CLEMENT being aduertised of the election of CHARLES (as a thing done by his commandement, and against LEVVES) presently confirmed and approued the same, and procured the French King to aid and assist him, which he promised to do with all his power: but in the mean time befell a strange accident which marred all; which was that shortly after, EDWARD the Third, King of England, came into France with a mighty Army: and PHILIP the French King raised his whole power to fight with him; whereof the King of Bohemia and his son CHARLES (newly chosen Emperour) hauing intelligence, they with more haste than good speed with all their forces came in person to his aid, the more to binde him to perform his promise to them against the Emperour: and they ioyning in battell against the English (which, as all Writers affirm, was very cruell and bloody, and continued fully six hours) the King of England in the end had the victory, and many great Personages of the vanquished were slaine. Amongst which was IOHN King of Bohemia; and the French King, and the new elect elect Emperour CHARLES escaped by flight. Through the losse of this battaile, the French King had so much to do to defend his owne countrey, that he could yeeld CHARLES no reliefe or succor at all against the Emperour LEVVES, which made his case the more doubtfull; but as he had the Popes fauor and the fauor of those which chose him, so was Germany diuided; some holding with him, others with the Emperour LEVVES: so as LEVVES his raigne ended as it began, with competencies and factions. But yet he forgot not to raise forces and to seek aid and friends, which with his life lasted but a while: but before we declare his end, I will briefly relate a strange accident that hapned in the city of Rome, which shall neither be impertinent, nor vnworthy to be related, which was this.

Rome at that time being gouerned in the Popes absence by two Senators, as the Popes Vicars or Lieutenants; one of which was of the family of the Colonnois, the other of the Visins; a certain man born in Rome of meane parentage, whose name was NICHOLAS RANZO, who being of a great courage and high minde, yet of no greater calling then a Notary publike, in such manner wonne the good will of the people, which repaired vnto him, that he perswaded them to recover the ancient liberty of Rome, which (as a man well read in Histories) he laid open vnto them, and was not ashamed to tell them that it was requisite, for the good of the common-wealth, to alter the manner of the gouernment, and to reforme and reduce the same to the ancient estate, rule and order: for seeing Rome was a free City and Lady of the whole world, they ought and were bound in duty to recouer her liberty. To these speeches together with many other to the like effect, the common people (as light of beliefe, and desirous of nouelties) willingly gaue eare; and he found such fauor and good liking amongst them, as gathering a head, he seized on the Capitoll, and without that any man durst make head against him, he depouled the Popes Vicars or Lieutenants from the gouernment, and intituling himself NICHOLAS SEVERVS (the fauourable Tribune of peace, liberty and iustice, the noble redeemer and restorer of the sacred Roman common-wealth) he made and ordained Senators, and settled the gouernment of Rome in such manner as it was in the time of the ancient Romanes, with so great obedience in all men, as if he had come from heauen for the same purpose. And he presently established such peace and iustice in the City, and made the same to be obserued in such manner, as the like had not been seen in Rome in 500 yeeres before.

The same whereof was presently spread into many parts, and all the Towns neere to Rome became obedient vnto him, and so did many other that were farre off: and all the tyrants and Princes hearing of so strange an accident, and of the title, and the enterprize which this man vndertook, sent Ambassadors to him, and making great offers, sought his fauor and friendship. And the matter was so carried in the beginning, as it seemed that in short space Rome would againe haue become Lady of a great part of the world. And as the report of such accidents is euer greater then the effect, so these news being carried out of Italy, such feare was generally that many altered their resolutions: And this NICHOLAS as a proud vaine man (nothing considering that vpon so weak and feeble a foundation he could not possibly build any great edifice) making Rome to be the head and Lady of all the World, he wrote his Letters with the aforesaid proud titles, to the Pope, requiring him to make his residence in Rome; and to the Emperour LEVVES and his competitor CHARLES, commanding them within a certaine prefixed time to make their appearance before him and the Roman Senate; and to shewe by what Title they held the Empire: The like hee wrote to the Princes Electors and to other Princes.

These Letters being seen and read (notwithstanding that they were held for vaine and frivolous) did put the Pope in a great perplexitie, feeling that Rome and the territory thereof in his time was vsurped. But this vanity continued not about seuen or eight moneths: for as it was grounded but vpon the fauor of the common people, so it soone waxing cold, and they repenting of what they had done, began to murmur and so to forsake him: whereupon he foreseeing his fall, departed from Rome, and went to CHARLES, the Emperors competitor: thinking to haue found fauor, and to haue made some league with him; but he caused him to be apprehended, and sent him to Aninion to the Pope, who commanded him to be detained prisoner: what end he had we will tell you, which truly is a pleasaunt discourse, as you shall see in the end, and so haue all the vanities of the world, although some last longer then others. What I haue spoken is written by BELONDVS, PLATINVS, NAVIGERVS, and all the Historiographers. PETERARCHA, in some of his Epistles affirmeth, that all the time that this man commanded, there was such peace and quietness, and iustice was so duly executed in Rome and in part of Italy, that that it seemed the Golden-age was come againe: wherupon hee made that excellent Sonnet which beginneth, Spirto gentil che quella membra reggi.

But now to returne to our History: Germany being thus diuided, some holding for the Emperour LEVVES, and others for the new chosen CHARLES, who was already King of Bohemia, this controuersie betweene these two was ended, through the sudden death of LEVVES, which happened vpon the seuen and twentieth day of September, in the yeere of our Lord 1347, in this manner: He riding that day ouer the fields on hunting, was taken with so cruell an Apoplexie, that he fell from his horse and died suddenly, when he had reigned 33 yeeres, the first time in contention and competency with FREDERICK, who was called Emperour: it was also suspected that he was poysoned by the widow of ALBERT of Austria, with whom he had been familiar. This Emperour hauing bin twice married, had six sonnnes, and one daughter, which from their father inherited sundry Lordships and estates. At this time the Geno-waics and the Venccians made most cruell warre one against another; the like did the English and the French. The Kings of Spain wholly applied themselves to warre against the *Moore*s.

In Constantinople reigned IOHN PALEOLOGVS, called CALOZOANNES, son of ANDRONICVS the younger, who had much to doe with CATACZENVS (whom his father left for his tutor) about the Empire; sometime the one preuailling, and sometimes the other: by reason whereof they both are accounted Emperours; but in the end CALOZOANNES PALEOLOGVS was sole Emperour, as hereafter shall be declared.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES, THE FOURTH OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND EIGHTTH RO- MAN EMPEROR.

(N^o X)

THE ARGUMENT.

Charles having no Competitor, went to subdue those Countreies which held with Lewes. Many were of opinion that the Empire was voyde wherfore some of the Electours met at Frankford, and chose successively two Emperours; which would not accept thereof. In the time of this Charles, was that memorable pestilence through all Europe; in Anno Domini, 1348, and the slaughter of an infinite number of Iewes. Afterwards the Electours chose one Gunther for Emperour, who coming against Charles dyed before any battaile. Charles having made an accord with the Electours which were his enemies, was freed from all his competitors; and came afterwards into Italy to be crowned where he behauid himselfe with such humanitie, as there was no Lord or Common-wealth that did not acknowledge him for their Emperour: and contented to pay his Souldiers, he giving priviledges to sundrie Cities in Italy; hee returned into Germany: wherein he maintaining peace and iustice, hee freed to make his eldest sonne Wencellaus King of the Romanes, which he obtained for money. After all these things failing like hee dyed, when he had valiantly raigned two and thirty yeeres.

Then the Emperour LEVVES died; his Competitor CHARLES (who in his lifetime was called Emperour) was in his kingdome of Bohemia; and as soone as he was certified of his death, with the greatest power he could raise left his kingdome, to make himselfe Lord of such townes as held for the deceased Emperour LEVVES: and comming to Ratisbone he was therewithout any contradiction received as Emperour; and thence went to Nuremberg, and had there the like reception; and generally in all the other cities whither he came; for he released all the actions which he had against them, and promised to procure the Pope to absolve all those which had continued in the service of LEVVES: but he afterwards comming to Basil, they would not receive him, except he first obtained for them the Popes pardon, and a release from all the curses pronounced against their citie, for that it held for the late Emperour: and while as they treated hereof, there came a Legate from the Pope, who hearing that LEVVES was dead, sent him to CHARLES with authoritie to absolve them and all the rest. And although that in this citie and in others theie was great contention, about the oth and the forme of the confession which the Pope had commanded to be made before they should be absolved; yet in the end absolution was given, and the Emperour with great solempnie was received into the citie, and into some other places. And notwithstanding that in the beginning he had so good successe with some cities and Princces; yet with many of the rest he sped not so well: for those which had continued firme and loyall to the Emperour LEVVES, and had been enemies and made warre against CHARLES, would not accept him for Emperour; but holding the Empire voyde, pretended anew election to be made, especially those Electours which contented not to his election; which were HENRY Archbishop of Mentz, (whom the Pope had depriued, and in his place set GERLASS of Mussaw) LEVVES Marquels of Brandenburg, ROBERT Count Palatine of Rhine and Duke of Baviera; al which pretended that CHARLES his election was neither lawfull, nor of any validtie, for that it was not made in Frankford; and also for that the estates were not assembled by the Count Palatine, neither were they present, or sent their Agents or Proctors: all which things (they said) were requisite in a lawfull election: and HENRY the new Duke of Saxony and some cities ioyning with them, alleged also that those which chose him were corrupted with money by CHARLES and his father IOHN King of Bohemia; and also that he was not crowned in Aken as hee ought to have been. For which causes (although in my opinion the greatest was the spleen and hatred which they bare him) in the beginning of the yeere 1348, the aforesaid Princces met in the citie of Frankford (notwithstanding that CHARLES used all his power and policie to haue prevented the same) where declaring the Empire to be voyde (the Bishops of Colem, Treuer and the other Bishop of Mentz being absent) by the common consent of those which were present, they chose the king of England (for that he was descended from the Germane blood) for Emperour; to whom they presently sent their Ambassadors to the same effect: but after that hee had well considered of the matter, refusing their offer, he sent to them, desiring to be held excused: And they seeing themselves frustrate of their hope, chose FREDERICK Marquess of Misia, who was a man of great judgement and very valiant; who standing in doubt whether he should accept it or no, and considering well thereof (for CHARLES being thereof aduertised, to the end that hee should not accept this election, sent him a great summe of gold and silver; and therewith gaue him to vnderstand of the inconueniences that would ensue) made the like answer as did the King of England: so as for that time without agreeing vpon any other, these Princces still continuing disobedient to the Emperour CHARLES, departed from Frankford not choosing any Emperour at all.

The chiefest cause of their departure was the plague in that country, which in that time was so great and so vniuersall through all parts of Europe, that the like thereof before that time had neuer beene seene nor heard of: for Historiographers affirme that it continued about one whole

ccccc

yeere,

Edward III
King of England being chosen, refused to be Emperour.

Generally plague through all Europe.

yeere, beginning in the year one thousand three hundred forty eight, and ending in Ann. 1350, which raged in such extreme manner that where it did least harme, the tenth person escaped not.

BLONDVS saith, that he heard his grandfather GASPARD BLONDVS affirme with an oath, that many townes in Italy were therewith so dispeopled, that not any one remained therein alive. During the time of this calamity, there was a general peace, so as not any could or durst make warre against other, except a little which was made against the Synagogues of the Jewes: for the common people took a conceit, and it was firmly beleevued, that the Jewes had poisoned the waters, and caused this plague; whereupon (the Princes and governors being no way able to prevent the same) the Jewes were every where torne in peeces, and an infinite number of them were by the Christians sacked and robbed, in France, Italie, Germany and Spaine. At this time also the French King gat the Countrey of Daulphine, and the City of Vienne the head thereof; which doe now belong to the Princes of France; which was given him by HENRY, Daulphin of Vienne, having no heire to succede him; vpon condition that the eldest sonne of France should be called Daulphine of Viennois.

In the yeere 1350, our Lord mitigating his ire, and the plague ceasing, Pope CLEMENT this yeere by the consent of his Cardinals ordained that the Iubile which Pope BONIFACE the 8. had granted to be held in Rome every hundredth yeere, should be held that yeere; and therefore every fiftieth yeere, considering the shortnes of mans life; so as an infinite number of people repaired to Rome to the Iubile. After the danger of the plague was past, men presently being free from the feare thereof, returned to their wars and deffension; principally the aforementioned foure Princes Electors, HENRY Archbishop of Mainz, LEUVIS Marques of Brandenburgh, RODOLPH Duke of Baviere and Count Palatine of Rhine, and HENRY Duke of Saxony: all which rebelled against the Emperor CHARLES, and stood vpon their guard; and the one aiding and assisting the other, they againe met at Frankford, and after many consultations, chose GUNTHER Earle of Swarzenburgh, who was an excellent and very valiant man of war. This man with the aid of those that chose him, and of his friends and kinsfolks, with a great number of very good men of warre, came to Frankford, where attending his enemies coming, he kept the field the space of fixe weekes (for so they write was then the manner of the new chosen Emperors). That time being expired, he was receiued into the city, and sworn and obeyed for Emperor. And notwithstanding that the Emperor CHARLES had leuyed a very great power, yet being unwilling to hazard his whole fortune in one battaile, he would not fight with GUNTHER: but all the Princes of his faction, meeting in the City of Spire, it was concluded that he should employ his whole power to make head against GUNTHER, and by force of Armes defeat him.

With this resolution the Emperor CHARLES with his Army took his way towards Mentz, and the one drawing neere the other, the war began between them, which men thought would haue proved very terrible and cruell: but through the death of GUNTHER, peace ensued: before which time some write it was concluded; for as soone as GUNTHER fell sick, some vnpassionate Princes sought to reconcile them: the conditions of the peace were, that GUNTHER should renounce the Empire to CHARLES, and that CHARLES should give him two walled Cities in Turinge, together with their confines: But in the time of this treaty (as most writers affirme) GUNTHER died, poisoned by his Physicians who being to give him a purging potion, and taking but the assay of it, died together with GUNTHER the next morning; which made men to thinke, that without the knowledge of the poore Physician, poison was put into the decoction; so as GUNTHER dying in the time of the peace, CHARLES remained sole Emperour, and in good sort compounded with those which were his aduersaries, who being weary of choosing Emperors, the controuersy ended, to the contentment of all men. And for as much as the plague was in Aken, he was with great solemnity crowned in another city; and going afterwards in his progresse, he visited many Cities, to which he gave sundry priuileges.

In time of this prosperity he had a sonne whose name was, WENCESLAVS, of whom we shall haue cause to speake hereafter: and he applying himself with great care to maintain peace and justice, there yet rested for him to goe to be crowned in Italy, whereof Pope CLEMENT the sixt was very desirous: but in his time it could not be, for he died within few daies after. At this time the Viscounts hauing made themselves Lords of Milan, were of great power in many other Cities, the chiefeft of which was JOHN Viscount Archbishop of Milan, a man feared through through all Italy; who by the Popes permission vnder the title of his Vicar, or Lieutenant, made himself Lord of Bologna, for which he was to pay yearly 12000 ducats of gold. Pope CLEMENT being dead, INNOCENT the sixt was chosen; This Pope sent for Legate into Italy the valiant Cardinal GILES, a Spaniard borne, who was called DON GIL CARILLO ALBORNOZ, who by his great witt and valour, comming twice into Italy recovered all the Cities and lands of the Church which had been vsurped by tyrants: in the beginning of whose Papacie was fought the memorable battaile by sea betweene threefoore galleys of the Genowaies, vnder the command of PAGAMO DORTA; and fourefoore of the Venecians, the Kings of Aragon, and the Emperours of Constantinople, who were in league together against them; which battaile was fought in the streight of Constantinople, and lasted from the break of day vntill the euening, in which the Genowaies had the victory, but with losse of many of their people: and the yeere following which was in the yeere 1354, the Venecians and Catalonians repairing their fleet, againe fought with the Genowaies, neere to the Ile of Corsica, wherein the Genowaies were so pitifully ouerthrowne and with so great losse, that one and fortie of their galleys, with all the men in them, were sunke in the sea; by means of which ouerthrow their power was so much weakened, that they became subiect to JOHN Viscount Archbishop of Milan, vpon condition that he should protect them; yet there ensuing other alterations, they afterwards committed themselves to the protection of the French King.

At this time also was atreacy betweene the Emperour and the Pope, concerning the Emperours comming into Italy to be crowned in Rome, he making preparation for the same. There befell in Rome also another great accident, although not so much spoken of as that of NICHOLAS RENZO who would haue raised Rome to her ancient state and dignitie, and was called the Enfranchiser of Rome: which was, that another Notary called FRANCIS VARONCELLO, imitating the said NICHOLAS, incensed the people, and with the same title of Roman Tribune, depose the two Senatours, JOHN VRSINO, and PETER de Colonna, who governed as the Popes Vicars: whereof the Pope being aduertised, and fearing that the matter would haue growne of importance, to auoid a further inconuenience, he thought it best to release NICHOLAS RENZO, whom his predecessor CLEMENT had left in prison; and thinking (as we say) to driue out one naille with another, sent him to Rome against FRANCIS, who vfed such meanes, through the helpe of the Romane Nobilitie, that by force hee expelled FRANCIS VARONCELLO out of the Capitoll and slew him in fight: but after this victory, the said NICHOLAS with a desire to vsurpe, persequing the Connoisall fell at variance with the principal men of Rome, and in the end was slaine; and so Rome was deliuered from both the one and the other: and then one GUIDO IORDAN (by the Popes consent) was made Governor, and afterwards there were two.

While these matters were in hand, it was agreed between the Pope and the Emperour (as write the Italian authors) that as soon as the Emperour should be crowned in Rome by Cardinals, without making any longer stay, he should returne into Germany. The Emperour and Empresse accompanied with many Princes and a great Army, in the yeere 1355 came into Italy, with intent onely to be crowned, and to fauour and further the Popes proceedings, which hee did accordingly, which made his iourney easie: for being come into Italy and leene to vie no violence, or to oppress any man, neither to deprime or dispossesse any man of his goods or lands, he was very honorably receiued by the Lords of Carrara in Padua, and afterwards by the GONZAGAS in Montua, and by those of the house of ESTE in Ferrara; and by the Viscounts in Milan, and by the most of the Lords of Italy, which did him homage, and acknowledged him for their Emperour; and he left them in their lands and estates: and comming to the city of Milan he was crown'd there with the Iron Crown; and from Milan went to Pisa; whither came Commissioners to him from Florence; and from many other cities, who acknowledging him for their Emperour, and suing for peace and his fauour, furnished him with money for the payment of his souldiers; and so departing from Pisa, he went peaceably to Rome, where they attended his comming, and was solemnly receiued by the Cardinals Legats which came to crowne him, together with the Senators, the Popes Vicars, and with all the Clergy and Romane people: and on Easter day, which was the morrow after his comming, hee together with his wife the Empresse, was after the accustomed manner by the aforelaid Cardinals crowned with great pompe. His coronation being ended, as he came in peace and quietly, without offending or giuing any man, so he departed from Rome, contenting himselfe with their seruice and the money which they had giuen him, which (some write) amounted to a very great summe; and so he returned into his countrie, more peaceably and with lesse tumult, then ever any Emperour that came into Italy before him had done. Being in Italy he favoured Don Giles Cardinal of Albornoz who recovered the patrimonie of the Church.

A small battaile between the Genowaies and the Venecians.

The Emperour Charles came into Italy.

Gunter Earle of Swarzenburgh chosen Emperor against Charles King of Bohemia.

The golden Bull made by Charles,

At this time King John of France being in a battaile taken prisoner by the King of England; after foure yeeres imprisonment, was vpon certaine conditions of peace set at liberty. This King had by inheritance the Duchie and Countie of Burgundy, which after his decesse he gave to his second sonne Philip, whose offspring enjoyed the same; from whom lineally descended the Emperour Charles the Fifth, by his grandmother, who was Lady of that estate. What ensued after the Emperours returne into Germany is briefly and confusedly written, and the Annales of Germany treat of some matters of small importance, and that very preposterously; wherefore I will write onely what shall seeme most agreeable, vntill we come to the end of his life. First, this Prince is commended for his wit and humanitie, and to haue been discrete and iust in administering iustice, and to haue been learned in the tongues, and wel seene in history, and indifferently well in other Arts and Sciences, whereof he made no small benefit in his actions. CARION writes, that after the Emperours returne out of Italy, he called a famous assembly of Princes in the Cities of Mentis; where the matter being wisely discuss with the cheefe orders of the Empire, for the contracting into one, and reducing into order, the antique and moderne institutions concerning the Maiestic and honor of the Empire, and of euery one in particular, he made a law which is famous by the name of the golden Bull, comprehending certain orders to be obserued in the Emperours election, and prouiding for the power, authority, and dignitie of all orders: which worke of his was very commendable, for that hath been a firme bond of publike peace. By this law he did strengthen the Maiestic of the Empire, and did cut off all occasions of dissension in the election; by this he did so bind the Emperour and Princes, as no man durst attempt any thing to the preiudice of the Common-wealth or Emperour. And as he was much affected to his countrey of Bohemia, so (as Pope Pivs Quintus and other authors write) in Prage he erected sundry stately edifices; and made the Church and Archbishopricke of that citie a Metropolitan, exempting it from the Church of Mentis, and erected an Vniuersitie in that citie, wherein Arts and Sciences were read; and all his whole life time he had so great a care to adorne that citie and kingdome, that the rest of Germany murmured against him for it, and so doe the Historiographers which write thereof. In those daies some sedition and tumults arose in the citie of Nurembergh, which in the end he pacified, although with some difficultie. It happened also that Edward Earle of Wittenbergh made an Insurrection against this Emperour, and had a great Army and many followers; but all was pacified, and Charles reigned peaceably. In the yeere following, which was in the yeere 1362, died Pope Innocent the Sixt, and in his place was chosen Cardinal William of S. Victor, a Monke of S. Bennet's order, and was called Urban the Fifth.

This Pope hauing resolved to come into Italy, the better to secure and settle his estate he sent to entreate the Emperour to doe the like; which he chiefly did, for feare of the Viscounti Lords of Adilan, and of the greatest part of Lombardy, which the Emperour at his entreatie performed: at which his coming I finde it not written that he came by Milan, for that Barnaby and Galeas Visconti were not his friends; but he took his waie by Pados, and from Pados to Bohemia, and thence to Pisa, and so to Rome, where he found the Pope: what they did there, I finde not written, either through negligence or for that it little imported; one thing Blondy, Platina, and others report, that it was vnknewe what was become of the heads of S. Peter and S. Paul, and that the Pope and the Emperour made great search for them, and at last found them and set them where they stand (as they say) this day. After this, the Emperour hauing been but three moneths in Italy, returned into Germany; and after his departure the Pope went to Marfelles in Provence in France, and thence to Auinion where he died; after whose decesse Patrice de Belfort Cardinal of S. Mary the new was chosen, and called Gregory the Eleueenth.

The Emperour in the same yeere summoned a Diet to be held in the citie of Frankford, where after many practices, he entreated the Princes Electors to make his sonne Wenceslaus, King of the Romanes, and his successor; which was not onely solicited by entreatie, but by great gifts and large promises; which were so excessiue, that (as Pivs Quintus writteth) he promised an hundred thousand Ducats to euery Elector: and as the summe was greater then he was able to pay, he gaue in, pawne for the same many townes and lands of the Empire, which they hold vntill this day. This they write to be the cause of the weakening of the Emperours power power which were his successors; which Albert Crantz also confirmeth in his History of Saxony, alleging that this Emperour morgaged sixteen Imperiall townes in Suenia to the neighbour Princes, which, together with the imbecillity and benefits of his son Wenceslaus who succeeded him in the Empire, so decayed and weakened the power of the Emperours in Germany, that they neuer recovered their former vigour: this was imputed to haue been a great oversight in so wise a Prince, notwithstanding that in all his other actions he gouerned with great policy and wisdom. Yet many imperiall cities, through sundry accidents which happened, without his commandement or leaue, made war vpon the Earle of Wittenbergh, which war continued many daies, and many were slain of either party: wherewith the Emperour being much displeased, and fauoring and assisting the Earle, he besieged the city of Vime, where he punished some for examples sake.

In this meane time, some cities in Italy belonging to the Church of Rome, discontent with the government of the Popes Vicars or Lieutenants, rebelled against him: Whereupon, the Pope knowing the great preiudice which his Church recieued through his absence, resolved to returne with his court to Rome: for which purpose (vnder another pretext) in the yeere one thousand three hundred seuentie six, he caused certain gallies to be rigged and armed in the river Rodanus, wherein embarking himselfe he sailed into Italie: and so the Papall court after it had continued in France the space of threecore and ten yeeres and somewhat more, and the most part of that time in the city of Auinion, returned to Rome.

The Emperour hauing reigned now 32 yeeres, and being busie in pacifying the cities in Germany which warred against the Earle of Wittenbergh, was in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand three hundred seuentie eight, taken with an infirmity, whereof he dying, left two sonnes legitimate; the eldest of which was called Wenceslaus, who was already King of the Romanes, and succeeded his father in the kingdome of Bohemia by inheritance, and in the Empire by election: the others name was Sigmund, who afterwards by the right of his wife was king of Hungary, and in procelle of time came to be Emperour.

Some Authors write of the Emperour Charles, that he had been worthy of praise, if he had not more affected Bohemia and France then the Empire, if he had not been more carefull of his owne private interest then of the publike; and to aduance his posterity, then to enlarge the Empire; if he had not been more greedy of money, then to do what was right and iust, and if he had not both in Germany and Italie, diminished the dignity and wealth of the Empire, alienating kingdoms and the publike reuenues, selling Immunities, and granting liberties: wherefore the Empire being spoiled of many ornaments, his posterity did not raigne long, but was unfortunate, and in the end fell; but yet he may not be deprivied of his due commendation, for the constitution which he made, which was very beneficiall to the common-wealth.

Touching the Emperours of Constantinople (of whom I am bound to make some mention) I finde so great confusion in the Histories of those times, as there was in that Empire; wherein were factions and warres; but in summe, in the time of Charles the Fourth in Germany, the discord in Constantinople between John Paleologus Caloianus, and his father in law John Catacyzenus (both which were called Emperours) was the cause that Amrath King of the Turks (having taken all that the Christians held in Asia) vnder color to help and succor Catacyzenus, passing Hellespont, came into Europe, and took Gallipoli, and other cities in that coast, and afterwards the city of Adrianople: and he passing forwards, there came against him Lazarus Despot of Serbia (which in antique time was called the vpper Misia) and Mark Despot of Bulgaria (which is part of the antique lower Misia) and many other Princes; which in a battaile about the yeer of our Lord 1363, being overthrown, Amrath became Lord of a great part of the Christians lands in Europe, and his sonne Baiazeth succeeding him conquered more; and so the Empire of Constantinople daily decreased. And afterwards in the time of the Emperour Wenceslaus, Caloianus being now old, and hauing dispossessed Catacyzenus, dying, a son of his called Manuel Paleologus succeeded him.

The first coming of the Turks into Graecia.

THE LIFE OF WENCESLAVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND NINTH RO- MAN EMPEROR.

(,)

THE ARGVMENT.

If I seldom hapeth that the sonnes imitate their fathers goodnesse, chiefly among Princes, but Wenceslaus would vnto this rule in himselfe: for being without any contradiction to his father, he pleased to imitate his father in goodnesse, that he left of himselfe as much infamy, as his father did glory: Neither did he pacify the wars which in Germany were kindled in his fathers time, but suffered them to proceede, which was the cause of much misery in that country. In his time began the great schisme which continued forty years. The Turke in his time made great conquests vpon the Christians: and Iohn Galeas made himselfe in his time Lord of Lombardy. The Electors seeing the small care that this Emperor took so becomingly for the defence of Christendome, to set his hand to the good government of the Empire, especially in the affaires of Germany, and that he led a base and a licentious life, deposed him, as unprofitable and of no worth. When he had vnworthily reigned Emperor two and twenty yeers, he afterwards died a private Lord.

Although that the desire to come to an end of this History (being neer thereunto) doth incite me to make haste, yet there are so many matters to be written of, and modern Historiographers haue so copiously set down the same, as I am constrained (euen against my will) to prosecute the remainder more at large; wherein I presume to be held excused, for the pleasure and profit which the Reader shall receive thereby: wherefore to auoide prolixity, I say, that WENCESLAVS King of Bohemia, and eldest sonne to the Emperor CHARLES the Fourth, succeeded his father in the Empire, who proued very vnlike to his father; for he grew to be vicious, and of little worth. It is written of him, that he had nothing in him like vnto a man, but the forme, and that was crooked and deformed, more like to THESITES then a Prince. He was dull witted, basely inclined, affecting nothing but pleasures, not caring for the Commonweale nor any honesty: A coward and very cruell, Of a lazy body, fit for nothing but the pleasures of gluttony and filthy lusts, if they may be called pleasures: But yet in the beginning, as he was yong, and men were in good hope of him; being chosen in his fathers time King of the Romanes, he was presently without any great contradiction obeyed for Emperor, and was so two and twenty yeers, and in the end lost it, as you shall heare.

His brother SIGISMUND being of more spirit, and fifteen yeers yonger then WENCESLAVS, LEVVS king of Hungary married him to his daughter (who was also by his mother ther King of Poland) and thereby SIGISMUND came afterwards to be King of Hungary, as we will declare, of whom in the History of WENCESLAVS we shall make especiall mention, for in proceesse of time he came to be Emperour; for by reason of the insufficiency of WENCESLAVS, little is to be written of him: so as of these two and twenty yeeres that he held the name of Emperour, the least that is to be said, is of him; but yet neuertheless passing it vnder his name, we will briefly relate what passed in the countries subiect to the Empire in his time, wherein he should haue borne the greatest sway, if he had not been so base and negligent; for although it seeme little to the purpose, yet it shall be expedient for the knowledge of such matters as follow.

First, for the warre between the cities of Germany, and the Earle of Wittenbergh, which his father before his decease fought to haue extinguished, his sonne had no such care: for in his time it encreased; and Germany from the beginning of his raigne, vntill the end thereof, endured want both of peace and iustice. In his time also hapned a schisme in the Church of Rome; for in the same year that the Emperor CHARLES the Fourth died in Germany, in Rome died Pope GREGORY the eleuenth, who as I said returned the Papall court to Rome; and after his decease the Cardinals assembling themselves in the Conclau to chooe a successor, of which, thirteene were French-men, and foure Italians, whither all the Romane people running, desired them to chooe an Italian, and no French-man; and the French Cardinals vied all meanes to haue had a French-man; and the rest an Italian: And notwithstanding that the greatest number were French, yet disagreeing amongst themselves, one BARTHOLOMEVVS Neapolitan, and Archbishop of Barri was chosen Pope, who tooke for his name VRBANE the sixth. The French Cardinals presently repenting, alleged that what they had done was for feare of the Roman people; whereupon some of them departed from Rome: yet VRBANE notwithstanding was consecrated, and generally obeyed; and those which had absented themselves returned, and so they continued three moneths: which being expired, through some discontentments which they conceiued against him (and as PLATINA writeth, for that he shewed himselfe severe and rigorous against the abuses and pride of the Clergy) eight of the French Cardinals, saying that they left Rome by reason of the heate, went to Fundi, where being fauoured by Queene IOANE of Naples which sold the City of Aninion to the Pope, they pretending and publishing the election of VRBANE to haue been made by violence, that he was no Pope, and that the Sea was void; they amongst themselves in Fundi chose a new Pope and called him CLEMENT the seuenth; whom Queene IOANE and all the kingdom of Naples obeyed and held for Pope; and so began the schisme, which lasted forty yeers. Through the warres and dissension betweene Princes, Christendome was diuided into two factions; for besides Queene IOANE and her kingdome of Naples, the French king fauoured Pope CLEMENT, and perswaded the King of Castile to doe the like. All Italie (excepting Naples) obeyed Pope VRBANE; so did the Emperor WENCESLAVS, Germany England and Portugall; and the one and the other alleged such reasons, and so great and so worthy personages took part with the one and the other, as it made the matter very doubtfull.

This schisme (as I say) continued long, norwithstanding that those which were chosen died, for the Cardinals of either party chose a successor, and held the chaire for void, as hereafter shall appeare. Pope CLEMENT went into France, where with the aide of the French King, and of the Queene of Naples and of Prouence, he held his court in Aninion, and VRBANE remained in Rome; and they two making warre, either of them by all meanes possible sought the others destruction. Pope VRBANE sent his Ambassadors to complaine to the Emperour WENCESLAVS, of what had happened, and to perswade him to come into Italie in fauor of him, against the Queene of Naples, who then was the widow of LEVVS Duke of Tarent, after that she had murdered her first husband: But he giuing them good words took little care for the matter, but yet he and his brother SIGISMUND sent to Pope CLEMENT at Aninion, admonishing him to leaue the name of Pope, and to submit himselfe to Pope VRBANE.

Pope VRBANE finding himself much grieved against Queene IOANE, for that through her assistance the schisme began (that Kingdom being subiect and held of the Church of Rome) sent to treat with CHARLES, Nephew to LEVVS King of Hungary (who as some say) was the sonne of her husband ANDREW King of Naples, whom she had made away) to come into Italie with an Army; promising him (as a schismaticke and disobedient to his Church) to depriue Queene IOANE, and to make him King of Naples, whereto CHARLES and his Vncle

LEUVES King of Hungary willingly gave ear, which LEUVES was father-in-law to SIGISMUND the Emperors brother; who, being very glad thereof, gave him his aid and counsell. CHARLES, when as he was called to the Kingdom of Naples, made warre against the Venetians: for he and his Vncle, the King of Hungary and Poland, favoured the Genowais; between which and the Venetians in those daies were very great and cruell warres, many Princes assisting both the one and the other party: in which war many great exploits were performed, chiefly by sea; sometimes the one party prevailing, and sometimes the other. But at this time the Genowais had the Venetians at such an advantage, that with a mighty fleet of Gallies by sea they besieged the City of Venice, and their partakers and friends made very sharp warre against them by land; so as the City was in danger to have been taken and ruined. We may say, this was the most cruell warre that vntill that time euer was seen in the world: for, therein was artillery first of all used by the Venetians; which was about the year of our Lord one thousand three hundred, eighty two, or a little while after. The invention of this pestilent scourge of mankind was attributed to the Germans: some say that a Monk, who was a great Philosopher, found out the same; not to that purpose to have killed and slain men therewith, but with a desire to have experimented the quality and naturall force of things. Others are of opinion, that it was one PATER, a great Magician; but it importeth little to knowe who it was; for, besides the ordinary Historiographers which I follow in this place, ther be many others write thereof.

Venice escaping from being taken in this warre, and many other matters succeeding, the Duke of Savoy treated, and set downe articles of peace between those two Common-wealths, which peace was concluded. So as to return to my discourse, CHARLES being called to the kingdom of Naples, he went into Hungary: where being furnished with men and other favors by his Vncle King LEUVES, and the Emperor WENCESLAWS, he came into Italy, and to be briefe (leaving what befell him upon the way) he went to Rome, and was very honorably received by the Pope, and thence took his way towards the kingdom of Naples; and coming to blowes with Queen IOANS Army, he overthrew and scattered the same; and then marching to the City of Naples took it: and the Queene retiring to Caserta was therein besieged, and so CHARLES in short space made himselfe Lord of the whole kingdom, which was in the year of our Lord one thousand, three hundred, eighty two. Queen IOAN, being besieged, sent to the French King, to her Countrey of Provence, and to Pope CLEMENT, for relief; and forasmuch as she had no issue, she adopted LEUVES Duke of Anjou, Vncle to the French King, for her heir: which LEUVES, with a puissant Army of French-men, and with all the favour that Pope CLEMENT and the Countrey of Provence could yeeld him, went to relieve her; which was so great, that what is written thereof seems incredible: for they write, that he came with above thirty thousand horse. Being come into the Territory of Bologna in Italie, warreing vpon such as were his aduersaries, and giving it out that he came to set Queen IOAN at liberty, to supplant Pope VRBAN, and to place Pope CLEMENT (of which, both the one & the other in any mans iudgment was easie to haue bin done) in the midst of his iourney (which was very long by reason of the great number of people which came with him, and being hindered by King CHARLES of Naples, and Pope VRBAN) hee was taken with so vehement sickness, that within very fewe dayes it decried him of life; and his Army, without a Leader being divided and disperd, returned to their Countrey: and so was King CHARLES freed from this fear; who, hauing by sundry practices gotten Queen IOAN into his power, commanded her secretly to be drowned: and so she dying, suffered punishment for the death of her husband; and CHARLES remained King and absolute Lord of Naples, with whom the Pope fell at variance, and other matters followed.

While these things passed in Italy, there was neither peace nor quietnes in Germany, through the negligence and little care of the Emperor WENCESLAWS; who, making his abode in his Kingdom of Bohemia, gave himself wholly over to his pleasure. About this time died the Earl of Blanders; and PHILIP Duke of Burgundy, son to King JOHN of France, inheriting his estate, the houses of Blanders and Burgundy were united. It hapned at that time also, which was in the year of our Lord one thousand, three hundred, eighty three, that LEUVES King of Hungary and Poland dying, left only two daughters; of which, one who was called MARY was married to the Emperors brother SIGISMUND, who by her inherited the Kingdom of Hungary; and the other was married to the Duke of Austria, with the title of the Kingdom of Poland.

King

King LEUVES being dead, and SIGISMUND being but fifteen yeers old, after that he and his wife were crowned, his mother in law Queene ISABEL had the government of the kingdom: who following the counsell of the Earle of Gara (a favorite of hers) gouerned with such rigor and severity, that the greatest part of the subjects murmuring against her, rose and rebelled; and as SIGISMUND was but a childe, and she a woman, and the Emperor vnable to relieve them, the rebellion could not be pacified: whereupon the principall men of that kingdom, sent for CHARLES king of Naples, alleging that the inheritance of the kingdom of Hungary appertained vnto him, and to no other; for that he was a man, and neere of blood vnto King LEUVES deceased. King CHARLES thirsting after another kingdom, and hoping of the like good successe in Hungary as he had in Naples, accepted the offer; and making preparation for his iourney, leaving the gouernment of Naples to his wife, with the greatest provision of men and money that he could make (for that he would not compass Italy about) sailed along by the Adriatick Sea (now called the Gulph of Venice) and landing at a place in Slavonia, subiect to the kingdom of Hungary, was there so well received, and in like manner by all those of that kingdom, that the young King SIGISMUND, doubting of the power of his friends which held with him, leaving his wife and his mother in law the widow Queen in Hungary, fled to his brother the Emperor, who then was in Bohemia; and the Queene mother being a subtle woman, sent a messenger to welcome king CHARLES into the countrey, and to tell him that she resposing her trust in his goodness, would yeeld her selfe and her daughter in his power, for that she assured her selfe his coming to be for the good of that Kingdom. King CHARLES gaue such credit to her speeches, that he came to the place where she was; and holding himselfe for absolute Lord, and taking vpon him the gouernment of the kingdom, was not so careful for the safety of his person, as reason required: for one day coming to the Queens lodging, he was there by the Queens direction and some of her favorites traitorously slaine by the hands of one BLASE DE FORBAC: so as this King, not contented with the kingdom of Naples, came to lose his life for the kingdom of Hungary: and the two Queens, mother and daughter hauing made away their enemy, wrote to the Emperor, to send his brother SIGISMUND into that Kingdom; and they in the meane time had the gouernment; for as it seemeth, there was then no open contradiction.

The Queene being more confident then she ought to have been considering what she had done, went from the place where she made her abode, to goe in progresse into the countrey, carrying her daughter with her; and passing one day carelesly with a small guard; a great Lord of Hungary, called JOHN BAN DE HORNBACH (who had been of the aduerser party) meeting her vpon the way, apprehended the two Queens, mother and daughter, and so many as were with them; and there in her presence slew BLASE FORBAC, who murdered King CHARLES; and made the old Queene and others of her company to be drowned in a lake of water which was thereby; and hauing thus cruelly reneged the death of king CHARLES, he carried the sorrowfull young Queene MARY prisoner to a Castle. When King SIGISMUND was certified of this great and strange disaster, moued with iust sorrow for his mother in law and his wife; with the aide of his brother the Emperor, he entred Hungary, where, by the most part hee was received and obeyed; moued thereto with compassion to see his wife imprisoned: which when JOHN HORNBACH, the cruell reuenger of King CHARLES his death vnderstood, repenting of what he had done, or fearing to be brought to ruine for the same, he so practised with the Queene, whom he held prisoner, that she promised and swore to obtaine his pardon of her husband, whereupon she being set at liberty went presently to Buda, where her husband was; and there they both were again crowned, and received for King and Queene, which happened in the year of our Lord, one thousand three hundred eighty and six. But SIGISMUND notwithstanding his wiles oathes and promises, in such manner persecuted JOHN DE HORNBACH, that after many conflicts hauing gotten him into his power, he commanded him to be slain: and so he remained King of Hungary, wherein he reigned many yeers after the changes of fortune before recited, in that Kingdom, and in Naples; such as if they haue been read with attention, are as strange as most that haue passed in the world; yet afterwards ensued other as great or greater, as shall appeare.

SIGISMUND hauing brought that kingdom to subiection, and thoroughly settled himselfe therein; in reuenge of matters past, he at a Parliament held at Buda (as writeth PIUS QVINVS, who before was called AENEAS SYLVIVS) who beheaded two and thirty of the chiefe Lords of that Kingdom, who had beene his enemies and made warre against him;

D d d 2

Artillery first used in the warre.

The death of Leues Duke of Anjou.

Ioan queen of Naples drowned.

The raising of the Countrey of Blanders to the duchy of Burgundy.

K Charles of Naples murdered
in Hungary.

The Queene of Hungary drowned.

him: which truly was cruell and seuer justice, notwithstanding that they had deserved it: for which cause, the kinsfolke and friends of those which were executed did euer after so much hate him, that they brought him into many difficulties and extremities; for it is a farre more safe course to pardon, and to vse moderate iustice, with clemency: then to extend the rigor and extremity of the laws. In the kingdom of Naples reigned LADISLAVS son to king CHARLES, although not without trouble by those which held for LEVVS Duke of Aniun (sonne to that LEVVS which died in that action as is before declared) who challenged the kingdom of Naples, and Queen IOANNE's other dominions.

IOHN GALEAS Viscount, sonne to GALEAS, in those daies made himselfe Lord of all Lombardy, by putting his Vncle BARNABY to death by treason, with whom he had in his fathers time diuided the Countrey, in this manner. BARNABY held Placencia, Cremona, Parma, Lodi, Brescia, Bergamo and other places thereto appertaining: and his Nephew IOHN held Pavia, Vercelli, Donarra, Torona, and the rest between that and the Alps; the City of Milan was for them both, conditionally that they should peaceably gouern the same. But as soueraignty can endure no company or equality: so IOHN GALEAS, to make himselfe Lord of the whole, found a meanes in a Castle to seize vpon his Vncle, and father in law, who trusted him as his own sonne, wherein either of poyson or other infirmity he died prisoner: and he made himselfe Lord of Milan, and the other cities, notwithstanding that BARNABY had one sonne called ASTROGIO, and another called CHARLES Viscount, who afterwards troubled his kinsman all that he might. But the ambition and power of IOHN GALEAS rested not here; for as at that time there were warres between ANTHONY della Scala Lord of Verona and Verona, and FRANCIS CARRARA, Lord of Padoa and other towns, he in such manner fauored the party of FRANCIS CARRARA, that expelling ANTHONY della Scala, GALEAS took those Townes to himselfe, and possessed the same: and after that he had subuerted the enemy, he bent his Armes against his friend, and besieged FRANCIS CARRARA in Padoa: and entering it by force, he took the poore old man prisoner; and so for that time made himselfe Lord of those Cities, and was the most mighty and redoubted man in all Italy: so as this was the right and title of the first Dukes of Milan: yet vntill that time they were not called Dukes, for this GALEAS was called Earle of Verona, vntill that the Emperor WENCESLAVS gaue him the title of Duke, as hereafter we will declare.

The Lords which were thus deposed, left sonnes behinde them, with whom he afterwards had warres, and many accidents happened, which I must of force relate, for the better vnderstanding of my principall intent: but this for the present shall suffice, to bring that to light whereof we purpose to discourse, which is of the raigne of the Emperour WENCESLAVS, for that it concerneth the state of the Imperiall townes and lands of the Empire in Germany, and Italy, whereof the Emperour took not such care as he ought to haue done, and cared not to be crowned in Rome, neither to come into Italy. And as for Germany, hee gouerned it with so little order, that the warres betweene the cities of the Empire, and the Dukes of Wittenburgh ceased not; sundrie Princes fauouring both the one and the other partie, and all the rest was out of order: whereupon they began to consult of deposing him from the Empire, which was afterwards effected; and the Bohemians, which were his owne subiects being much discontented with his gouernment, held him for the space of seuentene weekes prisoner; and hee being afterwards vpon certaine conditions released, fell to his old manner of living; at the end whereof, viz. in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, three hundred, eightie and nine, Pope VIRANE the Sixt died in Rome, hauing beene so eleuen yeeres, and Cardinal PETER TONACBLOA Neapolitane, was by the Romane Cardinals chosen for his succesor, and called BONIFACE the ninth: yet in Aniun, CLEMENT the seuenth was held and obeyed for Pope in all France.

This BONIFACE vsed such policy, that getting the absolute gouernment of Rome, he suppressed the power and liberty of the people; and making officers at his pleasure, fortified the Castle Saint Angelo with a garrison, which of long time had lien desert, an habitacle for Goates and other beasts: otherwise he was not greatly commended, for the contention between these two Popes opened the gate to Symony and many other abuses. And Pope BONIFACE afterwards sent a Cardinal Legate to crowne LADISLAVS, King of Naples, sonne to King CHARLES who was slaine in Hungary: and Pope CLEMENT in Aniun a little before gaue the same title to LEVVS Duke of Aniun, son to the other LEVVS his fathers riuall; so as many things passed between these two Princes, which I omit: but King

LADIS-

LADISLAVS preuailling in the yeere following Pope BONIFACE his election, Pope CLEMENT died in Aniun: and the Cardinals which followed him, chose one PETER de Luna a Spaniard to be his succesor, a very excellent learned man, if he could haue been restrained from the ambition to haue bin Pope, who was called BENEDICT the thirteenth.

IOHN GALEAS Viscount being of great power, sent the Archbishop of Milan for his Ambassadour, to entreate the Emperour to giue him the title of Duke of Milan, and to approue his right thereto: which the Emperour without the consent of the Princes of the Empire graunted, more for the desire of the money, which was presented him, then for any right or reason that might induce him thereto: and all things happened to IOHN GALEAS so well according to his desire, that he came to be one of the most puissant and redoubted Princes in Christendome.

The schisme betweene the two Popes, and the warres in Italy and Germany in those daies, together with the Emperours balencis and insufficiencie, were the cause why the Emperour and Empire of Constantinople could not be relieved or succoured, which at that time were mightily oppressed by BATZETH the fourth King of the Turkes; who with a puissant Army comming into Europe, ouercame and slew in battaile MARK DASHOTE of Bulgaria, and ouerran all his country: and within three yeeres after, returning into the prouinces of Greece, took and conquered cities and prouinces: and passing forwards marched through all Walathia, which in auintient time was called Dacia; and so came into Hungary, whence he returned with great spoyle, remaining Lord (besides what he held before) of the prouinces of Macedonia, of the greatest part of Thracia, of Thessalia, of the prouince of the auintient Athens and other countries; and comming victorious hee besieged the Imperiall citie of Constantinople: whereupon SIGISMUND King of Hungary, with the aide of his brother the Emperour (but with much more and farre better from fundrie other Christian Princes; chiefly from England, and France, whither he sent to sue for the same, and also from the Emperour of Constantinople) came to seeke the great Turke, with 100000 men, whereof twentie thousand were horsemen: whereof BATZETH being aduertised, raised his siege from before Constantinople, and with three hundred thousand men came to meete him; and the two Armies vpon Michaelmas day in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, three hundred, ninety and seuen, fought a bloody and cruell battaile, wherein the King of Hungary, and the other Princes and Nobles which were with him were ouerthrowne, and as it is written a very great slaughter was made of the Christians, through the fault of the French, which charged before their time; and the King of Hungary, and the Master of the Order of the Knights of the Rhodes escaping by flight, the greatest part of the French were either slaine or taken prisoners. After this victory, BATZETH returned to the siege of Constantinople: at which time if the great TAMORLAN (who was one of the most mighty and most victorious Captains that euer was in the world) had not risen in Asia, he had taken the citie, and at that time had wholly subdued the Empire: wherefore hee leaving in Europe the best garrisons he could, went to the defense of Asia, wherein he was in a battell ouerthrowne and taken, and in TAMORLAN's power died prisoner; which (for that time) brought some rest to Christendome. King SIGISMUND, escaping from this unfortunate battell, came vnto Constantinople; and from thence sailing vnto the Ile of Rhodes, hee came into Dalmatia or Slado-nia.

In the time of this peregrination, many of his kingdom of Hungary publishing him to be either dead or taken prisoner, aduanced the Colours of LADISLAVS King of Naples, proclaiming him king by the right of his father CHARLES, of whom we made mention, and of his death being slaine after his comming into Hungary, for which purpose his son was now sent forth: but SIGISMUND afterwards appearing, with the aid of the Archbishop of Strigoniun, and other his friends, recovered his Kingdome; although that afterwards hee was againe imprisoned, and fell into great troubles; the occasion whereof was the malice and haured which many of his Kingdome bare him, for the cruell execution done in the beginning of his raigne; as then was expressed.

These matters being past, and other which for that they concerne not the history of the Emperours, I ouerpasse: the Princes Electors of the Empire, and the rest, seeing the insufficiencie and little care the Emperour took to suppress and pacifie the warres and controuersies between the cities amongst themselves, and among the Princes; and that he gaue himselfe to his pleasure and vaine delights, by reason whereof hee was little regarded; resolved to meete;

D d d 3

and Batzeth King of the Turkes came into Europe.

A battaile betweene the King of Hungary and the Turke, wherewith the Christians were ouerthrowne.

The great Turke ouer-throwne and taken by the mighty Tamorlan.

Summum ius, summa iniuria

and to depose him, as dangerous, and vnprofitable for the Empire; and to chuse another Emperor; alleging him to be altogether vnfit for the government; that he desired not, neither sought to be crowned; that he had without reason, order, or equitie giuen the title of Duke to JOHN GALBAS the tyrant of Adrian, that he had put many men of Sacerdotal order to death, and some prelates; that he was vicious, and no good Christian; that he took no care to resist the Turkes; and finally, that he was a man vnprofitable for the Christian Common-wealth; with many other matters which they laid to his charge; and putting their resolution in effect, they met for that purpose in the citie of Frankford, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand, foure hundred, Pope BONIFACE being the chiefest author thereof, who published him for deprived and vnworthy of the Empire, in the 22. yeere of his raigne. During the raigne of this Emperor WENCESLAVS, they began to dispute against the vanitie of the Popes indulgences in the Vniuersity of Prague which then flourished. JOHN HUSA Bohemian, who then was very famous for his learning and pietie, did much oppugne them, saying, that they were meer Impostures. He inuighed against the Popes tyrannie, as the chief cause thereof, and blamed the avarice, luxurie and pride of the Clergie, reiecting their vows, impure Celibate superstitions, fictions and all their monasticall life, and whatsoever did not agree with the Analogie of faith. These matters were formerly brought in question in England by WICKLIFFE about the yeere of our Lord 1372.

Here is some difference betweene the authors: for some write that ROBERT whom some call RYPERT, Count Palatine of Rhine and Duke of Bauiere, was chosen in his place, without making mention of IODOCVS Marquess of Moravia cousin germane to the Emperor WENCESLAVS (being his fathers brothers sonne) who some say, was chosen before ROBERT, and liued but a little while after: others (which I rather beleue) say that there was controuersie betweene the Electors; some chusing IODOCVS, and others ROBERT, and that IODOCVS dying, the contention ended. Howsoever it was, it is true that IODOCVS liued but six months after this election; and of him nothing is written worthe to be recited. So as (according to all writers) ROBERT by common consent, after the decease of IODOCVS, remained sole Emperor; and his election was ratified by Pope BONIFACE. CARION writes, that IODOCVS soone after his election to the Empire, went to visit WENCESLAVS King of Bohemia, his cousin germane; who by bringing him into a priuate Chamber said vnto him: Although I know that it is not for my dignitie that the Electors haue degraded me, yet it is my comfort that our family hath not lost this honour. I willingly and gladly accept you for my successor. And when as IODOCVS amazed with these words kneeled vnto the King, desiring him not to impute any thing vnto him; Feare not saith he, for neither doe I vnwillingly leaue the Empire, neither would I violate the rights of blood and consanguinity, if I had a desire to hold it. Be therefore of good cheere and enioy the Empire which is giuen thee; Bohemia is sufficient for me; make vse of the power, Armes and wealth of my Kingdome as thine owne, and so he dismisset his cousin with ioy. CYSPIAN in this place maketh mention of one FREDERICK Duke of Brunswick, who (as he saith) was also chosen before ROBERT, and was slaine before that he could be crown'd, through the treason of a certaine Earle, by the counsell and procurement of the Archbishop of Mentz; and that ROBERT was chosen afterwards. I know not what authors he Archbishops therein, for I finde it written by him onely. It sufficeth, that ROBERT, whom the Germanes call RYPERT (WENCESLAVS being deposed) remained Emperor: whereof WENCESLAVS made no great account, for in truth hee that took small care to preserve it, it is no maruell though it grieved him little to lose it; for he contented himselfe with his Kingdome of Bohemia, which he enioyed a long time after, and gouerned the same so retchlesly, that his brother SIGISMUND King of Hungary, by the consent of his subjects took him once, and another time, and they themselves apprehending him, deliuered him to the custody of ALBERT Duke of Austria, who held him for a space prisoner in Vienna: whence being afterwards released, he returned to his Kingdome, in possession whereof he afterwards liued nineteene yeeres, and died being of the age of seauen and fiftie (as writeth Pope PIUS QVINTVS, otherwise called AENAS SYLVIVS) without leauing either son or daughter to two wiues to which he was married. And he raigning in Bohemia, the religion began to spring, whereof hereafter mention shall be made, which was the ground of that which at this day is professed in Germany, and in the greatest part of Christendome, which (as irremeth) this King fauoured. This was the end of the Emperor WENCESLAVS his Empire.

All

All this while JOHN PALOLOVS raign'd in Constantinople, who was also called CALOIOANNES; yet BLONDVS is of opinion, that ANDRONICVS, the sonne of this CALOIOANNES, raign'd at this time; wherein (as I coniecture) he is deceived: for the authors which particularly write the liues of the Greeke Emperors, make no mention of ANDRONICVS in this place, but of JOHN CATACVZBVS, with whom CALOIOANNES contended for the Empire. A little after the depriuing of WENCESLAVS, EMANVEL PALOLOVS succeeding his father CALOIOANNES, the Empire of Constantinople decayed & came to ruine; for BAIABETH the great Turke took many prouinces and countries thereof, as we haue already declared: yet it had some rest in those daies, by reason of the calamitie brought vpon the Turkes by the great TAMORLAN; but it continued not long, for TAMORLAN being dead, CALATIN the son of BAIABETH, recovered and reformed the Kingdome and Empire of the Turkes, and againe molested and persecuted the Empire of Greece, and the Kings of Hungary.

THE LIFE OF ROBERT, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND TENTH RO- MANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

ROBERT, being in the time of Wenceslaus made Emperor, took speedy order to make it knowne to the world, that the dignity was not giuen him for nought, and therefore he caused himselfe to be crowned; and having suppressed the troubles of Germany, he went to be crowned in Italy, and to protect the Florentines against the Duke of Adrian, but his coming was no lesse dishonourable than vnprofitable, neither were the Florentine warres with the Duke of Adrian ended, but through the death of the said Duke, for the Emperor departing without having decided them, or without putting their aduersary in any feare, applied himselfe to the affairs of Germany, wherein he was much troubled about the schisme in the Church of Rome; and desiring to assemble a Councell, the Popes not consenting thereto, he was a long time in doubt: but in the end, resolving to haue a Councell held in such a place whither both the Popes without suspicion might come, he fell sick and died, in the tenth yeere of his Raigne.

The Emperor WENCESLAVS being in such manner as I said deprived, ROBERT Duke of Bauiere, and Count Palatine, was chosen in his place. Hee was a man of quick apprehension, little of stature, but of a great spirit, very careful and studious of the Maiesty of the Empire and of the publique affairs, famous for his integrity and iustice, and well practised in Armes. Coming to Aix to be crowned, they would not receive him into the City, pretending that they were yet bound by their oath to WENCESLAVS: wherefore the new Emperor elect, accompanied by the Electors and some other Princes, went to the City of Colen, and there was crowned by the Archbishop thereof; and his election and coronation was confirmed and ratified by Pope BONIFACE: and so through all Germany he was held and obeyed for Emperor, but not with such obedience and reuerence as some of his Predecessors had been: for, the remisse behaviour and little worth of WENCESLAVS, and the mor-

Ddd 4

morgages and sales made by his father CHARLES, had given such liberty and exemptions in the territories of the Empire, that the Empire scarcely retained the authority and reputation in the Imperial countries, and with the Princes of Germany, which ought to have been given it. But as ROBERT was a wife and prudent Prince, and of himself very mighty and of great power, so in the tenne yeers which he reigned, he made a great reformation in all matters, and settled the best order that was possible, aswell in the controversies and warres which were in Germany, as in the execution of iustice and good government.

Italy was then on fier with warre and factions; in the kingdom of Naples LADISLAUS the sonne of CHARLES before named, with the aide of Pope BONIFACE, warred against those which held for LEVVS Duke of Anjou, soone to the other LEVVS who held some Cities and Townes in that kingdom, with the title which he inherited from his father, and from Queene IOANE, being inuaded in that kingdome by CLEMENT 7, who in Aninion was called Pope: And LADISLAUS his power encreasing, hee in the end prevailed.

The most powerfull man in all the rest of Italy, was JOHN GALRAS Viscount Duke of Milan, who (as I said) was an haughty minded man; who not contented to be Duke and Lord of so great estates, and of so many Cities as he was, thought to haue been a King, yea an Emperour and Lord of all Italy; and at that time made cruell warre against the Florentines, who only durst and were able to make head against him, they being assisted by the sonnes of BARNABUS who had been tyrant of Milan; and by the sonnes of those which had bene tyrannes or Gouvernours of Padua, whom hee had depofed, and others which hee had wronged and dispossessed; and by many others which did stand in feare to bee dealt withall in the like manner.

Matters standing in these teames, and the Election and Coronation of the Emperour ROBERT being published, the Florentines sent Ambassadors to entreate and to perswade him (for seeing he was Emperour he was bound thereto) to come into Italy, to free the Country from so cruell and pernicious a tyrant, as was Duke JOHN of Milan (who had vltured so many townes of the Empire, and of the Church) and therewith offered to give him towards his charges the summe of two hundred thousand Florines, whereof one hundred thousand presently in hand, and the rest the first day that he should enter into the Tyrant Dukes country with his Army, wherein they would assist him with the greatest power they were able to make both offsoote and horse. These Ambassadors being arrived in Germany, they were very well entertained by the Emperour, who presently accepting their offer and seruice, promised to come into Italy, aswell for the enterprise of Milan, as to be crowned in Rome: and he therupon presently began to provide all things necessary for his iourney.

The Duke of Milan hauing intelligence hereof, little regarded the deuices and policies which his predecessors had vsed with former Emperours, seeking by their Ambassadors to procure peace with them, and to obtain their grace and fauour, to beare themselves as their vassalls and subiects; but he as a mighty absolute Lord, with great resolution mustered vp his men, and provided armour and Artillery (which then was in vse) and all things else needefull for the warre so that great preparation was made of both sides; and all Italy and Germany were very attentive to see the event of this great action. The Emperour stayed longer then he, of those which expected his coming, thought he would haue done: for hauing resolved to come in the beginning of the yeere 1401, he came to Trium (which is at the entry into Italy) in the end of haruest following, accompanied by the Duke of Austria, the Archbishop of Cologne, and some other Princes, with many Captaines of Germany and Italy. And to performe the conditions made with the Florentines, he came with his Army within sight of Brescia, which held for the Duke of Milan; but the Duke had in that City, and the marches thereof, so many good men of warre to make head against him, that they feared not to offer him bataille; and the Dukes Cauallerie were such excellent good horse-men, that in all skirmishes and encounters wherefoeuer they met, they had the advantage of the Germanes, and slew many of them: and they one day coming to ioyne with their whole forces in a bataille, the Emperour and his Army were ouerthrown, nere to the Lake of Benaco, now called Garda: and being thus broken, hee retired to Trient, where he stood in great doubt and perplexity, to thinke whether he should returne into Germany, or reinforce his Army to returne into Italy; where the Duke of Austria and the Archbishop of Cologne leauing him returned home, wherewith the Emperour was so grieved as he was ready to haue done the like; but perswaded by FRANCIS CARRARA, the sonne of CAR-

RARA

RARA the tyrant of Padua, and by other Italian Captaines: and thinking it a shame for him to returne without further tryall of his fortune, he went with his Army (which he had reinforced) as farre as Triuigi, and thence to Padua; where by meanes of CARRARA he was receiued; whither came to him foure Ambassadors from the Florentines, being of the chiefe of the City: who also sent two Captaines with certain troupes of horse and foote; one of which (as saith BLONDVS) was SFORZA ATENDVLO, who afterwards was an excellent and very famous captain, and was father to that FRANCIS SFORZA which was one of the best captains in the world, and afterwards duke of Milan.

This SFORZA ATENDVLO was borne in a village called Catinola, of meane parentage and very poore. With these Ambassadors ROBERT had long treaties, concluding that the Duke of Milan was of such power, that neither he nor they had forces sufficient to ruine him, or to expell him out of his estate: wherefore he held it best for him to return, and that they should seek new aid and relief; besides this he demanded so great a sum of money for the payment of his souldiers, that it seemed not to be raised.

The Florentines fearing their ruine if the Emperour should abandon them and returne, they left no meanes to detain him: wherefore two of the Ambassadors returned in post to Florence, to conferre with their citizens about this matter; and the other two remained with the Emperour: who for that it was winter, and no fit time to make warre (having a great desire to see that citie) went to Venice, where he was most sumptuously entertained. The Florentines in the meane time hauing heard their Ambassadors, resolving what answer they would make to the Emperour, determined to procure the friendship of the Venecians, and to make a league with them, and with the Pope, and to giue the Emperour great aide of men and money: herewith the Ambassadors returned to Venice, relating to him the resolution of their citizens. The Emperour complained of them to the Venecians, for that they had not given him that money which they had promised: and they excusing themselves, alleged that he came not with such power as was requisite, neither had entred the territorie of Milan. Finally, many treaties and speeches passed, as well with the Emperour as the Duke of Milans Ambassadors, who came thither to defend their cause before the Venecians; the Florentines still insisting to stay the Emperour in Italy; who giuing them sometimes hope, and sometimes making the matter doubtfull, came from Venice to Padua, where he lay all the rest of the winter: and the moneth of Aprill being come, in the yeere of our Lord 1402, in the third yeere of his reigne, he perceiving that the Venecians would be but lookers on, and newters, and would not helpe the Florentines; and that LADISLAUS King of Naples had enough to doe with LEVVS of Anjou, and that Pope BONIFACE (notwithstanding that the Duke of Milan had taken many townes from him) durst not attempt ought against him; he resolved with himself to returne into Germany, and did so, although with losse of reputation: whereby it appeared that the Empire was not of such power as in former times; wherewith the Florentines were much grieved, and vsed all possible meanes to haue staied him. And although I shall make some digression, yet I will declare what end the war betweene the Duke of Milan and the Florentines had, and how it was interrupted by the death of the said Duke.

The Emperour being departed out of Italy; the Duke of Milan resolved presently to effect his desires, and to make himselfe Lord of Florence, sending his Generall, called ALBERICO Earle of Cuno, with all the force which hee had lenied to make head against the Emperour, to assault Bologna, which was gouerned by JOHN BENTIVOGLIO, a friend and confederate with the Florentines. And with the Dukes Army went the Marquess of Montoa, his friend and confederate, and PANDOLPHO MALATESTA Lord of Rimini. The Florentines to the reliefe of BENTIVOGLIO, sent their best Captaines and men of warre, amongst which was FRANCIS CARRARA the son of FRANCIS CARRARA Lord of Padua. BENTIVOGLIO herewith and with his owne forces took the field, with a resolution to fight with the Duke of Milans power, which refused not the same: wherein, JOHN BENTIVOGLIO and his partakers being ouerthrowne, he escaped by flight, and the CARRARI were taken prisoners: and ALBERICO presently besieging the citie of Bologna, and battering it in many parts, by one of which some of his men, by the permission of some within the citie began to enter; but BENTIVOGLIO resolving to die honourably Lord of Bologna, charged those which were entred, and fought with such obstinacie, that being vnkowne hee was there slaine, and cut in pieces. Being knowne that he was dead, the citie without any more resistance was entred, and so the Duke of Milan had that citie.

Bologna taken by the Duke of Milan.

This

This victory strake such a fear into the Florentines, that they holding themselves for lost, would have accepted any conditions of peace, had they been never so hard; and sent to desire the Venecians to purchase the same for them: but the Duke of Milan, which now assured himself to be Lord of Florence, refusing to hear them, commanded his Army to march forwards: and being in the height of his greatness, that God which only is able, and yfeth to abate mens pride, measured his ambitious thoughts; for, hee was suddenly taken with a pestilent Fever, whereof within fewe daies after he died: and notwithstanding that his death was kept secret, yet it was soon discouered, and the Florentines were freed from the great fear of the seruitude which they expected. I knowe well that I haue spent much time about this man: but I doo it for that it is a notable matter to see to what great power this Duke tyrannically, in despite of Kings and Emperours which were his aduersaries, attained; and for as much as hee was a subject of the Empire, whereof this History is, it may be said to be of the substance of the same History.

This Prince JOHN GALEAS Viscount, Duke of Milan, was tall of stature, of a faire and comely aspect, indifferently well seen in the liberrall Arts and Sciences, very well spoken, of a quick and sharp wit, hardy and valiant in Arms, and therewith very politick and subtle in his actions: but he was so ambitious and desirous to raige and command, that to attain thereto, he setting aside the fear of God, made no question to attempt any means, just or vnjust whatsoever, so he might obtain his purposes; which were so many and such, that I cannot describe them. It is certain that he acquired much of what he desired: for, before his death hee was Lord of nine and twenty Cities in Italy; which were, Milan, Pavia, Monfrigal, Nouarra, Bercelli, Alba, Aquino, Alexandria, Tortona, Droho, Placencia, Parma, Reggio, Bologna, Pisa, Siena, Massa, Grosseto, Clusio, Perugia, Asse, Nocera, Lodi, Feltra, Vicenza, Verona, Brescia, Bergamo, Como, Cremona and Crema, besides the Towns and Castles subiect and appertaining to these Cities, which were very many. He died in the month of November, in the yeer of our Lord one thousand, foure hundred and two.

This mighty Duke left two sonnes behinde him, the eldest of which was called JOHN MARIA Viscount; and the other, PHILIP MARIA Viscount: to the elder he left by his Testament the title of Duke, and the City of Milan, with all the Towns and Cities within the iurisdiction thereof; and out of it the Cities of Bologna, Siena, Perugia and Asse. To his second son PHILIP he left the Cities of Pavia, Verona, Vicenza, and other places: and to a bastard sonne, whose name was GABRIEL, he left the City of Pisa. Which diuision made to his sons was imputed vnto him for a great oversight, and was after very prejudiciall to that estate: for, the two brothers disagreeing, it came to decay and ruine; for they were so young, that the eldest of them was but fifteen yeers old; so as there presently beganne factions and parakings between them and the widow Duchesse their mother-in-law, and their kinred and fauourites, about the gouernment and command. Finally (for that it would bee long to relate) the matter grew to that issue, that as soon as the discord was knowne to be between the heads, all the members became so out of order, as the greatest part of the Cities rose and rebelled against the Duke; some with those which first held them, and others with the new Captains and Tyrants: so as what in the time of the Duke was held for the greatest euill (which was, To bee subiect to one) seemed afterwards to be the least, by reason of the multitude of Tyrants, and the warre and great discord which ensued: for, in Cremona arose VOOLINO CAVALCABO, and PANDOLPHO MALATESTA with Brescia and Bergamo; PHILIP ARCELLANO in Placencia; PAVLO GYTTIOI with Luca; FACINGO with Porecello, Alexandria, and other places; the SYARDI in Bergamo; FOLLIANO RISCONI in Como; GIANINO VERNATESI in Lodi; GEORGE BENZONE in Crema; OTHO VITALE in Parma: and others sought to do the like in other places as, the CARRARISTI & those of Scala sought to make themselves Lords of Verona and Padova: in such sort, that the state of JOHN MARIA, the new Duke of Milan, was in great combustion and danger; and what did most hurt, was his owne tyrannicall condition: for he (as a proud cruell boy) beheaded sundry of the chief men of that Country. He also apprehended his mother, and committed many other insolencies, which in the end cost him his life: whereof being reprehended by a seruant and fauourite of his, which told him that he was vnlike to his Ancestors, he yielded a reason answerable to his actions, willing him to let him alone, for, that house or family could not be accounted excellent or famous which produced not men of all conditions. Thus, what the father had gotten by his valour and policy, the sonne lost by his weaknes and cruelty: for, besides the aboue-named Townes which which were vsurped by other Lords, the Pope reconered Bologna, Assisa and Perugia: the Florentines bought Pisa. They of Siena hauing slaine CORREGIO their Gouernour, reconered their liberty, being subiect to cruell seditions. Neither did the Venecians forget themselves in these combustions, but extended their power as farre as Friuli and Istria. NOVEL CARARIVS the son of FRANCIS who had fled into Bauaria when his father was taken, hauing now reconered Padua with the assistance of the Venecians, being vnmindfull of their fauours, he sought to supplant them: and hauing perswaded WILLIAM SCALIGER to seize vpon Verona, being his familiar friend, and one who had assisted him both with counsell and Armes, he poisoned him to get Verona, and afterwards caused his sons ANTHONY and BRYNO to be treacherously murdered. He also attempted Vincenia: but they hating his tyrannicall craued protection from the Venecians, who imbracing this occasion, tooke Armes against him, besieged him in Padua, and in the end forced him to yeeld; so as he with two of his sons were strangled by the Venecians. By this victory they got Padua, Verona, Vincenia, with other Townes.

But PHILIP, his successor, reuenged his brothers death and expelled some of the tyrants, hereconered Bergamo and Brescia, hauing chased away MALATESTA, and Lodi, by the taking and hanging of VENASTES. He got Placencia and slew some of the ARCELLANI and banished the rest. He cast FRANCHINO RVSCA out of Como: with a promise of reward, he got Cremona hauing taken GABRYNDVLII, neglecting those which lay farther off. Let this suffice for his estate, and now to our purpose.

The Emperour ROBERT going into Germany (as is before said) applied himself to the pacifying thereof: for besides the ancient controuersies betwene the cities (as before is specified) in those daies many great men in Hungary through the old hatred which they long before had conceived against SIGISMUND their King, for the cruell execution which he caused to be done in the beginning of his raigne, rebelled against him, and they apprehending him committed him in a Castle to the custodie of a widow and her two sonnes, whose father he had put to death. SIGISMUND being thus prisoner, they sent to LADISLAUS King of Naples to come and take possession of that Kingdom, to whom it belonged: who although hee was not thoroughly confirmed in the Kingdom of Naples, yet moued with an ambitious desire to raigne and to commaund, he made the greatest haste thither that he could; and leauing Naples he came into Slavonia, where, in a citie subiect to the Kingdom of Hungary, he was crowned and proclaimed King: but in the meane time SIGISMUND vied such meanes with the widow and her sonnes, that they released him out of prison, and being at liberty, with the aide of his friends and many others which he reduced to his seruice, he reconered his Kingdom: and LADISLAUS being thereof aduertised, without proceeding any further (his hope and purpose failing him) returned to his Kingdom of Naples: but before his departure, in requitall of his good entertainment, he sold to the Venecians that citie wherein he was harboured. For all these matters (as it appeareth by the histories) his brother WENCESLAUS King of Bohemia and deposed Emperour, took little care, for he had enough to do to hold himselfe in his Kingdom; and as little is written of what the Emperour ROBERT did herein, or in the cruell warres betwene the Swislers and the Duke of Austria, the originall and issue whereof were long to be related. It seems he was otherwise buied in the Empires affairs; whereof, seeing it was in peace, no notable matter is written; and matters of small importance are not worth reading: for certainly although it be the blessing of God to liue in peaceable times, and vnder the rule of good kings and princes for the time present, yet the histories of them after their death are nothing delightful: and commonly men take more pleasure in reading of batailles, alterations of kingdoms, the fallies of Kings and their estates, then in histories of peace, iustice, and quiet times: and this is the reason why bookes of lies and fables are read with such delight, for that they are full of such fained accidents and adventures. True it is that those times were not without matters worthe to be related: but forasmuch as they concerne not the Emperour, I am not to write them in this history.

The Emperour ROBERT reigning in peace in Germany, in the fift yeere of his raigne Pope BONIFACE died in Rome, in the yeere of our Lord 1404: and he being dead the Cardinal of S. Croci was chosen & called INNOCENT the Seuenth, who before was called COSMO; BARNEDICT the Thirteenth liuing still in Avinion. Before that INNOCENT was chosen, all the Cardinals swore and promised, that whether soeuer of them should happen to be made Pope, he should doe his best endeavour to end the schisme in the Church, and that this INNOCENT should sware the same: but after that he was Pope, he vsed no such care therein as was expected.

The

The Emperor ROBERT, for that he was otherwise busied in Germany, or else through want of men or money, or both, could not or would not come into Italy at that time: whereto if he had had means, occasion was offered him to haue recovered to the Empire the Cities which the Duke of Milan and others had vsurped, by reason of the warres and great troubles which were among them in those daies: but (as I haue already said) the power and authority of the Emperors (for the causes before mentioned) was so much weakened, that they could not prouide for all parts; but the Venecians, taking the benefit of the time, made themselves Lords of Padoa, Verona, and Vicenza, with their confines; who before that time held not any City of importance in the main Land of Italy: and so they wholly extinguished the houses and estates of the CARARATI and of Scala, which of long time had been Lords of Padoa, Verona, and other Townes. The Florentines at this time bought the City of Pisa, of GABRIEL the base sonne of Duke GAUDAS of Milan; who, after that he had been Lord thereof the space of three yeeres, becing vnable to hold it, sold the same: and the Pisans to defend their liberty, and for the hatred which they bare to the Florentines, resolved (although in vain) to shake off the yoke of subiection. Whereupon, the Florentines besieging them, through famine, and by the treason of one JOHN SHORTLEBO, took the City, which in former time had been of very great power, and was now made a slave and subiect to the Florentines, as it is at this day: such is the weaknes and infidelity of the power and estates of this world.

*Pisa taken by
the Florentines.*

Pope INNOCENT the Seventh being dead, all the Cardinals, before the election of a new Pope, made a solemn vow, that he which should be chosen should endeavour to cause BENEDICT the Thirteenth, who was in Animum, to renounce the Papacy; and that BENEDICT doing so, he that was chosen should do the like, to the end that the schisme in the Church might cease, and that another should be chosen: this was held the fittest mean to end the schisme. After this solemn oath, one ANGELO CORARIA, Cardinall of Saint MARK, a Venecian, was chosen, and called GREGORY the Twelfth; who, as soon as he was chosen, confirmed the oath which he before had made: whereupon a meeting was procured to bee had between these two Popes, to the end that they both together should haue renounced the Papacy, and that another might be chosen; and many Letters & messengers were sent, and they both made shew to be willing thereto. But they could not agree vpon the place of meeting: yet in the end Saونا was appointed; and one Pope came from Rome to Luca, and the other from Animum to Genua: but they alleging many frivolous reasons, neither of them came to Saونا, whereby it plainly appeared that they had no meaning by their reconciliation to end the schisme. The Cardinals of either side lying neere together, and perceiving that neither of these two Popes had any meaning to renounce the Papacie, or to performe what they both had sworn, by Letters and messages passing betweene them agreed to meete together, to call a general Councell, to denie obedience to them both, and to chuse a new Pope.

The affairs of the Church being in this confusion, the power and authority of both Popes decreased, especially of BENEDICT the Antipope, France denying him obedience; who, finding no safety in Anignon, went into Arragon, where he was obeyed: and afterwards he retired himself vnto Biscae, where he continued in his hardnes of heart vntill he died; GREGORY also going from Rome, and the Cardinals repairing to the Councell. LADISLAUS king of Naples had an intent during this discord to make himself Lord of Rome; and with such forces as he could draw together, he went thither and seised thereon, with the help and fauour of the Colonnese; the which he held certain daies: during the which there were skirmishes and murders; but the Vrsini being in the end the stronger, he retired into his Kingdome.

27 Cardinals meeting altogether in Pisa, after many disputations a Councell was assembled, wherein met three Patriarches and 180. Archbishops and Bishops: the conclusion was, that the two Popes were cited to come to this Councell: whereto BENEDICT who was in Animum, answered, that the question was between him and Pope GREGORY, whether of them two should be Pope: wherefore they could not, neither did it appertaine to them to determine the cause; and that he marueiled at their presumption in attempting the same. Pope GREGORY also sent them word that they well knew him to be right Pope and canonically chosen; and therefore they neither could nor ought to call a Councell without his authority, for it appertained vnto him, and that he would not haue it held in Pisa, but in some other place; and that they were bound to go to that place which he should appoint, which was to Aquileia, whither hee went. About this controuersie the Emperor ROBERT summoned a Diet to be held in Frankford; whither came a Cardinall from Pope GREGORY, and another from the Councell held in Pisa, each defending his cause; and Pope GREGORY desired that some other place might be appointed, but not Pisa. Finally, after many contentations, the Emperour yielding to the opinion of many learned men, and holding with Pope GREGORY, affirmed that he only had authority to call the Councell, and to appoint the place: But notwithstanding the Emperours opinion, the Councell of Pisa, holding neither GREGORY nor BENEDICT for Popes, chose a Franciscan Frier called PETER, Cardinall and Archbishop of Milaw, who took to name ALEXANDER the Fifth. This being done, thither came LEVVS Duke of Aniow and Earle of France (a riuall and competitor with LADISLAUS King of Naples) who acknowledging ALEXANDER for Pope, was by him inuested: and ALEXANDER gaue him the title to the Kingdom of Naples against LADISLAUS, who took Pope GREGORY's part. The schisme for all this ceased not, but encreased: for in lieu of two Popes now there were three, and each of them held his court apart, and had Cardinals, and many followers; but the new chosen Pope had the greatest and strongest partie: and Pope GREGORY wandering vp and downe remained for a space in Genua, (for LADISLAUS King of Naples was his friend) but in the end he came to Armino, where CHARLES MALATESTA Lord of that citie harboured him; hether continuing vntill the Councell of Constance. Pope ALEXANDER went to Bologna; but within eight moneths after his election he died in the same citie; and the Cardinals which were with him assembling in their Conclau in the same citie, chose BALTHASAR COSSA, a Neapolitane and Cardinall of S. Eustace, who was called JOHN the 24. which Election was by some held for violent and forced; for this BALTHASAR being a Captaine in the warres, and Gouernour of Bologna, had the commaund of men of warre and was of great power: but yet in the end he was by the greatest part of Italy held for Pope; and so were GREGORY and BENEDICT also in the places where they liued; by reason whereof all Christendome was diuided into three factions. The Emperour ROBERT being herewith discontent, and desiring a redresse, procured that a generall Councell might be held by the consent and authority of all those three which were called Popes; which afterwards in the time of his successor STRONMUND was accomplished. But he hauing begun this worke was within few daies after surprisid by death, in the tenth yeere of his raigne, in the yeere of our Lord 1410, leaving the schisme and diuision in the Church as before. This Emperour had six sonnes, the eldest of which, ROBERT and FREDERICK died before their father, so as when he died there remained JOHN, LEVVS, STEPHEN, and OTHER, which had diuers titles, and possessed sundrie estates.

*The death of the Emperor
Robert.*

EMANUEL held the Empire of Constantinople in little prosperitie, as well by means of the warres with the Turkes, as other troubles and disorders in that Empire. In his time MAHYMAT sonne of CALAFIN was king of the Turkes: who in the beginning, and before that EMANUEL was Emperour, came into Eurape and warred in Walachia, but the rest of his time he spent in Asia in recouering that which TAMORLAN had taken from his grandfather BATAZETH.

In his time JOHN HVSSE began to be of such credit and reputation in Bohemia, that hee drawing many to be of his opinion, threw down the Images in Churches, denied Purgatorie, the sacrament of Confession, the Popes power, his Indulgences and pardons, Dirges and praying for the dead; praying to our Lady and to Saints; and held many other opinions which at this day are maintained in the greatest part of Christendome.

Ecc

THE

THE LIFE OF SIGISMUND,
ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND ELEVENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

Sigismund King of Hungary, after the decease of the Emperor Robert, was chosen Emperor, whose election was very gratefully, for that he was a man of great expedition. He being confirmed, procured a Council to be held in Constance, to cease the Schisme which had continued many years: but it bewitched him to deferre it for a time, by reason of the warres betwene the Pope and the King of Naples, who had taken Rome. But Ladislaus being dead, the Council was assembled, whither the Emperor himselfe came in person: in which Council John Husse and Jerome of Prague were condemned and burned. The two Popes Gregory and John renounced the Papacie, but the third (which was Benedict) would not, so that the Emperor going in person to procure him to renounce it, could not prevaile; for Benedict was refused to dye with this title, notwithstanding that hee was deposed by the Council; and that all the Princes Christian, together with his best friend the King of Arragon (seeing his obstinacie) resented him. The Council being dissolved, the Emperor went to pacifie the troubles in Bohemia, and to suppress the followers of John Husse; but he neither by peace nor war could effect the same: and the Popes being severall times memorably overthrowne, the Bohemians could neuer be subdued by force of Armes. But in the end Sigismund was received as King of Bohemia: and the Council of Basil having decreed, concerning the opinions of the Bohemians, the Emperor upon the way going into Hungary dyed in Zenopa, when he had reigned 37. yeeres.

The Emperor ROBERT being dead and buried, the Princes Electors (according to their custome) met to chuse new Emperor in the citie of Frankford: which being made knowne to Pope IOHN, he (with a desire to shew the authoritie of a Pope, to corie favour, and to get aide against king LADISLAUS, who would haue made himselfe Lord of Rome) sent his Legate to entreate them to make choise of SIGISMUND king of Hungary: truly his request was reasonable, for he was a prince in that time, for his wildome and valour besides his other gifts of nature much esteemed: for he was tall of stature, very well proportioned, of a milde aspect, very discrete and aduised, of a pleasing conuersation, and aboue all most bountifull: and in conclusion such a one as was needfull for the present time. The Ambassadors from IOHN who was called Pope, were joyfully heard by the Electors; and all Germany fixed their eyes vpon SIGISMUND, as well for his merits, as for that he was a mighty King, and son to the Emperor CHARLES the Fourth; so as by common consent he was chosen Emperor; and comming from Hungary to Aken, he was there crowned with the accustomed solemnity: and his raigne was afterwards very long, and so shall I be in writing his historie.

Sigismund
Emper.
1087.

When

When Pope GREGORY in Armino, and Pope IOHN in Bologna were advertised of his Election, they sent him their Ambassages and approbations, either of them attributing the authority to himselfe: but SIGISMUND by reason of particular former friendship, seeming to incline to Pope IOHN more then to any of the others, presently began by messengers to treat with him concerning the calling of a generall Council, for the suppressing of the schisme: touching the appointing of the place, there was some question, but the Emperor appointed the citie of Constance, whither (as all men thought) all those which were called Popes, were bound to goe, there to make their renunciations. And for as much as the most of the Townes and Cities in Italy held IOHN for Pope; and also for that LADISLAUS King of Naples sought to haue usurped Rome, and all the Church lands and goods, and in effect, though not in name, vnder colour of taking Pope GREGORYS part, to make himselfe Emperor; Pope IOHN departing from Rome, sent against him LEUVIS Duke of Aniow, called king of Naples, PAVL VRISM, SFOREZA, and other Captains and souldiers, with the aide of the Florentines which were his friends. These joyning in battaile with LADISLAUS, ouerthrew him; but they following not the victory, LADISLAUS gathered his men together, and leuied for many others, that Pope IOHN (being then in Rome) was glad to make peace with him; and LADISLAUS sent to yeeld him obedience: but as it appeareth fainely, for within few daies after he came vnder color of other occasions with an Army into the territory of Rome, and entred the City by force; and Pope IOHN hauing no power to make head against him, fled to Florence; so as the King was lodged in Rome with as great state as if he had been Lord thereof, which strake a great feare into the Florentines and their confederats. To Pope IOHN being then in Florence, the Emperor sent another Ambassage about the generall Council; and the Pope sent two Cardinals Legats to the Emperor, concluding the Council should be held in Constance, and begin the first of November, An. 1402: which for some occasion was deferred, but yet the Emperor neuer left to procure the same.

The State of Adrian and Lombardy was not in peace in those daies, for there were great wars between the tyrants which were therein, of which I haue named some; but FACINO CANN was of greatest power, for hee held Alexandria, Bercelli, Toriana, and Nouarra, and found the means vnder the title and name of Governour to PHILIP Viscount brother to the Duke of Milan, to get into Pania; and being possessed of that City, he kept yong PHILIP in poore estate in the Fortresse: vnder the same pretext he afterwards made cruell warres against the other tyrants and cities which were his aduersaries. At the same time the Emperour SIGISMUND sent a Captain with a good number of souldiers to make warre vpon the Venecians, wherein (as saith SABELLICVS) hapned many notable aduentures: but for as much as he sheweth not the cause of this warre, I hold it fit to come to matters of greater importance, concerning the Emperours comming into Italy; before which, in the year 1412, FACINO CANN dying, he left neither son nor daughter to succede him but his wife, who was his heire. At that time, IOHN MARIA Duke of Adrian, by reason of his cruelties and bad conditions was slaine by his own seruants and familiars: and those which slew him taking the City, made ASTROGIO Viscount, son to BARNABY Viscount, whom the mighty IOHN GALBAS father of this IOHN MARIA, to haue the dominion of Milan, put to death by treason (being his Vncle) as before declared: which the other brother PHILIP (who was in Pania, and now of age and of power to execute any great attempt) vnderstanding, he by the counsell of his friends tooke the widow of FACINO CANN to wife, notwithstanding that he was much older then himselfe: by which marriage, besides Pania which was his own, he made himselfe Lord of those Towns which FACINO CANN had possessed. His power and courage herewith encreasing, he resolved to see if he could get Milan and the rest, which his father and his brother had enjoyed, and thereupon went presently thither; ASTROGIO not hauing yet gotten the Fortresse, for it defended it selfe against him: so as hauing intelligence with some within the City, and assisted by certain captains which had serued FACINO CANN, he entred Milan, and expelling ASTROGIO, suddenly made himselfe Duke; and in proceesse of time hauing good successe was a great and very redoubted prince, of whom we will sometimes make mention.

These matters before spoken of, together with the tyranny & power of king LADISLAUS of Naples (Italy being out of order) were the causes why the Council appointed to be held in Constance took not much effect as the Emperor SIGISMUND desired: for Pope IOHN, who had appointed the same, durst not goe out of Italy, leauing his competitor GREGORY and the King of Naples with such power behind him; wherefore the Emperor resolved to come

Ecc 2

thither

John Maria
Duke of Adrian slaine.

A party between the Pope and
the Emperor.

thither, to make some conclusion with Pope I O H N concerning the Council, and to assist him against the king of Naples, to the end that the Council might be the more commodiously held; which he presently put in execution; and as the countie was diuided into factions and partialities, some were glad of his coming, and some were sorie. The Pope being certified thereof came from Florence to Bologna, and thence to Placentia, whither came the Emperour, where they two met and staid a month. But what forces the Emperour brought with him, in what manner they were receiued into those cities, or what happened in peace or war, is not distinctly written, but that he was in Lodi and in Cremona, and afterwards in Mantua; where the Marquess gaue him most sumptuous entertainment. In these places they treated of the recouerie of the citie of Rome, and other places which were vsurped by the King of Naples; which seemed very expedient to be done, to the end the Council might be held; and on the other side it seemed that the matter ought to be deferred, considering the Kings great power, with whom the Florentines at that time (more for feare then for any good will) had made peace, and (to the end that he should draw his forces out of their frontiers) were to giue him a great summe of money; for which Pope I O H N was very sorie, for this made his waire more doubtfull. But that feare was soone ouer-past: for L A D I S L A V S feeling himselfe sick, went to Naples, and there died Lord of Rome and of all the territorie thereof, besides his kingdome of Naples. When he died, he left neither son nor daughter, and but one sister whose name was I O A N E, which presently succeeded him in his Kingdome: in whose little time, and after her death in that kingdome, were great wars and combustion about the succession. L A D I S L A V S being dead, the citizens of Rome, crying Libertie, submitted themselves to Pope I O H N, and so did the most part of the other townes; and he sent his Legates to them; for Pope G R E G O R Y although he had a better title, yet he had not so great power to doe it: for hee with his Cardinals liued poorly in Arimino: yet some Princes and people acknowledged him.

Pope I O H N, hauing taken the best order for his busines that he could in Italy, resolved to go to the Council in Germany, whither the Emperour to make prouision of all things necessary (hauing already proclaimed the Council in all parts of Christendome) was already gone: so as after the coming of Pope I O H N and the Bishops, Prelates, and Ambassadors from Christian Princes, into Germany, the generall Council (according to the appointment) began in Constance, vpon the fifth day of November in the yere 1414. Yet in the beginning of the Council there came no Ambassadors from I O H N King of Castile nor from F E R D I N A N D king of Aragon; for that they obeyed B E N E D I C T, who was gone from Aragon into Aragon: yet afterwards they sent their Ambassadors. The first Session thereof was vpon the sixteenth day of November the same yere: and so began this Council, which continued three yeeres, and was one of the greatest and most solemn, and wherein were the greatest number of Princes, Ambassadors and Prelates, that euer was held by the Church of Rome: for writers affirme that with the Emperour, and with the other Princes, Prelates, and Ambassadors, there came 40000. persons. What matters passed, and what was decreed and done in that Council, plainly appeareth in an Instrument which at this day is extant; the summe of that (which is to our purpose) is this:

The Council of Constance.

That vpon Christmas euen ensuing after the Council began, the Emperour accompanied by the Dukes of Saxony and of Wittenberg; and other Princes, came to Constance, where he was solemnly receiued; and afterwards in Imperial pompe and habit it was present at the Sessions of the Council. After New-yeeres day came the Duke of Baviera, and then the Countie Palatine of Rhin, and the Duke of Silesia. Thither also came Cardinals Ambassadors from Pope G R E G O R Y in Arimino; who with authority from him approved the Council: but B E N E D I C T who was in Aragon, would neither come nor send. The Council being solemnised and ordained in this manner, Pope I O H N in the second Session, which was the second of March the same yere, promised and solemnly swore to renounce the Papacie, in case that G R E G O R Y and B E N E D I C T would doe the like: this he did to purchase grace and fauour with the Emperour, to the end that he might continue Pope still; whereof (as all writers affirme) he was unworthy; for his great vices and Insolencies, which were made manifest to the whole Council. Aiid he standing in feare of what after ensued (his owne conscience accusing him) fled in disguised attire into the Duke of Austria's Country who fauoured him & took his part. Whereupon many Ambassadors were sent from the Emperour and the Council to Pope I O H N, and from him to them. The Emperour and the Council proceeded against the Duke of Austria, for that hee was of counsell with the Popes flight, and had (notwithstanding their their prohibitions and warnings to the contrary) harbored and protected him: and the Emperour confisking his goods, the Swissers took certaine places from him. Whereupon the same Duke which had assisted him, now perswaded Pope I O H N to depart and to returne to the Council; whereafter many Citations made and signified vnto him, he submitting himselfe to the Council, and approuing what by them was or should be determined, as it appeareth in the twelfth Session, was by their Sentence pronounced non Pontifex; and the Duke conducted him to Constance: where he voluntarily renouncing the Papacie, was apprehended, and committed to the Count Palatine, in whose custodie he liued miserably the space of three yeeres; what befell him afterwards you shall vnderstand.

After this, CHARLES MALATESTA Lord of Arimino, where Pope G R E G O R Y lay, came to the Council with sufficient authority from him to renounce his right to the Papacie: by vertue whereof he publicly renounced the same in the 14. Session, saying, that Pope G R E G O R Y in the commission which he gaue him said, that for the vniou and vniuersall reformation of the Church, and for redresse of the schisme, it was requisite and expedient that he and the rest which pretended to be Popes, should renounce the Popedom, and that the Council, there assembled should chuse such a one as might be for the good of the Christian common-wealth: and notwithstanding that he was the right Pope and canonically chosen, yet he now, as he euer before had offered to doe, did renounce and there resigne the Papacie into the hands of the Council, approuing what therein by them should be done, or what they had done already. Pope G R E G O R Y'S renunciation was highly esteemed, and he therefore much commended: whereupon the Council holding the Papall seate for void, made him a Legate and gouernor of the Marca de Ancona; which office he enjoyed but a little while, for he shortly after died, as some say of sorrow, to see himselfe deposed from his pontificall seate; and the Council admitted and receiued those Cardinals which had serued him, and were made by him, and had confirmed to them the reuenues which he had giuen them. What appertained to Pope I O H N and Pope G R E G O R Y being ended, it yet rested to deale with B E N E D I C T who was in Aragon, to whom many ambages and admonitions had been sent, that he should either come or send to the Council, for that no Pope should be chosen vntill the schisme were thoroughly ended: what was donetherein we will presently declare. But first I will shew you that amongst other matters which in this Council were decreed and determined, a famous Bohemian whose name was I O H N H V S S E, was therein for certaine opinions which he held, condemned and burnt by the decree and Sentence of the Council; and after him I H R O M of Prague, who was a follower of his. Sentence being giuen against I O H N H V S S E, being deprived of his priestly Orders, he was deliuered to the Ciuill Magistrato to be burnt, and was brought to the place of execution with a Bishops mitre of paper on his head, whereon were diuells painted with this Inscription, This is an Arch-heretik. It is sayd, that before his death hee did preface; with a propheticall spirit, the declining of the Popes Kingdome, saying that there would a goose rise out of his ashes which they should not be able to burne, for in the Bohemian tongue H V S S E signifies a goose. He also vttered these words, After a hundred yeeres you shall make answere to God and to me. And the euent afterwards did verifie and make good the truth of that his prophetic.

The burning of John Husle and Jerome of Prague.

This being past, the Council sent to B E N E D I C T in Aragon and to the King thereof, to treat with them; to the end that B E N E D I C T should renounce the Papacie; and besides this, to treat of a meeting to be had at Nizza betwene the Emperour and the King, where they might conferre of the matter: in the end, in the sixteenth and seuenteenth Session it was concluded that the Emperour in person should with the Ambassadors, from the Council, take the paines to goe to Pope B E N E D I C T, to the end to procure him to renounce the Papacie.

Whereupon he resolving to put their determination in effect, departed from Constance in the moneth of Iuly, in the yere of our Lord, one thousand, four hundred, and fiftene. And forasmuch as at that time there were very great warres betwene the kings of England and of France, the Emperour going in person to each of them, sought to haue reconciled them: but he failing of his purpose, concluded with them, to request and require Pope B E N E D I C T in Aragon to renounce the Papacie; which if he refused, to doe, that then through all their dominions they should command that none of their Subiects should obey him. And passing forwards (for that the King of Aragon, by reason of his infirmities, could not goe out of his Kingdom to meet him in Nizza, or in Narbonne) he was content to goe to Perpignan, whither the King of Arragon and Pope Benedict were already come, where he and the Ambassadors which came from the Councell were by the King very honorably received; and after that the Emperor had visited the King and conferred with him about the matter, he went to the Pope Benedict, whom with the best speeches and reasons he could devise, he perswaded to yeeld to the Councells determination.

To the first, Benedict gave very good words, but generall without any conclusion, and did the like to what the Councells Ambassadors propounded. Afterwards there were other meetings between these Princes and this Pope about the same matter, but to no effect; for Benedict notwithstanding the King of Arragon entreaty, and the Ambassadors from the King of France, for the same purpose deferring the conclusion with delays, departing from Perpignan, went to Collioure: where imbarcking himselfe in a Galley, without any stay (notwithstanding that the King and the Emperor by their Letters desired the contrary) he went thence by Sea to Peniscola, which is a little Towne (but very strong) in the countrey of Valencia in Spain, vpon the Sea coast; whither both the Emperor and king of Arragon sent vnto him: but he persisting obstinate, the king vpon the fift of January, in the yeere of our Lord, 1416, reiecting him, denied him to bee Pope.

This being published, the Emperor and the Ambassadors took their way towards Constance: and in his returne (as I gesse) was his journey to the Kings of England and of France, concerning Pope Benedict: for by the Histories it appeareth not when it was, but it seemeth to be at his returne, for he came not to Constance vntill the beginning of the yeere of our Lord, one thousand foure hundred and seuentene, having spent one whole yeer vpon the way betweene Spain and Constance, being one yeer and a halfe after his departure from the Councell to goe this journey. Those which write that he spent three yeeres therein are to be excused, for he took part of all three yeeres, to wit, 1415, 1416, and 1417. The Emperor and the Ambassadors being returned, and the Councell hauing at large heard their relation, they resolved to proceede against Pope Benedict, as against a rebell, and one whom they neuer had held for Pope; and his accusation was signified vnto him, with a new charge to renounce: but he persisting in his obstinacy was denounced for no Pope, but an Heretick, a schismatick, and a scandalous perturbator of the vniuersall peace of the Christian Church and Common-wealth: And the Kingdoms of Castile, Nauarre, and Portugall, which vntill then had been at his deuotion, reiected him.

The Councell (by reason of the renunciations made by John and Gregory, and Benedict being depriued) holding the Papacy for voided, determined to chuse a new Pope: and appointing fise Prelates of fise seuerall nations, to wit, French, English, Spanish, Italian and Dutch, to these, together with the Patriarch of Constantinople, and to the Cardinals which had chosen the other Popes, the Councell gave order to choose a Pope; all which agreeing together, chose Cardinal Otho de Columna, and he was called Martin the fift. This Martin being chosen (to auoide all occasion of scruple) ordayned that euery tenth yeer a Councell should be held, and that the first should begin at the end of fise yeers, and that all the benefices giuen by the three Popes before that John and Gregory renounced, and Benedict was depriued, should be confirmed. After this, in the fise and forth Session, in the moneth of April, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand foure hundred and eightene, three yeeres and a halfe after the beginning of this Councell, it was dissolved, and the Pope tooke his way towards Rome, and all the rest towards their Countreies. At this time the Emperour made the Earles of Cleues and of Sauoy, Dukes, and so haue their successors continued euer since.

The Emperor hauing newly redeemed the Marquisate of Brandenburgh, from William Lantzgraue of Wirting; to whom Idocys, Marquesse of Moravia, his cosen germane, had pawned it when he aspired to the Empire, the same with the Electorall dignity he sold to Fredrick Burgraue of Nuremberg, a Prince of knowne wisdom, magnanimity, loyaltye and authority, hauing deserved well both of the Emperor and Common-wealth, for foure hundred thousand Crowns; with this condition, that if the Emperor should haue a sonne, it should then be lawfull for him to redeem it. And yet in this sale the price was not so much regarded, as the reward of Fredrick's vertues and merits, who had done Sigismund great seruises, and vndergone many dangers for him. There is one memorable thing written of this Fredrick; who, making his Will, called his foure sonnes vnto him, speaking to John the eldest after this manner: I first got this septentrionall dignity when I was familiar with the Emperor Sigismund; and now that I am cald out of this life, my cares, that such an honor should not grow contemptible in our family; Thou I see art wholly inclined to a quiet and contemplative course of life: In this Septentrionall charge thou shalt finde nothing but cares and continuall toyle; wherefore if I might, with your liking, I would giue this charge by my will to Fredrick my second brother, who seemes to be more fit for action: To whom John answered, I did alwaies thinke that Fredrick had been more decre vnto you then my selfe, which did somewhat grieue me, but now deere father, I will change my opinion, and will honor and loue you, who by your last will bequeath rest to me and cares to him. A notable example in old Fredrick, not of fatherly affection, but of wisdom, providing for the publike: and of modesty in John the sonne, yeelding to his fathers iudgement touching the succession, without any froward opposition.

Em-

This being ended, the Emperor went to pacifie the troubles in Bohemia, where the followers of John Hus and Jerom of Prague which were burnt at the Councell of Constance, were of such power that they pulled down some Churches and Monasteries, which did more abound in Bohemia then in any kingdom in all Christendom; the King hauing little meanes to redresse the same. I say King, for Wenceslaus who had been Emperor, liued vntill this time, who holding not himselfe to be in safety in the City of Prague, retired himselfe to a most strong Castle, about fise miles from thence, and being there the Hussites rose and committed many infortunes: Which King Wenceslaus perceiving, he sent to his brother the Emperor (as at other times he had done) for aide, about the time that the Councell brake vp at Constance: but he was so resolved to go to the warres against the Turkes which annoyed him in Hungary, or peradventure in hope to be reuenged for the battaile which he lost against them before that he was Emperor, which I write not for that it maketh nothing to my purpose: the which he did contrary to his duty, and therein had ill successe, and in Bohemia worse, for presently after this, King Wenceslaus dying without leauing any successeor but his wife the Queene, the Emperour was sent for to take possession of that Kingdom: but desirous to renew the warre against the Turkes, wherein most commonly he had ill successe, he would not come, thinking to entertaine the matter by Gouernors which he sent thither: wherein he erred, for that occasion being lost, the troubles encreased; and there arose one John Cysca, a man of a noble house and very expert in the warres, whom the Hussites made their Captaine, to whom out of Prague and other parts thereto adjoyning, came 40000 of the Hussites; who not content with the subuerting of Monasteries and pulling down of Images, possessed themselves of the forresties of that City, and being masters of the field, took the towne of Relesina, and other towns and castles.

Cysca Captaine of the Hussites
in Bohemia.

Cysca before the coming of the Emperours Gouernors, was grown so mighty, that they were constrained to make peace with him and with the Hussites, to the end that they should giue vp Prague and other Castles, which they desired to haue vntill the Emperours coming, which was shortly after; wherewith far greater accidents ensued, when peace and quietnes was hoped for; as we will declare after that we haue made some relation of the state of the Empire in Italie, wherein they now know no Emperor but in name only; and likewise of the coming, and successe of the new Pope.

The Councell being dissolved, Pope Martin notwithstanding that he was diuersly counselled, (by some, that he should continue in Germany, and by others, in France) remained firme in his resolution to goe into Italy and to Rome, alleging that he which gouerneth the ship, ought to sit at the Helme, and not in the Prow, neither in the mid ship. In conclusion, he departed from Germany the same yeer that he was chosen, and came directly to Milan; for Duke Philipp (who by his policy and valour was grown very mighty) was his friend. At that time Philipp was busied in the warres against Andvph Malatesta, who withheld Bergamo and Brescia from him, and against Gabrio Fondulo, who held Cremona; and against other Lords which held other places which had been his fathers, the mighty John Galas; and were lost in the time of his brother John Maria; in which warres Philipp had so good successe, that he recovered all those estates, and was afterwards one of the most puissant princes of the world, and was Lord also of Genoa. He possessed the state of Milan vntill he died, which were two and thirty yeeres, in which time he had great wars with the Venetians and Florentines, and with other Princes; whereof of necessity we must sometimes make mention of him.

From Milan the Pope came to Florence, but could not goe to Rome, for that one Baccio

MONTEIO (an excellent Captain, and of very great power) in the time of Sede vacante, and of the Councell, had taken the City of Perugia, and the Territory thereof, and many other Towns in the iurisdiction of Rome: and many others of his condition ioyned with him: so as there was no safe passage for the Pope to Rome, wherein the said BRACCIO MONTEIO had a strong party. But at the intercession of the Florentines, which were mediators between them, BRACCIO MONTEIO afterwards submitted himself to the Pope, and rendered some Towns which he had taken; and the Pope made him his General against Bohemia which rebelled: which by him, and by GABRIEL Cardinall of Saint CLYMENT, was reduced to the Popes obedience.

In those daies (but somewhat before this time) BALTHASAR COSSA, which had been Pope JOHN (who renounced his Papacy in the Councell of Constance, of whom Pope MARTIN stood in no small fear that he would have attempted some alteration by taking vpon him as Pope, and would have renewed the schisme) came into Italy, and finding fauor and entertainment among some of his friends, would not intermeddle in any matter; but of his owne accord without any safe conduct or other agreement, at such time as no man thought thereof, came voluntarily to Florence where the Pope lay; and comming into his Palace, kist his foot, and acknowledged him for Pope, Saint PETER's Successor, and CHRIST's Vicar; whereupon, Pope MARTIN made him a Bishop and a Cardinall: but he, within few months after dying, was in Florence most solemnly buried, by the procurement (principally) of COSMO DE MEDICI, a rich and noble Citizen thereof, and chief of the house and family of the Medici's, whose beginning (as it is written) was through the treasure and riches which hee inherited from this BALTHASAR COSSA, otherwife called Pope JOHN.

Pope MARTIN, knowing what troubles were in the Kingdome of Bohemia, fought by his Bulls to haue pacified the matter: but seeing it was comn to blowes, the friendship betwixt him and the Emperor SIGISMUND was soon after broken. In those daies came to *Rome LEUVVS, Duke of Aniow and Earl of Prouence, son to the other LEUVVS deceased, to receiue from the Pope the title and inuestiture of the Kingdome of Naples, against Queen IOAN, sister and heire to King LADISLAVS; being called thither by the Pope for the same purpose, through her ill gouernment and tyranny, but chiefly for that she ioyned with BRACCIO MONTEIO to offend made warre vpon him, and for other matters too long to relate. The Pope proceeding against her, and holding her vnworthy to enioy the feudatory lands of the Church, sent for Duke LEUVVS, offering him the Kingdome of Naples: but Queen IOAN, being thereof aduertised, adopted ALONZO King of Aragon (who was also King of Sicilia) whom shee called to her aid, and to the succession in that Kingdome; who came accordingly. The Queen afterwards (according to her naturall condition) falling at oddes with him, and reuoking the adoption which she had made of ALONZO, adopted the same LEUVVS whom the Pope had called. Hereof grew the wars between LEUVVS and ALONZO for the Kingdome of Naples; and, after the deace of LEUVVS, with his brother ROBERT, which was continued many yeers: but in the end, ALONZO hauing the victory, obtained the soueraignty of that Kingdome.*

These things passed in Italy, where the Emperors were now of small power: and in Germany, the warres which the Turk made in Hungary being asswaged, the Emperor resolved (though late) to come into Bohemia, to take possession of that Kingdome: whether if hee had presently comn, it is very likely that the troubles there had been pacified: for, at his comming to Brno, which is in Moravia, Ambassadors came to him from Prague to submit themselves, and to sue for pardon; which hee entertained and heard, and proposing certain tolerable conditions, granted them a generall pardon: the newes whereof were very ioyfull to the Inhabitants of that City and Kingdome; to the Hussites, to see themselves pardoned of their offences; and to the rest, in hope to liue in peace. But all this was crost, for that the King came not presently to take possession of that City which is the head of that Kingdome, where they peaceably attended his coming; but he would first go to Praha, the chief City of Silesia, a province to the East of Bohemia. There, as well as in Prague (in time of the insurrection of the people) the Gouernours which were left there by WENCESLAVS were slain; and the Emperor, to punish the offence, did iustice vpon the principall heads of that rebellion.

As the newes thereof was published in Prague, and as their offences were equall or greater, this vnreasonable punishment strake such a terror into the people, that they fearing the like rigour, without any further consideration rose vp in Arms; and resolving to refuse him for their King, wrote

wrote their Letters, thereby inciting the rest through all the kingdome to doe the like; publishing that he had resolved to commit great cruelty amongst them! This took such effect in the greatest and best part of the kingdome, the people took Armes: and as the greatest part of those of Prague were Hussites (the rest ioyning with them) they altogether sent for a Capitaine of the Hussites, a man of great power, whose name was CISCA, whom they put into Prague for defence thereof against the Emperor, who was comming against it. Hee encountered in that City and Kingdome many encounters, skirmishes; batailles and bloodshed by fire and sword; such as neuer was seen or heard of, and such as I am not able to relate: the most effectual whereof may be seen in the third booke of HEMBAS STRIUIVS, afterwards called PATRVS QUINTVS; in his History of Bohemia: for my part I will rest satisfied, briefly mentioning the most notable accidents which happened. The Emperor accompanied by the Duke of Saxony, the Marquess of Brandenburgh, and the Duke of Austria, with many other souldiers both of Foote and Horse, came neere to the City of Prague: Whereof the Fortresse called Vincograde was at his deuotion.

CISCA and his people very resolutely battered the same, but their chiefest hope was to take it by famine. The Emperor comming thither released the Fortresse, and entering it, was therein crowned King of Bohemia: the Fortresse being victualled and garriisoned; he presently besieged the City; which siege continued six weekes; in which time in all the skirmishes and encounters which happened, it pleased God that CISCA and his followers had the better: the like issue befell in a manner in all parts of the kingdome, between the Hussites and the Imperialists. Whereupon the Emperor raising his siege from before Prague, came to Chama: and CISCA leauing the City, ioyned with the Tabornites, so called after the name of a City founded by them, and so called: And being victorious, and not contented to make defensive warres only, taking the field, he likewise tooke some Townes and Castles from his aduersaries.

Many other conflicts after this ensued, which I omit: and the matter came to this issue, that the Emperor with his whole power came to a strong Monastery which he called for CISCA; with a resolution to batter and to take it; and if CISCA came to the reliefe thereof, to fight with him: for his army was such, that he doubted nothing of the victory. But there befell a strange accident: which was, that CISCA resolving to come to the reliefe of that Castle; and so to fight with the Emperor, and being come to the point to haue ioyned, the Emperors troups but at sight of their enemies, making no resistance, or shewing the mindes or courage of men, sodainly ranne away; and the Emperor was driven to do the like, nor daring to stay in any part of all Bohemia: So as CISCA and his people being masters of the field, besieged many strong holds and Castles, which he took by force: At the assault of one of which; as he had but one eye, that one was shot out with an arrow; but his credit and reputation was so great, that he continued in the gouernment and command of the Army, which was led by a blinde Christian: a thing neuer seen nor read in any History; for notwithstanding that he was blinde, yet he still prosecuted the wars.

The Emperor (notwithstanding these disasters) was not dismayed: but leauing his whole power he sent for the Princes of the Empire, whom he appointed to enter Bohemia by the West; and he with his Hungars would enter it by the East. Thither came with great troups the Duke of Saxony, the Count Palatine of Rhine, the Marquess of Brandenburgh, the Archbishops of Meuse, and some other Princes and Prelates; who began the warre; and besieged and took some townes. The Emperor stayed longer then he had appointed, but comming with his Army, he began on his side, and notwithstanding that CISCA was blinde yet he took the field against him; and comming to loyne in bataille, the Emperors men were slaine with such feare of CISCA and of the Hussites, that they were presently ouerthrowne, and many principall men of them were slaine; and the Emperor infortunate in the warres, being driven to flee, CISCA followed the execution of the victory.

Matters standing in this estate, the Nobles and principalls of Prague and of all Bohemia desiring to haue a King, that might oppose himselfe against SIGISMUND by force to yield them lawes, and their Kingdome to VITSLAV Duke of Lithuania; for which CISCA was sorry: The Duke desirous to be a King, accepting their offer, sent a Capitaine called TOKY with his power who being gladly receiued into the City, began to shew the power of a new King, and to batter such castles and Fortresses as were his aduersaries. But this Duke within short tyme after, at the entreaty of the King of Poland, comming to a composition with the Emperor, gave over his

The Emperor making warre against the Hussites, besieged the City of Prague.

The Emperor coming to fight with the Hussites at the sight of them, his people fled without blow striking.

The Emperor overthrowing the army of the King of Poland, and their Duke, Captain of Cilicia.

warres for the Kingdom of Naples.

his enterprise and title to the Crown of Bohemia. It followed, that the Emperor gave the Province of Moravia to Albert his son-in-law, one of the Dukes of Austria, to the end that hee should defend the same; and he returning to the war against the Hussites, there hapned betwixt Cressa and the Imperialists another great battell; wherein Cressa having the victory, nine thousand of the Imperialists were slain.

The Emperor, seeing the power of Cressa to bee so great, that without his good will hee could not be King of Bohemia, sought to be at peace with him; and to that end made him many large promises and offers: at the time of the parley, being at a point to have made a conclusion, Cressa died of the plague; after whose death the Hussites were divided into several factions, of which some were called Hussites, and some Taborites; so as they were at variance and contention amongst themselves: but warring against the Imperialists, they ever ioynd and were friends.

After many other accidents, Pope Martin sending his Legate into Germany, commanded the Emperor to renew the warre against the Bohemians: and the Duke of Saxony entering the Countrey upon the one side, and the Marquess of Brandenburgh upon another side, and at another place the Archbishop of Treuer, either of them with the greatest power they were able to levie; all which, meeting together in Bohemia, and beginning the war, and knowing that the Hussites came to fight with them (a matter seeming incredible, yet true although strange and shameful) they were stricken with such fear, that without seeing or hearing any enemy, both Captains and Souldiers setting all flame apart, abandoning the field, ran away in such manner, that neither entreaty nor authority was able to stay them; and the Hussites, pursuing them, took all their baggage and artillery, and not content therewith, salving forth of their Kingdom, warred in other parts; out of which, in consideration of a great summe of money, they returned home again.

The Pope, understanding in what estate the affairs of Bohemia stood, resolved to give a Croisade, and to send a new Legate against the Bohemians, notwithstanding that in Italy there was as little quietnes; but great wars, as well in the Kingdom of Naples as in Lombardy and in other parts. And to that effect he sent Livian, Cardinal of S. Angelo, to be his Legate against the Hussites, and that (the time being expired) he might sit in his place in the Councell appointed to be held in Basil. This Cardinal coming to the Emperor, it was decreed, that a new Armie, and new forces, to a greater number than before, should be leuied against the Hussites; whither came Frederick, Marquess of Brandenburgh (who was chosen General) and the Dukes of Bavaria and of Saxony, the Archbishops of Meiss, Treuer and Cole, and many Bishops, Prelates and Princes, together with the companies of the Cities, and so many others, that they amounted to the number of forty thousand horse, but not so many foot (for, it seems they were not so requisite for that war); who with this power entered the Kingdom of Bohemia, the Cardinal Legate going with the Army. But the Hussites were so accustomed to the hearing of Arms, and were therewith so courageous, that they drew themselves to one head, with a resolution to fight with the Imperialists: and the one Army being opposite to the other, so as no man doubted but that the Imperialists (considering their multitude, and the goodnes of their Captains and Souldiers) would have had the victory, there hapned the strangest accident that ever was seen, whether through treason or practice in the Army, or through some vain & cowardly fear or imagination, or through the secret iudgement of God who was not pleased that the matter should be decided by Arms, there fell a sudden fear in the Camp, and a rumor that they were not to stay there; whereupon they all beganne presently to march, leaving behinde them all they brought, and many of their Arms and furnitures; and the whole Army (no admonition, threatening or intreaty, made by the Princes and Commanders, being able to prevail with them) fled; and they did the like, without seeing or fighting with any enemy: and so they fleeing out of the Countrey, the Hussites made great booty of what their enemies left, and could not carry with them.

Seeing an Army being so shamefully overthrowne, the Emperor intended not (for that time) to visit any other; but the time being expired that the Councell should begin, the Cardinal Legate went to Basil; and the Emperor, by reason of the aid and assistance promised him by Pope Martin, Duke of Milan, resolved to go into Italy to be crowned in Rome. At this time died Pope Martin; and after his decease, a Cardinal called Gabriel Condulmer a Gentleman of France, was in March in the year 1431 chosen, and called Eugenius the Fourth: in the beginning of whose Papacy many insolencies (as saith Platina and other riters) were committed in Rome between the Pope and the Colonnois. Eugenius, approving the Councell appointed by Pope Martin, commanded it to be begunne in Basil; where, the Cardinal of Saint Angelo being President, the first Session was held upon Friday, the seventh of December: whereof before that we make any relation, which shall be but little (notwithstanding that it continued long, and that therein was much controuersie and contention with the Pope) we will describe the journey Sigismund made to his coronation, which was in this manner:

Wri-

Upon assurance of the promises and offers made by the Duke of Milan, Sigismund with small troops of Germans and Hungars came into Italy; and coming to Milan, the Duke being not there, he was by the Dukes commandement very honourably received by a Captain of his called Nicholas Pichino, and other principall men, and there according to the custome was crowned with the Crown of Iron: but the Duke came not to see him; yet hee afterwards by Letters and delays temporized with him many daies in Parma and in Placencia, yet not furnishing him with such things as he had promised against the Florentines, who, as enemies to the Duke, stopped his passage to Rome, and to that effect maintained an Armie in field: and moreover they perswaded the Pope to prohibit his coming to Rome, assuring him, that by the instigation of Duke Philip he came against him. The Emperor, without speaking with the Duke in the best manner that he could came to Luca; and notwithstanding that the Pope and the Florentines sought to stay him, yet he, after some accidents which hapned between the souldiers of the one and other side, came to Siena, where he staid six monthes; in which time he came to a composition with the Pope, many ambassages passing between them in the mean season; so as he peaceably departing towards Rome, was therein solemnly received, and with great solemnity crowned by the hands of the Pope, upon the last day of May in the year of our Lord 1432; and after some treatie he took his leave to return into Germany. By the way he was entertained in Ferrara and Mantua, by their Lords and Dukes (the warres continuing in Italy, as before) wherein passed many great matters: the principals were the Florentines and Venetians which made war against the Duke of Milan, who now was become Lord of Genoa, the which hee tooke by means of the dissention and discord that grew betwene the Inhabitants.

Whilst the Emperor was in Italy, in the Councell at Basil many matters were treated of, but had not yet taken such effect as they desired: for, the Hussites persisting constant in their opinions, the Councell sent thither certain learned men, such as well knew the Countrey, who by flattery and fair means sought to have seduced the Bohemians; in whom they sometimes found hope of peace, and at other times signes of warre: and so the case continuing as doubtfull as before, it pleased God that by secret means unknowne to man, there grew some suspition & jealousy between the Nobility of that Kingdom (whereof one Mennander was the chiefe) and the Taborites and the Hussites (notwithstanding that some of the Nobles were Hussites); but in the end it grieved them all to be governed by Procopius, a man of base parentage, who being General of the Taborites, commanded all; and by another Procopius called the younger, Captain of the Hussites. After that they had long murmured at the matter, they summoned a Parliament to be held by all the estates of the Realm, vnder pretext to set some order in the government: for they were discontented with the violence and insolencies daily committed. Finally, the Parliament was assembled, and a Noble-man and nobly defended, although of mean estate, whose name was Alcicon, was nominated and made their Gouvernor, and he presently undertook the government. And although he had the title and outward shew, yet all was done by the order and direction of Mennander the chiefe of the Nobility. Herewith the Hussites and the Procopii were so much discontent, that the matter came to blowes, I cannot describe all that passed; for there were many notable accidents: but I will tell you the euient thereof.

When the Emperor, coming out of Italy into Germany, was upon his way towards Basil, hee understood that between the Pope and the Councell there was great discord: for, the Pope perceiving that the Councell began to treat of many matters against his authority and dignity, commanded it to be dissolved, and to be transferred to Bologna; and the Councell, rejecting his commandements, would not accomplish what he required, but made other acts and statutes to his disgrace. Whereupon many matters passed, and the Emperor came to the Councell; and there hearing the matter debated, made a reconciliation between them: and the Pope againe ratified the Councell; yet they afterwards fell further at variance, as you shall hear: for, those

The Emperor
Sigismund crowned in Rome
by the Pope.

Dissention betwixt the Pope and the Councell of Basil.

of

of the Councell, refusing to make an end, continued the Councell a long time in despite of the Pope: but the Emperor by his authority in the best manner that he could tooke vp the matter; and vnderstanding of the warres between the Nobility and the Hussites in Bohemia, holding the same for the most assured mean for him to recouer that Kingdom, went from Basil to Vlm, where he was aduertised of a battell fought between them, wherein the Lords had the victory; and therein were both the Procopii (Captaines of the Hussites and Tabouriers) slaine, with many thousands of others; and a great number were taken prisoners: and they found the meanes afterwards to kill or burn all those which were taken, or escaped from the battell. The Emperor, vnderstanding heerof, sent his Ambassadors into Bohemia, to perswade the Nobility to obey and receiue him for their King, for that of right it appertained to him, as to the sonne and brother to the Kings of Bohemia. And it pleased God to work such an alteration in the hearts of the Bohemians, that they sent their Ambassadors to Ratisbone, whither the Emperor was gon from Vlm, to whom they gaue order to receiue him for their King and soueraign Lord: and they agreed with him concerning his coming into Bohemia; and he there ratified the conditions concluded by those of the Councell with the Bohemians, concerning points of religion; which in summe was, that that the Bohemians wholly submitted themselves to the Church of Rome, and that they, beleeuing as it did, forsooke all matters in question, except communicating vnder both kinds of bread and wine; which was granted them vpon this condition, that the matter should be referred to the determination of the Councell: and all other matters concerning Church-rents and goods, and other ecclesiasticall benefices, were concluded and agreed vpon.

These matters being ended, the Emperor within fewe daies after peaceably entring Bohemia, was with feasting and great solemnity, vpon the fourth day of August, in the yeer of our Lord 1436, receiued into the City of Prague: he had been there but a fewe daies space, but ther was so great an alteration, that it seemed a new world, and another kinde of people: for, notwithstanding that there remained some of the sect of the Hussites, yet the greatest and most common were Papists. The Temples which had been spoiled and ruinated were new built, and those which were defaced were repaired, and the Altars were decked with Images and Reliques, and the Monks and Friars returned to their Couents and Cloisters: finally, all was restored to the former order. Of the pretended Hereticks, which would not be conuerted, some fled for feare of imprisonment, and to others a time was limited wherein they should recant; and against such as persisted constant, the Emperor proceeded: for his success heerin, Pope Eugenius sent him a Rose of gold, who at that time commanded the Councell at Basil to bee dissolved, and a generall Councell to be held at Ferrara; where they expected the Emperour of Constantinople: but the Councell of Basil, holding themselves to be about the Pope, would not obey him, neither be dissolved.

The Emperor being now threescore and ten years old, and tired with warres and troubles both before and after he was Emperour (which were more than I haue written) began to wax feeble and sickly; and perceiving death to approach, he was aduertised that his wife (considering that he was old, and could not liue long, and that he had but one daughter which was married to Albert of Austria) sought, as soon as he should be dead, to marry with the King of Poland; and that the Bohemians should take him and her for King and Queen. For redress heerof, and being somewhat ialous of the Bohemians for matters past, he sent for the Noble-men of Hungary which came with him into Bohemia; to whom in seeret (aduertising them of what passed) he recommended his daughter and son-in-law, and made them to promise to take them for their King and Queen after his decease. And notwithstanding that he was very sick, yet hee caused himself to be carried out of Prague towards Hungary, where he desired to die: but being vnable to reach thither, he was carried to his daughter and son-in-law in Moravia, who by his gift, possessed that Prouince, which came to meet him in the City of Zemnia; whither also came his wife the Emperesse, who there by his commandement was apprehended. The Emperor within fewe daies after, in the 37 yeer of his Raig, vpon the day of the conception of our Lady, in the yeer of our Lord 1437, died. And so ended this Prince both his life and troubles; who although he had vnfortunate successe, especially in Arms and warres, yet he failed in nothing that belonged to a wife and valiant Knight. This Emperor might well be paralleled with the ancient THOMAS and CHARLES, for the excellency of his wit, piety, wisdome, greatnes of minde, industry, dexterity of counsell, and patience in labor, if fortune had been answerable to his wife resolutions and commendable attempts, and that God had not denied successe to his iust and necessary Arms against the Turk. He remained no more to these Turkish warres, being hindred with intestine combustions, and terrified (as I conceiue) with the remembrance of two ouerthrowes; and although he desired to be reuenged of these cruell and Barbarous enemies, yet he durst not make triall of a third battell. He delighted much in the reading of Histories. He had alwaies this Saying in his mouth, He knows not how to raig, that cannot dissemble; meaning, that he must not do all things according to his owne will. He hated a flatterer as the plague: but when as a slander by did blame the Emperor, saying that hee was gouerned by flatterers; he answered, So it falls out in Courts: those whom wee hate most and seek to shun, we are forced to obey. Speaking of gouernment, he was wont to say, that all men refused to practise any Art which they had not leard; but no man refused to command, which is the most difficult of all Arts. Blessed were Kings on earth, if hauing excluded proud men from all gouernment, they drew into their Courts such as are milde and graue. And when-as his Courtiers did blame the railing of the German multitude, who commonly spake ill of their Princes; smiling he answered, Do you think it strange that they speak ill, when as we doo ill? In his youth he was vindicative, but age and experience tempered this heat: wherefore one expostulating with him, that he not only pardoned his enemies, but also fauoured and aduanced them; Thou, said he, thinkest it a benefit to kill an enemy, for that there is not any danger in a dead man: but I kill an enemy when I spare him; and I make him my friend when I aduance him. He was twice married, first to MARY daughter to the King of Hungary, by whom he had that Kingdom; the second time with BARBARA, daughter to the Earle of Cilla, by whom he had his daughter ISABEL which was his heir, and married to ALBERT one of the Dukes of Austria, who then was Lord and Marquesse of Moravia. His wife after his death was set at liberty: but spending her daies infamously, in the end she died of the plague.

WARs

The state of Italy when SIGISMUND died was so confused and out of order, that except I should relate the whole, I cannot expresse the same in such sort as it may be vnderstood. Duke PHILIP of Milan, being an enemy to Pope Eugenius, fauoured the Councell of Basil: and the Florentines and Venecians supported the Pope against him. There were other warres among them; wherein the most famous Captains were, FRANCIS SFOERCE before named, and NICHOLAS PICHINO. ALONSO King of Aragon (Queen IOHNE and LEVVES being dead) contended with RENE, LEVVES his brother, about the Kingdom of Naples. A little before that LEVVES died, K. ALONSO and his brother the King of Nauarre being taken in a battell by sea, and with them many other Lords by the fleet of the Genoais, were carried prisoners to Duke PHILIP of Milan, who then was Lord of Genoa; who, shewing his magnificence, released them, and set them at liberty: which the Genoais took in so ill part, that they reuolting made themselves free from the Duke.

In those daies were cruell wars between the Kings of England and France; and amongst the French was a woman which bare Arms like a souldier, and afterwards (as a Captain) wrought wonders, and defended and recovered many Castles for the French: this woman was called IRANNE la Pucelle.

After the decease of EMANUEL Emperour of Constantinople, his son IOHN PALAEOLOGVS reigned, who was already vpon the way to come to the Councell in Italy:

FFF

THE

THE LIFE OF ALBERT, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND TWELFTH RO- mane Emperour; And of Iohn Paleologus in CONSTANTINOPLE.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

Sigmund being dead, his son-in-law Albert was peaceably chosen; who was in some doubt to accept the Empire, by reason of the Kingdom of Hungary: which being past, he accepted the government. For that he lived not long, he could not effect so great matters as he promised. He had warres with some rebels, which hee luckily ended. But he could not make any peace or union between the Councils which were held in his time, one in Basil without the Pope, the other in Ferrara where the Pope was in person; which Council was afterwards ended in Florence. He took Arms against Amurath King of the Turks, in the behalf of the Dispute of Serbia: but, being in a little village upon his way, he died of Dysenteria, having reigned but a small time. His death was much lamented, by reason of the great hope conceived of his vertue.

THE same day that the Emperor SIGISMUND died, his sonne-in-law ALBERT Duke of Austria was by all the principall Lords of both those Kingdomes which were there with him, together with his wife SIGISMUND'S daughter, to whom in right those Kingdoms appertained, hailed King of Hungary and Bohemia; who from that City of Zemonia which is in Moravia, sent Ambassadors into Bohemia, with SIGISMUND'S Will and Testament, and by his authority to take possession of that Kingdom: and he with his wife, carrying with them the dead body of the Emperor, and the widow Emperesse prisoner, departed towards Hungary; where they were without any contradiction received and obeyed, and afterwards with great solemnity, upon the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1438, crowned; having first performed the Imperiall funerals and obsequies.

In the meantime, his Ambassadors which were in Bohemia, assembling the principall Lords of that Realm in the City of Prague, shewed the Testament of the deceased Emperor and their King; and alleging many effectual reasons, perswaded them to chuse ALBERT, as well for that he had married the onely daughter and heir of their King, as also for that hee was of the house of Austria; between which and Bohemia there was an ancient covenant, that whensoever there failed an heir in any one of these houses, one should be chosen out of the other. Finally, the Ambassadors vied so good means, that the Assembly concluded, that ALBERT and his wife should be their King and Queen; and so in their absence they were sworn vato, and received for such, notwithstanding that some of the principall Barons were against the same: among which many were the Emperesse kinsmen; of which the chiefest were TASON and ALBERT'S BROTHER, which were consenting to the practice which we spake of when the Emperor died. These men, requiring certain conditions which might not be granted, departed from ALBERT'S service and obedience: which, calling and inuiting others to ioyne with them them, chose for their King, CASIMIR brother to the King of Poland; and they sending for him to come and take possession of the Kingdom, offered him their aid and seruice in the action.

In this mean time, the Electors of the Empire being certified of the death of the Emperor SIGISMUND, met in Frankford to chuse a new Emperor; where ALBERT, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and Duke of Austria, was upon the twentieth day of March, in the year 1438, chosen; and being by the same Princes advertised of his election, very gladly gave ear to their Ambassage, but yet could not presently accept the government, for that when he was sworn in Hungary, he promised the Hungars, notwithstanding he were chosen, hee would not accept the Empire, because it was not held expedient for that Kingdom, that the King thereof should be Lord of any other Countries, but should make his abode in Hungary onely; producing the Emperor SIGISMUND for example, whose absence was the occasion of many inconveniences in that Country. But notwithstanding all this, new Ambassages daily arriving, hee caused the principall Lords and the Burgeses of Cities in Hungary to meet in the City of Vienna in Austria, wherein he found some contradiction: but in the end the Hungars being intreated and perswaded by FREDERICK, Duke also of Austria, they consented to his election, and ALBERT accepted thereof; and presently went to be crowned at Aken, which was acceptable to all Germany: for, he was held for a wife and valorous Prince, and shewed the same in the final time that he enjoyed the Empire.

Albert Duke of Austria chosen Emperor.

Albert crowned Emperor in Aken.

ALBERT, knowing that CASIMIR brother to the King of Poland had accepted the Kingdom of Bohemia, and that with the aid of his brother he leuied forces for that enterprife, sent his Ambassadors to the King, desiring him, that si he well knew him to be the right King of Bohemia, he would not suffer their iust friendship for any vniust cause to be broken: where the King of Poland answered, that he could not let his brother to accept that Kingdom which by the natural subiects thereof was offered him, together with other excuses such as he thought good. Within few daies after, the Emperor entred Bohemia, notwithstanding that TASON and the rest of his faction sent (with certain protestations) to require him that he should not do it: but he, holding on his journey, was in the month of May, in the year 1438, crowned in the City of Prague. And TASON, and such others as took CASIMIR'S part, ioyning themselves with the men of warre which came out of Poland, raised an Army; and taking the field, and fortifying such Towns as were at their deuotion, warred vpon the rest: and the Emperor with the Troops which he brought with him, and others which came to his aid, did the like. And notwithstanding that others were expected to come to him out of Austria and from other parts, yet he would not stay, but went to seek his enemies and to fight with them: but TASON and the Polacres not daring to giue him battell, retreating, encamped themselves neer to the City of Tabor, which was inhabited by pretended Hereticks, whither the Emperor pursuing them, had in his Army CHRISTOPHER Duke of Baniere, FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, and ALBERT Marquesse of Brandenburg: which there pitching their Tents, daily skirmishes passed between them; wherein the Polacres and Bohemians were so hardly bested, that they disbanding, part of them put themselves into Tabor, which is a most strong impregnable Town; and ALBERT, knowing it to be such, returned to Prague: and the Polacres (fewer in number than they came into that Country) returned to their houses; so as the Emperor, finding no resistance, discharged his souldiers which were strangers: and some Princes which came to his aid, returned to their Countries; yet between the one and the other Kingdomes some roads and incursions continued: but shortly after a truce was taken between them. And forasmuch as there came tidings of the coming of AMURATH the great Turk with a great power into Hungary, ALBERT was constrained to leaue Governours in Bohemia, and to take his way thitherward, with a determination to leuie forces and to fight with the Turks, notwithstanding that he was counselled by many to the contrary, being feared with the infortunate battell fought by the Emperor SIGISMUND. But notwithstanding all their admonitions and perswasions, nothing could diuert the Emperor, so great a desire had he to fight: and that which more increased his resolution, was, that the Dispute of Serbia, fleeing from AMURATH, came into Hungary to implore aid and succor to relieue and vnset his sonne which was besieged in the City of Sinderunia, situate vpon the side of the riuer Danubius, which the Turk held besieged, and put it to great distresse: wherefore the Emperor resolved to raise his forces for that journey, which was in the year of our Lord 1439.

At this time the discord and contention between the Councell of Basil and the Pope grew more violent: for, notwithstanding the Popes commandments to dissolve (it hauing now continued eight or nine yeeres since it first began) they held, and refusing to be dissolved, cited the Pope to make his personall appearance before them. In this Council they disputed long of the authority and power of the Pope: and in the end they decreed that the authority of the Council was about the Pope, and that they might displace the Pope; and that not onely Bishops, but other learned and godly men should haue their voices. Hereupon EVGENIUS finding that this Decree would shake the Popes authority, and that the Council would arrogate more liberty then he thought fit, he refused to dissolve it.

The Pope hereupon summoned a generall Council to be held in Ferrara, which was the yeere before (by his commandement) begun by the Cardinall S. Crosse, whither the Pope himself came in person. Here was that which had neuer bene seene (a schisme of Councils) for those of Basil would not giue ouer, yet many which had been there came to Ferrara. In the Council of Ferrara came JOHN PALOLOVS, Emperor of Constantinople, with a great number of Greeke Prelates, notwithstanding that those of Basil sought to haue induced him to come thither: but a great plague falling amongst them at Ferrara, the Pope removed the Council to Florence; where the Greeks and their Emperour submitted themselves to the Latines, touching the proceeding of the Holy Ghost, the third person of the Trinitie, which they held to haue proceeded but from the Father onely: and other matters were there handled, which ANTONINVS Archbishop of Florence in his histories, and PLATINA and others write at large. But this notwithstanding, those of Basil proceeded in their Council against the Pope; and although the Emperour sought to bring them to vnity, yet his other affaires were so great (considering the small time he ragined) that he could not effect it; and now worst of all, for he had raised his whole power, and was marching with his Army against the Turk, to free the citie of Sindervonia.

Being past Buda, and encamped betweene the riuers Tisus and Danubius, he was certified that the Turk had taken the said citie & had put out the DISPOS's sons eyes; and AMURATH being aduertised of his coming, retiring with his Army towards Theffalonia, a famous citie in Macedonia, took afterwards many cities in Epire and Theffalia. The Emperour seeing that he could not recouer the citie, and that the Turk was retired, returned to Buda, where he discharged his Army: and being come thither, what with the scorching of the Sunne, and with the heate of Summer (and as some say, by eating of more Cucumers then did him good) he was taken with a flux; wherewith growing very weak, departing from Buda with a desire to go to Viena, he died by the way, in a little village called Langbrat, vpon the 27. day of October, in the yeere of our Lord 1439, before that two yeeres were fully expired, since that he was first chosen Emperour: his death was much lamented for the great hope conceived of him, that he would haue proved a good Prince. The Emperour ALBERT left two daughters, one of which was married to the Duke of Saxony, and the other afterwards to the king of Poland; and his wife the Emperess he left great with childe of a son, which in time came to be king of Hungary, and of Bohemia; but first there ensued much discord betweene the two kingdomes, as hereafter shall be declared.

The schisme & contention betweene the Pope and the Council of Basil grew to be so great, at what time the Emperour ALBERT died, that they chose for Pope AMADVS, whom many called BASILISK, for that he was chosen at Basil, who was now called FELIX: he had been Duke of Sauoy, and married and had children, he took religious orders (as many write) to the end to be made Pope: he was father in law to PHILIP Duke of Milan, to whom was imputed the principall cause of his election: for he being the Popes enemy, procured that the Council in Basil should make choise of him, and he himselfe made cruell warre against the Pope, against the Florentines, and the Venecians, PICHINO being General of his Army. And FRANCIS SPOCE (PICHINO's competitor) was General for them, so as there was a greater diuision in the Church of Rome then euer had been seene before, for as there were now two Popes, and two Councils; and some Princes fauoured the one, and others the other: amongst which ALONSO King of Aragon being an enemy to EVGENIUS, fauored Pope FELIX; but as it seemed that EVGENIUS had the better title, Pope FELIX his credit daily impaired, yet he held the name of Pope the space of nine yeeres; and afterward Pope EVGENIUS being dead, in the time of Pope NICHOLAS he renounced the Papacie.

In Constantinople reigned JOHN PALOLOVS, who in those times came to the Council at Florence; who hauing ended such matters as he came for, concerning the vnion of the Greeke and Latin Churches, returned to Constantinople; where, within a little after he died, and CONSTANTINE succeeded him in the Empire.

The death of the Emperour Albert the second.

THE LIFE OF FREDERICK, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND THIRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGUMENT.

ALtho the Electors ioyntly agreeing in the election of Frederick Duke of Austria, a young man of the age of fine and twentie yeeres, he accepted the Empire, and coming to be crowned in Aken, was confirmed by the Pope. He was a loue of peace, and a disinterested observer, thereof in all his actions. He supplanted the schisme, and shewed himselfe a perfect friend to the Pope; and coming into Italy was crowned in Rome, to the great contentment of all the Countrey: Wherewith were made most sumptuous feasts by all the cities which receiued him. He afterwards returning into Germany, was much troubled with the confusion he found there, by reason of the King of Bohemia, which could not be pacified but by the restitution of the King to the Bohemians. In times of this Emperour, Constantinople to the great shame and dishonor of all Christendome was lost, and great harmes were threatened by the Turke: but a Croisade being made, the Turke had a very great overthrow, so as he was constrained to alter his resolution. This Emperour had some controuersie with his brother about the Duchie of Austria, but in the end the title rested in the Emperour: who, to his sonne Maximilian gave the title of Archduke of Austria and made him King of the Romanes. He ever sought to maintaine peace, by reason wherof he was called the peacable Emperour. And being now old, and his sonne Maximilian desiring the gouernment, it pleased God to take him out of this world, when he had ruled the Empire three and fiftie yeeres.

THose which haue trauelled a long iourney, and being come neer to their iourneys end; through the desire they haue to attaine thereto, and to rest their wearie bones, make commonly greater halte then before: so I desiring to do the like, and to make a quick dispatch in writing the history of the Emperours remaining yet behinde; being tired with the long iourney which I haue trauelled, and to obtaine rest; after so long watching and so much painetaken in that which is past; in the end of my iourney the Emperour FREDERICK presenteth himselfe, and after him his sonne MAXIMILIAN, whose liues were such and so long, that all the time and paper which I haue spent might haue bin employed in writing the liues of them two: of FREDERICK, for that he was naturally more enclined to peace, and procured the same, and raigned fiftie and odd yeeres; in which time so many accidents passed, that they require a long discourse; and of MAXIMILIAN, for that his acts were so great, and so many accidents happened in his time, that if they all should be written, this volume would hardly containe his history. Whereof (when I had well considered) it did put me in a great perplexitie, fearing to be tired or founded before I should attaine to the end of my iourney: but setting all feare apart I will proceede, and thus it was:

As soone as the death of the Emperour ALBERT was published, the Princes Electors of the Empire assembling in the citie of Frankford, about two or three daies before the new yeere 1440. chose for Emperour FREDERICK Duke of Austria, a young man of the age of fiftie and

Frederick
Duke of Austria chosen
Emperor.

and twenty yeeres, who a little before came from Ierusalem where he had been in Pilgrimage. This FREDERICK was the son of Duke ERNESTVS of Austria, descended in line masculine from the Emperour ALBRECHT, above named. When as he vnderstood of his election, accepting the same, he prepared himselfe to go to Aken to be crowned; before which I hold it expedient to relate in few words what happened in the Kingdomes of Hungary and Bohemia, after the death of the Emperour ALBERT; since they were provinces of the Empire; and forasmuch as they serve for our purpose, for the clearing and better vnderstanding of that which followeth.

The King of Poland chosen
King of Hungary.

The widow Emperesse (as before is said) at the time of her husbands decease was with childe: and as soone as he was dead, the Lords of Hungary assembling together consulted about the choosing of a new King: for sith the Emperesse before had already two daughters, they thought not that she now would haue had a son: whereupon after many doubts they choosing VLADISLAVS King of Poland for their King (yet some say it was the Kings brother) sent to aduertise him thereof. In the meane time that the Ambassadors were vpon their way, the Emperesse was deliuered of a son, who was named LADISLAVS; which when they saw, they then wished they had not sent to the King of Poland: yet they held it more expedient for the good of the Kingdom to haue him for their King, for that he was of age and power to protect their countie, and to gouerne the same, which would be wanting in the infant; and they in like manner were of opinion that the Bohemians would haue made him their King also.

Standing in this doubt, the King of Poland (to take benefit of the time) in the greatest haste he could, came into Hungary, and was in Buda by those which desired to haue him so received for their King. In the meane time, the widow Queene with her new borne son, together with the Earle of Cilia and great part of the nobilitie, went to Alba Regalis, where vpon Whitsunday the young child was crowned King by the Archbishop of Syrigonium.

This solemnity being ended, and featic sworn to him by those which were present, as to their Lord and King, the Queene with her son fearing the inconstancie of the Hungars, by the counsell of some her friends presently took her way towards Piena, and committing him to the protection of his Vncle the new Emperour, together with the crowne of that Kingdom, which she had in her power (which is there held for the best right to haue the possession thereof) he returned into Hungary, to see if he might haue the gouernment thereof, during her sons minority. Some say that she sent the young King to the Emperour: but howsoeuer it was, the Emperour as his Vncle had the wardship of the childe, for to him appertained the protection of the house of Austria. In Hungary was great contention who should be King: but those which took part with VLADISLAVS King of Poland being assisted by JOHN HYNIADES VAIVODA (a very famous Captaine for the great victories which hee had obtained against the Turkes) for that time prevailed: and the young LADISLAVS, although crowned, remained a long time dispossessed in the Emperours keeping. In the Kingdom of Bohemia was no lesse combultions: for the Emperour ALBERT being dead, they in like manner treated of the chusing a new King; and they hauing appointed a day for that purpose, before the time came, the widow Emperesse was deliuered of her son LADISLAVS, and she presently vpon her deliuerie sent into Bohemia, to enforme the Bohemians of the equite of her cause, and to put them in minde that she was the daughter of the Emperour SIGISMUND, King of Bohemia; and that she and her husband ALBERT had enioyed the same, wherefore they should not now deprive her soone of his right.

The Ambassadors doing what in them lay, found fauour and assistants; but TASCON and the rest which had been ALBERTS enemies, were of such authority, that notwithstanding they confessed that the childe LADISLAVS had right to the Crowne, yet they alleged that he ought not to be King before he was foure and twentie yeeres of age: and their sentence prevailing, they chose ALBERT Duke of Baniera for their King, who shewing the greatnes of his minde, would not accept it: a rare example of magnanimitie, and seldom seene. The Bohemians meeting againe agreed to send to entreate the Emperour FREDERICK; that seeing he had charged himself with the protection of the person of the young King, that he would also be pleased to take vpon him the gouernment of the kingdom of Bohemia: and TASCON who was one of the Ambassadors, counselled him to haue made himself King thereof, which was a matter calfe to effect.

This Ambassage was deliuered to the Emperour at such time as he was going towards Aken to be crowned (for he was but newly chosen) his answer he referred vntill his returne; which which then was, that whereas they had offered him the kingdom of Bohemia, he would not shew himselfe so vnusult a tutor, as to bereaue the pupill of his right; and that he could as ill take vpon him the gouernment of the countie, for hee had otherwise enough to answer for before GOD: for that which he held, and for that cause he would vndertake no other charge: Wherefore amongst themselves they might finde men sufficient to haue the Rule and Gouernment.

Those which came with this Ambassage being returned, the Lords of Bohemia appointed a new meeting; and chose for Gouernors vntill that LADISLAVS should come to age, TASCON and MENANDER; who were heads and leaders of the contrary faction: To TASCON repaired all the reputed heretics of time past. Within a little while after, TASCON dying GEORGE POGIABRACCIO succeeded him, who after the decease of MENANDER, had the sole gouernment; and many other matters befell in the time that LADISLAVS, by reason of his nonage was in the Emperour FREDERICKS protection: And the Hungars and Bohemians oftentimes fought to haue the keeping of him vntill he came to full age. This for the present may suffice, to vnderstand the successe of the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia.

The Emperour FREDERICK spent the time from Ianuary vntill Iuly, in providing for the affaires of Hungary and Bohemia, and to make provision for his Coronation, which should be solemnized in the moneth of August, in the City of Aken, at which time Cardinal LEVVVS being sent by the Councell at Basil, came thither to approve and authorize his Election. About whose coming, there were great alterations; for the Bishop of Liege who was an enemy to the Councell of Basil, and to Pope FELIX, holding with EVGNIVS, put him out of the towne: but THEODORICVS Archbishop of Colen (who held with those of Basil) made him to be received in againe, whereupon Pope EVGNIVS deposed him from his Prelacy, vntill that afterwards he was through the Emperours entreaty by his Ambassadors restored. The Coronation being ended, the Emperour returned into Austria where he was at great controuersy with his brother ALBERT about the diuision of the estates thereof; with whom FREDERICK seeking to come to an agreement, procured peace and concord through all Germany, for he was euer enclined to peace and a louet thereof. Whilst the Emperour applied himselfe hereto, in Italy in those daies (or a little before) after great warre and infinite combultions, a peace was concluded between Duke PHILIP of Milan of the one side, and the Venecians and the Florentines of the other. And FRANCIS SFORZA who was General of their Army marrying the Duke of Milanes base daughter, had Cremona and other places with her for her dowry: this peace was made in the yeere 1442. A little before this, in the same yeere, ALONSO king of Arragon wholly expelling his competitor RENE out of the kingdom of Naples, remained in full possession thereof. About this time, VLADISLAVS King of Poland (who was also in possession of Hungary) after many adventures past in the warres against the Turkes fighting a battaile with them, was therein vnturnately slaine; hauing bene King of Hungarie but foure yeeres.

The Emperour
Frederick crowned in A-ken.

King VLADISLAVS being slaine in this manner, the Noble men and Burgeses of Cities assembling, chose the childe LADISLAVS their right Soueraigne, for their King; who (as I said) at the age of foure moneths was crowned in Alba Regalis; and they hauing proclaimed him for their King, sent a solemn Ambassage to entreate the Emperour to permit them to haue the custody of him, to the end that they might crowne him: whereto the Emperour (commending their doings) answered, that there needed no election, sith he was their naturall Lord; neither was there any neede to crowne him, sith he was already crowned. And seeing that he was but an infant, and wanted a tutor, vntill that he should come to age, he willed them to chose them Gouernors; and he would take care for his person vntill he should be of yeers fit to gouern. With this answer the Hungars being greatly discontented, refused to haue that by force which by faire meanes they could not obtaine: And JOHN HYNIADES being chosen for their Gouernor, came into Austria to waue vpon the Emperour, for that he gaue them not their King; but finding sufficient resistance, mist of his purpose. About the same time, the Bohemians in like manner did sue to haue him; to whom the Emperour gaue the selfe same or the like reasons and excusis as hee had done to the Hungars; and so he dispatched them for that time.

Whilst these matters passed, after most cruell warres, between England and France, a truce for a time was taken between them, and the Dauphin of France whose name was LEVVVS; in the

the time of this truce, without any reason or occasion that might move him thereto; leuied a very mighty Army, and entering Germany, besieged and tooke the City and state of Wittenbergh, and other Towns of lesse quality, no man knowing thereof: yet Historians set downe sundry. Someday, that he came by the Emperours procurement against the Swissers, who at that time were enemies to the house of Austria. N A V I L L A R V S writeth, that hee published, that hee came to recouer those lands which in antient time appertained to the house of France. P L A T I N and other Italians write, that the Dolphin's coming was by the Popes inflation, to ouerthrow the Councell at Basil; which in my opinion is most likely to be true: for, hee presently marched against Basil, and the Swissers (who were in league with that City) sent 4000 cholemen to the relief thereof; but they could not enter it without meeting with the Dolphin, who within fight of the City fighting with his whole Army, were all slain, not one escaping: but they found their liues very dear; for they fighting in a manner a whole day, from the morning till night; were not broken vntill they had slain twice so many of their enemies as they were. After this battell the Emperor sent to require the Dolphin to make no war in the Territories of the Empire, and began to prouide for the defense thereof. Some report it after this manner, and others after another: the conclusion was, that the Dolphin hauing done much harm in many places, returned to his fathers Kingdom.

At this time died JOHN PALAEOLOGVS Emperour of Constantinople; and for that he had no sonne, his brother CONSTANTIN PALAEOLOGVS succeeded him. Many matters passed in those daies in Italy, which I haue not time to relate. King ALONSO of Aragon, possessing the Kingdom of Naples, and defending the cause of Pope EUGENIVS (with whom he was in great grace) was by him inuested, and confirmed in his Kingdom.

Pope EUGENIVS being dead; Cardinal THOMAS SARZANO (who lately was Legate in Germany) was chosen, and called NICHOLAS the Fifth, to whom (as soon as hee was consecrated) the Emperor sent to acknowledge obedience; and he sought to haue established a general peace through all Italy: but the treaty of peace and the conclusion thereof was interrupted by the death of the great and puissant PHILIP, Duke of Milan; who might iustly be called great; for, he was great of minde, of body, of power, of estate, and of farre greater wit and vnderstanding than any of his Ancestors: which PHILIP died the thirteenth day of August, in the yeere of our Lord 1447, in the twelfth and fiftieth of his age, and the two & thirtieth of his reign. When he died he left neuer a son; and but one base daughter called BLANCH, who (as I said) was married to FRANCIS SPORCH.

The Duke being dead, the City of Milan, crying Liberty and Empire, made choice of twelue men to gouern it; but there was a sudden alteration; for many fought to haue been Lords thereof. The Milanois (as I said) desired their liberty; and King ALONSO of Naples and Aragon pretended a title of inheritance: for, Duke PHILIP by his Will and Testament made him heir to all his dominions. The Emperor with better right pretended that estate to appertain to the Empire (for default of heirs) and therefore it was to returne to the Empire: but hee had not time to come into Italy, by reason of the great fear and danger of the coming of the Turks into Hungary; which, as Emperor, and Tutor to the young King, hee was to defend. FRANCIS SPORCH, hauing married the base daughter of Duke PHILIP, pretended title to the duchie of Milan by the right of his wife. CHARLES Duke of Orleans would haue it, for that hee was the sonne of VALENTINA, sister to Duke PHILIP's father; which VALENTINA was married to LAVES Duke of Orleans, brother to CHARLES the first King of France: wherefore CHARLES pretended that Duchy to appertain vnto him. The Venecians, taking for their right the occasion which was offered, presently seized sundry Towns into their hands, as Cremona, Placencia and Lodi. All those which pretended title to the Duchy of Milan, sent their Ambassadors to the Milanois; not that they all did absolutely make claim therunto, but with certain complements and offers to assist them against the Venecians which took their Townes. The Milanois would accept no Soueraign but the Emperor: whom they intreated to permit them to enioy their liberty, vpon condition whereof they would yearly giue him a cup of gold in token of their vassallage and subiection; and to that effect they dispatched their Ambassadors vnto him: but God in his secret iudgement had reserved that estate for FRANCIS SPORCH; which hapned after this manner:

FRANCIS SPORCH being certified of the death of his father in law PHILIP, and that the Venecians made themselves Lords of the countrie, hastned him to Cremona, which was his owne towne, giuen him for his wiues dowrie; and fortifying, garrisoning, and furnishing the

the same with all things needfull, he went to Pavia, whither being called by the inhabitants, he became Lord thereof. The Milanois made him General of their Army against the Venecians, and he accepting the charge, hauing good successe, ouerthrew them in battaille: and being victorious (imitating OCTAVIVS CÆSAR) made peace with them, which they gladly accepted, and in their agreement they bound themselves to assist him with certain troupes of men of warre: and he resolving to put in execution what he had intended (which was to make himselfe Lord of Milan) bent his forces against the Townes and Cities of Lombardy; some of which he tooke by force, and other by faire meanes, and in the end besieged the city of Milan itselfe: and after many accidents, was received into it; and so with the title and by right of Armes, was called Duke of Milan; and afterwards coming to be Lord of the whole estate, was a mighty and a valiant Prince, and liued many yeeres Lord thereof.

At the same time when these matters passed in Milan and Italy, the Emperor FREDERICK, after the dissolution of the Councell of Basil, sought by all means to root out the schism betwixt the Popes, for FELIX was still called Pope and obeyed by the Sauiouists: but the Emperours Councell and Authority so much preuailed with him, as he was forced to come to obedience, and renouncing the Papacy, was by Pope NICHOLAS made a Cardinall, and his Legate in Savoy, and in certaine other Prouinces. Shortly after ensued great warres in Germany, between many of the Imperial cities, and the Marquesse of Brandenburgh, who was assisted by the Earle of Wittenbergh: the warre was such, as in the space of two yeeres that it lasted, they fought nine severall times, and fortune fauoring sometime one, and sometime the other; much harme was done before that the Emperour could pacifie the same: vntill at length, by his intercession and commandement, a peace was concluded between these Princes and the cities. And he hauing settled this concord, resolved to come into Italy, for the great desire hee had to be crowned, wherein ALONSO King of Naples and Aragon was his allie and great friend; the Venecians were also his friends, for as he loued peace, so hee euer sought to maintaine the same. He hauing resolved to goe his iourney, and agreed to marry with the Lady ELEANOR daughter to the King of Portingall, it was decreed that shee (he being there) should come into Italy by Sea, and that the nuptials should there be solemnized. Whereupon he leuied an indifferent Army of foote and horse, and provided all things necessary for his iourney; and departing from Germany, carried with him LADISLAVS the young king of Hungary and Bohemia, not without griefe to both those kingdoms, who very instantly desired to haue had the guard of him: by reason whereof, a great number of the Nobles of both those Kingdoms, together with many Lords of Suenia and Austria accompanied him: with which (although in warlike manner) in the beginning of January in the yeere of our Lord one thousand foure hundred fifty two, he entered Italy: and coming into the countries subiect to the Venecians, Ambassadors with shew of singular loue and affection came to entertaine him, who freely furnished his whole Army with victuals whilst he was in their iurisdiction.

Keeping on his way by Trenigi and by Padoa to Ferrara, he was thereby BONIFACIUS; their Duke sumptuously feasted; and in all parts was entertained with great loue and good will. From Ferrara he came to Bologna (notwithstanding that FRANCIS SPORCH invited him to come to Milan; there to be crowned with the crowne of Iron) and following his way towards Rome, accompanied with the Cardinall which came to receive him there, he went to Florence; and was there most sumptuously entertained, and had the like in Siena, whither he presently went: at his being there, he was certified that the King of Portingall's daughter, to whom he was to be married, being but sixteen yeeres old, was arrived by Sea in the city of Basil; and he staying for her there, she, with many gallants in her traine was brought to Siena; where the Emperour, accompanied with the King of Bohemia and other Princes and men of account y went to meete her.

The Emperor was already by his deputy betrothed to her, but he deferred the nuptials vntill he might receiue her at the hands of the Pope. The Emperor being come to Rome, was sumptuously entertained and feasted by Pope NICHOLAS, who vpon the steps coming into Saint PETERS Church clad in his pontificalibus; attending his coming; receiued him; the Emperesse and the King of Bohemia, kissing his foot, hee gaue them their hands; comming into the Church, and hauing made their prayers, and other ceremonies accustomed, they went to their lodgings; and vpon the fifteenth day of March in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fifty two, the Emperour was married to the Emperesse, and was the same day with the Iron crowne, which should haue been done in Milan, crowned king of Lombardy: And three dayes after battell fought by the Swissers against the French

A memorable
near to Basil.

The death of John Palaeologus, Emperour of Constantinople.

The death of Pope Eugenius, whom Nicholas the Fifth succeeded.

The death of the mighty Philip,
Duke of Milan.

Titles to the duchie of Milan.

The Emperour
going into Italy.

Hieronicus Mæ-cius lib. 19.

The Emperour
Frederick crowned and married in Rome
by Pope Nicholas.

after in the same Church, with the ceremonies and solemnities accustomed, was crowned Emperor of Rome, and the Emperess in like manner. The feasts at the coronation being ended, the Emperor leaving King LADISLAUS in Rome went to Naples, whither afterwards came his wife the Emperess, to see King ALONSO who was her vncle, where they were continually for the space of fiftene daies sumptuously feasted. From Naples the Emperor by sea, and up the river Tiber, returned to Rome, thence to take his journey towards Germany, where he was advertised, that the Hungars and Bohemians had caused some alterations for that the Emperor detained their King from them; the chief motors were VLICH Earle of Cilia, and another VLICH a man of great power.

The Emperess tarrying 8. daies longer in Naples then the Emperor, went by land to Manfredonia, and from thence by sea to Venice, for she knew that the Emperor would go to see that citie before his returne into Germany. The Emperor in his iourney took Ferrara in his way, where in reward of the service done him by BORSIO Duke of Ferrara at his coming and going, he made him Duke of Modena and Reggio, and gave him the title and soueraignty of those cities; and being there, GALEAS SPOCR Viscount, son to FRANCIS SPOCR Duke of Milan came to see him, and brought him gifts and presents from his father. The Emperor friendly entertaining him dubbed him Knight, for the good conceit he had of his person. And from Ferrara the Emperor sending his people by land, went downe the river of Po to the citie of Venice, where he was received with infinite sorts of triumphs, whither the Emperess was already com, and was received with no lesse solemnitie: in such feasting and pastimes he spent there other ten dayes: and then departed, accompanied with the Duke and Senate of Venice to the sea side, who sent Pourvoiers before with order, that in all their dominion, his whole court should be furnished with all things necessary gratis. And so this peaceable Prince passed through Italy in peace, and with euery mans loue and applause, which he could not haue done if he had been ambitious and desirous of warre: and if he could haue done it, it would haue bin to the greater losse of his people and expence of money, and with the peril of his life and burthen to his conscience, as by the histories of other Emperours which came into Italy to other intents, it may appeare.

The Emperor being departed out of Italy, it seemed that peace and quietnes went away with him: for the warres presently began betweene those which formerly had bin enemies, who as long as he was there were in some sort pacified. The Venecians being in league with King ALONSO, with the Duke of Sauoy, and with the Marquess of Monferrat, against FRANCIS SPOCR Duke of Milan, made cruell warre against him, whom the Florentines and LEWIS GONZAGA Marquess of Monten assisted and aided. And King ALONSO, enemy to the Florentines, sent his son FERRINAND with 8000 horse as some write and 4000 foot to make warre in Tuscane. The King of France dealt with RENE Earle of Provence, to passe into Italy with 2000 horse, in the behalfe of the Duke of Milan and the Florentines, in hope of the enterprise of Naples. So as there was most cruell war through all Italy, the issue whereof I haue not time to declare. The Pope vsing all means to haue pacified the same, desired they all should haue ioynd together, to haue holpen the Emperor of Constantinople against the great Turke, knowing that he purposed to besiege the citie of Constantinople: but he could not then effect the same, and so Constantinople was not relieved, when it stood in most need.

The Emperor FREDERICK coming into Germany, found it in no better quiet, then at his departure he left Italy; for a great part of his countrie of Austria was in Armes against him, and had thrust out the Governours which he had set there: all which was done for that he had not leaue young King of Hungary and Bohemia at liberty, moued thereto by the Earle of Cilia and by VLICH a great man in Bohemia; who perswaded them to take LADISLAUS, the son of ALBERT Duke of Austria for their Lord, to whom that countrie did more properly appertain; and the Emperor vnderstanding of their rebellion, came with part of his Army to a towne called Xiensa, where those of Austria came against him; and notwithstanding that the Emperor had good forces, yet they fought with him, and the fight continued foure houres: but so many charged the Imperialists, that they were constrained to retire to Xiensa, before which whole of Austria encamping themselves with great furie, in the name of Hungary and Bohemia requiring their King, battered the same. When it was knowne that the Emperor was besieged, great preparation was made through all Germany by sundie Princes which resolved to free him; and the like was made by the Hungars and Bohemians, who to the contrary required to haue their King.

The

The Emperor foreseeing the great miseries likely to ensue, gave care to a parley, wherein it was agreed that he should deliuer the young King LADISLAUS who was not yet fully 14 years old) into the hands of the Earle of Cilia, who should haue the keeping of him vntill November then next coming, in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fiftie two: And that the Proctors and deputies of Hungary and Bohemia should meete in the City of Viena, there to conclude who should haue the government of those kingdomes; with many other promises which were neuer performed.

Herewith the siege was raised from before the city, and the Earle of Cilia, carried the yong king to Viena, where he was received with as great ioy, as if he had been the naturall Lord thereof: and so presently without any other treaty, he gaue offices and dignities as lord of the countrie, and was also called Duke of Austria, by the Title before specified. To him came presently many great men of both the kingdomes, and amongst them JOHN HYNIADES VAI VODA, who had been gouernor of Hungary; and GEORGE POGIORACCIO Gouernour of Bohemia.

The time appointed being expired, thither resorted many Princes of Germany, and Ambassadors from the Emperor: but the yong vnexperienced King would accomplish no part of what was couenant; and being ruled and led by fauorites, in the final time that he liued many disorders were committed in his house and Court, which ARNAS SLYVIVS hath most excellently written in his History of Bohemia, Viena, and the other Cities which held for LADISLAUS being supported by Hungary and Bohemia, persecuted in their rebellion, and so continued as long as LADISLAUS liued.

Whilest the Emperor FREDERICK was pestered with these troubles, and the other Princes had warres amongst themselves, MAHOMET the great Turke in the beginning of the yeere one thousand foure hundred fiftie three, with an huge Army besieged the Imperial City of Constantinople, the head of all the Greeke and Oriental Empire (CONSTANTINE the last Emperor thereof being within it) which he besieged the space of more then fiftie daies, in which time (for that it was not relieved) vpon the nine and twentieth day of May in the same yeere, the City was by force taken and entred, and the Emperor, to the shame and dishonour of all Christendome was therein slaine: and in that City were such cruelties committed, as the like thereof had neuer been seene or heard of. For the losse of Constantinople all the Princes in Christendome were very sory, but much more when they vnderstood how great cruelties and murders the Turke had afterwards committed; and that he had taken other Townes and Provinces thereto adioyning, and that he therewith threatened Italy and Germany: Whereupon they began to consult of defence and resistance to be made against him: but the Ambition and dissension which reigned amongst them, gaue no place to the conclusion or performance of any good exploit; as in our daies the like hath been seen in the like necessity. Yet the next yeere a peace was concluded in Italy between the King of Naples and the Venecians, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines, and those of their league: which being concluded, the Pope rigged vp a great flecte of Gallies to make head against the Turkes; but they write that he was euer so sorrowfull after the losse of Constantinople that he neuer enjoyed good day, but falling sick died, vpon the twenty fift day of March in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fiftie fve, in the fiftenth yeere of the raigne of the Emperor FREDERICK, and the eighth of his Papacy.

After his decesse, Cardinall ALFONSO BORGIA a Spaniard was chosen Pope, and called CALIXTUS the Third. The first thing he vnderooke was to procure warre against the Turke, and to that effect sent out his Bulls, and a generall Croisade, and therewith sent his Legates into all parts of Christendome, especially into Germany; where the Emperor haue the like care, had summoned a Diet or Parliament vpon that occasion. And notwithstanding that many Princes gaue in their names, and offered to serue in this warre, yet the icalousie and dissension amongst them was such, that they put nothing in execution: but the Pope neuertheless sent Cardinall JOHN CARAIAYAL for his Legate into Germany, who for that it was certainly known that the Turke was coming into Hungary, with the Emperours aide and fauor leuied men and money: presently hereupon came news that the Turke was come, and that he had in his Army (they which say least) one hundred and fiftie thousand men, and that he went to besiege Belgrade otherwise called Alba Graeca, and more anciently, Taurinum; and that he purposed in few daies (taking that City) to march forwards. King LADISLAUS giuing the charge of that warre, with the defence of that City and Kingdome to JOHN HYNIADES

Constantinople
besieged and taken by the great Turke.

The great Turke entred Hungary.

NIADBS, retired to Vienna: for in truth he was neither of age, neither had power sufficient to fight with the Turke.

The Popes Legate with the greatest number of men that he could get came to Buda, and from thence before the Turks comming put himselfe therewith into the City of Belgrado: amongst those which came with him, was one JOHN CAPISTRANO, a Franciscane Frier, who with his sermons and exhortations gathered together and brought with him a great number of men, which for their device wore the signe of the Croffe. The Turke comming with his power, and besieging the city, these men wrought wonders in the defence thereof, being furiously battered. To the reliefe thereof, with the power which the Emperor sent, and such others as he could raise in Hungary, which were forty thousand Foore, and five thousand Horse, came JOHN HUNIADBS.

To be briefe, it pleased God, that the succors being arriued, and comn to blowes, they had so good fortune that the Turke was ouerthrowne and wounded, and a great number of his men slaine: Whereupon he raising his siege and flying, left his Artillery and baggage behinde him. This happened vpon Saint MARY MAGDALENS day, in the yeere one thousand foure hundred fifty six. All Christendome reioyced, and made bonifiers for this so notable a victory: And Italie and Germany by this means were deliuered from the feare which they conceiued, by reason of the late losse of Constantinople: For, considering the great power of the enemy, they all feared to haue been lost. Within few daies after this victory, died that excellent Capitaine JOHN HUNIADBS: and the Turke by reason of this ouerthrow, suffering Hungary and Italie to rest in Peace, made warres in the Ilands of the Sea called Archipelagus, and in other countries bordering vpon them.

The Emperor FREDERICK sraigne was so long, and so many accidents hapned therein, that I shall be enforced to be briefer in writing what followeth, then I haue been in what is past. After this victory obtained by JOHN HUNIADBS, the Emperour FREDERICK applied himselfe to the establishing of peace in Germany, to the end he might be able to prevent what might befall: and being busie herein, the yong King of Bohemia and Hungary being of the age of eighteen yeeres died (not without suspect of poyson) in the City of Prague, where he attended the comming of the French Kings daughter, to whom he should haue been married. The realmes of Hungary and Bohemia, and that also which he held in Austria, by reason of his death without issue and heires, were void; which caused much strife in those countries and kingdoms, about the succession and election, diuers Princes pretending to haue right to them. In the end the Bohemians took GEORGE POGIORRACCIO (who was Gouverneur thereof in the time of LADISLAUS) for their King, a man of a Noble house and of great valour. The Hungars for their King chose MATTHEVV the sonne of that excellent warriour JOHN HUNIADBS, as well for the loue which they bare to his father, as for the good hope they had of his person, being a yong man of nineteen yeeres old, and then prisoner in Bohemia for the death of the Earle of Cilia, which grew vpon this occasion, the yong King LADISLAUS was wholly gouerned by the Earle of Cilia, who had enuiet the vertues and glory of JOHN HUNIADBS; and after his death continued his hatred against his sonnes LADISLAUS and MATTHEVV, seeking their ruines: LADISLAUS comming to expostulate the matter with the Earle, they fell to wordes, so as in the end the Earle strooke him, and LADISLAUS slue the Earle.

The King of Hungary being informed of the fact, promised LADISLAUS pardon & gaue him a purple robe imbroyded with Gold: yet being newly incensed, he seized vpon both the brethren, and put LADISLAUS to death, and finding that the Noble-men of Hungary hated him for this fact, and that he could not stay there without danger, he returned into Bohemia, carrying MATTHIAS the yonger brother with him, where soon after the yong king died, leaving him a prisoner, whom POGIORRACCIO the new King of Bohemia setting at liberty, married him to his daughter; and he afterwards being King of Hungary, proued an excellent and a most valiant Prince.

In the house of Austria (the gouernment whereof in right appertained to the Emperour) his brother ALBERT pretended, that for as much as his brother was Emperour, he ought to enioy the same; the like did his cosine SIGISMUND. About this controuersie those of Austria assembling maintained the Emperour to be their principall Lord; and that he according to the custome of Germany was to haue regard to the maintenance of his brothers and cosin-germanes estate: Wherefore and for the better preferuation of the peace, certain Lands and re-

uenues

uenues were assigned vnto them. The Emperour vpon this agreement came to Vienna, and was there receiued and obeyed: but his brother and cosin, persecuting in their purposes, caused some alterations in the Country; and there were some sharp bickerings about this matter: but, by the mediation of LEVVUS Duke of Bauiere, a composition was made between him and them, yet they were neuer without iealousies and contentions till the death of ALBERT: at which time the Emperour without any contradiction took possession of that estate. After this, in the yeer 1458, died ALONSO, King of Aragon and Naples, whom his brother JOHN King of Nauarre succeeded in the Kingdomes of Aragon and Sicilia; and in the Kingdom of Naples succeeded his bafe son FERNANDO; who contented with JOHN the son of RENN, with whom his father was at variance about that Kingdome. And in the month of August following, died Pope CALIXTUS; and in his place was chosen ENRRAS SILVIUS, a Cardinall and Citizen of Siena, and was called PIVS the Second; who was so excellently learned, and endued with so many graces, that I cannot expresse what is written in commendation of him: besides this, the books which he wrote bear record of his wisdom and learning; who accordingly first took care for the defense of Christendome, and for the wars against the Turke, and to that effect wrote to the Emperour and the other Princes.

The next yeer after his election, he summoned a generall Councell to be held in the City of Mantua, to treat more effectually of the matter; where many Noble-men and Princes Ambassadors met; and many matters were deuised and ordained, which were neuer put in execution, by reason of the wars and troubles in Italie, and between the most part of the Princes in Christendome. Particularly in Germany, in the yeer 1460, beganne great debate and strife between VDALRICVS Earle of Wilttemberg, and FREDERICK Count Palatine of Rhine, about a dowry and some such matter; for which they came to fight sundry times, and many were slain of either side, vntill that an agreement was made by the Emperors commandement and authority.

After this another warre ensued, of longer continuance and more dangerous, which was for the Archbishopsrick of Mentz: for which, DIETTERVS of Isenburgh, and ADVLPH of Nassaw contended. DIETTERVS, who was in possession of the greatest part of the Bishopsrick, being for his contumacy, intrusion, simony, and such other matters, by the Sentence of Pope PIVS deposed, ADVLPH by the Emperors consent was by the Pope created; so as the one to get possession, and the other to defend the same, troubled all Germany, which the Emperour could not remedy: for, their rage grew to that height, that his commandements being contemned, some Princes taking part with the one, and some with the other, all imploied their whole force therein; and there followed many batels and encounters, and many great Personages were slain of either party.

CARION writes, that Pope PIVS the Second, of the house of the Puolomini, who had been Secretary to the Emperour FREDERICK, relying vpon his priuate loue, and his respect to the Sea of Rome, deposed DIETTERVS from the Archbishopsrick of Mentz, and advanced ADVLPH of Nassaw. The chief reasons they say were, for that he opposed himself stoutly against the Popes vniuersal exactions, wherewith the Provinces were opprest vnder colour of the Turkish warre; and that Pope PIVS required an oath, whereby his successors should also be bound, that he should not call the Electors together for the choosing of a new Emperour, or to determine of any other thing concerning the Empire, before they had acquainted the Pope therewith, and knowne his pleasure, which he refused to doo. This quarrell drew most of the Princes and chiefe Lords of Germany into Armes and combustions; as you haue formerly heard.

This warre continued long; but yet in the end, by the Emperors order and authority, the matter was taken vp; but the harms which were done before that time, could not be repaired as he would haue had them. For, he was so ill obeyed by his subjects in Austria, that those of Vienna ioyning one day with his brother ALBERT, in the yeer of our Lord 1463, took Armes and besieged the Emperour in the Fortresse of that City; and, battering the same, would haue taken him prisoner.

The King of Bohemia, who was his next neighbour, desiring to win his grace and fauour, came to his aid; and rescuing him, in such manner pacified the rebellion, that the Emperour if it had so pleased him might haue apprehended his brother ALBERT, but hee of purpose let him go: and it pleased God that a while after Duke ALBERT died, when as without his death there was no mean of peace in the state of Austria. He being dead, the Austrians together with Duke

Ggg

Str.

The Turks besieged Belgrado.

The great Turke ouerthrowne before the city of Belgrado in Hungary.

SIGISMUND wholly submitting themselves, became subject to the Emperor.

The death of Aeneas Sylvi-us, otherwise
Pope Pius 2.

In the yeere 1464, in the 24 year of the reign of the Emperor FREDERICK, died that excellently learned Pope, PIUS the Second, otherwise called AENEAS SYLVIVS, after whom was chosen Cardinal BARDO a Venecian, and was called PAVL the Second, who considering that the Turkes daily conquered the Christian countries, applied himself to procure a remedy: but the same reason which hindred others, prevented him also, so as he could not bring it to passe. Yet the Venecians entred into league with MATTHIAS King of Hungary, whose fame and reputation was then very great; and they giving him a certain summe of money, resistance was made in diuers parts. About this time died FRANCIS SPORCA Duke of Milan, whom his eldest son GABRIEL MARIA SPORCA succeeded in that Dukedome. About this time also died PHELIP Duke of Burgundy, and Earle of Flanders, whom succeeded the most valiant and renowned Captaine Duke CHARLES, called CHARLES the Hardy.

In the second yeer after Pope PAVLs election, the Emperour FREDERICK came to Rome, whereby the Pope he was most honestly received: the cause of his coming, some say was to performe a vow which he had made; others say that it was to conferre with the Pope concerning warres against the Turke: but howsoever it was, he came and returned quietly into Germany, where through his meanes peace continued long after: at the last there was no great warre, eyther in Germany or in Italy. In those daies notwithstanding that these countries were in peace and quiet, yet Duke CHARLES of Burgundy had cruell warres with France, and with the Swissers, and with other Princes. Pope PAVL being dead, SIXTUS the 4 succeeded him, who although he was but a Franciscane Friar, yet they write that he was so warlike, that the most part of the time that he was Pope he warred in Italy. The next yeer after his election which was in the yeer 1472, and the 32 of the Emperors reign, Duke CHARLES of Burgundy (of whose power and aspiring minde and of his warres, and the battails which he fought, wonders are written) procured leave to see, and to speake with the Emperour: and they meeting in Luxembourg, the Duke requested many matters at the Emperors hands, amongst which, this was one, that the Emperour should giue him the title of King of Naples, and make him his Vicar or Lieutenant in Italy, for he purposed to haue made a conquest thereof.

The Emperour disliking the ambition of this Prince, temporizing in the best manner hee could, answered him in general termes without concluding any thing, and in a night without bidding him farewell, departed the City; wherewith the Duke was very much discontented, and the next yeer following he leuied a very great Army, and marching towards Colen besieged the City of Nuiz: which he did to the end (as he said) to restore Colen to ROBERT of Bannia the Archbishop thereof, who was his kinsman and good friend. The Emperour vnderstanding that the Dukes meaning was (if he could) to take Colen, required him to raise his siege, which taking no effect he leuied a very great Army, and therewith marched directly against the Duke: but as he was slack in his business, so he needed (considering the Dukes power) to haue speedily brought a great Army: but as he came not with such expedition as the cause required, so the besieged, and the cuntry thereabout endured great extremity, and the siege continued many months: but he coming at length (though late first) and the one Army encamping neere to the other (with the Emperour came the Duke of Saxony, the Marquesse of Brandenburg, the Archbishops of Mentz and Treuere) and being at the point to haue given bataille (which as it was thought would haue been very cruell) a treaty of peace was propounded betwene them, whereto the Emperour neuer refused to giue care, in so much that hee was therefore called The peaceable Prince. What the conditions of the peace were, I finde not written by those Authors which I haue read: but the effect of what ensued, was that the Duke raising his siege from before the Town, returned with his Army into his Country; and so the war ended betwixt the Emperour and him.

Some write, that by this peace it was concluded that MAXIMILIAN the Emperours sonne should marry with the only daughter of CHARLES, and enjoy all his Prouinces, if he died without issue male. Out of this peace were excepted by CHARLES, LEVVS the French King, SIGISMUND of Austria the Emperors cosin-germane, RENE Duke of Lorraine, and the Swissers, who had made an irruption into Burgundy by the procurement of LEVVS: and hee was incensed against SIGISMUND, for the redeeming of certaine Towns which had bene pawned to him. But the Duke had other warres, for hee euer desired and procured the same, and thereby enlarged his Countries and Dominions untill that that in the yeere one thousand foure hundred sixty six, in a cruell battaille which he fought with the Duke of Lorraine, he was ouerthrown and slain. His death was the cause that the Emperour and his son MAXIMILIAN warred with the French King, the reliques and feed whereof continued long, and hapned in this manner:

The death of Charles the Hardy, Duke of Burgundy.

The warlike Duke CHARLES dying in such manner, as I said, left no heire but one only daughter, whose estate contained the two Burgundies, the estates of Flanders, Brabant, Guelders, Holland, Zealand, Artois, and many other Towns, besides those which he had taken in Lorraine, in Picardy, and from the Swissers; for his minde and valour was so great, that he durst hold all the world for his enemy, and made no reckoning to take their townes. But this smooke (for so it may well be called) being by his death ouerblowne; euen as he had done by all others, so all men dealt with his. The Duke of Lorraine, and his confederats the Swissers, recovered what he had taken from them. LEVVS the French King, speedily leuying an Army, recovered Picardy, took the Cities of Peronne, Montdidier, Tournay and other Townes. The Flemmings and Burgonians with those of their party, in the name of their Soueraign Lady, MARY daughter of the deceased Duke, for their defence put themselves in Armes. The French King alleged that Burgundy for want of heires males, was to returne to the house of France: the Duke of Lorraine by his commandement entring Burgundy, took the greatest part thereof; and the King sent to require the Duchesse MARY to come into France in person to doe him homage for the Earldome of Flanders, and her other estates subject to the Crown of France: but she vnderstanding his meaning, refusing to come stood vpon her guard. Hereabout were many treaties and parleys, and many Towns were taken, too long to be recited.

The Flemmings sending to the Emperour for aide, offered their Duchesse MARY in marriage to his sonne MAXIMILIAN, who was then one and twenty yeeres old, a young man of a great spirit, valiant, a comely personage, of a very good constitution, and apt for any attempt. The Emperour being very glad of this proffer, granted their requests, notwithstanding that hee saw he vndertook a warre against France, and that he already had warres with MATTHIAS King of Hungary, who (like the Duke of Burgundy) was neuer content with what he had, but thought all too little, and incensing the Austrians against the Emperour, took some townes from him in Austria and warred vpon him.

The French King hauing intelligence of this treaty of marriage, sent to the Emperour and his sonne MAXIMILIAN perswading them to desist. This notwithstanding, MAXIMILIAN who was now called Arch-Duke of Austria, with many good men of warre, in Iuly, in the yeere 1467, went into Flanders, and marrying this Lady MARY had with her all her dominions: the warres on the Flemmings side against the French through his coming, were well reinforced: and he therein fighting oftentimes in his owne person, shewing the greatest of his minde, obtained some victories, especially one memorable battaille between Tournay and Arras, wherein he alighting from his horse, put himselfe into a squadron of foote. Afterwards some treaties of peace being motioned, a truce was taken for a time, wherein the French King rendering some Towns, continued in possession of what he had taken in Burgundy, and so for a season the warre ceased. This peace (so farre as I can coniecture) was made by the Emperors procurement, by reason of warres made against him by MATTHIAS King of Hungary: for which, being otherwise troubled with other occasions of the Empire, he could make no sufficient prouision, and also for that the peace with France (as presently shall be said) continued but a small time.

The battaille of Guinegats.

The reason of the warre, betwixt the Emperour and MATTHEW CORVINVS King of Hungary, was, for that the Pope hauing by his Bulls given the kingdome of Bohemia to CORVINVS, from GEORGE BOISERAC, who constantly defended and maintayned the doctrine of JOHN HUSSE, which was hatefull to the Court of Rome, the Emperour refused to inuest him in the said kingdome. But this quarrell grew violent after the death of GEORGE, when as the Noble-men of Bohemia, and the Emperour neglecting CORVINVS, made choice of LABISLAUS the sonne of CASIMIR King of Poland, the Emperour hauing first refused to come vnto the said kingdome, eyther terrified with the mutinies of the Bohemians, or else that he fled from toyle and danger, wherein he knew he should be engaged against so powerful and valiant a Competitor. In this warre the Emperour was in very great danger to haue lost Austria, if ALBERT Duke of Saxony had not valiantly and fortunately made head against MATTHIAS, forcing him in the end to accept of conditions of peace. MATTHIAS did so honour ALBERT for the euent of this warre, as hee gaue him only the prayse, to be one of the greatest and most valiant Captaines among all the Princes of Christendome.

At the same time GALBAS MARIA having been nine yeeres Duke of Milan, certaine his subiects and favorites, for his licentiousnesse, and insatiable Luxury, conspiring against him, slew him as he was in S. STEPHENS Church at Masse, he being then of the age of three and thirty yeeres. He left for his successor a sonne of the age of nine yeeres, whose name was JOHN GALBAS, who by reason of his nonage was under the tutele of his mother BONA: through whose negligence and vnchaste life, his vnkle LEUVES or LODOVICK, called the Moore (a man blinded with ambition and desire of command) seized vpon the person of the young Duke, whom he consumed away with a slow poison, and vsurped the government, getting into his hands all the strong holds, or whatsoever else did belong to that State, whereby he came to be absolute Lord of the whole Duchie: and his Nephew (languishing two and twenty yeeres) had onely the title of Duke; and LODOVICK the authority and possession: where many matters happened, which for that they concern not my History I omit. The truce between MAXIMILIAN and France continued little more then one yeere, at the end whereof the French King and he renewed the warre, which lasted a certaine space, and some Townes were taken both of the one side and of the other; vntill at length through the procurement of the Emperour FREDERICK, a peace betwene them was concluded for seven yeeres.

At the same time when these matters passed, the great and mighty Turke MAHOMET, having done much harme in the Christian countries, held Rhodes besieged little lesse then three moneths; but it pleased God that he could not then take it: this happened in the yeere of our Lord 1480. After this in the same yeere, he sent a mighty Army by Sea, which landing in Pagha and in the kingdom of Naples, took some Townes, and amongst others Otranto, which they held more then one yeere after: and if through the goodnesse of God the great Turke had not died, all Italie was in danger to haue been lost: but through the death of this mighty Tyrant (who in Gracia, besides Constantinople and Thracia) had taken and subdued many Prouinces, and an infinite number of Cities and Towns) those townes in Italie were recovered, and Christendome was freed from the oppression which it endured: and the rather for that his sonne and heire BATAZETH in the beginning of his raigne, was troubled with domestick war and dissension. At this time died RENA Earle of Provence and Duke of Aniow, an ancient challenger of the crown of Naples.

In Italie was great war at that time, which beginning between the Venecians, and the Duke of Ferrara, spread it self ouer all Italie: Which the Emperour FREDERICK, perceiuing, and considering how great danger all Christendome was in, hee procured the Princes of Germany to settle some perpetuall peace and concord, thereby to bee able to resist the Turkes: the like he practised with the French King, and with his own son the Archduke of Austria, and Duke of Burgundy. Whilst he was thus busie, the Duchesse MARY, daughter to the braue Duke CHARLES, with whom MAXIMILIAN had so many prouinces, came vnfortunately to her end: for the (as of custome she used to doo) riding hunting, fell from her horse; and, as some say, the horse trode vpon her, or kickt her, whereof she died: others say, that with the fall she was so bruised, that she died thereof the eleuenth day after, which was vpon the seuententh day of March, in the yeere of our Lord 1482, when shee had been Lady of those Countries little more then five yeeres. She left at her deace one sonne and one daughter which were PHILIP, who afterward was King of Spain, and father to the Emperour CHARLES the Fifth; and MARGARET, which afterwards was a Princess in Spain. When this Duchesse MARY died, LEUVES the French King was very sick, and lying vpon his death-bed, desired peace; wherewith the Emperour being well pleased; they agreed, that MARGARET (which was a child of two yeeres old) when she should be of age, should bee married to his sonne CHARLES, who afterwards was King and then twelve yeeres old: and that their fathers and they should keepe perpetuall peace: with this condition, that eyther of them should continue in possession of what they held in Burgundy. This being concluded, the young MARGARET with great pompe was brought to Paris, where her wedding feast was held, although it afterwards took no effect, as shall be said.

Within fewe daies after this solemnity King LEUVES died, leauing his son CHARLES of the age almost of thirteene yeeres, to succcede him. At the same time a peace was concluded in Italy, and about the same time the Emperour assembled the Princes Electors and other

The death of Mahomet the great Turke.

The death of Leues King of France.

Princes

Princes of Germany in the City of Brannford, where he desired and obtained of them to make his sonne MAXIMILIAN King of the Romans, which was effected in the seuen and fortieth yeere of his raigne, vpon the sixteenth day of February, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand foure hundred eighty six; and departing thence with a very great count of Princes and Lords, they went to the City of Aken, where he was with great solemnity crowned with the crowne which sometime was of CHARLES the Great, brought for that purpose from Novemburgh, where it was kept with great respect. The same day, by the consent of all the Princes, he made a Law: Whereby hee ordained vnder great penalties that peace should bee kept through all Germany; which was obeyed, and in the greatest part of Germany obserued a long time after.

After this, the new king of the Romans came into the Lowe countries, wherof his son PHILIP was now lord, whose tutor he was, where at first he had great oppositions, ADOLPH D. of Ghellers being head of a faction, who (conspiring with the French) was slaine at Tourney, wherupon the Dutchie of Guelanders yielded vnto him; he being assisted by the counsell and fortune of that valiant warrior ALBERT Duke of Saxony: the Belgians factiously mutyning, and insensibly reiecting the command of their new Prince PHILIP of Rauenste in being head of the faction, he so daunted them with encounters and sieges, during the space of eight yeeres, as hauing taken some Townes by force and others by composition, he so terrified the rest, as they willingly submitted themselves, and craued pardon.

After which ALBERT of Saxony transported the warres into Frisland, the which (in reward of his great seruice, and recompence of his charges) MAXIMILIAN (with the consent of the Princes of the Empire) gaue vnto him and to his heires for euer, wherof although he subdued a great part, yet being preuented by death, he left the victory imperfect to his sons. But the euent of this Frisland was, that although that GEORGE and HENRY brethren, Dukes of Saxony, had subdued the greatest part of the country, yet afterwards they fell into a new rebellion, not able to endure a strangers yoke: wherewith the brethren of Saxony being tyred, this Prouince lying faire from their hereditary possessions, the enioying wherof would be more chargeable then beneficiall, they afterwards past it ouer by transaction, to the Emperour CHARLES the Fifth, for a certain sum of money.

MAXIMILIAN being in the City of Bruges, in the yeere one thousand foure hundred eighty seuen, vpon certain discontentments the Burghers rose against him, and in this tumult apprehending his person, with certain of his traine, they held him prisoner the space of foure moneths: wherof when his father had intelligence, leuying the best forces that he could, he hastened to him, and notwithstanding that his sonne before his coming was at liberty, yet he severely punished the Burghers of Bruges and of Gaunt, and for the king of the Romans peaceably enioyed the government of the Prouinces of the Low Countries, and of that which he held in Burgundy, and his father the Emperour being now old and tyred, returned into Germany, to maintaine peace and iustice, and to prouide for defence to be made against the Turks. For the preservation wherof, notwithstanding that MATTHIAS King of Hungary had taken Viena and other townes in Austria, he endured it, and attempted not by force to recover the same: but within short space after King MATTHIAS died, without any heires, when he had reigned seuen and thirty yeeres. His death being made knowne to MAXIMILIAN King of the Romans, he with great speede departed from Flanders; and through his fathers aide, leuying a puissant Army, in short space recovered Viena, and all the rest which King MATTHIAS had vsurped.

Whilst these matters were in handling, LADISLAVS sonne to CASIMIR King of Poland wholly recovered the kingdom of Bohemia, for which both he and his father CASIMIR had waited with king MATTHIAS, from the time that GEORGE POGIOBRACCIO died. After this, both he and MAXIMILIAN pretending to be King of Hungary, each of them sought to marry the Queene widow, the Lady BEATRIX of Aragon, daughter to FERDINAND King of Naples, who was of great authority in that Kingdome. MAXIMILIAN being somewhat slow in the matter deferred the time; but LADISLAVS making more haste, married her, and was receiued for King of Hungary, and crowned in Alba Regalis; and presently between him, the Emperour and MAXIMILIAN a peace was concluded, wherein it was ordained by the consent of those of the kingdom, that if LADISLAVS died without lawfull issue male, then MAXIM. and his heires should inherit the kingdom. But LADISLAVS reigned 22 yeeres after, and his sonne LEUVES succeeded him, who married MARY sister to the Emperour

Ggg 3

CHARLES

CHARLES the Fifth: and FERDINAND brother to the Emperour CHARLES, married his sister ANNE: by which marriage (King LEVVS being in the yeere of our Lord 1526, ouerthrowne and slaine by SOLTMAN the great Turk) this FERDINAND succeeded in the kingdomes of Hungary and Bohemia: and so the covenant by meanes neuer thought of, came to take effect betwixt LADISLAVS and MAXIMILIAN; which passed in the yeere 1490.

Returning to our history, after this agreement, MAXIMILIAN comming to Norimbergh, by the consent of his father he treated of a marriage between him and the Duchesse of Britaine, who after her fathers decease without heires males, succeeded in that Dukedome: and CHARLES the French King in like maner sought to haue her, notwithstanding that he was already betrothed to MARGARET of Burgundy, which was but a child, and whom he had in his power, as hath been declared.

The French writers excuse him herein, and yeelde reasons for what he did; whereof those Kings are neuer to seeke which haue not the feare of God before their eyes. They alleged that the Kings contract with the young Lady MARGARET was of no force, for that she was vnder age; and also for that King CHARLES neuer consented thereto: and notwithstanding that he had consented, yet he was likewise vnder age, and afterwards reuoked the same. And that the contract of the Duchesse of Britaine with MAXIMILIAN was of no effect: for the Duchesse gaue thereto no sufficient authoritie, for none of the Ambassadors being foure in number, had any authority in solidum to make any contract; neither had the Duchesse any meaning to do it: and that which she did was but to temporize with the Brittaines, to the end they should not yeeld themselves to King CHARLES of France. And admitting that the contract had been made by men hauing sufficient authority, not being confirmed it was of no force, for that the conditions and covenants were not afterwards performed. Finally, by these and other reasons they excuse him, holding their arguments for true and sufficient in their opinion. And the French King going into Britaine, the Princess MARGARET (who was nothing forie for it) returned: for (they say) she neuer liked of the match, yet yeilded thereto by the perswasion of the Flemmings: and so a very furious and cruell warre began betweene the Emperour, his son MAXIMILIAN, and the French King. And forasmuch as his father was now old, MAXIMILIAN had the sole gouernment, and had already vnderaken the charge: but after some bickerings, a faigned peace was made betweene them; whereto MAXIMILIAN by reason of the great and excessive charges of the war, and for some other respects, was constrained to condescend; but principally for that at the same time, which was in the yeere 1492, the men of warre which had serued the valiant MATTHIAS King of Hungary, which kept still together (& for that they were mourning colours for their King, were cald the black Regiment) through want of pay, or some other infolence, making war in Austria, had the spoile of some townes: for the reliefe whereof, MAXIMILIAN leuying forces, went into those parts, and without any great trouble brake and scattered the mutiners, and for example to others seuerely punished them.

This yeere was much noted about others for three speciall things: the first was, for that therein died Pope INNOCENT the 8, in the eighth yeere of his Papacie; whom RODRIGO de Borja a Spaniard, borne in Valencia in Spaine succeeding, was called ALEXANDER the Sixt: GVICHARDIN writing of his election saith, that hee came to be Pope by bribery, hauing corrupted some of the Cardinals with money, and poisoned the rest with promises of offices and great preferments, which made him hateful to the world; and drew vpon him the vengeance of God. But his election was not so distastefull, but his conditions were more odious: who although he were sharpe witted, excellent in counsell, a good Orator to perswade and of great Iudgement in the greatest affaires, yet these vertues were wonderfully blemished by his vices: for his manners were dishonest, in his actions was no sinceritie, there was no modestie in his countenance, small truth in his words, little faith in his heart, and lesse religion in his soule. All his actions were stained with insatiable couetousnes, immoderate ambition, barbarous cruelty, and a burning desire to aduance his children (by what meanes soeuer) being many in number, among the which there was one no lesse detestable then the father, to whose cursed counsels he became a wicked instrument. The second was, for that the great citie of Granada in Spaine, was in the beginning of that yeere, by FERDINAND and ISABEL King and Queene of Castile taken from the Moores: the third was, for that in the same yeere, by the commandment of the same Princes, the West Indies were discovered in the Ocean sea.

This being past, and the yeere 1493 being comin; Germany and Italie beeing, through the Emperors perors wisdom and good gouernment, in peace, and himself at peace with all Princes, in quiet possession of the Duchie of Austria, and his sonne MAXIMILIAN beeing King of the Romans, and Gouernor of the states and prouinces of the Lowe Countries and of part of Burgundy, in the behall of his sonne PHILIP; when he had reigned 53 yeeres and foure months Emperour (wherewith no Emperour but AVGVSTVS CESAR, who reigned three yeeres longer, could be compared with him: but yet FREDERICK did far exceed him in age) at this time it pleased God to take him out of the world. This Prince is reported to haue had many vertues: for, besides that he was courteous, desirous of peace, temperate in his diet, and very devout, he was in all his life time neuer heard to swear but twice, which he could not auoid; once was, when he was crown'd in Aken, the other time in Rome. He had great care for the preservation of the lands of the Empire: and to the end not to hazard the same, or to bring them in question, he sometimes made peace with the losse of his owne estate; neither would he euer inuest FRANCIS SFOCE nor his son GALEAS MARIA in the Duchie of Milan, notwithstanding that they were in quiet possession thereof: which when FRANCIS SFOCE saw it would not be gotten without much money, hee gaue ouer the pursuit, nothing fearing the Emperors force, who was diuerted without other war. He had by his wife ELLENOR (who died long before him) three sons and two daughters: his first sonnes name was CHRISTOPHER, who died a childe: his second sonne was MAXIMILIAN, who was afterwards Emperour: the third was JOHN, who also died a childe. Of his two daughters, the one, called HELEN, died in her infancy, and the other, called HVGORADA, was married to ALBERT, Duke of Banier, and was afterwards mother to the Dukes, WILLIAM, LEVVS and ERNESTVS.

The death of the Emperour Frederick the third

THE LIFE OF MAXIMILIAN, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND FOVRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(*)

THE ARGVMENT.

Frederick being dead, his sonne Maximilian, who in his fathers life time had the gouernment of the Empire, was without any contradiction made Emperour. In the beginning of his Reigne, hee disposing himself to go to the warres against the Turke, who had kept a great stirre in Hungary, made him to flee. Hee took to wife Blanch, daughter to the Duke of Milan, and made great warres against the Swislers. In this Emperors time the Pisans in Germany made an insurrection, which was one of the greatest tumults that had been seen; but they being soon suppressed, he subdued many other Rebels. Then became to growe the causes of the dissension between Spain and France for the Duchie of Milan. This Emperour made warre against the Venetians: then Lewes king of Hungary ouerthrowne and slaine by the Turke, anno Dom. 1526.

Warres betweene the Emperour and the French King.

then followed the terrible battailes of Rauenna and Marignan, with diuers accidents of warre, which ended in a fainted (yet for a time durable) peace. When the Emperour Maximilian departed out of this life, he had reigned 5 yeeres.

After the peaceable FREDERICK, followed his son, the warlike and victorious MAXIMILIAN, who in his fathers life time was crowned King of the Romanes. The same yeere that his father the Emperour FREDERICK, died, the Turkes made an incursion into the countrie of Croatia, a prouince of Hungary, which bordereth vpon Dalmatia: and the new Emperour desiring to preuent the danger, speedily raising his forces, went to fight with them, but they hauing intelligence of his coming, retired: whereupon he dissolued his Army. The Emperour MAXIMILIAN hauing bin a good space a widower; when as his father was dead, he contracted himself to the Lady BLANCH, the daughter of GALEAS, and Nicetto LEVVS SFORCE Duke of Milan; who being Vncle and gouernour to his Nephew JOHN GALEAS (who in right was Duke) vsurped and held his estate. This BLANCH being the fairest woman of her time was wooed by many Princes, yet to her was the Emperour married. To whom LO DOVICK promised in dowrie 400 thousand duckets, to be paid within a certaine time and 40 thousand in Jewells and other ornaments: and MAXIMILIAN (regarding money more then the alliance) tyed himselfe to inuelt LO DOVICK in the Duchie of Milan (to the preiudice of JOHN GALEAS his new brother-in-law) to hold it for him and his successors, as if the estate had been without a Duke since the death of PHILIP MARIA visconti. At the same time, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1494. the French King CHARLES the Eight made preparation to come into Italy, who a little before had given out in speeches that he meant to make a conquest of the kingdome of Naples, which he pretended to belong to him, by the last will and succession of RENNE Lord of Provence, and his ancestors Dukes of Anjou: whereto he was chiefly induced by LEVVS Duke of Milan Vncle to the right Duke JOHN: For FERDINAND King of Naples, and his sonne ALONSO, had required him to leaue the gouernment of Milan, to Duke JOHN GALEAS, who was married to King FERDINANDS Niece, and vpon this quarrell they determined to make warre vpon him: by reason whereof he by all meanes possible perswaded the French King to come against him into Italy, and to that effect furnished him with a great summe of money. And to the end that the Emperour MAXIMILIAN should not be his enemy in this case, LEVVS SFORCE procured this marriage of his Niece with the Emperour. In the time wherein his coming was most bruiet, died FERDINAND King of Naples, when he had reigned feuen and thirty yeeres, and his son ALONSO Duke of Calabria succeeded him.

At this time was the new Emperesse BLANCH carried into Germany, and there was married to MAXIMILIAN; Germany being in peace and quiet, and the Emperour taking care for the warres, and resistance to be made against the Turkes. But the King of France neuertheless took his way towards Italy: and to the end he might passe in more safety, he gaue to King FERDINAND the Earledome of Rossillon, and the Ile of Sardinia, which JOHN, father to FERDINAND had morgaged to LEVVS the French King, father to this CHARLES. Of the commanding of this King CHARLES, although it concerneth not this history, yet I will briefly write the summe: for it was a matter very famous, and much feared by the Pope, and by all the Princes and Potentates of Italy: and also for that it will serue for the better vnderstanding of what we shal speak of hereafter.

King CHARLES then with 50000. men of foote and horse, in the moneth of September in the same yeere came into Lombardy, where he was by Duke LEVVS receiued with great honor, and his Army was by him furnished with all things necessarie. Being there he went to visit the right Duke, JOHN GALEAS, who lay sicke in Pavia, and within few daies after died, leauing a young son called FRANCIS: He was his cosin germane: for the King and GALEAS came of two Sisters, daughters to LEVVS the Second, Duke of Savoy. The words he vsed to him were in general, for that LO DOVICK was present, onely expressing how much he was grieved for his sickness, perswading him to hope of recouerie, but in his minde the King and all that were with him had great compassion on him, beleeuing confidently that the young gentleman had not long to liue, by the villanie of his vncle. The presence of ISABELL his wife did adde much to this compassion: who not onely full of sorrow for her husbands infirmity and the estate of her little son, but much afflicted for the danger wherein her father and friends were, in the presence of them all fell at the Kings feet, recommending vnto him with teares, her father and his howse of ARAGON: to whom although the King for her age, beaurie and present fortune made some shewes of pittie, yet not able to stay the course of so great an action vpon so slender an occasion, he answered her with shewes of will to do that which he could not; saying, that he was forced to prosecute the enterprize, being so farre advanced. Then holding on his iourney he came to Pisa, and was afterwards receiued into Florence, and from Florence he went to Rome, no man daring by the way to make head against him, and much lesse at his coming to that city.

man

Pope ALEXANDER not daring stay his coming in his Palace, retired himself into the Castle Saint Angelo, so much did they stand in feare of him. Afterwards they two came to a composition of peace, although they neither met nor spake together: but afterwards vpon security they met and conferred, and within few daies after, the King with the greatest part of the forces which he brought with him out of France, tooke his way towards the Kingdome of Naples, in the moneth of Ianuary, in the yeere of our Lord 1495. where King ALONSO durst not stay vntill he came, as well by reason of the great Army which he brought with him, as for that, by reason of his vicious and dissolute life, he was ill beloued of his owne subiects of that kingdome. Whereupon, at what time as King CHARLES was in Rome; King ALONSO hauing reigned not fully one whole yeere, giuing vp that Kingdome to his son FERDINAND, went into Sicilia, where he became a Monke, and in short space after died: by reason whereof, his son FERDINAND being King, he raised the greatest power hee was able, so that it is affirmed he had 5000. men at Armes, 500. light horse, and a great number of foot. Neuertheless the French had so good successe, and King FERDINAND found so great feare, and so little constancie in his people, that after some accidents, he came to Naples, and thence fled by Sea to Isehaia, and afterwards into Sicilia, and so the French King in two moneths space, became Lord of the whole Kingdome, excepting some little townes vpon the Sea side, which held for King FERDINAND.

Pope ALEXANDER seeing the prosperitie and power of King CHARLES in the kingdome of Naples, knowing his ambition, and fearing to lose his estate, whilst he was buisied in the conquest of Naples, procured a league to be made betweene himselfe, the Venecians, and the Emperour MAXIMILIAN, whom hee solicited to come into Italy to the reliefe and defence of his Church. Into this league also entred LEVVS Duke of Milan (notwithstanding that by his procurement King CHARLES took occasion to come into Italy) being grieved in minde for that King CHARLES had so good successe in Naples, which made him stand in feare of his owne estate; whereto the French King euer had an eye; as afterwards LEVVS Duke of Orleans and cosin germane to King CHARLES, who afterwards was King, made apparant; who challenged that Dukedome to appertaine vnto him, for that he was Nephew of the other LEVVS Duke also of Orleans, brother to King CHARLES the Sixt, and of his wife VALENTINA, sister to Duke PHILIP of Milan, the last of the Viscounts; whose bastard, FRANCOIS SFORCE Duke of Milan took to wife, when he became Lord of that Duchie: Whereupon LEVVS for the better confirmation of his estate, obtained of MAXIMILIAN (as supreme Lord of all Lombardy) to be inuested in the Duchie of Milan: which in my iudgement, and of all those which write without passion, was his truest and best title; for after the death of Duke PHILIP aboue named, neither the Emperour FREDERICK, neither MAXIMILIAN had giuen the title to the Duke, or to his Father, or to his Nephew; neither could it descend to them by the feminine sex, and much lesse to this LEVVS Duke of Orleans, who then sought, and afterwards took the same, when he came to be King of France; and by so much the more, for that the descendents from this SFORCE, came from the woman being a bastard, whereby he vniuilly and without reason possessed so great an estate: he being inuested by the Emperour with great ioy and solemnitie, took the Ducal Ensignes. King CHARLES hauing intelligence of the League newly made by these Princes, resolved to leaue such forces in the kingdome of Naples, as might suffice for the defence thereof, and with the rest of his Army to returne into France; and marching towards Rome, giuing the Pope to vnderstand that he came to do his dutie to his Holines, Pope ALEXANDER after some Ambassages betweene them, not daring to abide his coming, departed from Rome; wherein, and in other townes belonging to King Charles of France his conquest of the kingdome of Naples.

Charles the eighth, King of France, came into Italy.

to the Church, the Kings troupes did much harme. The Pope not holding himselfe to be in safety in Civita Vecchia, went to Perugia, with an intent, if he were oppressed, to go to Ancona, and there to imbarke himselfe for Venice.

The French King departing from Rome, continued his journey towards France, notwithstanding that he knew that in Lombardy the Venecians and the Duke of Milan had an Army in a readinesse to fight with him; and in Lombardy L. VV. Duke of Orleans had already taken the City of Nouarra, vnder pretext of the title aforesaid: whereupon the Duke of Milan made haste to besiege him. King CHARLES coming neere to Parma, passing the river Taro, found a great Army of his enemies; whereof FRANCIS GONZAGA Marquesse of Manos was General: with whom neere to the river they came to a battell, where hapned very notable accidents. But herein is great difference among Writers about this matter: for, the French attribute the victory to their King; and the Italians giue it to the Venecians and to the Milanais. The truth is, that neither of the Armies was wholly broken or ouerthrowne, but the Italians that day seemd to be Masters of the field: which appears in this, that they taking many French prisoners, none of them were taken by the French; and they moreover compelled the French king to seek another passage, by reason whereof they were reputed to haue the victory.

There died in this battell, which was fought on the sixt day of Iuly, in the yeer of our Lord 1495, a thousand men of both sides. But GUYCHARDIN, writing of this battell of Taro or ENFRAUO, saith, that the French had not about 200 slain; and of the confederates there were slain 3000: among which was RAINVENTO de FARNESA, Leader of the Venecian horsemen. Touching the honour of the victory, either side sought to appropriate it to himselfe with what reasons they could produce; The Italians, for that their tents and carriages were not spoiled: but, by the general opinion of all indifferent men, the French were held to haue the glory of the victory, both for that they slue more of their enemies, they chased them ouer the river, and wonne their liberty to passe on. But after some treaties between the two Armies, the French in a night went towards Aste; where the King remained certain daies, and a peace was concluded between him and the Duke of Milan: and L. VV. Duke of Orleans rendering Nouarra, King CHARLES returned into France; and shortly after, FERRDINAND King of Naples recovered that Kingdom, but not without great difficulty, by reason of the French which remained in garison there, and of those which the King afterwards sent thither. In which war, matters of greatest importance for the seruice of King FERRDINAND, were guided and directed by the famous Captain GONSALO FERNANDES of Cordona, who for his excellency was called the great Captain of Spain; sent thither by King FERRDINAND, called the Catholick, for the defense of that Kingdom the first time that he went thither: and so of all this great enterprise, there remained nothing to the French King, but that hee did much harm, and put all Italy in great fear (for, the reputation and power wherewith he came, was very great) and making a iourney, gaue a bold attempt, and therewith returned.

Whil'these matters passed in Italy, the Emperor in the same yeer 1495, assembled a Council or Diet in the City of Worms; where the matter was debated, whether the Emperor should go to relieue the Pope against the French King, or make warre against the Turk: but the Princes were so contrary in their opinions, that nothing was concluded. The Emperor at this Assembly gaue to the Earls of Wittenburgh the title of Dukes, which they hould to this day: and from thence he sent the Ensignes and inuestiture before named to LODOVICK Duke of Milan; and other matters were ordained concerning the government and peace of Germany. At that time was MAXIMILIAN daily solicited by the Duke of Milan to come into Italy: and in the end by his importunity, and promise of certain money for the defraying of his Army, the Emperor past the mountains but slenderly accompanied, giuing it out that the body of the Army which he had promised, marched after. Being entred Italy, he sent to haue the Duke of Saluz and some other Princes come and speak with him: but his forces were so contemptible, that not any one would obey. Then LODOVICK Duke of Milan perswaded the Emperor to go to Pisa (against whom the Florentines made warre) hoping by his means to get that Towne into his hands: whereupon, the Emperor sent Ambassadors to Florence, to let them understand, that intending to go with a great Army against the Infidels, hee held it necessary first to come into Italy, for the pacifying of all quarels. And for that it did belong to his Imperiall Authority, he required to be informed of the controversies between them and the Pisians; commanding them in the mean time to surcease from Arms, with assurance that hee would administer iustice indifferently. To whom they sent their Ambassadors to Genoa to beseech him to think, that seeing his holy resolution was to settle peace in Italy, there was nothing more conuenient than to restore Pisa to the Florentines, from whence sprung all the discontentments to his Majesty and the confederates, Pisa being in that regard the cause which made some aspire to the ans. Moreover, that it was not agreeable to iustice, that such as had been spoiled by force, if they were not restored to their possession; which if they might obtain of him, they would then refer their cause to him, and wholly rely on his iustice. MAXIMILIAN discontent with this siege, and returned suddenly with little honour into Germany, hauing shewed his weaknes in Italy.

that

It hapned after, that King FERRDINAND hauing recovered his Kingdome, falling sick, died; and for that hee had no sonne, his vnckle FREDERICK, brother to his father King ALWIS, had the Kingdome; and many other matters befell in Italy, which I haue no time to write: and the Emperor was in peace with King CHARLES, who shortly after in the yeer 1497, died suddenly; which caused a great alteration: for, by reason that he had no issue male, dome of France; who as soon as he was King, caused himself to be called Duke of Milan; where execution: and he presently diuorcing himself from his wife LOAN, which was sister to his Predecessor CHARLES, alleging for his reason that she was barren, and that he was forced to marry her; and also to the end to haue (as he had) the Duchie of Brittain, he married the widow Queen ANNE, late wife of the deceased King CHARLES.

The Emperor hauing intelligence of the death of the French King, desiring to get the Duchy of Burgundy for his sonne PHILIP, who afterward was King of Spain, entred it with an armed hand, and took some Towns: for the defense whereof, the new King L. VV. Duke of Orleans sent a very great Army; but within few daies following, a peace was concluded between them, greatly to the Emperors honour and advantage: which was the more easily effected, by reason of the great desire the French King had to proceed in his enterprise against Milan, for the right which he pretended to haue to that Duchie; and for that the Emperor had resolved to make war against the Duke of Gelders. The Duke of Milan hauing a watchfull eye, and standing in great fear of the French Kings proceedings, as much as was possible for him provided for his defense, principally through the league and friendship with the Emperor; who, being of sufficient power to protect him, was resolved to haue done so: but other warres happening in the mean time with the Swissers, who in the yeer of our Lord 1499, made warres in the Territories belonging to Austria (which warre, and the occasion thereof, is written at large by HENRICVS MYCIVS and NAVCLERVS); the Emperor, leaving the enterprise of Gelders, the situation of their country, environed with most high hills and steep mountains, as also for their great strength and courage, were then (and at this day are) greatly esteemed, and reputed valiant in Arms. MAXIMILIAN coming against them, notwithstanding that this warre began against his will, yet he followed the same in such sort, that in sundry conflicts and encounters between them, 30000 men were slain of both parts, but the greatest number was of the Swissers; fortune inclining sometime to the one side, and sometime to the other: in the which war he did wonders in his owne person, vntill that at last, through the entreaty of the Duke of Milan and other Princes (which interposed themselves) the Emperor concluded a peace with them. But before that this warre was ended, L. VV. Duke of Orleans the French King (who procured the same) to take benefit of the time, raised his whole power; and in the moneth of October, the same yeer, entring Lombardy, he besieged and took the Duke of Milan's Towns; who because he was ill beloued of his subjects, and the Emperor failing him in his necessity, and also because the Venecians were in league with the King, he resolved by abandoning the City to giue place to the French fury; and sending his brother ASCANIVS SEURCH before, with his sonnes MAXIMILIAN and FRANCIS into Germany, he with the best and greatest part of his treasure, within few daies after followed. The Duke being in this manner departed, the French King with very little resistance or none at all, was receiued into Milan, and into the rest of the cities in that Duchy: and the Venecians (according to the composition made betweene them) took the citie of Cremona and other places of that estate.

King

A battell between the French and the Italians at Enfrauo.

The Kingdom of Naples recovered by King Ferrdinand of Aragon.

The Emperor comes into Italy.

King LEVVS being in this manner become Lord of all Lombardy, leaving therein such gouernours and garrisons as he thought expedient, returned victorious and triumphant into his countrey. The Duke of Milan being come before the Emperour (who loued him very well) was by him very honorably and kindly intreated; and within few daies after, the Emperour assembling the greatest part of the Princes of the Empire, resolved to relieue and succour him as a prince by him inuested, and who had the best title to that estate; and so with the greatest expedition that could be made, a good Army was leui'd, the greatest part whereof were Swissers; wherein the Cardinall A SCANVS the Dukes brother vsed great diligence. With these men and with such others as he leui'd in Italy, the Duke in the yeere 1500, returned into Lombardy, and his brother the Cardinall going before, was receiued into Milan and other cities, who speedily conducted thither his brother.

The French King being certified hereof, in the greatest haste possible sent into Lombardy the greatest number of choice men that he could get, the greatest part whereof likewise were Swissers; and the Duke who wanted neither men nor courage to fight, attended in field the coming of the French Army: the two Armies being at the poynt to haue ioyned, the Swissers which were with the Duke, not onely refused to fight, but (as some say) corrupted with money, deliuered vp the poore Duke to the French, who was carried prisoner into France and afterwards his brother the Cardinall was taken. And so in few daies space, the French King recovered the estate of Milan, and Duke LEVVS afterwards, poore, afflicted, and deprived of his Duchy; dyed in prison, hauing been one of the most puissant, valiant and redoubted Princes of the world.

Pope ALEXANDER (who neuer had any feeling or compassion of an other mans affliction and miseries) felt tragically crosses in his owne howle, the fruits of lust and vnatural cruelty; for he still desiring to aduance the Duke of Gandia his eldest son to all temporall greatnes, the Cardinall of Valente ambitiously affecting his brothers place, and withall enuying him that he had a better share in the loue of the Lady LVCRATIA their common sister, thrust on by lust and ambition, hee caused him to be murdered as he rode one night alone in the streets of Rome, and his body to be cast into Tiber. GVICHARDIN writes, that it was reported, that the father was a concubiner with his two sonnes in the loue of his daughter LVCRATIA, who being made Pope took her from her husband, as too mean, and married her to JOHN SPORE Lord of Pesaro; but not able to endure her husband to be his cortuall, he disolued this second marriage, suggesting that JOHN was colde by nature, and vnable to cohabit. The death of the Duke of Gandia afflicted him so, as with teares in the open consistorie he accused his owne actions and life, and promised reformation.

In this yeere 1500, vpon Saint Matthias day, being the siue and twentieth day of February, CHARLES who afterwards was King of Spain and Emperour, and was called CHARLES the First, was borne in the citie of Gann in Flanders. Duke LEVVS hauing in this manner lost his estate, the Emperour receiued his sons which the Cardinall A SCANVS brought with him: what became of them, you shall heare hereafter. In the yer 1501, prodigious sights, much to be admired, appeared in Germany; for certaine crosses of sundry colours, and some blacke, were seene vpon men and womens apparel, vpon their heads, and vpon the beds whereon they did lie, made so perfect and so liuely for the time they lasted, that it was wonderful to behold; after which, ensued a most grievous and cruell Pestilence. In those dayes also in Asia began the Empire and dominion of that great Prince, called the Sophi of Persia, who had his beginning from one called SEHIN, or SECHIN, who was said to be descended from the auncient Kings of the Persians: this Prince by Armes made himselfe Lord of all Persia, and of great part of Armenia, of Mesopotamia, and other Prouinces: and afterwards the Kingdome of Persia was established in his successors; which since encreasing, is in some sort a bridle to the vnmeasurable rapine and power of the great Turk.

At the same time, LEVVS the French King standing in some doubt of the Emperour, by reason of his late conquest of Milan, and the enterprise of Naples, which he purposed to vnder-take, sought to enter into a league with him, and to giue his eldest daughter CLAVDIA in marriage to young CHARLES, who afterwards was Emperour and King of Spain, being then but one yeere olde (he being also an infant) to whom appertained the succession and inheritance of the Duchy of Britaine: with this match, the Emperour and his son PHILIP were well content: and Queene IOAN and the said PHILIP being then to goe into Spain, by the league and consent of the said French King, went through France, and in the citie of Paris this marriage marriage was solemnized; and so they passed into Spain, where they making their abode not fully two yeeres, returned by the same way they came through France, as through their friends countrey. Which marriage afterwards was not accomplished, for King LEVVS married his said daughter CLAVDIA, to FRANCIS Duke of Angolemente, who was afterwards King: by reason whereof King LEVVS lost the title which he pretended to haue to the Duchy of Milan; for at the making of the peace, it was decreed, that if this marriage took not effect, that then the Emperour, should giue the Duchy of Milan to the said young Prince CHARLES. The French King being in this manner in league with the Emperour, sought also to enter into the like with FERDINAND King of Castile, with these conditions; that they two making a conquest of the kingdome of Naples, and deposing King FREDERICK should diuide the same betweenethem: which conditions were accepted by King FERDINAND (as saith SABELLEVS, a writer of that time) for that King FREDERICK shewed himselfe ingratefull to his Nephew, who sent him ayde and succours; and the same went, that hee secretly practising vnderhand with the French King, offered to pay him tribute, to the end he should not make warre against him, but suffer him to liue in peace; and that hee promised him his help for the taking of the Ile of Sicilia, which appertained to King FERDINAND, and to the house of Aragon.

This being concluded, the two Kings sending thither their Armies and Generals, the warre began; and after some matters (which I haue no time to relate) King FREDERICK abandoning the Kingdome, yielded himself into the French Kings hands, who vsed him very kindly: but his Army neuertheless took all his Countrey, Calabria and Pulia excepted, which the Spaniards seized on in the behalf of King FERDINAND. And so for a while the peace continued between the French and the Spanish, until that the French seeking to intrude themselves into the Spanish limits, they made warre one against the other, which warre was one of the most cruell and famous that euer was, and wherein the French employed the greatest force and power: and GONSALO FERNANDES of Cordova, being Generall for King FERDINAND, in the space of three yeeres that this warre lasted, obtained so many notable victories, and performed such exploits in Arms, and vsed so many policies and stratagems, that he purchased the name of a great Captain; and wholly expelling the French out of that Kingdome, made a conquest thereof for his King: and so it remains vntill this day subiect to the house of Castile. In the time of this war, which was in the yeere 1503, died Pope ALEXANDER, when he had been Pope eleuen yeeres. He died (as it is written) of poison; which, GVICHARDIN relates after this manner: Going the 18 of August to sup in a Vineyard neer to the Vatican, he was suddenly carried away dead to the Palace, being (according to most mens opinions) poisoned after this manner: The Duke of Valentinois his gracelesse sonne had resolved to poison ADRIAN Cardinall of Cornette in the wine they should haue at supper; for, it is most certain, that both father and sonne were well practised in poisoning; not onely to be reuenged of their enemies, or to be freed from icalousies, but euen of a wicked desire to get the goods of the rich whosoever they were; As happened to the Cardinall of S. Auge who was very rich, yea they would poison their greatest friends and most faithfull seruants, such as were the Cardinalls of Capua and Modena. VALENTINOS had sent certaine flagons of poisoned wine before, giuing charge to his man that no man should touch them. The Pope coming thither before and some what altered with heat, called for drink, his owne prouision being not yet come: he that had the charge of the poisoned wine (thinking it had been recommended vnto him for the rareness thereof) gaue the Pope thereof to drink; and his sonne VALENTINOS, arriving at the same Instant, drank also of the same wine. The father died instantly: but VALENTINOS by the vigor of his youth and the helpe of strong counterpoisons recovered after a long and grievous sickness. At Rome reioyced to see the body of this monster dead; a man full of ambition, infidelity, cruelty, luxury, and strange couetousness, selling both holy and prophane things without distinction, with which vices he had infected the whole world. In his place was chosen Cardinall FRANCIS PICCOLLOMINI, Nephew to Pope PIVS, being his sisters sonne, and was therefore called PIVS TERTIUS; but he being Pope but thirtie dayes, Cardinall IVAN was chosen, and called IVLIVS the Second.

The Emperour intermeddled not in the affaires of Naples, as well for the preservation of the league and friendship with France, as also the better to provide for other matters in the Empire, wherein at the very same time, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1502, befell a strange aduventure in the countrey of Spire; wherein an infinite number of people gathering themselves together

H h

A league betweene the French King, and the King of Castile.

The Swissers gave the Duke of Milan into the power of his enemy the French King.

The Duke of Gandia murdered by his brother.

Emperour being discontented drawing his forces towards the Frontiers of Italy, he sent a Herald to Verona to publish his intent to passe into Italy, to receive the Imperiall Crowne, and to require lodging for 4000 Horse; whereunto the gouernour made answer, that if he would passe for no other occasion then to receiue the Crown, they would honor him with all offices of obseruance; but they saw contrary effects, hauing brought so great forces with Artillery vpon their Frontiers. This voyage of the Emperours produced no great effects: for after some spoiles don in Friuli and some places taken, which the Venecians soon recouered, in the end he sought to haue a truce with the Venecians, the which was concluded for three yeers, and so the Emperour retired into Germany.

In the meane time, CHARLES Duke of Gualderland, through the ayde (as it was furnished) of the French king, made warres in Brabant, whereupon the Emperour was constrained to giue ouer the warre against the Venecians, and with his forces to go to the reliefe of that Countrey, wherein he making head against the Gelderois, put them to the worse. In the yeere 1508, LEONARD Duke of Milan, called the Moore, being depriv'd of his estate, dyed prisoner in France; his sonnes MAXIMILIAN and FRANCIS, living in the Emperours Court in Germany.

A league made at Cambray.

This yeere the Emperour and French King, being either of them much discontented with the Venecians, they resolved to contract a league secretly against them; sending their deputies to Cambray to that end, where they concluded (contrarie to the covenants with either of them made with the Venecians) with the consent of the Pope and king of Aragon, to make war against the Venecians, every one in his owne right, to recouer those townes which they had usurped from them. As, for the Pope Faenza, Rimini, Ravenna, and Servia: for the Emperour Padua, Vincenza, and Verona, belonging to the Empire, and Friuli and Trenis as th'inheritance of the house of Austria: for the French King Verona, Ghiaradada, Brescia, Bergamo, and Crema: And for the king of Aragon the Townes and hauens which had been morgaged by FERDINAND king of Naples: That the French King should beginne the warre in person by the first of Aprill, at what time the Pope and the Catholike King should enter into the action: And to the end the Emperour might haue some colour of excuse for not observing the truce which he had made with the Venecians, The Pope should demande succours of him as from the protector of the Church. There were many other Articles conteyned in this league whereof GUY CHARDIN makes an ample relation.

The Pope being resolute, and loth to see the Emperour too great in Italy, he desired rather to obtaine part by accord, then the whole by Armes, labouring to induce the Venecians to restore him Rimini and Faenza; letting them know that the danger which threatened them by the vnion of so many Princes, would be farre greater if he did concurre with them, and pursue them both with his spirituall and temporall Armes; but if they rendered those townes he should haue iust cause not to ratifie the league, which without his Pontificall authority would easily vanish. The Venecians were herewith much perplexed, there being great contrariety of opinions amongst the Senators: but in the end the worse counsell prevailed, which was not to yeeld vnto the Popes desire, whereupon his Holinesse ratified the league.

In Aprill 1509 the French King advanced his Army into Italy, sending a Herald to Venice to denounce war against them, whereunto the Duke and State answered; That since the king his master was resolved to make war against them, in a time when they hoped most for the obseruation of the league which they had neuer violated, whereby they had made the Emperour their enemy, they would stand vpon their defence, relying vpon the equity of their cause. They hauing drawne together a flourishing Army went to field, and after some daies the two Armies met at Ghiaradada where there was a furious battaile fought, and the Venecians were overthrowne. But some write that onely the Venecian reercard came to blowes, wherethey were in a manner all slaine hauing fought very valiantly, their commander BARTHOLOMEW d'ALVIANA being taken prisoner. Many townes in Lombardy followed the Victors fortune and yeelded to the French King. The newes of this ouerthrow being come to Venice, it cannot be written what a generall lamentation there was in the citie, and how much they feared the ruine of their countrey. Thus in 15 daies after the battaile, the French King hauing conquered all that belonged to him by the league of Cambray, the Pope plaied his part with the townes of Romagnia, and the Emperour MAXIMILIAN sending diuerse troupes into Friuli, took diuerse townes there.

The Venecians, seeing their estate desperate, resolved to abandon the iurisdiction of the firm land, land, and to contain them selues within the salt water; commanding their Magistrates and Officers in Padua, Verona, and other places, to retire; and leade the Towns to the peoples deuotion. They also sent an Ambassador to the Emperour to pacifie him by their humble submission; and to obtain peace vnder what condition soeuer: but they could not move him. They also sent vnto the Pope whatsoeuer they held there; vpon certain conditions, which the Pope did not allow. Thus were they stript of all their great power, being almost out of hope for the preferuation of their liberty. This ruine of theirs was very sensible to many, who foresaw that the state of Italy would be very wretched, if it should be brought vnder the yoke of strangers. The Pope aboute all others began to be much grieved for their fall, who, fearing the power of CHARLES and the French King, resolved to do all hee could to crosse their courses, accepting the Letters written vnto him in the name of the Duke of Venice with great submission, humbly entreating him to pardon and absolue them.

The Emperour delaying his coming into Italy, the Venecians began to recouer some Towns in the firm land which they had abandoned; and the French King prepared for his return into France. In the mean time the Emperour came into Italy with no great forces; so as hee spent the time in enterprises of small moment with little honour to the Imperiall Name: yet at that time he did sollicite his confederates to ioyne their forces together, for the taking of the City of Venice; but they could not agree: but in the mean time Friuli and Istria were pitifully afflicted by the Emperours forces; and he went in person to besiege Padua with a great Army, which the Venecians did fortifie with all the men, artillery and munition they could; so as all the young Gentlemen of Venice with their friends and followers put themselves in Armes, and went to guard the City: but after seuenteen daies siege he raised his Camp, and retired towards Verona with much discontent; and then presently returned into Germany to giue order (as hee said) for the warres he intended to make the Spring following: After which, the Venecians made their submission to the Pope, who gaue them absolution, and enioyned them for penance to visit certain Churches. The warre continued still betwixt the Emperours forces and the Venecians: and the Pope, seeking to reconcile them, the first that gaue ouer this war, was Pope IV 11 01 who, being sued vnto by the Venecians for peace, granted the same; and therewith withdrew his forces.

Pope IV 11 01 (as he was a subtile cunning Prelate) hauing gotten what he desired, mistrusted that the Emperour and the French King hauing brought the Venecians to ruine, his owne state would be in danger: for, his meaning was that no man should be of greater power in Italy than himself. But as the French Kings purposes were to the contrary, so he took his agreement between the Venecians and the Pope in very ill part; and after many Ambassages past between them, in the end they two fell at variance. The Pope, practising vnder hand with the Genoais, made them rebell against the French King; and the King (in requital) made a schisme in the Papacy, and to that effect drew the Cardinall of S. Croffe (who had been Legat in Germany) together with some other Cardinals, to his deuotion; who, calling a Councell against the Pope, appointed the City of Pisa for the place of their meeting. The Emperour, notwithstanding the league between the Pope and the Venecians, desisted not from warring against them: but hee was aduertised that the French King had induced the Duke of Gualders to take Armes against him, and to that effect had with money supplied his want: for, the King although hee would that all should aid and assist him, yet hee would not that any one but himself should haue the victory.

Vpon this occasion, the Emperour, leauing the friendship of the French, ioynd with the Pope: and the French King, persisting in his resolution, caused many Bishops and other Prelates to go to Pisa; where he procured the Councell to be assembled, which the Cardinall of Saint Croffe had already begun: but, holding themselves to be there in no safety, they went afterwards to Milan. And the Pope in like manner sent to the King of Castile, requiring his aid, which presently was promised, and afterwards sent him; and then he began with his fulminations to persecute the French King. And to the end to defeat this Councell, hee summoned a Councell generall to be held in Saint Iohn de Lateran in Rome, the yeer next following, which was in the yeer 1512. The warre between the King and the Pope being very cruell, the King mightily engrossing his Army, made MONSIEUR DE FORX, Generall thereof; who going to Bologna, took it; and taking Brescia, sacked it.

The Cardinall of Saint Croffe, and those which ioynd with him, cited the Pope to appear before

The French
King caused a schisme in the Papacy.

before them : and the Pope, after many protestations proceeding against them, deprived them of all their ecclesiasticall dignities and benefices : King FERDINAND'S forces coming to the Popes aid, after some encounters the two Armies (meeting neer to Ravenna upon Whit Sunday, in the year 1512) came to a battell, which was as cruell and bloody as ever was any; and although the French obtained the victory, yet twice so many of them were there slain, as of those which were overthrowne, if they may be accounted overcome; whereof one Squadron remained whole and neuer broken, and so past through the midst of their enemies, none daring to charge them.

A battell between the French and the Pope's forces neer the river of Carro in Italy.

In this battell MONSIEUR DE FOIX the French Generall was slain, together with many of the French Nobility. Finally the French were reduced to such an estate, that notwithstanding they had the victory, yet it fared with them as though they had been overcome: for, they departing from Ravenna, and taking their way towards Milan (MONSIEUR DE LA PALISSE being the Generall) Pope IVLIO recovered the City of Ravenna, and in like manner Bologna: and understanding the issue of the battell (though at the first he stood in great fear) yet being certified of the truth, and how much the French Army was distressed, after his accustomed manner leuying new supplies, wrote to all the Kings and Princes of Christendome to stirre them up to warre, and to that effect sent a Cardinall to the Emperor; who, being discontent with the French King, within fewe daies after sent into Italy by the way of Perma, an Army of Swissers and Germans, with MAXIMILIAN SPOER the sonne of Duke LAVRES, to recover the state of Milan which was his fathers. MAXIMILIAN SPOER entering Italy, and being come to Perma, ioyning with the Spanish Army, and with those which were in league with the Pope, the French were stricken with such fear, that the Cardinall of Saint Croisse, and the rest of the Councell of Pisa (which had withdrawn themselves to Milan) with all speed possible departing thence, fled into France: and MONSIEUR DE LA PALISSE the French Generall, leaving such garrisons as hee thought good in the Castles of Adrian and Brescia, and other Towns in Lombardy, abandoning the City, retired to Pavia; and the enemy coming thither, he departed from thence, and went also into France. And so MAXIMILIAN SPOER, in short space recovering the Duchy of Milan, was with great ioy (through the Emperors aid and favour) received into the City: to whom presently came Ambassadors from Genoa to do him honour, and to congratulate his return: for, the Genoais then rebelling against the French, and having chosen them a Duke; besieged the Castle of the Lanterne, which was at the French deuotion. In the processe of his war, the King of Nauarre, for that he held with the French King against the Emperor, against the Pope, and the King of Castile, and would not giue passage to the Spanish Armies, was bereaued of his Kingdom: and the Kings of Castile possesse the same vnto this day.

After these things, and other which succeeded, in the beginning of the year, vpon the three and twentieth day of February, in Rome Pope IVLIO died, in the tenth year of his Papacy; and in his place was chosen IOHN, Cardinall de Medicis, who being taken at the rout of Ravenna, and afterwards set at liberty, was called LAO the Tenth: in the beginning of whose Papacy, the French King, the Lord of Tremouille, and the Duke of Albania, with a great Army came into Lombardy against MAXIMILIAN Duke of Milan; who with aid from the Emperor and the Swissers, coming to a battell neer to Nauarra (where his father was taken prisoner) obtained the victory, with the death, overthrowe, and imprisonment of many of them: so as he, driving the French out of that Duchy, remained Lord thereof in peace.

Presently after this in the same yeere, the Emperor (resolving to let the French King know that he had committed an error, in not keeping the peace made and concluded with him) came to a composition with HENRY the Eight King of England (who was enemy to the French King) to enter France, and to make warre against him: for performance of which conditions, the King of England came to Calis; and entering France, the Emperor with his Army came and ioyned with him: and although the French King durst not fight in battaille, yet there passed many notable skirmishes betweene them: and notwithstanding that the King of England lay two moneths before Terrouenne, yet the French King in all that space not daring to come to seee it, the towne was constrained to yeelde: and so the King after the taking of some other places, went to Tourmay, which he battered with such fury, that it yeelded, together with the Castles and other townes neere adiacent; whereof the King of England being Lord, made great spoyle in the country, without finding any Army in the field to make head against him. The Emperour in like manner by another way, sent VDLRICK Duke of Wuttembergh, with great troups of of Swissers into Burgundy, who besieging Dijon, and having brought it to that distresse as it was thought the prouince would have been lost; the Swissers (according to the accustomed manner) in consideration of one hundred thousand Ducats, sent them by the French King, and moued with the hope of a promised greater summe, raising the siege, returned home to their houses, maugre the Duke of Wuttembergh their Generall: who with his people seeing himselfe abandoned, returned also into his country. It likewise happened, that whilst the King of England made warre in France, the King of Scots (through the instigation of the French King) entered England, against whom in person came KATHERINE Queene of England, accompanied by some of the Nobility and Commons of that Realme, and fighting with the Scots (notwithstanding that the victory was very doubtful and vnequall, by reason of the great multitude of them) yet their King was slaine in the battaille: and the Scots not daring any longer to hold the field, returned home; and the English entering Scotland, took certaine places there, in such sort that the King of England through his wiues meanes in England, and the Emperors ayde in France, returned victorious into his country. And the Emperour, for that his presence was very requisite in Germany did the like; for in Wormes was much debate and contention betweene the estates Ecclesiasticall and Secular. There was also great controuerfie between WILLIAM and LAVRES, Dukes of Basurie, the Emperors Nephewes, the sons of his brother in-law ALBERT. Whereupon the Emperour went to them, and in some fort mitigating the contention, brought them to be in peace. In the same yeere 1513, the Venecians made a league with the French King, which was effected by means of BARTELEMY D'ARVIANO their Generall, who was taken prisoner by the King, and ANDREW GRITTI a Venecian gentleman, who was afterwards one of the most excellent Dukes that hath been in Venice, who likewise was prisoner.

After this, a peace being concluded betweene England and France, the French King took to wife MARY the King of *England*s sister, with whom he liued but a while after his marriage; for he falling extremely sick, died vpon the first day of Ianuary, in the yeere of our Lord 1514. and the 17. of his Reaigne; whom succeeded the often named FRANCIS Duke of Angouleme, who after his Coronation, procured a league to be made with the Emperour: whereupon the Earle of Neufass came to Paris, and so a new marriage was concluded between CHARLES who then was Prince of Spaine, and RENATA sister to CLAVDIA the new Queene of France; which Marriage afterwards took no effect. The Emperour consented, and liked well of the match, as well by reason of the troubles he had in Germany, as for the peace and common good which was expected to ensue thereof. And for the better preferuation of the particular peace made with LADISLAUS King of Hungary & Bohemia, he resolved to marry his niece MARY to LAVRES, the eldest son of the said King, notwithstanding that they both were very young: whereupon in Iuly in the yeere 1515 a meeting was appointed to be held in Vienna in Austria, whither came SIGISMUND King of Poland, LADISLAUS King of Hungary and Bohemia, with his sonne LAVRES, the Emperour, the Dukes of Basurie, and many other Princes of Germany, where the said LAVRES prince of Hungary was betrothed to MARI the Emperors niece; and it was also agreed, that FERDINAND of Castile, should marrie with his sister ANNE, which afterwards took effect; who reigned in those kingdomes after the decease of his brother in-law LAVRES, which marriages were accomplished after the Emperors decease, in the yeere 1521. The French King FRANCIS knowing the Emperour to be inclined to peace, feasting and banquetting, and hauing a little before confirmed a peace with England, and with the Venecians, as he had also done the like with the same Emperour; within short space after he leuied a very great Army of Germans, and Lantzknights, with a resolution to inuade the Duchie of Milan; and being with his Army past the Alps, neere to Turin, he ioyned with his Vncle CHARLES Duke of Saoy; and then coming to Verselli, thither came 2000 souldiers sent him by the Genoais, at the request of OCTAVIAN FRIGOSO their Duke: from thence he went to Nouarra, which yeilded without assault; and passing on towards Milan; and knowing that the Duke had an Army of Swissers sent him by the Emperour; and that he intended to giue him battaille, he sought to haue corrupted the Swissers with money, asking LAVRES did when he took the said Dukes father; but failing thereof (for it was discovered to his enemies) he fought with them betweene Milan and Marignan, neere to a Village called Saint BRIGHTS: the battaille was so fiercely fought, that before any signe of victory, they were ouertaken by the night, which was so darke, the Moore being down, that when they left fighting, neither party knew how to retire; and so they stood all the night armed, expecting the day; which being come they again renewed the thebataille: at which time, a rumor was spread over the Camp, that BARTHOLOMEV DALVIANO was at hand with the Venecian Army, and that he had marched all the night to come to joyne with the French King. Whereupon the Swissers fearing so great succors, fled; and the victory remaining to the French King, a most cruell slaughter was made of the poore Swissers.

The battaille of Marignan.

GVICHARDINE writes, that the Swissers grew proud of the first daies fight, it being bruited throughout Italie, that they had put the enemies Army to flight; and the King was careful to provide for all things fit for his safety. At the breake of day, the Swissers (who not only despised the French Army, but all the forces of Italie united) returned to the charge with like fury and rashnesse, and the French entertained them with great valour and discretion: and withall ALVIANO commander of the Venecian forces comming with his light-horse-men, charged the Swissers on the back, so that they despaired of the victory, founding the retreat, and retraying in good order towards Milan, to the great astonishment of the French men, who durst not follow them. This was one of the most furious batailles that euer was scene in Italie.

The King having obtained so notable a victory; Duke MAXIMILIAN abandoning the citie of Milan, withdrew himself into the castle, whereupon the city yielded to the King, and the other cities did the like. The Duke being besieged and assaulted in the castle, (notwithstanding that the Emperour certified him that he would speedily send him releefe) compounding with the French King for a certaine summe of money, which the king promised to giue him yearly, he resigned the title and state of Milan; and so putting himself into the Kings power, he went into France, where he afterwards dyed. The French King hereupon was received into Milan, and into all the other cities without resistance; wherewith the Emperour being much displeased, made preparation for his comming into Italy: whereof the King standing in some doubt, sought to enter into a league with Pope LEO; who seeing him victorious was glad of the match; and appointing to meete him in Bologna, the league was confirmed, which being ended, the King returning into France left the Duke of Bourbon with his Army in the state of Milan.

At this time vpon the five and twentieth day of January in the yeare 1516, dyed King FERRDINAND in Madrid heere to Guadalupe in Spain; and to the government of those kingdomes they called CHARLES, (who was afterwards Emperour, being then but sixteen yeeres old) who went thither the yeere following. The Duchy of Milan being conquered by the French King, in such manner as is said, within few dayes after the Emperour MAXIMILIAN by the way of Perona, came into Italy with so flourishing an Army, that he would haue bin glad to haue met the French King: and the Duke of Bourbon in Lombardy not daring to keepe the field against him, shut vp himselfe in Milan: the Emperour finding no resistance, held on his way vntill hee came before the citie, and besieged it: which together with all the rest had been soone recovered, if he could haue staid some while in the country; but the treasure and reuenues of this great Capitaine, were not sufficient to maintaine the warres which he undertooke, and to pay the ordinarie troups which he should neede in the action; which was the occasion that he that he oftentimes lost great occasions. Besides this, LADISLAUS King of Hungary falling sicke and dying, there arose after his decease, such discord, that to establish peace in that kingdome, and for the defence thereof against Turke, the Emperour was sent for; for LEO was, sonne to the deceased King, was but a child of little more then thirteene yeares old: wherefore being constrained to leaue the wars of Milan, and to returne into Germany, the French King continued in possession of that Duchy for a time; as you shall heare.

The Emperour vpon so vrgent occasion being come into Germany, could hardlie keepe the peace in Hungary: the occasion whereof was, for that King LADISLAUS before his death nominated for tutors and gouernours for his son, in the kingdomes of Hungary, and Bohemia, the Emperour MAXIMILIAN, and his owne brother SIGISMUND, King of Poland: wherewith the Hungars were very much discontent, for they stood in feare that these two Princes would haue practised to haue had those kingdomes to themselves. But as the Emperours intent was but for the good of the countrie, so he took not so great care to haue the gouernment, as he did that those Kingdomes should be gouerned with equitie, and for the defence of sinngary against the Turke, which was put in effect so long as he liued: for he gaue the gouernment to certaine great personages of those Kingdomes: but not without great difficultie and trouble, which plainly appeared, by the calamities which ensued in those kingdomes after his decease.

A

A hundred yeeres were now past since the conclusion of the Councel of Constance, when JOHN HUSS foretold would come a fatal change in the Romane Hierarchie, which no fury nor fire should bee able to prevent. Wherefore this yeare 1517, MAXIMILIAN an Augustin Friar, began to impugn the Popes trade of Indulgences, the which were carried about in Germany to be sold for little money, (vnder the title of ALBERT Archbishop of Magdeburg) by TICELVS an impudent sycophant. LEO being moued with his wicked Sermons published certain propositions concerning Indulgences: against whom TICELVS did sett out his poyson, and burnt his propositions, which forced LEO to write more copiously for the defence of the truth; yet in the beginning he did not wholly reject Indulgences, but desired some reformation. The Elector FREDERICK Duke of Saxony having read LEO's writings and duly considered of his authorities, fauoured and supported his doctrine; neither could he be diuerted with any terror or threats, being straightly inioyned by MAXIMILIAN and CHARLES Emperours and by the Bishops of Rome nor to graunt LEO any place to teach in: yet he would not of himselfe iudge of his doctrine, but craued the opinions of many learned men. And among others calling ERASMVS of Rotterdam into him, he said that he had rather the earth should swallow him vp, then he would adhere to any false opinions, inreating him earnestly to deliuer his iudgement freely. To whom ERASMVS answered pleasantly, that LEO had committed two great finnes, he had been to buffe with the Monks bellies, and with the Popes Crowne, but he added seriously, that LEO had iustly taxed the errors, and that reformation in the Church was necessary, and that his doctrine was true, but he wist more mildnesse in his proceedings. After which there were many disputations touching diuers points of doctrine held by the Church of Rome, which LEO did impugn, whereof diuers haue written, and diuersly, to whom I will referre the impartial Reader.

At this time also it behoued the Emperour to take order for the going of his Nephew CHARLES King of Spain into his Country: by reason whereof, he was constrained to giue care to a new peace motioned by the French King, which was concluded; and it was also decreed that CHARLES King of Spain should take to wife the daughter of King LEO. This friendship and alliance being made (although the marriage took no effect) King CHARLES taking shipping sayled into Spain, where he arriued the nineteenth of September, in the yeere 1517. And so Peace being between the Emperour and the French King, and generally through all Christendome, he spent the rest of his time in ministering iustice, and reforming the lawes and customes of the Empire; and so liued in peace and good estate.

This yeere one thousand five hundred eightene, the Emperour called a great and his last assembly of the Princes of Augusta (where they treated of the Turkish warres; for Selim, having ruined the Sultans of Egypt) strooke a great terror into all the Princes of the Christian World) and desired to settle the succession of the Romane Empire vpon one of his Nephewes, which he wished might haue been FERRDINAND the yonger brother, thinking it better for the supporting of the honor of his house if two personages were great, then one alone: but being otherwise perswaded by some about him, and by the Cardinal of Spain, he commends his Nephew CHARLES to the Princes Electors, who could not be chosen King of the Romanes in his life time, for that he had not receiued the Imperial Crowne from the Pope. After this he was taken with a Dysenteria, which bereaued him of his life vpon the twelfth day of January, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand five hundred nineteene, being of the age of nine and fifty yeeres (as saith CVSPINIAN) and after others, threescore and three, and in the five and twentieth yeere of his reign.

Thus haue I briefly past ouer the great acts of this Emperour (for as I said in the beginning of his life) if I should at large haue described his prowels and excellency, I should haue been driuen to haue run a long race, and haue needed an excellent wit and much eloquence, whereof I know my selfe as naked and destitute, as this Prince was abundant in all vertue: for he was so bountifull, that if he had been Lord of all the rents and reuenues of the World, he would haue needed them, considering his gifts and expences, according to the greatnesse of his mind; and notwithstanding that what he had was great, yet was it euer too little in regard of his liberality. He was endued with such magnanimitie, that he neuer was seento be timorous what danger sooner he were in; and therewith was one of the most redoubted Princes in the World: he was very devout, and as he liued to he died, he was of a most singular wit, and sound iudgement, as well in Peace as in Warre: and notwithstanding that he was well able to counsell others, yet he neuer disdained to aske and take counsell of such as he thought loued him, and were able

The death of
the Emperour Maximilian.

The French
King in possession of the Duchy of Milan.

able to give him counsell. And as he loved learning, and learned men, so he gave great gifts and pensions to such as were well seen in the Liberal Sciences: and it grieved him much that he had not in his youth been instructed in good Letters, and in the pure elegant Latine tongue: for as he had a barbarous schoole-master, so was that which he learned of him; yet he afterwards, having many learned men in his Court, came to the knowledge of many things. He was naturally inclined to Poetrie, so as he compiled a notable peece of worke in his own vulgar tongue, of the many dangers wherein he had been, and another booke called the price of honour. Besides his excellent wit, he was of a wonderfull memorie: for whosoever had once conferred with him about any businesse, although in long time after he came not into his presence, yet as soon as he should see him he would know him.

He was so honest and bashfull as it was strange, for he never consented that any one should see him naked; neither did he at any time take the Vrinall to make water, in the presence of any Chamberlaine or Page, or any such like thing; neither would he permit that any should see his Vrine, except some few very excellent Physicians. He was of an excellent and strong complexion, and was feldome sick, and then but lightly, where to this was a great help; in that he was very temperate in his diet; yet he kept a very bountifull table, and did take his meate so neatly and comely as it was a pleasure to behold him. He could so well endure traualle, that heate, cold, hunger, thirst, or any other want or discommodity did little annoy him. He much exercised his person in bearing Armes, especially at Tilt and Tourney, besides the warres and battailes wherein he fought in person; and about all he was exceeding milde and courteous in his behaviour towards Princes, and towards all his seruants and familiars; and was so friendly to those which had to deale with him, that with his looks and countenance he wonne their hearts, which put them out of the feare and bashfulness wherein they were, by reason of his presence: for which excellencies and other which I leaue to write, he attained to be the most honoured Prince of his time, and was both obeyed and beloued through the whole Empire, and saw all his sonnes and Nephewes Lords of the greatest part of Christendome. After his death CHARLES the Fifth was chosen Emperor, whose great wars and acts require a more eloquent and exact writer.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES, THE FIFTH OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

()

The defense of
the Emperor
Charles the Fifth.

THE Author, writing the life of this famous Emperor, perfect over his memorable acts cursorily, both for that (as he saith) they were then fresh in memory, as also they were related at large by GUYCHARDINE, LOVIS, and other Writers. But, holding it an indignity don to so noble a Prince, to neglect him more in the writing of his life than other his Predecessors, or to fend the Reader to seek satisfaction from other Authors, I am bound somewhat to enlarge the History of his life.

The Emperor CHARLES was by his fathers side of the Imperiall House of Austria; and by his mother he descended from the ancient Kings of Spain, and his grandmother by his father, was of the house of France, in this manner: CHARLES the Fifth, King of France, surnamed the Wise, gave the Country of Burgundy to his younger brother PHILIP. From PHILIP, who had to wife the onely daughter of LEUVIS Earl of Flanders, descended JOHN, who was father to PHILIP which begat CHARLES the Hardy, Duke of Burgundy, whose warres with LEUVIS the Eleventh, King of France, are written by PHILIP de Comines, Lord of Argençon. This CHARLES, being slain at the battell of Marston, left his onely daughter the Lady MARY, heir to his whole estate: this MARY was married to MAXIMILIAN the Emperour, father to PHILIP; which PHILIP took to wife the Lady IOAN, the daughter of the Kings of Castile and Aragon, and by her he had the Emperor CHARLES the Fifth. And forasmuch as FERDINAND, King of Castile had neuer a son, hee adopted his son-in-law PHILIP for his sonne; who, after the decease of his father-in-law FERDINAND, became King of Spain: and by these meanes the house of Austria obtained the dominions of Burgundy, Flanders, and Spain. As for his mother, her grandfather FERDINAND, King of Spain, had to wife the Lady ISABELL, the onely daughter of JOHN the Second, King of Castile; and after the conquest of Naples, he gat by her JOHN, ISABELL, IOAN, MARY and CATHERINE; but JOHN and ISABELL dying without issue, the succession of the Kingdome, by the lawes of Spain, came to IOAN, as to the eldest of them; but Austria, by the diuision of the inheritance, came to FERDINAND brother to CHARLES the Fifth; which FERDINAND was afterwards Emperor also; and father to the Emperor MAXIMILIAN the Second.

CHARLES was born in Ghent, a City of Flanders, vpon Saint MATTHIAS day, being the foure and twentieth of February, in the year 1500: which day was noted to be euer very fortunate vnto him; considering that vpon that day many accidents hapned to him in sundry parts of the world, and he obtained vpon that day honourable victories; as by his actions, written by GUYCHARDINE and LOVIS, plainly appeareth. Being come to yeers of discretion, although but a youth (for, his father, dying, left him but sixteen yeers old) he was sent to Mechlin, a citie in Brabant, to school, his Masters name was ADRIAN of Florence; then whom, none in all that prouince was more famous, for many qualities, as the issue of his life made manifest; for he became a Cardinall, and afterwards being made Pope, after the death of LEO the tenth, was called ADRIAN the Sixt. But in his exercise of armes he was instructed by CHARLES de Cheures, a valiant man at arms in that Age. It seemeth that hee profited little in learning, yet hee attained to the Spanish, Dutch, and French tongues, the Latin tongue he vnderstood somewhat grossly. Three bookes onely hee looked to reade, which hee caused to be translated into his owne vulgar tongue; of which, one was the Institution of a ciuill life, which was the Courtier of the Earle BALTASAR de Castillione; the other was of matters of state, which was the Prince, with the discourse of MACHIAVEL; the third was the Order of Knighthood, which was the historie of POLIUIVS. But he most delighted in armes, which besides religion, are the foundation of kingdomes; and hee more esteemed the warres then any man in the world. Hee was skilfull in the managing of Artillery, and very expert in the marshalling of an armie, and lodged the fame very skilfully, and knew all the means and deuices how to batter and assault a City: so as all his attempts, or the greatest part which he undertook, might well haue good success. The constitution of his body was neither fat nor grosse, but of a gallant proportion and strongly sinued. His hands were great and strong, fit to wield weapons and to manage Armes. His legs were straight and of a due proportion, which chiefly appeared when he was on horseback: for, he rode with such majesty when he was armed, and managed his horse so gallantly, that it seemed no gallanter Knight could be found, or more fit to bear Armes than himself. Hee was of a fair complexion, with cleer azured eies, which (although he were angry) were not terrible, but accompanied with a graue bashfulness and manly modesty. Hee was somewhat hook-nosed, after the manner of the ancient Kings of Persia, which was a signe of the greatnes of his minde. He had a long chin, and a yellow beard: his hair was yellow of the color of gold, after the vfe of the ancient Emperors of Rome. It was thought by those which were wise, that neuer was man of better constitution, better aduised, or of siper judgement than he: for, with a certain motion which accompanied his speeches, he made men to wonder at his proceedings. He was very curious in discourse, but double; so as his speeches might haue diuerse constructions: and so hee euer saued himself by the interpretation, fitting it to his purpose; allarging; that his meaning was to be vnderstood in this and in this manner. He was neuer throughly angry; but telling the truth, and grounding his speeches vpon reason, he satisfied the hearers. He was neuer over-hasty in his answers: for, he first consulted, and then concluded; but the conclusion must depend of him onely. He made great account of those which might either pleasure

The birth of the Emperor
Charles.

sure, or annoy him; but made no shew thereof in outward apparance, to the end to maintaine his reputation in greatnes. He was neither bloody nor vindicative vpon his enemies, but reformed them without ruine.

He seldom punished his seruants and officers, but vpheld them in their defects. And although that by his enemies he was noted of cruelty, in the matters of Rome, and in the death of the children of France, yet was he milde and pitifull, and they of malice slander him wrongfully. As for his friends which were made great by him, he constantly maintained them, and would not endure to heare them ill spoken of; giuing more credit to his owne iudgement then to other mens reports; reputing them to speake of enuy or malice. He was an earnest defender of his Ambassadors, notwithstanding that they did ought that were not tolerable; for he loued to haue good intelligence, and knew all that passed in all parts of the World. He vied to discourse of his affaires the space of foure or fise houres together, and wrote downe the reasons pro & contra, the better to consider thereof; and his arguments were so well compounded, and all of one poize, that who so vnderstood the beginning of the matter, might presently comprehend the end thereof.

He knew the naturall inclination of those Princes with whom he had to deale, and spent much money to haue full notice of them; by reason whereof, he negociated with them, with liuely reasons and sound arguments, and not with generalities; and had his busines in all parts in readines, attending opportunity & fit occasion to put them in execution: Hence it grew, that in regard of his affaires, he was mortified in all his pleasures: concerning the lawes, he was iust, and made profession to maintain and hold his word, and to preferre his honour before all things in the World; wherefore who soeuer desired to get his fauour, was to vse the meanes of honour, and of modesty, with shew of Religion: whereto he was so much addicted, as he communicated foure times in the yeere. He was very patient in hearing causes, and gaue audience aswell to the meane as the great, with much attention: and notwithstanding that he was slow to resolve of his owne affaires, aswell as of other mens; yet he concluded very prudently. But he that will blame him may say, that he was remisse and irresolute; and he that will commend him may affirm, that he was well aduised and politicke.

Touching his liberality, he was held rather niggardly and sparing, then bountifull; especially towards his seruants, whom he entertained with hope many yeers; but when he did reward, if enough were enough, he gaue enough; for he had great meanes to giue, of the three orders of Knight-hood which are in Spain, besides Bishopricks, Abbeyes, Titles, Offices, and other reuenues: neuerthelesse, it seemed that in giuing he much more fauoured the Flemings then the Spaniards or Italians. He was bountifull to such Capitaines as serued him in the wars, and to such as he loued; but it came but slowly. He made shew to loue peace, and not to desire wars, but when he was prouoked. Briefly, he gaue example for all to follow, and abstained from all such vices as might staine his Conscience, or good name. He effected great matters by negotiation, wherein he was more then in Armes; notwithstanding that in Armes he was inuincible and peerlesse.

He rose late in the morning, and after he was ready (clad in no better then in silke, or cloath, close made, more like a priuate Gentleman then a great Lord, but yet very neatly) he heard a priuate Masse for the soule of the Emperesse; and then gaue audience and dispatched much business; then going out of his chamber, he heard another Masse openly in a Chappell, which being ended, he went to dinner: Whereupon they vsed this prouerb in his Court, From Masse to Messe.

He was a great feeder, and did eate such things as did breede grosse and viscous humors, wherof proceeded the Gowte, and the Pitsick; which infirmities in his later daies greatly tormented him, especially the Gowte; which was of so maligne a condition, that it sent the vapour thereof from the stomack into the head, which put him often in danger of his life, which he assured himself could not be long: but yet when he was wel, he made small reckoning of Physicians, as though he should neuer be sick againe. He did eate little at night, thinking to make amends for disordering himselfe at noone. After dinner he gaue audience, and sometime retiring himselfe into some secret place, he passed the time in drawing the plot of some fortresse, or other edifice; but most commonly he vsed to iest with a Polonian dwarfie which he had, or with one Adrian a groome of his chamber; and often with the Baron of Montaleon Steward of his house, in whose company he took great delight, for his ready and quick wit. He sometimes rode on hunting, not with about eight or ten horse at the most, and returned often times times with a brace of Stagges, or wilde Boares. And sometimes he vsed to shoote at Pigeons, at Choughs, and such like birds; and in all these his sports he spent not an hundred crownes in the yeere; so much did he apply himselfe to matters of importance. He vied the like sparing in cladding his court, in his table, in the furniture of his house, and such other ornaments; insomuch that if in trussing himselfe a poynt brake, he would tie it together, and keepe it, not to lose so much time as till another were fetcht. His sparing was such, that there was no man that spent tenne crownes by the yeere, but spent more then he; but for other expences, passing through other mens hands, he did as other Princes doe, which referre the same to other mens trust; yet he vied all possible diligence to vnderstand euery particular, and would know how his money was issued; even to a crowne; so carefull was he for what was his. The vertues and faire conditions of this Prince, together with his power, excelling all the Princes of his time, moued the Electors in Germany to create him Emperor.

But before we come to relate what his actions were after he came to the Empire, it shall not be impertinent to make a breefe repetition of the most memorable accidents which happened in his kingdomes of Spain. Ferdinand King of Arragon dying, left Queene Ioane his onely daughter to succeed him in all his Realmes and estates: Charles Archduke of Austria and Earle of Flanders her eldest son was to inherit all those great estates after her; by reason of whose absence and the Queenes disability (being possessed with a melancholy humor) Ferdinand thinking that Prince Charles would not come in person to gouerne the Realmes of Spain, was desirous to appoint Ferdinand his Nephew, brother to Prince Charles (whom he loued dearly, hauing bene bred vp with him) to gouerne those Realmes, for his daughter Queene Ioane; but he was diuerted by the wise aduice of some of his Councell, shewing the inconueniences that might ensue: wherupon he nominated Cardinal Francis Ximenes of Cisneros for gouernour, vntill the coming of Prince Charles, giuing great testimonies of his fidelity and loyalty: who tooke vpon him the government of Castile, with the consent of all the Councell, and Nobility; only the ministers of the Infant Don Ferdinand, sought to haue him intrude himselfe into the government of affaires.

The first care of Cardinal Ximenes was to make an accord with Doctor Abrian of Florence who had ben Schoole-Maister to Prince Charles, hauing bin sent Ambassadour from him to King Ferdinand, touching some negotiation; but with secret authority, that the King dying he should take vpon him the government of Castile; but the Cardinal and he made an accord that vntill they had other newes from Prince Charles, they should ioynly signe all dispatches.

The Cardinal with the Councell remaining at Madrid, there grew some tumult in Andalusia, the head wherof was Don Pedro Giron eldest son to the Earle of Pregna, who entered the Duke of Medina Sidonia's country with forces, pretending a title to the whole Duchie: which tumult the Cardinal sought to suppress, proclaiming them troublers of the publike peace and guilty of high Treason, wherewith Don Pedro Giron retired for a time; But soone after he returned to his first frenzy, being countenanced and supported by Don Fernand of Velasco, Constable of Castile, by the Duke of Benmant, the Duke of Albuquerque, by the Earle of Nadina Celi, the Bishop of Segunuen, with diuerse others, who hating the Cardinal entered into a faction: But by the wise aduice of the Duke of Infantazgo (whom they sought to haue drawne vnto them) and by the constant resolution of the Cardinal these practices died; and they returned vnto their first obedience, the greatest of them seeking to insinuate themselves into the Cardinals fauour.

This wise Cardinall knowing that he might be crost in the government of affaires, by the Nobility which did both hate and enuy him, he sought to procure from King Charles Letters patents for the confirmation of his authority, and that he might haue free liberty in matters of state to doe what he should thinke profitable for the safety of the kingdomes; requiring the like authority ouer iustice and the treasure; but before the dispatch of these Letters patents, he put one thing in execution which bred some alteration in the State.

The Cardinal after the death of King Ferdinand ordained for the defence of the Realme, aswell against forraigne invaders, as home-bred rebels, Legions and bands of soldiers taken out of the citizens and Burgesses of the good townes of Spain, men of good fame, hauing both house and family. Some seditious men and desirous of innovation were much scandalized at this edict; and many townes began to oppose themselves against the execution thereof, but especially

The death of Ferdinand King of Arragon.

Accord for the government of Castile.

A tumult in Andalusia.

Cardinal Ximenes institutes legions and soldiers.

Sedition at Valladolid against the Cardinal.

specially at Valladolid, where they took Armes against Cardinal XIMENES as against an enemy, offering violence to his officers who were sent to make the inrolments, wherein they were animated by the Admirall of Castile who had some hereditary rights in the government of the towne, and the Bishop of Astorgia who had been Schoole-Master to the infant, DON FERDINAND. These alterations did much trouble the Cardinal; yet would he not proceed rigorously against them untill that he had received approbation from King CHARLES, the which was sent him the yeere following: so as at the coming of these Letters into Spain, the inhabitants of all the murinous townes, submitted themselves and gave over their factions.

A tumult at Malaga.

In the yeere 1517 there grew a mutiny in Malaga against the officers of the Admiralty, the rowthemen being desirous to free themselves from that iurisdiction, pretending that it did but hinder the course of iustice, and give way to ill liuers, to avoid deserved punishment. This multitude of Malaga having no patience to attend an answer from King CHARLES of Austria, did tumultuously chase away the iudges, and defaced all the marks of the Admiralty in their towne and iurisdiction. The Admirall of Castile complained to the Cardinal and Councell, who sought by admonitions and threats to suppress the fury of this people: but they persisted still in Armes and planted the Artillery vpon their walles. But the Cardinal seeing no milde courtes could prevaile, sent 6000 of his legionary foot and 400 horse against them, vnder the command of DON ANTONIO de la Cuena, vpon whose approach the Malagins fainted, and sued for mercy: whereof the Cardinal being aduertised, he commanded him to proceede with mildnes and clemency, preserving the Kings honour and dignity; So as there were five of the chiefe authours of this sedition hanged and the rest pardoned.

The State of Queene Iouane of Castile mother to King Charles.

Cardinall XIMENES was much troubled with the pitifull estate of IOANE Queene of Castile; for this Princeesse being posselt with a sharpe melancholy humored a most lamentable life in the Castle of tordeyllas whereas King FERDINAND her father had lodged her, being a very pleasant place: yet LEVVS FARRIER of Valencia who had the charge of her could neuer get her to lodge in any wel-aiired chamber, but she would still lurk in some dark place neere the ground, fit to entertaine her melancholy. She did abhorre soft beds, and would ly vpon the ground, or vpon a boord couered with a carpet by importunity. They could not get her to weare a furred gowne in winter, nor any thing that was rich: She was many times three daies together without eating, complaining often, that she was kept like a prisoner, and that they withheld her from the government of affaires like a priuate person. The Cardinal was much grieved hereat: and somewhat to redresse it, holding that the negligence of LEVVS FARRIER did feed the malice of her infirmity, he removed him, putting in his place FERDINAND DYCA of Talavera, a man nobly borne and wise, who by his discretion in a short time did moderate this violent humor in the Queene, getting her to be content to haue her chamber made cleane, which grew vsuall by reason of the meate which she would not suffer them to carry away, and by little and little he perswaded her to ly in a bed and to goe abroad to Church, and he made her to haue some feeling and apprehension that she was a Queene, and so acknowledged. And in time he made her familiar and brought her to a more mild and humane kind of life: The which did much please K. CHARLES her son, who thanked Cardinall XIMENES by his Letters.

Cardinall Ximenes impatient of injuries.

Cardinall XIMENES found many crosses and oppositions in his government: yet he was so impatient of any injury, as whatsoever King CHARLES ordeined touching the affaires of Spain, if it proceeded not from him and his counsell, he held it done in contempt of him, and condemned it as a subiect of sedition; accusing the Noblemen & Councell of Flanders of rashnes, who being ignorant of the manners of the Spaniards meddled with the government, the which did wholly depend of the Viceroyes authority & of the kings Councell which was in the country: he did much honour ADRIAN FLORENT who was ioyned with him in the government: for that he yielded vnto him.

A third generation sent into Spain.

The Spaniards who are by nature haughty and proud, could not long indure the integrity of Cardinall XIMENES, neither were they well pleased with the Flemmings, who entertaining the King in Flanders were too busie with the affaires of Spain, so as all things tended there to a combustion. But to prevent all disorders which were feared by reason of the Kings absence, it was resolved to send the Lord of Chaux thither to haue the third place in the government with Cardinall XIMENES, and Doctor ADRIAN, who had formerly beene the principall cause of his sending; for that (as he said) he was not sufficient to resist Cardinall XIMENES a haughty man, who did manage all things at his pleasure, and could in no sort indure any companion; His coming was very pleasing to the the Noble-men and people of Spain, who were much discontented with the Cardinal; and they all went forth to receiue him with great honour, being the first that euer had been sent into Spain with authority, since CHARLES of Austria took vpon him the title of King. But the Cardinal maintained his authority resolutely, and held still the first place in all dispatches; as may well appear by that which follows: for the other two hauing on a time signed certain Letters, leauing a space for the Cardinal to signe vnder them; he tore them in pieces, causing others to be made to the same effect, which he signed aboue: and thus he continued untill the Kings coming. It was often resolved in Flanders to haue sent some great man into Spain to manage the government, and to check the fowre and haughty disposition of the Cardinal. LEVVS Count Palatine was propounded both to take charge of the State, and of the Infant D. FERDINAND: but the Cardinal could indure no corinall, beseeching the King by his Letter; not to send any one into Spain with whom he must bee in continual quarell; but rather to giue him leaue to retire himself to his Diocesse, where he would liue religiously in peace, foreseeing that many would seek maliciously to crosse his good designs to see the Common-weal; they hauing no other end but to breed some great tumults in Spain, he desired not to bee engaged therein, but rather to be a spectator; aduertising the King, that the onely means to prevent all dangers, was, To commit the whole affairs of the estates government to his tried faith, and to rely wholly vpon him, seeking to diuide the royall Souerainety betwixt the King and himself: for, he said the Flemmings vnderstood nothing in the affairs of Spain, and the King for his tender age could not vndergo so many cares: but the Cardinals proud courtesies hurt him much hatred.

The King much distressed in Spain.

The King was greatly desired in Spain by the Nobility, who thought thereby to supplant the Cardinal in his government: and this voyage was much pressed by the Emperor MAXIMILIAN, who held it very necessary; and to that end came to see the King at Bruxelles, and to conferre with him, fearing that his long stay in the Low Countries would breed some alteration in the state of Spain, where he was much desired. This conference bred some jealousy in the Cardinal; who wrote, that the enteriue of great men did neuer bring profit to themselves, nor to their affairs. The Spaniards, seeing the time spent in vain hopes of their Kings coming, began to grow into mutinies, making great complaints of the greedinesse of the Flemmings, who disposed of the affairs, and wasted the Kings treasure, transporting it out of the Realm. Many of the best Towns of Spain, being incensed with these complaints, sought how to prevent the disorders, and to curb the greedinesse of the Flemmish Courtiers. The Cardinal and Councell, knowing well, that what the Towns had desired was just, yet fearing some popular tumults, they perswaded them to forbear all Assemblies till there were certain newes of the Kings coming, who they vnderstood made preparation to imbarke speedily: and in the mean time they aduertised the King of what had past. But the Cardinal and Councell were again importuned for an assembly of the States, promising onely to sollicite the King to come into Spain, to maintain the lawes and customes of the Country, and to reforme such disorders as were crept in; or else the people did protest to send Ambassadors to the King, and to provide that the Common-weal should take no prejudice. The Cardinal could not refuse their just demand, appointing the Assembly in September 1517, hoping by that time the King would be arrived in Spain; hauing to that end sent him a fleet of ships, and sending Post daily to aduance his coming, the onely means to maintain peace: for, the Cardinal held it a dangerous thing when as people (hauing cause of grievance) presume to complain publicly: for hauing once lost the respect due to the magistrate, there is no more any restraint; and popular complaints are easily beliewed by such as haue a desire to trouble the State.

Pope LEO about this time, by vertue of a decree made in the Councell of Lateran, demanded the tenth of all the reuenues of the Clergy, vpon colour to defend the Christian religion against Infidels; for that SELIM, Emperor of the Turks, threatened Christendome, and especially Italy: whereupon the Pope sent out his Bulstoe exact this money for three yeeres, with many indulgences to such as should contribute willingly. The Clergy complained hereof to Cardinall XIMENES, being at Toledo; who vndertook their protection, and by his authority (which was great with the Pope) freed them from that exaction.

Exactions of Pope Leo increased by Cardinall Ximenes.

At one Instant there were three of the greatest Noble-men of Spain conspired together against the Cardinal vpon sundry discontents; which were, the Duke of Infantazgo, the Duke of Alua, and the Earl of Vegras: The Duke of Infantazgo had offered violence to a Promoter sent by the Cardinal touching some proceeding at Guadalajara, threatening to hang him: The Cardinal gaue it out; that he would call the Duke in question, for that he had violated religion, and broken the publike peace : and the Duke, desirous to braue the Cardinall, sent a Chaplain of his vnto him, with a message full of disgracefull reproaches and vain threats. To whom the Cardinall (hearing him quietly without any alteration) answered, Go back to thy master, whom thou shalt finde repenting the foolish words which thou hast deliuered : and in truth before his return, the Dukes choler was past, and he very sorry for his rashnes ; but he was afterwards reconciled to the Cardinall by the Constable of Velsco.

Violence committed by the Duke of Infantazgo.

The Earl of Preguas excelsse was of a higher strain : for Don GVTIERRE of Quixada having a sute against him for the restitution of Villafraite, a Town neer to Vailedolt, and certain officers of justice coming thither by order of the Court to put him in possession, they were outraged & beaten by RODRIGO GIRON the Earls sonne, BERNARDIN of Velsco the Constables sonne, BERTRAVD de la Cuena sonne to the Duke of Albuquerque, FERDINAND HENRIQUES son to the Admirall, with other ill aduised yong Noble-men then present. The Court being much incensed heerat (the Bishop of Malaga being President) commanded certain legionary souldiers to arm to assist justice, and to punish those rebels, getting himself in person towards the place. The Constable, foreseeing the danger, posted thither before, and caused them to giue way to the Sentence of the Court : for which good office, the Bishop of Malaga gaue thanks to the Constable, and dismisst his souldiers. But the Cardinall was not so tractable, but sent out his warrant to apprehend these yong Noble-men ; who, seeing him proceed criminally against them, returned to their old frenzy, putting themselves again into Villafraite, meaning to keep it. This businesse tended to sedition, many blaming the Cardinals severity, whereby the whole Realm might be drawn into combustion : but the Cardinall held it a glory to oppose himself against great men, seeking such occasions ambitiously to shew his magnanimity & courage. Finally, they proceeded against these yong Noble-men by course of justice, and their names were proclaimed, and they cited to appear and to giue an account of the action.

The Fathers of these yong men were much troubled : who knowing the Cardinals power and sower disposition, resolved to pacify him by all faire meanes, sending to intreat him to have regard vnto the youth of their children, complaining notwithstanding by their letters vnto the King of the Cardinals harsh disposition, whereby Spain was filled with combustions ; The Cardinall in like manner did aggravate this action vnto the King, complaining of the disobedience and contempt of these Noblemen, who made many assemblies tending to some great tumult : But in the meane time, they proceeded against them, that were within Villafraite, who, fearing the Viceroyes power, left the place and dislodged by night. The towne was by sentence condemned to be burned, and the ground to bee sowed with salt : And the Earle of Preguas with his sonne and their other confederats were convicted of high treason, which sentence was presently put in execution : The towne was burnt to Ashes and seauen of the inhabitants publickly whipt. This severity bred great hatred against the Cardinall. But the Admirall HENRIQUES coming to MADRID, told him with great mildnes, that hee did himselfe wrong, and the whole Realme (being Archbishop of Toledo and Primate so to blemish the honour of the greatest houses of Spain, so well deserving, both in these publike executions and in many bad offices which he had done them with the King ; perswading him for the good of the Realme, and the kings service, to temper his austere behaviour, and to intreat men with more equity, and lesse choler. The Cardinall (with a settled countenance) answered, that hee had neuer sought to winne fauour of Kings or to maintayne his reputation in the world by doing wrong to any, but had euer endeavored to acquit himselfe duly, of the gouernment which had been committed vnto him : neither had hee done any bad offices to the king, as many did maliciously publish.

The Duke of Alua's discontent grewe vpon a sute depending betwixt Don DIEGO of Toledo his sonne, and D. ANTHONY of Elmizga, brother to the Duke of Bejar, for the Priory of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem. D. ANTHONY, who had it at the first by resignation from his Vncle the which Pope LEO confirmed with consent of King PHILIP, and now againe having siewed at Rome, he had wonne his cause, and gotten letters of execution from the Pope, who recommended him with other fauorable letters to King CHARLES, who sent him into Spain to Cardinall XIMENES, giuing him charge to sequestrate all the places of the Priory into his hands, commanding the Duke of Alua and his son to retire their men, and to refer the cause to his compromise, and if they should refuse then to execute the Kings letters, and the sentence. The Duke of Alua was loath to dispossesse himselfe, conceiuing that the Cardinall did not affect his cause ; And therefore hee reiected such reasonable conditions as hee offered vnto him

The court of Parliament was lased.

The causes of the Duke of Aluas discon-tents.

him ; and falling into choler and rage, he mustred vp his friends and forces, thinking to maintain that by Arms which was not justifiable by law or reason : wherefore the Cardinall, seeing his furious proceeding, was forced to come to the last remedy, calling together his legionary bands, as well to guard and fortifie the counsell and iustice, as to suppress and disperse the mutinies ; of whom they encountered about a thousand foot and some horse, drawne together by the Duke of Alua, and put them to rout. The Duke presently saw his owne error, employing the fauour of his best friends for his reconciliation ; submitting himself vnto the Cardinall, into whose hands he yielded vp the Priory : which controuersie was after ended in friendly manner.

This yeer the Inhabitants of Algier (a Town in Affrick) being much afflicted by the dissension of two brethren Moors, who contended for the Signory, they had called vnto them FERISCO BARBAROVSS, a famous Pirat, to defend their liberties ; who hauing seized vpon that City, fit for theft and Piracies, he made himselfe king of Algiers, hauing slaine CELIM the lawfull Prince, and then he began to spoile the coasts of Spain, and to tyrannize ouer the petty Kings of Affrick, of his owne sect, seeking to dispossesse ALVZEVAN, King of Tuniz, whom hauing slaine, he forced IAHIA his sonne to flee into Spain, who imparting his miseries to Cardinall XIMENES, intreated him to assist him in the recovery of his Kingdome. The Cardinall caused men to be leuied to send against this Pirat BARBAROVSS, giuing the charge of the Army to DIEGO VERRA, a rali and indiscreet man. This Army, beeing about eight thousand strong, came neer vnto Algier in October, the Moores beeing aduertised, and prepared to hinder his landing. The Town was manned with very good souldiers Turks, which HORVSCO had brought with him out of Asia. DIEGO VERRA, coming neer the Town, diuided his Army into foure parts, contrary to aduice : for, the Barbarians were in all places stronger than the Spaniards ; so as the whole Christian Army was chased and dispersed with great slaughter. DIEGO VERRA abandoned all, and hid himself with his sonne among the rocks till the euenng ; when as he found a vessell lying at anchor, with which hee returned into Spain, with much disgrace and dishonour, the children singing, that DIEGO was too weak to wraastle with HORVSCO, who had but one arme. Cardinall XIMENES made small account of this losse, saying, that by this means Spain should bee purged of a great many of lewd insolent companions.

The Cardinall was much importuned to send a fleet into Flanders to transport K. CHARLES into Spain : whereupon he prepared a good number of ships, appointing GOMES of Buiteron for Admirall. He caused the Ports of Biscae, Affrica and Galicia to be visited for fear of infection, and victuals with other refreshings to bee sent vnto all places where the fleet should arrive : he himselfe went vnto Aranda de Duero, there to attend the Kings coming, hauing in his company the Infant Don FERDINAND, Doctor ADRIAN now made Cardinall, and ARMASTOS. Dining at Boleguillas, a Borough in the mountaines, it was thought that hee was poisoned, so as hee fell into a lingering consumption. Hauing dined, hee found himselfe very ill, the blood coming out at his eares and nailes : this suspicion was augmented by an unknowne horseman, who that morning hauing neer vnto the village mette with the Prouinciall MARQUIN and other Monks which went vnto the Cardinall, he willed them to make haste and to aduise him not to eat of a great Trout which would be set before him : for, without doubt it was poisoned. If you arrive, said he, too late, then care for the health of his soule, for his body will be past recovery. This message was deliuered late to the Cardinall, who answered, that if his infirmity came of poison, he thought it proceeded from Flanders, and that hee had been infected by the eyes in reading of a Letter which came from that Countrey ; since which time he had not been well.

Being in this estate, he caused himselfe to be carried to Aranda, and in the meane time, the town of Vailedolt fell into a new tumult, the people hauing a conceit, that the report of the kings coming was but counterfeite, and that this great preparation, was to send the Infant Don FERDINAND into Flanders, so as Spain remayning destitute of her Princes, being in the hands of an old Monke, halfe rotten and neere his end, must of necessity be ruined by home-bred seditions, or become a prey to forraigne Nations : But to pacifie this muriny, and to assure them of the kings coming, the Cardinall sent vnto them, and satisfied them : The Cardinall had resolved to doe one act more which hee held necessary, but was full of enuy, and that was to reforme the Infant Don FERDINAND'S house, and to take from him those which had bred him vp and serued him, either for some priuate dislikes, or for some other considerations which he

Algier assumpted by the Spaynards.

A fleet sent into Flanders for King Charles.

Cardinall Ximenes poisoned

A tumult at Vailedolt.

Reformation of Don Ferdinands house by the cardinall.

pretended, wherewith he acquainted the King, who a little before his coming, sent his Letters of command to the Cardinal, to discharge D. PEDRO NVANES of Guzman, the Infants Gouverneur, D. ALVARO ORORIO bishop of Algora his Schoole-master, Don GONZALO of Guzman his chamberlain, and SANCHE de Enredas his steward, and to send them home to their houses, letting them know that the King was well satisfied with their good seruices; but their ages required rest, referring the rest of the Infants house to the Cardinals disposition.

The secret of this packet was divulged before it came to the Cardinals hands, which bred a great alteration in the Infants house, they giuing the Infant to vnderstand that this was a practice of the Cardinals, to debase him and keepe him vnder; whereupon he came in choler the next day to the couent of Agullera, where the Cardinal lay sick of his infirmity, to whom he complained euen with teares, of the wrong he did him; seeking without any iust cause to depriue him of such faithfull seruants, and therewithall he intreated him and conured him, by the memory of Queen ISABELLE, not to suffer such an indignity to be done him, as to take from him such worthy personages which had attended him so faithfully, and now to see them so ignominiously disgraced.

The Cardinal sought by milde words, to pacifie the incensed courage of this Prince, laying before him the King his brothers pleasure, which tended to his aduancement, if he would shew himself obedient and tractable; he told him that he loued him dearly, and that he had no will to wrong him: he confessed that he care for the good of his seruants was honorable, but he must withall know, that the king his brother was dearer vnto him: and therefore he exhorted him, that laying aside those passions which his seruants had bred in him, he should wholly rely vpon him who was the greatest king in Christendome, against whose will it was neither safe, nor fit for him to oppose himselfe, vnto many other reasons to the like effect; But the young Prince was not so satisfied, but answered the Cardinal with these words: Seeing you are resolved to ruine me and mine, I must of necessity finde means to preferre our selues. The Cardinal being toucht at these words; Doe (said he) what you please, but I sweare by the life of king CHARLES your brother, that to morrow shall not passe, before his commandments be executed, the which it behooues you to obey before all other; yea, though all Spain had conspired to hinder it. Hereupon the Infant went from the Cardinal without any shew of perturbation, and so returned to Aranda, where he found himself with the Towne and all the approaches, guarded by two Captaines of the Guard, and their troupes, which bred great discontent in the Infant, but he could not helpe it, nor auoid the remouing of his seruants, as you may reade at large in the History of Spain.

King CHARLES hauing taken shipping in Flanders in the beginning of September, arrived about the end of that moneth, vpon an vnease coast of the Asturies, a Rockie place and not frequented; The mountain-people hauing retired their wiues and children into the Rocks, be- took them to their Armes, and came downe in troupes to take the Sea-shore, thinking there had been some enemies; which the king perceiuing, he caused his royall Standard to be aduanced, that he might be knowne, and the Asturians discouering the armes, knew it was their king; so as laying downe their weapons, they came to salute him vpon their knees, accompanying him to Villa Viciosa, where he rested himself after his trauel by Sea, being accompanied by his sister D. Lubnara then Queen of Portugall.

The Cardinal, who lay in his couent very sick, was so much joyed, at the newes of the kings coming, as he left his bed and lang Maffie; and the Flemings, on the other side, were as much discontented, wishing him dead before the king should conferre with him, for they knew well that he sought to chace them from the Councell, and from the managing of all affaires: wherefore they were very inquisiue of his life, and practised delais to stay the King vpon the way, wishing he were dead before the King should see him: There were diuers deuises to haue drawne the king first into Aravagon, which the Cardinal hindred, humbly beseeching him not to determine any thing touching his publike or private affaires, before he had giuen him a full information of the estate of his Kingdome: and he also counseled him to send Don FERDINAND his brother as soon as might be into Germany to the Emperor his grandfather, holding it the best course both for his owne affairs & the good of the Infant, and to be a means that all or the greatest part of MAXIMILIANS estates might be conferred vpon him, seeing that he was King and Lord of so many Realms and rich estates. This aduise was followed after the Cardinals death: but it seems the Flemings had other designs; for, the Lord of Cherbourg sought

Intreaty of the Infant D. Ferdinand to the Cardinall.

Speech of Cardinall Ximenes to the Infant
D. Ferdinand

Arrivall of K.
Charles at the Asturies.

Practises of the Flemings countiers to keep the king from seeing of the Cardinall.

sought to keep him vnder, and would haue had him giue water to the King his brother, who (being discontented to see his brother so debase himselfe) said; that XIMENES counsell was better: whereupon he ordained, that the Infant should be conducted into Germany.

The King, vpon his way towards Vailedolia, had a desire to go and visit his mother Queen IOHAN at Tordeillas, writing the causes which moued him thereto to the Cardinall and to his brother D. FERDINAND: his resolution seemed full of piety; but considering the indisposi- tion of this Prince, it was not needfull to conferre so long with her of affaires and matters as he did.

The Court coming to Vailedolia, the Cardinal found that his credit began to decay, and that he was not so respected in the making of his lodging as he ought to haue been, whereto he thought himself to haue been disgraced; saying, that it was a poore recompence after so much toyle and sweat to receiue a wrong, in the place of a reward, blaming the Kings officers, who were ignorant of the customes of Spain: But the receipt of the kings Letters touched him neerer, by which he was commanded to attend him at Meinade, vpon the way to Tordeillas, where he desired to haue his aduice touching the affaires of his Realme and house, to the end he might discharge him of so great a burthen, and suffer him to retire to his owne house to lue in rest, where God would reward him for the many good offices he had done to the Realme, which he thought was not in the power of man to doe, and that for his part, he would euer remember it, and honour him as his Father: He conceiued so great a griefe vpon the receipt of these Letters, to see himself kept back, and; in a manner, disgraced, as within few houres after he died.

The King hauing called the estates of Castile to Vailedolia, he was there proclaimed king of Castile, Toledo, Granado, and other Prouinces depending in Spain, where he receiued and tooke the oath after the accustomed manner: at which there was some question made by some of the Granadoes, for that Queene IOHAN his mother was yet liuing, but notwithstanding they proceeded. Hauing there ordained some things touching the Government of Castile, he went into Aravagon to haue the like assembly called and solemnly performed in regard of those countries and prouinces: during his abode there, he had newes of the death of the Emperor MAXIMILI- AN: for which great dignity, there were two great Princes in competition; FRANCIS the First, King of France, and CHARLES King of Spain: In the beginning they proceeded with great modesty, each of them labouring by his Authority and means to draw the Electors vnto his side.

The King of Spain thought the Empire did belong vnto him by right, as hauing continued by a long succession in the house of Austria, and that it had not been the custome to deiprue the descendants of the dead, without apparent cause of disability; hauing diuers other reasons to feed his hopes to attaine vnto the Empire.

The French King on the other side had no lesse hopes, grounded vpon an opinion he had to purchase the Electors voices by money, whereof some were his antient friends and pensioners, to which enterprise they encouraged him, as a matter easie to effect: Hee also knew well that it was very grieuous to many great houses in Germany, who held themselves capable of so great a dignity, to see the Empire continue so long in one house, and become as it were hereditary; and that they might call that Election a succession, which durst not leaue the next descen- dents of the deceased Emperour. These humours of the Germane Princes made him hope; that the iealousies among them might helpe his cause.

The Electors were assembled at Frankford to agree vpon their election: The French King was still abused by the promises of the Marquess of Brandenburgh, who was drawne thereto by offers of great summes of money, for the which he did not onely binde himselfe to giue his voice: but he also promised that his brother, the Archbishop of Mentz should doe the like; and the French King was in hope that some other of the Electors were well affected to his party. But the Germane people had no wil to see the Imperiall dignity transferred to a stranger, intrea- ting the Pope that he would not fauour any one in that election, that were not of the Germane Nation; yet in shew he seemed to fauour the French King, but in his heart hee desired not to haue either of them chosen Emperour, fearing their great power, but laboured to cause some other of the German Princes to be elected. During all these practices and the Electors differen- ces about the election, they were aduertised of an Army put to field by the King of Spain (who was more ready to leaue Souldiers with his money then to giue it to the Electors) which Army drawing neare to Frankford vpon colour to bridle such as should offer to force the Ele-

King Charles
visits his mother

Sight of the Car-dinall's disgrace.

The Death of Cardinal Ximenes.

Coronation of King Charles
the first of that name.

Death of Maximilian, and consequents for the Empire.

The German louers of their country.

dition gave courage to those Electors which favoured his cause, and drew such as stood doubtful unto them. The Marquess of Brandenburg who stood for the French King, was so amazed, as despairing of the other Electors, and fearing the hatred of the whole nation, he durst not discover his intention; so as coming to the act of Election, CHARLES of Austria King of Spain was chosen Emperor by four of the Electors, only the Archbishop of Treves gave his voice for the Marquess of Brandenburg who was also concurrent in the Election for himselfe.

This election did much trouble the French king, so as many conceived that these two young Princes, between whom there were so many causes of jealousy and debate, upon sundry pretensions, would in the end grow to some great & dangerous warre, as you shall hereafter understand: King CHARLES being at Barcelona, he had newes of his election to the Empire of Germany, by an Embassage sent from the Electors, whereupon he went to make preparation for his journey, and to set order for the affairs of Castile, which were very confused. But he was forced to make haste and to leave many things undecided; being advertised of the conspiracies and leagues betwixt the townes and Noblemen of the Realme, for the defence of the priviledges of the country, against the greediness of the Flemish Counsellors. The king was loath to be engaged in the Spanish mutinies, with whose humors he was not yet acquainted: wherefore he embarked suddenly at the Greyne, leaving for governours Cardinal ALEXANDER and the Constable VELASCO, with whom afterwards he joynted FREDERICK, HENRIQUES great Admirall of Castile: And so passing by sea with a great fleet he landed in England, to see King HENRY the Eighth, with whom he was in good correspondence, where he was very honourably entertained for some daies, and then passed over into the Low countries, from whence he went with an honourable traine to Aix, where he made his entrie with all the Princes Electors, and many other Princes Embassadors and Noblemen, so as some write there were in the traine 15000 horse, and there he received the first Imperial, crowne of Iron.

In the meane time the combustions increased daily in Castile, many townes and Noblemen complaining of the breach of the lawes and priviledges of the Realme, and of the bad government of the Flemish Lords, most of the chief townes fell to Armes and actual rebellion, having joynted with diverse Noblemen and Knights and committing all sorts of riots and insolencies, refusing to obey the Kings officers, but of themselves they set downe a forme of government, which was made by the generall multitude, and they called it, la Santa Junta. The governours seeing this generall revolt, leaved forces to suppress the rebels, in the which there were many exploits done, which I omit. But in the end the two Armies met neere to Villa Lara, where the rebels were defeated, and thereby all tumults pacified, & the confederate cities labored to recover their former favour. The Bishop of Zamora one of the chiefs of the confederates was taken & strangled, and some other condemned to lose their heads: and thus their civil wars ended, which grew by the excessive and violent government of the Flemings.

During this rebellion in Castile, the governours being weak, were forced to draw the garrisons out of Navarre, and to draw away some of the ordinance out of Pampelona, whereupon the Lord of Asperant brother to the Lord of Laurerch, with some French wel affected to HENRY of Albrer, the right heire of that Realme, entred the country and took some places, and in the end was received into Pampelona: yet being abandoned by the Duke of Nagera, who was Viceroy, and finding no resistance in the whole Country, during the civil warres, he vnaudibly past the river of Ebro and laid siege to Zagaya: but the Governours having gotten the victory at Villa Lora, marched towards him, and forced him to repasse the river, following the French untill the Armies came neere to Pampelona, where the Lord of Asperant resolved to hazard a battail and would not attend such forces as were to joine with them the next day, in the which the French were defeated, and the Generall taken prisoner; whereupon the whole country of Navarre was easily recovered by the Castilians.

The heart burning betwixt the Emperor and the French King began now to discover it self, for the Duke of Bonillon (having put himselfe vnder the protection of the French) sent to desire the Emperor being at a Diet at Wormes, and his sonne the Lord of Florençes having leaved some forces in FRANCE, went to besiege a small town in Luxembourg; but the king of England dissuaded the French King, from entering into quarrell upon so small a subject, there was nothing done, and the Duke of Bonillon dismissed his Army: but the Emperor raised forces, and took divers places and townes from the Duke, who finding himselfe too weak obtained a Truce for six weekes. After the Emperors coronation the first act he did, was to suppress, if he could by mild means, the doctrine preached by LUTHER the which increased much in Germany. To this end, and for some other causes of importance concerning the Empire, he caused the Princes and estates to assemble at Wormes, whither LUTHER came, having a passport, and was heard disputing against Doctour ECKIVS and divers others, but there followed small fruites of this Diet.

King FRANCIS being much discontented with the overthrow of the Lord of Asperant's army, he sent the Lord of Bonques admiral of France with a greater power, who entred by Genipsea and besieged FONTARRABIE the which after some daies he took by composition, and manned it with a garrison of 3000 Gascons, vnder the command of the Earle of LYON: and about the same time the Viceroy of Navarre received commandement from the Emperor, to ruine all the walled Townes and forces of Navarre, to prevent another rebellion, the which was executed but at Pampalona and some few other places. Both these great Princes in like manner were in Armes upon the frontiers of FRANCE and Burgandy, where there were diuerse exploits done but of no great moment.

This yere the Emperor hearing of the alterations which had been in Spain against the governours; having consulted with the Princes Electors he disposed of his affaires there and of the Netherlands, and took shipping at Flushing, who finding a prosperous winde he touched in England where he concluded an allyance with King HENRY the Eighth, to marrie with MARY his daughter (being then but seuen yeeres old) when she should come to age but it succeeded not, from whence he sailed into Spain and arrived at Seville the 25 of July. The Emperor being gon into Spain there fell out great combustions in Germany, the Peasants taking Armes against the Nobility, who being assembled in great numbers, made spoile of religious houses, and committed a thousand insolencies having no subiect, but only abused by certaine false preachers, who said, they had a revelation from God, that they should root out that tyrannous Nobility and enjoy their full liberty; but they were defeated, and put to rout by the Count Palatine, the Archbishop of Mentz, and some others. Their leader was publicly executed, and those poore wretches that escaped from the battaile, returned home to their houses.

The Emperor being in Spain, had sent an Army to invest FONTARRABIE: the Earle of LYON the governour wanting things necessary for the defence of a towne of war, which attended a siege hourly, he advertised the king his master, intreating him to relieve him and to send another to take the charge: whereupon the Marshall CHABANES came and victualled the towne, and changed the garrison, leaving captain FRAVOIR, in the place of the Earle of LYON, and the next yere 1524 the Emperor sent an Army to besiege it; and FRAVOIR having neither want of victuals nor endured an assault, yielded the towne by composition, for the which he was degraded of his Nobility, upon a scaffold in the citie of Lyons. In the meane time the warres began to grow hot in Italy, whereas the Pope and the Emperour had made a secret league against the French King, seeking first to supplant him in the Duchy of Milan by secret practices, and then by open Armes, where after many exploits done in the end the Imperialists took the city of Milan. After which the Swissers under the French Kings pay, and vnder the command of the Lord of Laurerch General, would needs go and change the Imperialists at Bicocca where they were repulsed, yet they retired in good order with their Artillery, the enemy not daring to pursue them; in which conflict the Swissers lost 3000 of their best men and 22 Captains: after which they returned home; and the French, into FRANCE. The Lord of Laurerch having given order for the defense of Cremona, Genoa, and some other Townes in Lombardy, in the mean time the Emperor made a league with the Venecians: the Articles were, that between the Emperor FERDINAND Duke of Austria, and FRANCIS SPORZA Duke of Milan, on the one part, and the Senate of Venice on the other, there should be a perpetual peace and league, with diuerse other Articles for the joynt preservation of their estates. And in August following there was another league concluded at Rome betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the King of England, the Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Milan, the Cardinall of Medici, together with the state of Florence, and the Genoais; where it was concluded, that this league should continue during the confederates lives; and a yere after the death of any of them, reserving place for any other to come in, so as they were admitted by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of England: the rest of the Articles you may read at large in GUYCHARDIN.

The French King was nothing danted with these leagues, nor the vnion of so many Princes, who being come to Lyons, resolved to go in person with a great Armie into Italie. His Armie passed the mountains: but the King was slaid by the conspiracy of the Duke of Bourbon, who, being Charles the Fifth chosen Emperor.

Civil warres in Castile.

Navarre entred by the French.

The Lord of Asperant and the French defeated in Navarre.

Duke of Bonillon desired the Emperor.

A Diet at Wormes.

Fontarrabi taken by the French.

The Emperours secret voyage into Spain.

The peasants warre in Germany.

Fontarrabi taken by the Emperours.

Milan taken by the Imperialists.

The income tax of Bicocca.

A league betwixt the Emperour, the King of England, the Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Milan, the Cardinall of Medici, together with the state of Florence, and the Genoais.

The French King prepares to go into Italy.

being the greatest officer of the kingdom, and of a noble Family, seeing himselfe in some disgrace, made a league with the Emperour and the king of England, by which it was agreed, that as soone as the king should have passed the Alpes, he should enter Burgundy with twenty thousand Foot; But this could not be brought to passe, before it was discovered to the King being at Lions, who sent to apprehend him, but he was fled away in a disguised habit. This accident of importance stayed the king from his intended journey, who keeping certaine troupes about him prepared for the new warre, he sent the Lord of Bonnaville Admiral of France, into Italie, with one thousand eight hundred Lances, and thirty one thousand Foot, of several Nations, with which he drew neere to the confines of the Duchie of Milan, where he took some Townes, but attempted Milan in vaine.

The Duke of Bourbon, not able to doe the Emperour any seruice in Burgundy, for want of money to pay his Lance-knights, retired to Milan, where the Emperour (having no will he should passe into Spaine, to marry his sister the widow Queene of Portugal) sent to intreate him that he would stay there, giving him the title of his Lieutenant general in Italie; the Emperours affaires were not successful upon the coasts of Spaine, for having a great desire to passe in person into France, and thither to transport the warres, hauing to that end sent his Army vnder the Pirenean hills, the which had taken Dolmaterra; But his desires were greater then his power, being unable for want of money to entertain such great forces as were necessary for such an enterprise: for which cause he could not draw his Army together before the later end of the year, which bred him great difficulties in that cold season, for which consideration together with the want of victuals he was forced to dissolve his Army.

But to return to Italie, the Emperours Army was now on foot, vnder the leading of the Duke of Milan, the Duke of Bourbon, the Vice-roy of Naples, and the Marquesse of Pesquera; what successe these three Armies had, I leaue to the relation of GUY CHARDIN: part of this Army was sent in France, vnder the Duke of Bourbon, and the Marquesse of Pesquera, they entered Provence and took Aix, the chiefe City of that Prouince, with some other townes. The Duke of Bourbon would gladly have passed the riuier of Rhone, and entered farther into France, giuing diuers reasons for his aduice: But the Marquesse and the Spaniards desired rather to take Marseilles a haven of the Sea, lying very commodious for the Emperours passage out of Spaine, into Italie, the which they went to besiege, lying forty daies before it; but despairing to be able to take it, and fearing some great danger if the King should approach, they raised their siege: the king being commended to Adrian with his whole Army, and marched with all speed towards Marseilles: the French King, seeing a faire occasion offered him for the recovery of the Duchy of Milan, hauing a puissant Army; and his enemies being weak, he resolved to embrace the occasion; wherewith he acquainted his Captains; saying, I haue resolved to passe in person into Italie, and whoeuer shall aduise me to the contrary shall much displease me. Let every man therefore looke carefully to his charge; for God is a lover of iustice, and the rashnesse of our enemies, hath at last laid open a meane for vs to recouer that, which hath been violently taken from vs.

After which he caused the Army to march immediately, shunning to meete with the Lady Regent his mother, who came to perswade him not to passe the mountains in person: But he went on, and encamped with his Army before Pavia (having first taken the City of Milan) during which time, the Pope did mediate a Peace betwixt those two great Princes, but it took no effect.

The French King continued still his siege before Pavia, which was reduced to extremity, but the Imperialists drew all their forces together to relieve it; and the Armies lying neere together, they ioyned battaile vpon the four and twentieth day of February, where the French Army was ouerthrowne, and King FRANCIS, fighting valiantly and long in the middelt of the battaile, had his horse slain vnder him, and himselfe lightly hurt in the face and the hand, being fallen to the ground, he was taken prisoner by five soldiers who knew him not: But the Vice-roy changing to come he discovered himselfe vnto him, who gaue him his hand with great reuerence, and received him prisoner in the Emperours name. In this ouerthrow there were many Princes and Noble men of France slaine and taken prisoners, the particulars wherof I omit for breuities sake.

The Emperour being aduertised of this ouerthrow, and of the kings imprisonment, the news were very pleasing vnto him, yet he made no shew of pride for this great successe, but carried himselfe very modestly; For, being informed of the victory, and receiuing Letters of the French Kings own hand, which were humbly written, rather in the condition of a prisoner then of a king: He went forthwith to the Church to giue God thanks, and the next morning received the Sacrament with great deuotion, and so went in procession with his whole Court; but he would not suffer any Bells to be rung, or bonfires made in signe of ioy; saying, That it was fit to reioyce for victories obtained against Infidels, and not for those which were gotten against Christians. Whereupon he called his Councell together to aduise in what sort he should deale with the French King, and to what ends he should vse the Victory, commanding euery one to deliuer his minde freely in his presence: Whereupon the Bishop of Osmas, who was his Confessor, making a graue speech & shewing three deliberations which might be taken, touching the French King; the first to keep him a perpetuall prisoner; the second, to deliuer him friendly and brotherly without any other conditions but such as might settle a perpetuall Peace betwixt them; and the third to deliuer him, but to draw as great profite thereby as hee could, concluding that the safest course was to binde the king vnto him by a free and brotherly deliuerance. But on the other side the Duke of Alua perswaded the Emperour to make as great profit of this Victory, as possible he could, whose aduice was applauded by the whole Councell without any reple, the which the Emperour himselfe also approved: Whereupon there were certaine Articles drawne and sent with all speede vnto the King, who rectified them as vnreasonable.

The Vice-roy doubting of the Kings safe keeping within the Duchie of Milan, he resolved to transport him to Castel, whereto the King was much grieved: He was conducted to Genoa, and from thence to Portofeo where he should imbarke, but the Vice-roy hauing certaine French Gallies, sent him by the Queene Regent, he changed his aduice, and transported the King into Spaine. The Emperour, hearing of his arrival, gaue commandement, that he should be receiued with great honour in all places as he passed: what followed during his imprisonment vntil his deliuey, you may read at large in the French history.

In the year one thousand five hundred twenty six, after many consultations, in the end was attreay concluded for the deliuey of the French King; but the Emperour tyed him to such conditions as were very vnreasonable: yet he promised vpon his oath to obserue them faithfully, hauing left his two sonnes in Hostage, and contracted himselfe to Queene ELIZABETH the Emperours sister. This accord held all the Princes of Christendome in suspence, for they considered that if he obserued the treaty of Madrid, all Italie being vnable to defend it selfe, would fall into seruitude, but the world was soone satisfied of the French kings intention; For, being arrived at Bayonne, he was required to ratifie the Accord, which he had promised to doe when he came to a free place, but he delayed it with many excusis: giuing the Emperour to understand that before he proceeded to such an act, it was necessary he should pacifie his subjects, who were discontented with bonds which tended to the diminution of the Crowne of France: But notwithstanding all difficulties he would obserue what he had promised; notwithstanding the Pope and the Venecians sending messengers vnto him, he complained much of the Emperours inhumanity vnto him, during his imprisonment, not vRING him like a Prince, nor with that commiseration of his calamity that befitted a Prince. That he had not found him any milder disposed towards others, but perceived by his speeches vied at Madrid that he affected nothing more then how to bring the Church, Italy, and all other Princes into seruitude: and therefore he wished them to be carefull of their owne safeties: which if they did, he would concurre with them for the common good, and make a league with them against the Emperour, not that he had any intent to recouer the State of Milan, or to adde any thing to his own greatnesse, but only by warre to recouer his children, and assure the liberty of Italie, seeing the Emperours great couctousnesse had left him no colour to binde him to obserue the treaty: For that both at the first when he was in the Castle of Pisqueton and afterwards in Spaine, he had often protested to the Emperour, by reason of his exorbitant demands; that if through necessity he were driuen to compound vpon vnjust conditions, or such as were not in his power to performe, that not only he would not obserue them; but holding himselfe wronged in that he had forced him to make impossible promises, he would be reuenged if euery occasion were offered, and that he had often told him, that it was not in the power of a French king, to binde himselfe to the alienation of any thing depending of the Crowne, without the consent of the generall estates: that the Laws of Christians did not allowe, that he which was taken in warre should be detained in perpetuall prison, which was a punishment proper for malefactors, and not for such as had been beaten with the cruelty of fortune; that all men knew that bonds made by constraint in prison were of

The Emperours moderation upon the news of the Victory.

The French king transported into Spaine.

The delivery of the French king.

His complaint against the Emperour.

The Emperours desire to go into France made frustrate.

The Duke of Bourbon enters into Provence with an Army.

The French king resolves to passe the mountains and follow the enemy.

The battell of Pavia where the French King was taken prisoner.

The French King's moderation upon the news of the Victory.

no value; and that the capitulation being of no force, the faith likewise which was but accessary, and the confirmation of the same, could not be bound; that by the oath which hee had taken at Rhemes at his coronation, hee was bound (according to the custome of other Kings of France) not to alienate the patrimony of the Crown: and therefore for these reasons he was no lesse free than ready to abate the Emperors pride.

The Emperor, growing jealous of the Kings delays for the ratification, sent one vnto him to be certified of his intent, who found him very vnwilling to leaue Burgundy; which, beeing very prejudiciall to the Crown of France, he said was not in his power to obseue: but desiring much to entertain the amity begun with the Emperor, and to giue perfection to the marriage, he would be contented (observing all other Articles) to pay him two millions of crownes for the resignation of Burgundy.

The Emperor, hearing this answer, was much troubled in minde, yet he resolved not to alter any thing touching the restitution of Burgundy, and rather to accord with the Pope, and to consent to the reintegration of FRANCIS SFOUR; being more fitting for him to pardon a Prince lesse than himself, than by yeelding to the will of a powerfull Prince, and one that enuied his greatness, to make as it were a confession of fear. But the French King hearing that the Emperor would alter nothing touching the Articles of the capitulation, he presently began to hearken to the treaty of the league, the which was concluded the tenth of May 1556. between the French King on the one part, the Pope and the Venecians on the other; that between the Pope, the French King, the Venecians, and the Duke of Milan (for whom the Pope and the Venecians assured their ratification) should bee a perpetuall league to restore FRANCIS SFOUR freely to the Duchy of Milan, and the French Kings children to their liberty; that the League should be signifi'd to the Emperor, to whom was given power to enter into it within three moneths, with condition to deliuer the Kings children, receiving a competent ranfome, such as the King of England should arbitrate, and also to leaue the whole Duchy of Milan vnto FRANCIS SFOUR, and the other estates of Italie as they were before the last war began: there were many other Articles touching the managing of this warre, which I leaue to GYRCHARDINE.

The Army of confederates being in field, they came and sate down before Milan, and soon retired again without any effect: and in the meane time the poore Inhabitants of Milan were wonderfully oppress'd by the rigour and cruelty of the Spaniards; and the face of this City appeared very miserable and almost naked of Inhabitants, many beeing wasted by the plague, and many fleeing away daily to auoid the fury of those merciles Spaniards. They were somewhat reuiued by the coming of the Duke of Bourbon, perswading themselves, that seeing hee had brought some prouision of money, and that the confederates Camp was retired, their necessities and dangers would decrease, and they should not bee so much oppress'd and cruelly handled: furthermore, they had a conceit, that the Duke (to whom it was said the Emperor had given the Duchie of Milan) would prouide for his owne profit, that they should be no more so miserably afflicted. Wherefore, assembling themselves together, they came to the Duke, and deliuered their grieuances vnto him by the mouth of one of their company, with tears and lamentations. The Duke seemed to be much grieued for their miseries, promising to doo his best to releuee the City, which had been so much oppress'd contrary to the Emperours will and pleasure: he told them, moreover, that he had brought some prouision of money, but not so much as might content the souldiers; yet if the City would furnish him with 30000 Ducates for the pay of one moneth, he would cause the Army to retire out of Milan; assuring them, that hee would not break his faith and word, vpon which they might confidently rely; praying God, that if he failed of his promise, his head might bee taken from his shoulders by the first shot of Cannon from the enemy: whereupon, the poor Citizens with great difficulty began to make prouision of the money. But the Duke of Bourbon made no reckoning to keep his word and promise, or at the least it lay not in his power to curb the pride and insolencie of the souldiers.

The Castle of Milan was all this time besieged by the Imperialists and reduced to great extremity for want of victuals, the confederate army vnder the command of the Duke, promising still to relieue them, and they came and planted their Camp within a mile of Milan: but they delayed the execution so long, as the Duke of Milan was forced by extremity of hunger, to yield it vp vnto the Duke of Bourbon vpon certain conditions, the which were very ill obserued. The Emperour began to fortify himselfe in Italy against the confederates: hee sent the Viceroy

The Emperor sends to the French King touching the treaty.

A league concluded between the Pope, the French King and the Venecians.

The miserable estate of Milan.

The Castle of Milan yielded to the Imperialists.

Prisoners of the Emperour against the confederates.

of Naples out of Spain, with 6000 foot, Lanceknights, & Spaniards, and he sent directions into Germany for new succours of footmen: but by reason of the want of money that Leuy came slowly.

After the successe of these matters in Italy with diuerse euent, Embassadors came vnto the Emperor in September from the Pope, the french king & the Venecians, to signifie vnto him the league which they had made with the libertie which was left to him to enter, according to the conditions: at which at the Embassador of England being present, hee deliuered a Letter from the king his master, who perswaded him to enter into the League. The Emperour hauing heard their charge, answered, that it agreed not with his dignity, to enter into a league, made principally against his estate and honour: but hauing been alwaies desirous of the vniuersall peace, he made offer to accomplish it presently if they had sufficient commissions for the same.

This yeere the Duke of Bourbon went out of Milan with part of the Imperiall Army: being perswaded by the Duke of Ferrara to adresse himselfe to the head, and attempt Florence, or Rome: and in like manner the Viceroy of Naples, who also had an Army for the Emperor, was desirous to inuade the territories of the Church: the Duke of Bourbon marched neere to Bologna, where he was in great danger of his life by reason of the mutinie of his souldiers for want of pay: But the Pope seeing these stormes approach, began to faint and to lose all courage, so as he resolved, to make an accord with some whom the Viceroy had sent to Rome, to that end: which was, That there should be a surceasing of Armes for eight moneths, the Pope paying to the Imperiall Army 60000 Ducats, with diuerse other Articles. The Duke of Bourbon was perswaded by the Viceroy to accept of the truce: the which he refused, saying that the Army could not bee staied but by the aduancing of a greater summe of money, so as hauing no means to entertaine the Army longer without money (for vntill that day he had carried them through many difficulties, with fair promises and vain hopes) being constrained either to trie his fortune or to perish, he resolved to march with all possible speed to surpris Rome: where the reward of the victory would be incalculable; and he was encouraged with hopes of good successe, for that the Pope had vnadvisedly vpon the treaty of the accord dismissed his troups. The Duke of Bourbon, leaving his artillery and baggage behinde, marcht with incredible speed, and drew neer to Rome, the Pope being scarcely aduertised of his coming: what passed within the City, I omit for breuities sake. On the sixt of May he sent a Trumpet to demand passage through the City of Rome, to go with his Army to the Realm of Naples; and the next morning at the break of day he resolved either to dy or vanquish, giuing a furious assault to the suburbs; in which hee was much fauoured by a thick mist. At the beginning of the assault, the Duke of Bourbon, beeing in the head of the troups to draw them on, was shot through the head with a bullet, and slaine. This did nothing daunt the resolution of the souldiers, who after a little resistance forced the rampiers, the Defendants all fleeing away: whereupon Pope CLEMENT with certain of his Cardinals fled into the Castle, and the same night the souldiers entred the City, where they made a pitifull spoil, without respect of person or place, were they holy or profane. The spoil was infinite for the wealth and riches which they found, and for the quality and number of the prisoners, who were to redeem themselves with very great ranfomes.

On the sixt of Iune the Pope compounded with the Imperialists: the conditions were, that he should pay to the Army 400000 Ducats, that he should deliuer vp to the Emperor the Castle Saint Angelo, the Forts of Ostia, Ciuita vecchia, and of Ciuita Castellana, with the Cities of Parma, Placencia and Modena; that the Pope, with thirteen Cardinals which were with him, should remain prisoners within the Castle vntill the first payment were made of 15000 Ducates, and then they should go to Naples or to Caietta, and there attend the Emperours pleasure; that for assurance of the other payments he should giue in hostage certain speciall men whom they named. This sack of Rome drew all the souldiers of the Realm of Naples thither; so as there were at that one Instant 24000 men, who liued there tumultuously and insolently, and would not depart: but a great number of them were deuoured by the plague.

Matters being created of before for the preparation of a new war, in April a league was concluded betwixt the Kings of France and England, vpon certain conditions set down: and it was resolved, that either of them should send Embassadors to the Emperor to acquaint him with the league they had made, and to summon him to restore the Kings children, and to enter into the peace with honest conditions; which if he would not accept within one moneth, then to denounce war.

This league being concluded, the two Kings sent two Gentlemen in poste to make this summons

557

The Pope makes an accord with the Imperialists.

The Duke of Bourbon slaine at the assault of Rome.

Rome taken and sacked by the Imperialists.

A league betwixt the Kings of France and England.

mons to the Emperor, which all the two Ambassadors performed. And in like manner, on the fifteenth of May 1527, the French King (having newes of the sack of Rome, and the death of the Duke of Bourbon) contracted with the Venecians and the Duke of Milan, for the leuying of an Army in Italy. Of this Army of the league, MONSIEUR de Lautrec was made Captain general, who, having passed into Italy, took Genoa and Alexandria, and sackt Pavia. After which he was importuned by the Pope to advance with his Army: whereupon the Imperialists, fearing his descent into the Realm of Naples, which they were of necessity to defend, made an accord with the Pope. The Articles were, that the Pope should make no enterprise against the Emperor, either in Milan, or the Kingdom of Naples; that hee should grant him a Croisade in Spain, and a Tenth of all the Clergy-revenues in those Realms; that he should leave in the Emperors hands (for assurance of the obseruation) Ostia, Civita vecchia, Civita Castellana, and the Castle of Pavie, and give for hostages his nephews, Hippolito and Alexander; that he should pay to the Lance-Knights 67000 Ducats, and to the Spaniards 35000: which being performed, they should release him with all his Cardinals: and they should goe out of Rome, and the Castle, conveying the Pope in safety to Orvieto, Spoleto or Perusia, untill the rest of their money were paid.

The night before the tenth of December, which was appointed for the Popes departure, he fearing that some sinister accident might happen unto him, stole, in the closing of the evening, secretly out of the Castle in the habit of a merchant; being attended by Levvus de Gonzaga, who was in the Emperors pay, and conducted him safely to Orvieto: from whence he wrote a Letter to MONSIEUR de Lautrec, thanking him for that which he had done touching his deliury.

Most part of the former yeer there had been treating of a peace betwixt the Emperour and the Kings of France and England; and taking no effect, the Ambassadors being retired, their Heralds came to denounce warre against the Emperor: whereto (as some write) hee made this answer, that the French King could not denounce war against him being his prisoner, although he were at liberty, having given his sonnes for hostages: if hee could not observe his promise which he had solemnly sworn, being hindered by his subjects, he should return again to prison; and that he could not by the law of Nations, being not yet freed from his oath, denounce war against him: and GUYCHARDIN writes, that hee could some of the Kings ministers, that he would end all quarels with the French King by single combat of both their persons, and that he had dealt villanously and cowardly with him in falsifying his faith. The King, hearing heerof, held it a dishonour to passe it over in silence: and therefore on the twentieth of March, in a great assembly of all his Princes, all the Ambassadors and his whole Court, calling for PERRET the Emperors Ambassador, after some speeches hee desired him to carry a Letter and deliuer a message to the Emperor from him of this tenor; that whereas the Emperor had told his Herald that he had falsified his faith, he had spoken an vntruth; and that as often as hee had spoken it, so often he had lied, and not to deferre the triall of their quarels, that hee should assigne him the place where they might together perform the combat. The Ambassador refusing to carry this Letter or deliuer the message, told him hee would signifie as much to the Emperor by an Herald: and although he were not ignorant that he had spoken against the honour of his brother the King of England, yet hee would say nothing therein, knowing that the King was well able to defend himself: but if through the indisposition of his body he had any lawfull impediment, he offered to aduantage his body for him. But not many daies after, the King of England gaue him the like defiance with the same solemnities. The Army of the league vnder the command of MONSIEUR de Lautrec their Generall, entred into the Realme of Naples, being still followed by the Imperiall Army, cutting off their vituals: but in the end of April he came to Naples, which he resolved to besiege both by sea and land; where in the beginning there was a great fight at sea between PHILIP DORIA who serued the French, and the Imperialists, in which Don Hernando Viceroy of Naples, with about 1000 Spaniards, were slain, and many Noble-men and others taken prisoners. The siege of Naples proved very fatal for the French: for ANDRE DORIA with his galleys left the Kings service, and fell to the Emperor, whose Army was fortified with new forces. The French Army was distressed for vituals, and much infected with the plague, whereof many great Commanders and Captains died, and in the end MONSIEUR de Lautrec the Generall himself, which was the overthrow of the French Army in the kingdom of Naples, having as bad successe in Lombardy vnder the command of MONSIEUR de S. Pol, who was overthrowne and taken prisoner by ANTHO-

NY

ix de Lena, at Laudiano. These many crosses caused the French King willingly to giue care to a treaty of peace, the which was debated at Cambrey in the yeere 1530 by Levvus of Sauoy, the French Kings mother, and MARGARET of Austria the Emperours Aunt; where after much debating the two Princes were reconciled; by the which the Infants of France were to be deliuered in regard of two millions and 500000 crownes, payable at severall times, whereof part was in discharge of the Emperour to the King of England, that the King should renounce the Soueraigntie of Flanders, & Artois, and his pretensions to the Duchie of Milan & Naples, with diuerse other Articles which did not hold. During the negotiation at Cambrey, the Emperour passed into Italy with great forces, which amazed all the States of Italy: he landed at Genoa, and went to Bolegna, whereas Pope CLEMENT attended him and receiued him with great honor, and lodged him in the same palace with him, where by their outward demonstrations they seemed to haue been alwaies in great amity. There he receiued the imperiall Crowns, one of Iron, which the Emperours haue bin accustomed to receiue at Milan, and the other of Gold which he should haue taken at Rome: and during his abode there, by the Popes mediation, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan, vpon certaine conditions, were reconciled to the Emperor, who returned to FRANCIS SPORCE, Milan, with the whole Duchie: from whence he passed into Germany, to an Imperiall Diet which was held at Ausbourg, where assisted FERRINAND King of Hungary his brother, with the Princes of the Empire. There the Protestant Princes, Noble-men, and Imperiall townes besought the Emperor to heare the confession of their doctrine, where were many disputations by the Doctors on both sides: where the Protestants seeing they could not preuaile any thing, made a protestation that they could not contribute to the warres against the Turke who threatened to besiege Viena: After which, King FERRINAND was chosen King of the Romans, with whom the Emperor went to Aix where he was solemnly crowned, in January 1531. And from thence the Emperour went into the Low countries, where he made a very seuered Edict against them of the reformed religion; and then he returned into Germany and went with his brother FERRINAND to a Diet at Ratisbim, where the Councill of Ausbourg was allowed vntill a Councill were called: and so a peace was concluded in Germany, vpon certaine Articles, so as the Protestants for their parts, being seuen Princes and 24 townes, offered obedience to the Emperor, and promised him succours against the Turke.

This treaty was ratified by the Emperour the second of August 1532, commanding the Imperial chamber and all other Iudges to obey it. The Emperour leauing Germany returned into Italy, and had an enteriue with the Pope at Bolegna, in shew to treat of a generall Councill, which was nothing pleasing vnto the Pope: but the chiefe end was, to make a league betwene them and the other Potentates of Italy, for the assurance of their estates against the enterprises of the French: which done, the Emperor returned to Genoa and from thence passed into Spain.

The Emperour being in Spain, he was solicited by MULEY HASSEN King of Tunis who had been dispossessed by HARADIN BARBAROSSA, to restore him to his Realme, promising to hold it of the Crowne of Spain. This occasion was willingly embraced, as necessary for the good of Christendome, and very honourable for the Emperour in particular. Having resolved vpon this enterprise, he aduertised all Christian Princes, inviting them to contribute men, money and ships to this warre, whither hee would go in person: the Kendee was in Sardinia, where he shipped his Army being nere 40000 men, with the which he landed happily within six miles of Tunis: he first assaulted Gouletta which was a strong Fort set vpon the mouth of the lake, the which was taken by assault, in which there were slaine in fighting or in flying away above 1500 Turks and all *BARBAROSSA*s ordinance and Galleys taken. There was great consultation touching the enterprise of Tunis, which some held difficult and others made it easie. It is written that BARBAROSSA being much grieved for the losse of Gouletta was once in minde to haue slaine all the Christian slaues: from which cruell resolution he was deterred by some, shewing him that so foule a fact would not onely blemish his name perpetually, but bring him in disgrace with SOLIMAN, who was a generous Prince, and hated all such base actions, as to kill people imprisoned which could not offend him. The Emperour marched with his Army towards Tunis, and BARBAROSSA came forth of the citie in shew to giue him battaile, having (as some write) twenty thousand horse, 100000 foot, Moores and Arabians, with 7000 Turks on whom he did chiefly rely. The two Armies drawing nere, the charge began: but the Barbarians vpon the first charge, fled away basely, neither did BARBAROSSA shew any courage that day, but fled speedily to the City, where the slaughter in this battaile

K k k 2

was

The Emperour makes a peace at Cambrey with the French King.
Coronation of the Emperour at Bolegna.

Ferrinand chosen King of the Romans.

A peace betwixt the Emperour and the Protestants in Germany.

A league betwixt the Pope and the Emperour.

Muley Hassem restored by the Emperour.

The Emperour forces going to Tunis.

Gouletta taken by the Emperour.

Battaile betwixt the Christians and Barbarossa at Tunis.

Accord betwixt the pope and the Emperours agents

1528
Answer made by the emperor to the French King.

The French King gives the Emperour the ly.

1528 Naples besieged.

The Spaniards defeated at sea.

Death of MONSIEUR de Lautrec.

was not great, the Barbarians flying presently. BARBAROVSSIE being in Tunis entred into a new resolution to murder the Christian slaves, which moued those Renegados (much fauoured by him) to compassion, who opened the prison doores to these wretches, who (as some write) were 10000: and they having broken their chaines, got staves and such other weapons and became maisters of the Castle, driving away those few Turks which were left there in garde, seizing vpon the treasure, victuals and Armes which BARBAROVSSIE had left there, who posted to the Castle seeking to be let in, but they chased him away with reproches. This happened the day after the bataille, when as those slaves made signe vnto the Emperour to approach, but by reason of the distance they could not be seene: yet the Emperour finding there was some alteration sent to discover it. In the meantime BARBAROVSSIE fearing the inconstancie of his Moores, left the citie, and went towards Bona with his 7000 Turks: the Christian Army marching towards Tunis, they were met by Embassadours from the city, who offered to yeeld vnto the Emperour vpon what conditions he would prescribe, so as he would secure them from sack, the which was granted: But soon after the Emperours entrance the Spaniards and Germanes fell to spoile and kill, committing all acts of hostility. After all this MYLE HASSEN was restored to his kingdom by the Emperour, vpon certain Articles: set downe, doing him homage: and then the Emperour dismissing part of his Army from Gouletta he returned with the rest into Sicily, and so came to Naples.

The Emperour being returned to Naples there began a new warre betwixt him, and the French king, for the Duke of Savoy brother in law to the Emperour, whom the French fought to dispossesse of his estate. The Emperour consulted with his captaines of the manner how he should begin this war, whether he should stay in Piemont or passe presently into Provence: where after diuerse opinions it was concluded to invade Provence: for the which enterprize he made preparation of a mighty Army, hauing (as some write) 24000 Germanes, 14000 Spaniards, 12000 Italians and 5000 horse, with which he marched into Provence, where he attempted Marselles in vaine, neither did he any thing in that voyage worth the memory, but was forced to retire with his Army with great losse and dishonor, the particularities you may reade at large in the French historie. After the Emperours retraite out of France the warre being still hot in Piemont, Pope PAVL considering what miseries it brought vnto Christendome, and foreseeing the ruine of Italy if it continued, he labored an enterview of these two Princes and himselfe at Nice, where they could not be reconciled, there being a truce onely for tenne years concluded.

The Emperour returning towards Spain, was staied by fowle weather about Marselles, where the King sent to intreate him to enter and to rest himself vntill the winde were faire, for which he gaue him thanks, letting him vnderstand, that he desired they might meete at Aligues martres: whereupon the king went thither from Alignon, where the Emperour landed, and dined with the king, and he afterwards entred confidently into the Emperours Galley where they conferred long together, and parted with great shewes of friendship.

In the yecare 1539. the Gantois in the County of Flanders began to mutine: the Companies of Trades and occupations, assembled in their severall Halls, and then went to Armes, seeking to extort many things from the great Bailiffe, and the Magistrats of the Towne; they committed many to prison, and one they publicly beheaded of their owne authority. The Emperour hearing of this rebellion, (vpon the French Kings word and safe conduct) he posted from Spain, to come by land, into the Netherlands through France. The Prince Dolphin and the Duke of Orleans were ready to receive him at the foot of the Pyrenian mountains, who conducted him to Paris, being in great late, in all the townes where hee passed; approaching neere vnto Paris the King met him hauing a godly traine of Princes, Noblemen, and Gentlemen; and being come to the Louvre both the King and Queene ELIZABETH his sister, gaue him a very Royall reception, from whence hee was conducted to Valencienne in Flanders: and from thence he went to Brussels, where hearing many complaints of the Gantois rebellion; he went thither with 4000 men, where comming neere the towne the Magistrats met him, and brought him into the towne with great honor. Being duly informed of all matters, he caused many Burgesses to be apprehended: and their procees being made, there were nine of the chiefe beheaded, and the inhabitants were forbidden to cary kniues, vlesse the points were broken: and the better to keepe the towne in awe, the Emperour caused a strong cittadell to be built: their priuiledges were taken away, and many other indignities were donethem, which I forbeare to relate.

The

The warres continued hot betwixt the Emperour and the French King, who had entred Brabant, and spoiled the Countrey vntill they came to Antwerp, being assisted by the troups of the Duke of Gelders. The Emperour having settled his affaires in the Netherlands, he went to Ratisbona, where he had appointed an Imperiall Diet; as well to provide for the warre against the Turke, as to bring the Protestants vnder the obedience of the Church of Rome: and vnder the colour of Religion, he thought to stay the French King, from making varre (being much incensed, for that his Embassadours had bene murdered going to Venice) by vndertaking the Conquest of Algier, for which attempt hee assembled his Forces, teicting the wise counsell of his best Captaines; who aduised him to deferre the enterprize vntill the Spring following: but the enterprize proved very fatall, for the Army was not onely annoied by Land by the Barbarians, but his Fleet was miserably come and spoyled at Sea by Tempest, whereby the Armie was driven to great extremity for want of victuals; and the Emperour forced to retire; embarking his Armie in those few ships and galleys that remained; himselfe shaping his course for Spain, where he found himselfe engaged in a difficult warre against the French King, who pretended the treuche had bene broken, by the murder of his Embassadours; whereupon (as I haue said) he had sent troups into Brabant, and the Duke of Orleans into Luxembourg: the Dolphin HENRY went with a goodly Army to besiege Perpignan, but hee prevailed not: hee also made warre in Italy, and sent the Duke of Vendome into Picardie.

The Emperour tainted not for all this, but that which troubled him much was to heare that SOLTMAN had newly repult the forces of the Empire from before Buda, and that hee prepared to returne this yecre into Hungary with a mighty Army: and that which did afflicke him more, was to vnderstand that BARBAROVSSIE was at sea with a great fleet, meaning to invade his countries of Naples, and Sicily, or Spain if hee could: To prevent all these mischiefs hee past into Italy and made a league with the King of England, from whence he went into Germany, and so into the Lowe Countries, and then began the warre in those parts betwixt the two Princes: for after many encounters, and sieges of townes, the two Armies being neere, and ready to giue bataille, by the mediation of some good men, a peace was concluded betwixt them, and the Emperour retired to Brussels in October, whither came in the same moneth Queene ELIZABETH the French Kings wife, with the Duke of Orleans, where they were receiued and entertained with great state and magnificence.

The Emperour went from thence to an Imperiall Diet at Wormes, where he meant to treat of matters of Religion; Pope PAVL and hee hauing made a league in Iune 1546, concluding, that seeing the Protestants would not allow of the Councell of Trent, nor submit themselves vnto it, the Emperour should force them by Armes, and if he entred into any treaty with them, he should not preiudice the Church of Rome: That the Pope should consign 100000 crownes at Venice, besides 100000 Crownes which he had already payed, to be employed in this warre; that he should also inttaine 12000 foot, and 500 horse, for six moneths; That the Emperour might for this warre, take the one halfe of the reuenew of the Clergie, and sell of Abbey Lands, to the value of 500000 crownes: And if any Prince should seeke to hinder their resolution they should ioine their forces together to resist them: Then they began to make preparation for this warre, both in Germany, Spain, and Italy.

The Emperour (as it seemed) had a further designe; Viz. that hauing ruined the protestants, which made the greatest power of Germany, he would subiect the states of the Empire to his will, that he might keepe the Empire in his family, and make it hereditary: and for some proofe of this absolute power which he did affect, he had mad a truce with the Turke the better to attend this warre, without taking the aduice of those Princes and States, who had contributed great summes of money; to make warre against the enemy of Christendome.

Finally, after many conferences, and refusal of peace, which they had demanded; the confederate Princes raised a mighty Army, whereupon the Emperour proclaimed them guilty of high treason. The two Armies lay neere together, and the protestants offered bataille to the Emperour, but he would none, assuring himselfe that they could not long continue together. The protestants Army had two commanders, the D. of Saxony & the Landgrave of Hessen, who did not concurre wel in their consultations, besides they wanted victuals, and money; so as

K k k 3

The French enter into Brabant.

The Emperours voyage to Algier.

His returne from that misfortunate attempt.

The French king invades the Emperours territories.

A league between the Pope and the Emperour against the Protestants of Germany.

The Duke of Savoy defeated and taken.

Christian slaves set upon the Castle of Tunis.

The Emperours returne into Sicily.

The Emperours passage into Provence.

An enterview between the Pope, Emperour, and French King at Nice.

The Emperour and French king meet at Aligues martres.

The Emperour passes through France to suppress the Gantois.

The Gantois rebellion punished.

as they were forced to dislodge and retire further off: whereupon, diuerse protestant Townes compounded to pay money, and to receiue garrisons. The Emperor pursued the Elector, and forced him to fight with disadvantage, where he was defeated and taken. Within few dayes the Emperor gaue Sentence of death against him, which was reuoked vpon suit made; yet vpon condition, that he should resigne the dignity of Elector; which was given to MAVRIC, with all his Lands. There were many other conditions imposed vpon him, all which hee signed; onely he would not promise to obey the decrees of the Councell of Trent, protesting constantly, that he had rather dy than yeeld to it: whereupon the Emperor caused that Article to be left out; yet for all this, FREDERICK continued prisoner to the Emperor.

D. MAVRIC being now Elector of Saxony, and the Marquess of Brandenburg, sons-in-law to the Lantzgrau of Hessen, were suters for him; who obtained a promise from the Emperor to pardon his life, to remit all other punishments due to the Rebels, to leaue him his Countrey, with one Fort furnished with artillery, so as he did renounce all leagues which did prejudice him or his brother FERDINAND, obey the Imperiall Chamber, deliuer vp the rest of his Ordinance, pay 150000 crowns within foure months for the charges of the war, and deliuer the prisoners which he held, and come and craue pardon of the Emperor. The Lantzgrau accepted these conditions, and presented himself to the Emperor vpon his knees, who returned him an ambiguous answer: yet, thinking that all went well, hee thanked the Emperor. Then going to sup with the Duke of ALBA, and thinking after supper to retire with his two sons in law, he was detained prisoner, and giuen in guard to Spaniards, the which ministred matter of great discontent, Duke MAVRIC and Brandenburg charging the Emperor with breach of his promise. This act deprived the Emperor of the fruits hee pretended of his enterprises, and was a means to chase him out of Germany.

Prince PHILIP, being sent for by the Emperor his father, came from Spain into Italy, and so passing through Germany, arrived at Brusselles, the Emperor inuesting him in the Duchie of Brabant, the County of Flanders, of Henalt, and of Artois, and afterwards of the Town of Antwerp, and the Marquisate of the holy Empire: all which was performed with great pomp and ceremonies. In May 1550, the Emperor parted from Brusselles with the Prince his sonne, to go to an Imperiall Diet held at Ausbourg, where he prest his brother FERDINAND to re-signe to Prince PHILIP his sonne his right and dignity of King of the Romans; whereupon they grew to a quarrell: all for the pacifying whereof, MARY Queen of Hungary, their sister, was forced to return to Ausbourg. He pursued this resignation by all means possible: but FERDINAND would neuer yeeld, thinking that if he made his dangerous alienation, all his sons (hauing many) should remain without estates: and he had sent into Spain for MAXIMILIAN his sonne to come to the Diet, being a milde and courteous Prince, and very pleasing vnto all Germany. Prince PHILIP, hauing failed in this attempt, returned towards Spain the same way he came;

Duke MAVRIC and Brandenburg, being assisted by the king of Denmarke, the King of Romanes, and by many other Princes, who had written their Letters to the Emperour for the Lantzgraues deliuey: But it seemed the Emperour respected all these Princes little, referring the answer of their request, to the comming of Duke MAVRIC, whom he said he expected to come and treat with him. WILLIAM eldest sonner to the Lantzgrau did importune him much: But Duke MAVRIC and the Marquess of Brandenburg much more, speaking very boldly vnto him, and putting him in minde of their bond and promise.

The Emperor, being puffed vp with his good luccesse in Germany, gaue distaste to all, as well Catholics as Protestants, by his exactions, vpon diuerse pretences: of some to be satisfied for the charges of the warre, which he pretended to haue made for the liberty of Germany; of other by the way of chastisement, for that they had reuolted: wherein he said he proceeded mildly, quitting much of his right to ease and spare them. By this means there was neither Town nor Country, estate nor condition amongst the Germans which were not vexed by taxes, and by fowre speeches and threats, if they presumed to put him in minde of his conuention and promises. It is said, that he wrested from those Princes and protestant Towns, about 500 pieces of great Ordinance, wherewith he furnished his Forts in Italia, Spain and Flanders. Duke MAVRIC remembering the captivity of the Lantzgrau his father-in-law (whom hee had brought to the Emperor vpon a promise that he would not detain him prisoner, yet notwithstanding he carried him vp and down as it were in triumph) resolved to compound the wars with the town of Magdeburgh, which had been straightly besieged for that they resisted the Emperors edicts;

so as they had means to free themselves vpon honest conditions; Duke MAVRIC becoming the chief in that action: who seeing the Emperor reject his many motions vnto him for the Land-graues deliuey, he entered into league with ALBERT of Brandenburg, the Land-graues children and others, and all they ioyntly with HENRY the Second, the French King (sonne to FRANCIS the First, who died before in the year one thousand five hundred forty seuen) who marched speedily with a great Army towards the Rhine, publishing that it was to restore the Germans, his good neighbours, and ancient friends, to their true and ancient liberty, which was taken from them by CHARLES of Austria, tearming himselfe Emperour: the Protestant Princes went also to Armes, and took many Townes in Germany, into their protection, yet forcing them to furnish both money and artillery: inioyning the townes of vpper Germany, to meet at Ausbourg in the end of April.

Duke MAVRIC had taken Ausbourg, finding small resistance; from thence he marched towards Inspruck, to ouertake the Emperour, who (seeing this new taking of Armes in Germany) had retired thither to draw men out of Italia. Hearing that the enemy approached, he sent some few souldiers to defend Chiusa, a very strong passage in that Countrey, but it was soone forced by the Germans; whereof the Emperour being aduertised, he parted suddenly from Inspruck, in the night by torch-light, in a rainy season, and retired to Vlatca, a Castle belonging to the house of Austria, vpon the confines of Friuly. It was a miserable thing to see the Emperor and his Court depart in such haste, at such time, and in such a season, hauing left behinde them most part of their baggage, many walking on foote for want of Horses, whom the Emperour comforted what he could. Duke MAVRIC came the same night to Inspruck, but followed the Emperour no further, making spoile only of what the Court had left there. But this warre had an end by the Land-graues deliuey, and by a peace concluded by FERDINAND's mediation at Nassau, the which the Emperour himselfe signed.

The French king was discontented with this accord, yet hearing that the Land-graue was in great danger, if it had not been concluded, he yeilded, sending back the hostages (which the Protestant Princes had giuen him) safe into Germany, and retired with his Army, retaining for his charges, Metz, Thoul, and Verdun, Imperiall townes. The Land-graue was set at liberty according to the accord, hauing been a prisoner five yeers at Macklin in Brabant, and returning homeward, he was againe stayed by the Queene of Hungaries commandement, who pretended that the Peace was broken.

The Emperour set LOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony at liberty, hauing first deprived him of his Electorall dignity, and his estate: And in September the Land-graue was absolutely discharged, and returned to his house: And the Emperour finding himselfe bound to recover those townes which the French had taken, came with a goodly Army, and laid siege to Metz, in November, the which he battered with 40 Cannons. The winter was very sharpe, and the town well mand, and valiantly defended, by many good captains, Princes, and others of great houses, vnder the command of the Duke of Guise: so as seeing his Army ouer-toyled, and diminished daily, through hunger, cold, nakedness, and want of all things, being pressed by necessity, he retired his Army with losse and dishonor; from whence the Emperor returned to Brusselles, and the warres continued betwixt him and the French King, vpon the Frontiers of Artois and Picardy, where there passed many encounters and taking of townes.

In the yeere one thousand five hundred fifty foure, HENRY the French king, sent three Armies against the Emperor, the first into Vermandois vnder the Prince La Roche sur Yonne: the second towards Creily led by the Constable, and the third was commanded by the Duke of Nevers, who entered the Ardennes, took Orchimont, and burnt many villages, and passing into the countrey of Legee, he assured the passage of the Riuer of Menue, by the taking of some strong Forts. The Constables Army took Marreimburg, and Rocroy, with diuers other places; The Prince of Roch sur Yonne, with the Duke of Nevers, entered Henalt, and Brabant, where they burnt all the villages, and carried away a great Prey, leauing the countrey miserable and desolate; They besieged the Castle of Remy, which the Emperor came in person to relieue, whereupon the French retired their Army.

During the warres in Germany and the Lowe Countreies: the Turkes and Pirates of Affrick, spoiled the Coasts of Naples, Sicily, and Spain: whereof the chiefe commander was DRAGARAY a famous Pirate, who surprized the towne of Affrick, which then was well peopled and of great traffique, whereby he made himselfe fearfulfull toall the Coasts of Italia and Spain. So as the Emperour was daily importuned to dislodge him from thence, who gaue Conditions proposed to the Lantzgrau.

Prince Philip takes possession of the duchie of Brabant.

The Emperour facilitates King Ferdinand to recover the dignity of the Romans for his son Philip.

The Germans begin to grow discontent with the Emperour.

A league betwixt the Princes of Germany and the French King against the Emperour.

The Emperour flies to Pilsna for fear of Maurice.

The Duke of Saxony and the Land-graue set at liberty.

Metz besieged by the Emperour.

Three French Armies against the Emperour.

Affrick, a Town in the Realme of Tunis taken by the Spaniards.

charge to Don Iohn de Vega, Viceroy of Sicilie, and ANDREW DORIA, to gather an Army together with all speede for this action, who came in Iune, one thousand five hundred fifty two, with 54 Gallies well man'd with souldiers and mariners, and landed neere to the towne of Affrick, but they first attempted Ministeria a little towne neere it with a good Castle, the which DRAVOT had fortified with a good Garrison of Moores, and Turkes, the which they hauing battered in the end, after a long defence they took it, all the Turkes being either slaine, or taken prisoners: Then they turned towards Affrick, the siege whereof they found to be of greater difficulty, it being inuironed on three parts by Sea, where they could not easily batter it, and the fourth side vpon the Land, was very well fortified, yet they planted their Cannon against a raelin and made a breach which the Spaniards entred with great courage and resolution: but there being no diuision made by the Gallies, as it was ordered, they were oppressed by all the forces of the Towne, and repulst with great losse, the which did much afflict the whole Campe, there being small hope in this siege, for the Moores and Turkes were growne proud, and in the Campe they wanted both men, munition and victuall; but sending to Genoa, they were supplied with 1200 Spanish foote from Milans, and the Duke of Florence, and the State of Genoa, fortified them with munition and victualls.

DRAVOT was resolu'd to relieue them by Land, hauing gathered together many Moores, which he ioyned to seuen hundred Turkes, who making often attempts, did much annoy the Christians: But in the end, hauing lost many of his men in a furious skirmish, he despaired, and retired himselfe to Gerbe; after which they concluded to make three batteries, one by Sea, and two by land, where hauing made sufficient breaches, they came to the assault and took it, the Turkes hauing defended it very valiantly: In which Towne (some write) there were 10000 prisoners taken; it was afterwards to be razed by the aduice of the Emperors Council, being held a place of great charge, and not guardable.

1555
An assembly to treat of a peace.

After all the warres vpon the Frontiers of France and the Netherlands, betwixt the Emperour and the French king, they sent their deputies, who met in a Plain betwixt Ardes, Calais, and Graveling, hauing Tents set vp for that purpose, whither came Cardinal POOLS from England, to assist as a mediator and vmpier betwixt them: The demands on either side were so excessive, as they could not agree, and so the assembly proued fruitlesse.

The death of Queen Ioan the Emperours mother.

This yeer, on the ninth of May, newes came to the Emperour of the death of Queen IOAN his mother, in the Town of Tordesillas, hauing been alwaies troubled in her senses and distracted since the death of King PHILIP her husband, vntill she was 75 yeers old. This Princesse troubling herself infinitely for that she thought she was contemned and kept as a prisoner, this ambitious humour of command would not suffer her to take any rest; so as this sharp and violent humour of melancholy (which she had as it were by inheritance from Queen ISABELL of Portugall, her grandmother, wife to IOHN the second King of Castile) was continually augmented in her: her funerals was deferred vntill the coming of King PHILIP, who was then in England with Queen MARY his wife, who arriued at Brussels in September. At what time the funerals were celebrated with great pomp and state.

The Emperour signs his government to his Son K. Philip.

This yeer the Emperour performed an act, which bred admiration in all the World; for, being broken with the toiles and cares of the World, and willing to free himselfe of so great a burthen, he renounced the absolute Government, with all the titles of those Realmes and Estates, except the Empire, in the which his brother FERDINAND was to succede. And to this end he called all the Knights of the order of the Golden-fleece to Court, in whose presence he pulled the Coller of the saide order, from his owne neck, and put it about his sisters; saying, I doe now make you Soueraigne of the noble order of the Golden-fleece; and maintaine it in the like dignity that I my Father, and predecessors haue done. Then turning to the knights he said, Prince my sonne, these are the faithfull seruants, which haue been the support of my Empire, by whom I haue ouergone many perils and dangers, and therefore I haue loued them dearly. If you doo the like, I assure my self they will carry you the like affection and obedience: but if you intreat them otherwise, they will be the cause of the ruine of your estate; wherefore loue and honour them.

On the twenty fift of Nouember, all the States being assembled in the great Hall at the Palace of Brussels, the Emperour came thither, being accompanied by the King his sonne, Queen MARY the Regent, with many other Noble-men; whereas the Queen caused all men to depart, of what degree soeuer, but such as were called to this solemn Act.

The Emperour, King, Queene and all the deputies being set according to their degrees,

PHILIP

An Oracion in the States in the Emperours name.

PHILIBERT of Brussels the Emperors Orator, made a long speech to them in his Maiesties name; giuing them to vnderstand, that he had gouerned those his hereditary countries long, and had alwaies endeouored to maintain the publike equite; that he had vndertaken many painful and dangerous voiaiges to come vnto them; that he had beene carefull to gouerne them with iustice, to maintaine their rights and priuiledges, and to doe all other things whereunto a good Prince is bound; All which he held well employed, being done for such faithfull, dutifull, and obedient subiects. But his age and the weakenie of his bodie making him vnable to vndergo his forperall toyles, he was resolu'd to giue ouer that burthen and to commit it to another; who might continue as he had begonne; and so retire himselfe into Spaine, from whence hee had been long absent, the climate being more agreeable to his health then any other; wherefore he resolu'd to substitute in his place, his deere and only sonne, and their Lord and lawfull Prince, to whom they had giuen their oath; his maiesty knowing well, that the king his son was not only sufficient to vndergo the charge, but also had a will and a desire to imploy himselfe for the good of those countries: wherefore his Imperiall maiesty trusting that they would like thereof, and that for the loue of him, they would willingly accept in his place the king; their Lord and Prince; he did then glue ouer those Countries, and resigne them into his sonnes hands, intreating them earnestly to receiue him willingly and cheerefully. And accordingly he did freely acquit and discharge them of their oath of fealty and homage, that they might take the same vnto their king at the reception of their estates and offices.

His Maiesty did also intreate them to take in good part the affection which he had shewed by the effects, hauing omitted no traualle nor care belonging to his dutie, confessing withall that they had been good and loyall subiects, and had assisted him faithfully and dutifully. He vied many words more, admonishing them of diuers things which concerned their estate. After which speech the Emperour began to speake vnto them in French, saying;

The Emperors speech vnto the States.

That he had forty yeers fine in the same place beene emancipated by the Emperour MAXIMILIAN his Grand-father, and put in possession of those Countries; since which time he had runne through many fortunes, and endured much as well in Spaine, touching the affaires of Queene IOAN his mother, and the gouernment of her kingdoms, as in his other estates: he shewed also how many troublesome, long, painefull and dangerous voyages he had made in passing and repassing the Seas, as well into Spaine as into Italie, to the great perill of his person; namely in the voyages to Barbary, Tunis and Algier; he shewed also into what daunger he had willingly thrust himselfe, passing through France, to preuent the troubles which were like to grow in the Nether-lands, which he euer had in great recommendation. And as they had alwaies been to him louing subiects and faithfull vassalls; so he intreated them to be the like vnto his sonne, into whose hands he had resigned those Countries. In speaking of which words he shewed such passion, as sighs interrupting his speech, the teares trickled downe his cheekes; which moued many to the like compassion: hauing made a little pause, he tooke his Spectacles, and looking vpon a remembrance which he had in his hand, he said that his sight and memorie were not so good as they had been, and that he felt himselfe to decline, and grow weake hourly, vnable to endure the traualle that was requisite for the preservation of the Countrey and of them all, the which did moue him chiefly to returne into Spaine, and not to prolong his life, the which he referred into the hands of God. Lastly, he intreated them to continue in the Christian Religion, as they had done, and to obserue iustice. After these words, the king kneeling downe before his Father, said vnto him that he was vnworthy of so great fauour: but seeing it was his Maiesties pleasure; he humbly thanked him, accepting the charge, protesting to be so carefull to gouerne his Subiects with iustice, as he hoped they should rest satisfied with him, referring to make manifest by his deedes the loue which he bare them: And turning to the assembly; he spake in French, saying; I would, my Lords, that my skill in this language were more then it is; to the end I might make you the better vnderstand what affection I beare you; but for as much as I cannot expresse it in such tearms as were fit, the Bishop of Ayas shall speake for me; who rising vp, deliuered the Kings minde at large: which being ended, King PHILIP retired to his seat. After which, Doctor MAREVS an eloquent Orator, deputed to that end by the States, made answer to the former speeches, saying; that they knew well his Imperiall Maiesty had for many yeers gouerned that estate carefully and religiously; that he had vndergone great and many toils in many accidents; that notwithstanding his Maiesties great and vrgent affaires; yet he had alwaies carried a fatherly loue and affection to those Countries of his inheritance, whereof the people had tasted the fruit whensoever they stood in need: all which duly considered, dered, they found that his Majesty was well aduised in that which he had propounded. And therefore the Nobles, Prelates, and Deputies of Townes there present (although it were a sword which did wound their hearts to hear of his Majesties departure, yet desiring to conform themselves in all things to his good will and pleasure) did humbly thank his Imperiall Majesty for the great honour and fauour he had done them; euerie one being very ready to consent irrevocably to the said Cession or resignation made by his Imperiall Majesty of all those Netherlands to the behoof of the King there present, whom they did acknowledge for their naturall Lord and Prince, the lawfull sonne and only heire of his Imperiall Maieity, being ready to renew the oath which they had formerly made vnto him, with all other duties requisite in the like case: and so, after thanks giuen, he ended his speech.

The Deputies answer to the Emperour.

During this action, Queen MARY of Hungary, the Emperors sister, and Gouvernesse of those Countries, rising from her seat, said reuerently to the Emperor, that she had euer endeavoured to govern those Countries in such manner as she thought most expedient for his Majesties benefit and the publicke good: but if peradventure, according to his desire and her good intent she had not attained thereto, she humbly besought his Majesty to pardon her. To whom the Emperor, both with his hands and his countenance, made great shew to be well pleased: and then she, turning herself towards the States, vsed in a manner the same words which shee had done to the Emperor.

After all these speeches, the Emperor by a publike Act resigned to his son K. PHILIP the Kingdoms of Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, Maiorca, Minorca, the Indies, and all others depending vpon the Crowne of Spain, reseruing onely a small yearly reuenuer for the maintaining of himselfe and a few seruants. The next morning the Deputies of the Duchy of Brabant coming to Court, King PHILIP in their presence renewed the oath which he had formerly taken in the year 1549, to keep, maintain and preserue them in their ancient rights, priuiledges and customes, without breaking them, or suffering them to be broken in any sort whatsoeuer. And the Deputies of the chief Towns of Brabant did also take the oath of fealty and homage to him, as to their Lord and Duke of Brabant.

About this time there ended an Imperiall Diet held at Ausbourg, where king FERDINAND did preside in the Emperors name; in the which, after much debate, it was concluded, that neither the Emperor, King FERDINAND, nor any other Prince, or State should doe wrong to any of the Empire, in what sort soeuer, by reason of the cession of Ausbourg; that from thenceforth they should not force by edict or other meanes, the allies of this cession, to abandon their Religion; but should suffer them to enioy it freely with their goods, rights, and possessions, with many other priuiledges, granted in fauour of their Religion. It was thought that the Pope was wonderfully discontented with this decree, and that he did sollicite the Emperor to disannull it. Before the Act of the Emperors resignation, he gaue instructions to his sonne PHILIP, touching the government of his person and estate; the which being very long, would take vp too much roome in this Volume; but I will only make mention of the reasons which moued him to this resignation, who speaking vnto him, said:

I haue resolu'd deer sonne, to come to the point of resigning into your hands, the absolute government of all my Realmes and estates; wherefore my pleasure is, that against the morning you giue order for the performance of this Act, with all due Ceremonies: you shall giue order with speede, that all Governours, Magistrates, and all other persons, acknowledge you for their superior; that all persons (except the subiects of the Empire) take the Oath of allegiance: the more rare this president is, the greater are the signes, both of my loue to you, and of the assurance I haue of your good inclination, and also of the great care I haue to see your estate settled. I could deferre this Act (as most Princes doe) vntill my death; but hauing a desire rather to imitate the smaller number of Fathers in this point, I haue chosen willingly by this Act in my life time, to make my selfe a superior, rather than a companion to any. It is a weak trial of the valour and resolution of a Prince, to subdue kingdoms by force, in comparison of conquering himselfe, being not only content to bridle all ambition and desire of Rule, but to submitte himselfe to a certain kinde of obedience: Against this course, sensuality doth strive with all her force, and in exchange of all worldly satisfactions, which are enioyed by the prerogative of absolute authority, setteth before our eyes the rigor of the Lawes; to which (Princes setting their authorities aside) must leuell all their actions, as well as priuate men. To blinde our vnderstanding with like veiles, the same sensuall consideration stirreth vp, by way of admonition, a prouident forecast of diuers inconueniences, wherinto many fall, which haue made them-themselves subiect to the will of other men, by the diuersity of their conceits and censures, the which by the corruption of the care of priuate interest, are apt to swarue from the right rule of integritie. It may be that some will be terrified with this common supposition, that Princes which are once possessed with authority, may resigne it at their own pleasures, but they must resume it at the pleasures of other men: yet fatherly loue and affection hath preuailed more with me, then all these worldly considerations, and dutie also in some sort; for, finding my selfe now aged (which may be accounted greater, in regard of my sickly estate) my satiety of glory in this World, and wearinesse of royle; finding moreover that by my continual trauaile vnto this day, I could not satisfie in any part the dutie which belongeth vnto the profession of a Christian; I finde my selfe enflamed with a most earnest desire to free my selfe from so many troubles and incombrances, and then retire to a more religious kinde of life, and more fit for a Christian. On the other side the consideration of your age being now ripe, and fit for government, together with the expectation which you haue gotten in the World, by managing the greatest affairs of Spain with great iudgement, moue me now the rather to proceed in my resolution. Being incited with all these good considerations, I haue thought it fit to lay this wayty burthen vpon your shoulders, and to ease mine owne, which time and trauaile haue now weakened and disabled. I doe confidently hope, that the subiects of all my countries, shall haue cause to thanke God first, and then me for this resolution, in respect of the gracious vsage they shall receiue at your hands, succeeding in my place: neither is it hurtfull vnto your selfe, that by this occasion, during my life, you shall settle your selfe more firmly in my Dominions. And so hee proceeded to his aduice and counsell, touching the government of his Estates.

After that the Emperour had resigned all his kingdomes vnto king PHILIP his sonne, and disposed of his affaires in the Netherlands, being desirous to free himselfe from all temporal cares, and to spend the remainder of his daies in peace, applying himselfe wholly to the seruice of God; he resolu'd to retire himselfe with his two sisters, ELENOR the French Queen, and MARY Queene of Hungary into Spain: But before his departure, he would also dispose of the Empire, the which he would resigne vnto his brother FERDINAND King of the Romanes, and to that end he wrote his Letters vnto the Princes Electors and States of the Empire, giuing them to vnderstand, that finding himselfe ouercharged with age, and continuall infirmities, which had disabled him for the managing of affaires; hauing long before resolu'd to resigne all his Realmes of Spain to the Prince his sonne, hauing taken leaue of the Court, being ready to imbarque with the first prosperous winde; and seeing that by his absence, the government of the Empire did of right belong vnto his deere and welbeloued brother FERDINAND king of the Romanes, of Hungary and Bohemia, as his lawfull successor in the said qualitie of King of Romanes, which government he had for many yeers well deferred in his absence, supporting the burthen with a brotherly loue and affection; wherefore lest the holy Empire should fall into some dangerous inconuenience, he had resolu'd that his said brother, king of Romans, should haue absolute and irrevocable power to treat, negotiate and command in all things that he should finde requisite and necessary for the greatnesse, prosperity and increase of the Empire, as absolutely as he himselfe being Emperor might doe; and for that he could not come vnto the Imperiall Diet at Ratisbone, there to haue resigned the government of the Empire vnto the king of Romanes, as he had intended; he thought it good by those Letters to acquaint them with his resolution, inioyning all men by his Imperiall authority to shew all loyalty and obedience vnto the King of Romanes, and to honour and respect him in all his commandements, and Decrees, without any contradiction, as they would doe himselfe, if hee were there in person.

After this, the fleet being ready in Zeland, he took his leaue of PHILIP his son, and of all the Princes and Noble-men: then he imbarqued with his two sisters, and arriued within fewe daies in Spain; where, after some daies rest, he retired to a Monastery of Saint Isidore the Hermite, in Esfremadura neer Placencia, an vnfrequented place, and fit for heavenly meditations, where he liued not about two yeers, spending his time in holy and godly works. And the better to attend the seruice of God, he would haue his sisters to liue from him at Valledolit, that they might not trouble him. He reserued but 100000 crowns a yeer to himselfe, whereof hee employed 4000, for his diet and entertainment: the rest he disposed of, for the marrying of yong maids, and to relieue widdowes and orphanes, and for other works of Charity.

This

The words of Queen Mary to
the Emperor.

King Philip takes the oath as Duke of Brabant

Resolution of the Imperiall diet held at Ausbourg.

The Emperors
speech to his son.

The Emperor
writes to the princes Electors

The Emperor
departeth with his two sisters out of the Netherlands.

Diverse opinions touching the Emperors
nuptials.

This Act of renunciation, being one of the rarest precedents, that had bin seen for manie ages, ministred occasion vnto the world, to discoufure of the reasons that might induce him to deprive himselfe of so great a dignity. Some held opinion that his infirmity of the gowt being very grievous, and foreseeing that it would shorten his life, was the cause that moued him to that resolution. Others said that he did it vpon discontent, seeing himselfe bearded and ouermatched, by HENRY the French king: and some affirmed that to auoide the crosses of fortune, which (by the relation of certaine Astrologians) he knew would befall him, he with great iudgement resolved to retire himselfe before it should in that sort obscure the brightnesse of that glory, which he with so much toile had gotten. There were also some which said that fortune began to frowne on him when as he made his retreat to Vienna and went to besiege Metz: so as some commending and others blaming his resolution all did censure diuerfely thereon.

THE
LIFE OF FERDINAND,
ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND SIXTEENTH
ROMAN EMPEROR.
(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

His present life of the Emperour Ferdinand, containeth his country, his parentage, his education, and where he was brought up; how he became Lord of Austria, Bohemia, Hungary, and Transilvania; his warres with Iohn Sepulchus, the taking of Buda; with the siege of Vienna; when he was created King of the Romanes, his agreement made with the said Iohn, the difference betweene Friar George and him; the often coming of Soliman into Hungary; the Insurrections in Germany against the Emperour Charles the Fifth; the displeasure of Pope Paul the Fourth, threatening of Maximilian King of the Romanes; his conuersation and behaviour, and the children which he had by his wife Anne, sister to Lewes King of Hungary.

Among many Townes worthy respect, in the Kingdom of Toledo in Spain, it is certaine (as it appeareth by the Chronicles thereof) that Alcala Henares in ancient time, euer hath beene, and still is, one of the chiefe; wherein besides the men of singular valour which in time past haue liued there, in the yeere of the incarnation of the sonne of God 1503. vpon the tenth day of May, in the same yeere, FERDINAND of Austria of that name the first Emperour of the West, was borne; whose father was PHILIP the first of that name, King of Castile, and sonne to the Emperour MAXIMILIAN: his mother was IOANNE, daughter to FERDINAND and ISABEL, King and Queene of Spain, who by reason of the vnexpected sodaine death of his Father (which hapned in the yeere 1506) remaining vnder the tutelle of his Grandfather FERDINAND (commonly called the Catholike.) was by him (by means of the ex-cellencie of his wit, besides the exercise of Armes) carefully instructed, in diuers languages; principally in the puritie of the Latin tongue; wherein, in short space he profited so much, that to the great admiration of all men, he procured a most active Knight in Armes, and a perfect Orator in the Latin, Dutch, Spanish, Italian, Hungarian and Bohemian tongues; so as all men did prognosticate him to proue a Prince of singular valour: and this made him the more accounted of, for that by all men generally which knew them, he was likened to FERDINAND the Third, who by force took Seuil from the Moores, from whom by his mother, he descended. That FERDINAND for his many vertues, was no lesse numbered amongst the noblesse, then reputed happie amongst all the Kings of Spain, for being father of King ALONSO, who for his rare knowledge in Sciences, was furnished the Sage: who in the long schisme of the Empire, in the yeere 1528, being by the greatest part of the Princes Electors of the Empire chosen Emperour; by the perswasion of Pope GREGORY the Tenth, for the common quietnes of Christendome, voluntarily resigned, and gaue vp his right, after that he had enioyed the name of Emperour the space of sixteene yeeres, approouing and ratifying the successeful election of ROBERT the First of that name, from whom from father to sonne this FERDINAND lineally descended.

cellencie

This FERDINAND being brought vp in Spain, vnder the Catholike King, was for his rare qualities so much beloued by the Spaniards, that his brother CHARLES in the yeere 1520. remaining (through the death of his Grandfather FERDINAND, which happened in the yeere 1516.) heire generall of the kingdoms of Spain, of both the Sicilies, of the West Indies, of Burgundie, and Austria, and in the yeere 1519. through the death of his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN, chosen to weare the Imperiall Diadem, was by those which (tumultuously mutinying vnder the name of the holy assembly) rebelled against his brother CHARLES, by reason of the vnmeasurable oppressions laid vpon them by his polling officers, instantly requested and entreated to make himselfe King of Spain; whereto not consenting (much more esteeming the preservation of his faith, by refusing those estates, then the greatnes of them, by violating the same to his eternall infamie) with singular integrity of minde, he not onely refused their offer, but vied all meanes possible to retaine those kingdoms in his brothers subiection: for which, he was euer after entirely beloued by him. Who returning into Spain, in the yer 1529. not onely reconfirmed vnto him the donation of the Archduchy of Austria (the ancient patrimonie of their family) made ouer to him by testament, by their Grandfather MAXIMILIAN, by his brother CHARLES his consent, to whom as to the eldest sonne it did appertaine; but he also freely gaue him the Countries of Stiria, and Carinthia, with the Counties of Tirol, Salzburg, and Hassia; hauing first in the Diet at Wormes, declared him (to the good liking of the Princes Electors) his Lieutenant, and Imperiall Vicar in Germany; whither, within a while after this graunt, going in the yeere 1521. hee was honorably receiued by the Germanes; and as Vicar of the Empire, was with great magnificence, met by all the Potentates: where making no long abode, he went to take possession of his dominions, to the great good liking of that people.

In the same yeere he celebrated his contracted nuptials, with ANNE sister to LEWES king of Hungary and Bohemia; renewing the oaths sworne in the yeere 1515. betwene his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN, and LADISLAUS father to King LAVRES; which were, that LAVRES dying without issue, FERDINAND, or any other begotten by him, and his said sister ANNE, should succeed in his kingdom. But either through the iust wrath of God kindled against the manifold iniquities of the Hungars; or what other occasion I know not, the two brothers in-law had scarcely enioyed the beloued fruit: of the established succession two moneths, but FERDINAND being molested by the instability of fortune (seldome constant in prosperity) was aduertised that SOLIMAN Emperour of the Turks, being victorious, hauing subdued GAZELLES in Soria in the yeere 1516; and also for that his father SELIM, had in three seuerall battailes, with incredible fortune, first ouerthrowne CAMPSON, and some after TOMORBY, Souldanes of Egypt; GAZELLES giuing place to fortune, and voluntarily yeelding himselfe into the power of his victorious enemy, was with great fauour receiued into grace: so that notwithstanding that the Empire of the Souldanes was extinguished in Egypt, yet he hauing liberty was made Gouverneur of Soria (not without much murmuring of the Turkish Captaines, his Lieutenants in that country). Neuertheless GAZELLES in the yeere 1519. being certified of the death of SELIM, thinking himselfe now discharged of the oath of fealtie which he had sworne vnto him onely (without any mention made of his successors) and therewith earnestly desiring to requie the ancient dominion of the Souldiers,

Egypt taken by the Turks.

The birth of Ferdinand,
when, and who was his father.

This Tabell together with her husband Ferdinand
drewes the Moore out of Granada out
don. 1492.

levied the greatest forces of Mamalukes, Arabians, and Syrians that he possibly could; with which, rebelling, he made himselfe Lord of sundry Cities in Soria: against whom in the yeere 1520, SOLIMAN sent FARAAZ Basha with a great Army; who fighting with him neere to the City of Damasco, GAZELLES being slaine in the battaile, he obtained a notable victory, which happened in the end of the yeere 1520. FERDINAND (as I said before) advertised that SOLIMAN putt up with pride by reason of his victory, refused to make warre in Hungary; where through the negligence of King LEVVS, and want of reliefe from the Emperour CHARLES, or his Lieutenant FERDINAND, the Turkes (making sundry roades and incursions into the Country) in the end besieged, battered, and tooke the strong City of Belgrade, in ancient time called Zaurinum, situated in Angularis Ferme, between the rivers Sauus and Danubius, the which was held the buckler of Christendome, and in the time of MATTHEVV King of Hungary, it had been twice assaulted in vaine by MAMORT his great Grand-father, and AMVRATH father to the said MAHOMET, and now by the negligence of King LEVVS, who did not relieue it in time (although he were much importuned thereunto by FERDINAND) after some moneths siege, it was forced by SOLIMAN, and a great slaughter made of the Christians.

But FERDINAND as it seemeth taking more care to suppress LEVTHERR'S doctrine, then for the defence of Hungary against the Turkes, in a Councell held at Norimburch, vpon grievous penalties, prohibited the reading of the Bible, which LEVTHERR had translated; but yet LEVTHERR neuertheless being countenanced by IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony published his booke, wherein he toucht all the Romish Princes of Germany, but chiefly FERDINAND. Hereupon FERDINAND summoned a Councell to be held in Ratisbone in the yeere 1523, whither from Pope CLEMENT the seuenth, who succeeded ADEIAN the sixt, came Cardinall LAWRENCE CAMPREVS, to procure (although in vaine) the suppression of LEVTHERR'S doctrine. About which matter FERDINAND hauing spent the yeeres 1523, and 1524, had intelligence that SOLIMAN after the taking of the Isle of Rhodes (which he vpon composition entred vpon the fift and twentieth day of December, being Christmas day, in the yeere 1522, after that it had been by the Knights of the order, held and valiantly defended against the whole forces of the Infidels, for the space of 214 yeeres, from the yeere 1280 at which time it was taken from the Infidels until then; and after that it had been now besieged the space of sixe moneths, in which time the Turke lost the greatest part of his Army; for besides those which were slaine at the many assaults which were giuen, about 30000 died of the sick) threatned to bring greater calamities vpon the Christians: among which a man would haue thought, the long troubles of the former wars, in the yeere 1525, would haue ended. For the imprisonment of FRANCIS the first King of France, who by the Emperours Captaines, vpon the foure and twentieth of February in the same yeere, was taken at the battaile of Pavia, made most men to thinke that the Emperour would not haue released him, without an assured peace with France; by which means, he might not only haue been able to haue performed any great attempt, but also haue made frustrate SOLIMAN'S desires. But as men in future accidents are most commonly deceiued in their opinions, so the affaires of the Christians fell afterwards into farre worse teermes; for the most part of the Christian Princes being moued against the Emperour, either through griefe for the French kings aduersitie (a Prince for the worth of his person, and the greatness of so flourishing a kingdom highly esteemed) or else for feare of their owne particular interest, doubting that he would haue aspired to the absolute Monarchy; the state of Christendome came to be so confused and out of order, especially in Italie, that mens iudgement proued not only vaine, but the troubles continued a long time after.

Italy being by reason of the warre betweene CHARLES the fift, and FRANCIS the French King miserably afflicted, the one enuying the others greatness, most of the Princes and states in Christendome were by the one or other (to the great enfeebling of the whole Christian Common-wealth) drawne into the action; which SOLIMAN the great Turke perceiving, was thereby encouraged with an Army of two hundred thousand men to invade Hungary; into which (hauing Belgrade) he had an open passage, thinking withall that he might easily oppress the young king of Hungary, who was ill obeyed in his kingdom, by the discord of his Barons; hauing also small experience in the art of war, by reason of his young yeeres. King LEVVS, who in regard of his tender age, was but weak of iudgement and terrified with the fame of so powerfull an enemy, sending in vaine to all places for succors; hee called a Diet of Hungarians, which was according to their custome of armed men, who were bound to assist him in the wars. The Nobility of Hungary (who had neuer seene the campe of a Turkish Emperour, but had only encountered them in light skirmishes) despised the Turkes in such sort, as they bragged vainely, that if they came to fight they would cut in pieces huge Armies of Turkes: Among the which PAVL TOMORRVS Archbishop of Colossa shewed himselfe most vaine, assuring himselfe confidently of the victory, bragging that he would be the first that should charge the Turkish troupes with his lance. The King had not in his Army about 26000; and yet TOMORRVS would needs presse him to fight: whose presumption all men of iudgment condemned; and the old soldiers said that it was the part of desperate men, to ioyne battaile with such an enemy who had neuer eight times as many fighting men in his Army: wherefore some were of opinion that the king should retire himself, and STEPHEN VEREBSITS General of his Army perswaded him to go into the Castle of Buda; but the obstinate soldiers opposed, saying that they were not to fight vnlesse the King did lead them: TOMORRVS prevailed, and the king refused to go and meete the enemy: yea, TOMORRVS madnes was such, as he would not stae for IOHN SEPVSVS gouernour of Transilvania who marcht with an Army to ioyne with the king. The Armies ioyning, the Hungarians were in halfe an houre ouerthrowne. And the poore king seeing his whole Army in rout, thought to saue himself by flight; but passing through a marshy fenne, his horse falling, he was smothered in the mud, there being not halfe a foot of water: his page escaped and obserued the place, so as many daies after the enemies retreat, the Kinges bodie was found, and buried in Alba Regalis. After the victory it is said that SOLIMAN wondred at the beastly humor of the Hungarians; and that the kings Counsellors should be posselt with such madnes, as with so small forces to encounter so great an Army. Hauing seene the pictures of the King and the Queene his wife, he was grieved (he said) for the disgrace of that young king, who hauing had such foolish counsellors, in a matter of such importance, had grossely made halfe to ioyne battaile; adding withall that he came not into Hungary to deprime him of his kingdom, but to reuenge the wrong done him by the Hungarians; and if he had escaped from the battaile he would only haue imposed a tribute, and restored him to his kingdom: and that he would haue held it a glory to haue preferred one who was son to a brother of SIGISMUND King of Poland his friend, and so strictly allied to the Noble house of Austria: which words he deliuered with great maiesty. This battaile was fought in October 1526.

For the infortunate death of King LEVVS, FERDINAND was very sorrowfull: for besides the losse of his friend and brother-in-law, he was advertised that SOLIMAN besides other places, without one blow striken, had taken the city of Buda; and that from thence, besides the most excellent Artillery which he found there, he had carried the statues of HERCVLES, APOLLO, and DIANA, most exquisitely made in brasse, and left there by the great MATTHEVV CORVINVS: and that with an infinite number of captiues and laden with prey and bootie, he was returned to Constantinople.

After SOLIMAN'S departure, King FERDINAND went into Bohemia, and there was crowned together with his wife, who a little before was deliuered of a daughter called ISABELLE, which afterwards was married to SIGISMUND King of Poland: and being in peace King of Bohemia, he challenged to be King of Hungary. But knowing that IOHN SEPVSVS Valiude of Transilvania, after the celebration of the sumptuous obsequies of King LEVVS, notwithstanding FERDINAND'S former election, aspiring to the kingdom, had made himself to be crowned King of Hungary; and at the same time had bestowed vpon those Lords which had assisted him in the action, the principall estates of that kingdom, to the end that being obliged to him for receiued benefits, they should not after their accustomed manner practise ought against him; FERDINAND made himself in Bohemia to be crowned King of Hungary, in the presence of Doctor STEPHEN, and other Hungarian Lords his friends, which after the death of King LEVVS came to see him.

After this coronation, FERDINAND hauing leuiad an Army, presently marched therewith against IOHN SEPVSVS: who by reason of the inequality, of their powers standing in some feare of him, departed from Buda, which after SOLIMAN'S departure was againe recovered by the Hungarians; and retired himself on the other side of the riuier Tysa, to Toccy, a place both by nature and Art very strong; where, sending to his friends in sundry parts for aide, he wrote two Letters, one to the Princes Electors, entreating them to giue no aide to FERDINAND against him: the other to the Emperour, therein exhibiting sundry complaints against FERDINAND. But FERDINAND pretending the kingdom of Hungary in right to be his;

Gazelles overthrown or slain by FARAAZ Basha 1520.

Belgrade taken by the Turke.

The Hungarians ouerthrowne by the Turke.

Death of Lewis king of Hungary.

John Sepulius Princes of Transilvania crowned king of Hungary.

Ferdinand in Bohemia crowned king of Hungary.

Solimán the great Turke entered Hungary with an army of 200000 men & the rest.

Ferdinand entering Hungary with an army against John Sepulchus, who had fled.

The battle of Törczy fought between John and Ferdinand, both pretending to be King of Hungary.

King John fled into Poland.

Stephen Viceroy of Hungary for King Ferdinand.

Pope Clement the Seventh released out of prison.

Marching forward, with his Army, without any resistance took Buda, and other principall places in that kingdom; and being unwilling to give his enemy time to recover heart and courage, he without any great difficulty, passing the river Tisza, upon a bridge made of boates brought thither for that purpose upon carts, went to seeke him at Törczy; and within sight of the castle making an Alt, made VALENT TYRAC General of his Army; who in the day of battaile diuided the Caualery of Stiria and Austria into two squadrons, in the midst between which he ranged his maine Battaillon, which of both the one and other Army, were Hungarian footmen. Which order when FERENC BODO, who was General of King JOHN's Army perceived, he marshalling his troups in the like manner, perswaded King JOHN with certain troups of choise horse, to withdraw himselfe to some place from the Army, where he might, notwithstanding any sinister accident, saue himselfe. After whose example PHIL BARCHIT a Seruan, one of the chiefe Captaines of King FERDINAND's Army, retired himselfe to a close place, a good distance from the Army, with a determination to charge his enemies in flanke. To be briefe, the two Armies ioyned in a battaile, wherein for a space the fight was very doubtfull: for the left wing of King JOHN's battaile charging the right of the Stirian horse, and gallantly overbearing them, had put King FERDINAND's people to rout, had not the men at Armes of Austria in rescuing them, with such furie charged the enemy, that they were constrained to retire fighting.

In the meane time the footmen, which of either side were almost all Hungarians, fought with such obstinacie, that it was hard to iudge whether partie should haue the better. So as, if BARCHIT with his troupe, which vntill then lay close in an Ambuscado, had not risen and suddenly charged at vnawares, FERDINAND (as the report went) had had the worst of the bargain; but BARCHIT giuing a fresh charge, BODO, notwithstanding that he that day, shewed himselfe no lesse a valiant Souldier then a prudent Captaine, often attempting in vaine to haue rallied his squadrons, being overborne by his enemy, was taken prisoner together with many other very excellent Captaines: and their campe being assaulted, their Ordinance and Colours were likewise lost; and the whole troups were so much disordered, that they running away, left all their baggage to the Austrians. Which when King JOHN perceived, he as fast as his horse could beare him, fled: and not holding himselfe in safetie in his owne countrie, he fled into Poland, where by IEROM LASKY a Noble-man of that countrie he was honorably entertained. And FERDINAND's Captaines entering Transilvania, all the countrie, together with what in Hungary held for him, without any resistance yielded to be at his deuotion. But forasmuch as BODO, vpon promise of liberty, would not renounce his oath made to King JOHN, and so beare Armes against him, he was by King FERDINAND's commandement cast into a dungeon, where of griefe and sorrow he died miserably.

After this victory FERDINAND made himselfe together with his wife in Alba Regalia, to be solemnly crowned King of Hungary by the Archbishop of Strigoniun, who forsaking King JOHN came to FERDINAND, bringing with him the Crowne of STEPHEN King of Hungary, which amongst the Hungarians was held in great veneration. Shortly after, FERDINAND leauing STEPHEN BATOR for Viceroy of that kingdom (to be assisted by the Bishop of Strigoniun) went to Bohemia, and thence into Austria, where vpon the first day of August in the yeere 127. his Queene bare him a son, who was christened MAXIMILIAN, and in proceesse of time coming to be Emperour was called MAXIMILIAN the Second. FERDINAND hauing so happily gotten the kingdom of Hungary, was very earnest with his brother CHARLES the Emperour to release Pope CLEMENT the Seuenth, taken prisoner by the Duke of Burbon General of the Emperours Army in Italy, the same yeere, vpon the sixth day of May, a fatal day in antient time in Rome; which he did to the end to auoide further cause of discontentment amongst the Christian Princes: for the greatnes of the house and state of Austria being growne odious and suspect to all Christendome, it seemed that by long detaining the Pope, the hatred and ill will conceived against it, would daily encrease: which reasons induced the Emperour after seven moneths imprisonment to set Pope CLEMENT at liberty, although vpon hard conditions.

King JOHN after the battaile of Törczy, being expelled his kingdom, fled as we haue said to IEROM LASKY, a Noble-man of great account amongst the Polonians, by whom he was most honorably entertained, with the consent of SIGISMUND King of Polonia, who notwithstanding their affinity was nothing pleased with FERDINAND's greatnes. To be briefe, IEROM LASKY counselling King JOHN to craue aid of SOLIMAN the Emperour of the Turks, went

John Sepulchus fleeth to the Turks for ayde.

Ferdinand's father the Duke of Austria, but in vaine.

Soliman with an Army of 140000. men entered Buda, &c.

Soliman's conspiracy to his purpose, put to the sword all the Souldiers in the Castle of Buda.

Vienna besieged by Soliman.

Solimans loss at the assault of Vienna.

went himselfe Ambassadour (King SIGISMUND winking therat) to Constantinople, where he so behaued himselfe amongst the Bassas, that SOLIMAN taking JOHN into his protection, with promise to restore him to his kingdom, proclaimed war against Hungary. Wherewith FERDINAND seeing himselfe destitute of sufficient forces to withstand the Turkish power, and that by reason of the war amongst the Christians, chiefly in Italy, he could not haue such aid from his brother the Emperour as the necessity of the cause required, he was much grieved: neither thelesse to cleere himselfe from blame, acquainting the Emperour with all matters, he sought means to obtaine of SOLIMAN (according as LADISLAVS and LEWES, Kings of Hungary had done) truce for some yeeres; and to that effect sent JOHN OBERDANSKY, a very wise man, to Constantinople; who after many practices could bring no other answer from SOLIMAN, but that if FERDINAND did not restore JOHN to the kingdom of Hungary, he would make him to know how much the Turks power was to be feared: with which answer, OBERDANSKY being driue out of Constantinople returned into Hungary, where relating SOLIMAN's proud answer to the Councell, he went to Spire to FERDINAND, who at that time was besieged at the Diet, about matters of Religion.

FERDINAND, vpon this answer, standing in great doubt of the Turkes forces, made all the piousition that the breuity of the time would permit: but the yeere 1529 being come, in the beginning of the Spring, SOLIMAN commanding his Bassas to draw his Forces to an head, came in person with 140000. men to Belgrade; where, by means of his favourite LEWES GRITTI, sonneto ANDREW GRITTI (at that time Duke of Venice) and of ABRAHAM Bassa, gently receiuing JOHN with many other Hungarian Lords, he againe promised to restore him to his Kingdom: wherewith JOHN being very ioyfull, with many his friends followed the Turkish Armie; which marching from Belgrade was already before Buda. Those in Buda being in extreame feare, presently yielded to SOLIMAN; who entering the City, fought with as great speed to haue had the forrest, guarded by THOMAS NADASKY a Captaine for FERDINAND; who valiantly resisting the enemy, was within few dayes (to the great reproach of Christian Souldiers) betrayed by those Germanes which FERDINAND left there in garriison: who perceiving that the enemy with Mines & other Military stratagems, sought to force the place, willing to provide for themselves, and to the end that NADASKY should be impeded vnto them, bound him; and then yielding to SOLIMAN, with their liues and goods saued, gaue up the Fortresse. Wherinto when the Turke came, knowing the treason of the Souldiers, and moved with a noble disdain, he presently set NADASKY at liberty, and made his Souldiers cut all those in pieces which had committed so shamefull a villany, making no conscience to break his faith with men so base and so unworthy to liue.

SOLIMAN hauing (without effusion of blood) gotten the citie of Buda, presently sent his Army towards Vienna in Austria; and coming before the same vpon the fix and twentieth day of September that present yeere, he besieged the citie in five parts, hauing first by the way taken Alteneburg and the five Churches. From thence with great speed he made his horse troups to pueruen the countrie as farre as Lintz, (many miles distant from Vienna); where doing much harme, and laden with bootie, and many prisoners, they returned to the campe, which being diuided into many parts, continually infested Vienna. The Count Palatine of Rhine, with many other excellent Captaines, being therein for the defence thereof in the behalfe of FERDINAND, used all means to frustrate the enemies attempts; who besieging the City by land, had intelligence that the Fleet which came vpon the River Danubius with great store of Ordinance to batter the City, was for the most part by WOLFRANG of Osse Governour of Pelson, beaten, and sunk in Danubius, which then was swollen extraordinarily high, by reason of much rain which fell at that time. Whereof when SOLIMAN was certified, he with the rest of the Artillery which escaped WOLFRANG's furie, so beat Vienna, vpon the fifteenth day of October, that he might but little so haue taken it: but he was repulled by the valour of those which had the guard thereof.

SOLIMAN lost at the assault in this one day thirty thousand Turkes, with many famous Captaines: who thinking with himselfe, that if he should haue the like successe in two other assaults, he should haue a small Army remaining; hearing withall that FERDINAND came with a great Army to succor them, and that he was not farre off, he resolved to retire from that enterprise, sending word vnto them of Vienna, that if they would yeeld, he would not enter into the City, and their goods should be saued, giuing them a perpetual exemption, for that he was not come to doe them any harme; but only to meet with FERDINAND, to the end the quarrell for the possession of the kingdome of Hungary by battaile : whereat, the people of Vienna made a scorn, so that the day following being the thirtieth day of the siege, he was constrained (after that he had giuen many fierce assaults) to retire with the losse of 80000 men, and the sooner, hauing intelligence that Ferdinand with a great number of Bohemians and Morauians came to the reliefe thereof. Which making him to doubt that his people being weakened with the wars, would be vnapt to make head against Ferdinand's fresh troups he resolved to raise his siege and to depart. And being departed with so great losse of his people, and hauing in vaine fought to allure those of Vienna to giue vp the City vpon composition, he went to Buda, where confirming King John King of Hungary, calling him his friend and vassalle, and leauing Lvves Gritti with him for his counsellor, he with a determination to return againe the next Spring with greater forces, leading with him about 4000 captiues, returned to Constantinople.

Shortly after Soliman's departure, Ferdinand came to Vienna: from whence aduertising his brother the Emperor of all what had happened, he tooke order for the reedifying of the City, which together with all the countrie round about was in a manner wholly ruined, and then shortly after returned into Germany, very ioyfull for the news of the peace, concluded between the Christian Princes, hoping that the Emperor being free from warres, would now haue suppressed Lvves's supposal heresie, which daily encreasing, was in such manner dispersed, that many Princes of that countrey were of his opinion; by reason whereof there was nothing but Councils in Germany concerning Religion: which to abolish was Ferdinand's chiefest care. But the yeere one thousand five hundred thirty, being comm, and Charles being with the Imperiall Diademe, by the Pope solemnly crowned in Bologna in Italy, vpon Saint Mattheus the Apostles day (an auspicious day to him) and afterwards going into Germany, and there celebrating the Amburg Diet, he took such order, that Ferdinand by the Electors (after some contradiction) was chosen King of the Romanes, who being crowned in Aken, and the Emperor being gone into Flanders to visite those Countreies, hee went for feare of Serviss to Vienna: for Serviss by the counsell of Lvves Gritti, daily incensed the Turkes against Ferdinand, who in the end of the yeere coming into Hungary, spoiled such countreies as held for him: but King John being desirous to bring those troubles to an end, he in such manner solicited Gritti to be an intercessor for him, that Soliman in the yeere one thousand five hundred thirty two, much displeased with Ferdinand, proclaimed open warre against Hungary; and coming shortly after thither with an Army of three hundred thousand men, he committed such spoiles in the countrie, that more could not be done. Which Ferdinand vnderstanding (who at that time was with the Emperor at the Diet at Ratisbone about matters of Religion) was greatly troubled: and hauing no sufficient power to resist the Turkes forces, imploring aide of all the Potentates in Christendome, he (by the Emperors means) obtained some of the German Princes: and the Emperour causing a great number of his footemen to come into Germany, resolved with the assistance of other Christian Princes, in person to ioyne with him; particularly with the aide of Pope Clement the Seuenth, who with nine thousand men paid, sent his Nephew the Cardinal Hippolito de Medicis, with all the succours that possibly in time of such discord (especially between France and Italy) could be gotten. And in such sort the matter was handled, that the Emperour and his brother Ferdinand hauing ninety thousand footemen, and thirty thousand horse, taking their way towards Vienna, resolved to fight with Soliman, who proudly reiecting Ferdinand's Ambassadors sent to treat with him of a league, he with such furie assailed in many parts, such places as held for Ferdinand in Hungary, that he did infinite harme; for besides the delolation of townes, he in person with great furie bent his forces against the City of Guinz: The charge of which siege, was giuen to Abraham Bassa, Captain generall of the Turkes Army, who vnderstanding that Nicholissa (a man well knowne to him) was Governour within the Towne, he sent to perswade him not to hold so weak a place against him, promising him all honest conditions: but Nicholissa, who was a souldier, hauing resolved either to die or winne honor in that seruice, answered him courteously that he could not doe it: whereupon the place was battered many daies, and valiantly defended, but the Turkes had no great Ordinance, Soliman giuing it out that he came only to fight a battaile against the Christians, and therefore had brought none but field peeces.

Abraham, seeing what difficulty there was to force this place, he draw Nicholissa to

to his Campe vpon a safe conduct: where hauing much commended his valour, he laid before him the great danger wherein he was, if he attended the great Ordinance which was neere, perswading him by the friendship that was betwixt them, to yeeld him the place, the which he must for his honour take. The gouernor seemed to esteeme his words little, telling him that his garison was strong, and that he had many Germanes and Spaniards within the place, who would not accept of any accord: but through the importunity of Abraham, he suffered some few Turkes to enter, to giue him some satisfaction for his honor, and so Guinz was brauely defended against this mighty Army: and Abraham retired to Soliman's Campe, from whence he dismissed Ferdinand's Ambassadors, to whom he wrote that he was come into Hungary, to reuenge the wrong done vnto John his friend and tributary, and that he would be soone with him to giue him battaile: wherewith he was not much troubled.

Lvves Gritti (left in Hungary with Serviss after the siege of Vienna) likewise assailing Strigonium, and making incursions by his Captaines into the countrey, did put the Hungars in such feare, that many of them abandoning their houses, retired to the Christians Army lying intrenched without the walles of Vienna; whither it was thought that Soliman in the end would haue come: but he failing of his purpose to get the City of Guinz, and fearing the Emperors fortune; after that he had harried the countrey, and taken many prisoners, retired to the other side of the Riuer Mura into Carinthia; and from thence leading his Army in great disorder, and with dishonor to Belgrade; and there not holding himselfe fully in safety, hee shortly after went to Constantinople, being first greatly annoyed by the Christian Cavallery, which then did followe his Campe to Belgrade, and did often fall vpon his rewerd.

Soliman being departed out of Hungary, Ferdinand vsed all meanes to draw the Emperour to attempt the recovery of Buda; but for as much as he could not perswade him to stay in that Countrey, he obtained of him to leaue the Italian foot-men, together with Cardinal Hippolito there in Garison, against the Turkes: but they vnwilling to stay any longer, mutinying, by the perswasion of one Marke de Volterra putting themselves in order, in a great rage returned into Italy: with which their departure Ferdinand was so discontented, that coming to a composition with John Serviss, he granted him during his life, peaceably to enjoy such part of Hungary as then was at his deuotion; by reason whereof the wars for that time being ended in Hungary, Ferdinand bent his forces against the Lantgraue Philip: who being an enemy to the house of Austria, induced Vlrich Duke of Witemberg (assisted by Francis the French King) to take Armes against Ferdinand, for the recovery of his estate taken from him by the Emperor, and giuen to Ferdinand at the Diet at Ratisbone; in which action the Duke so valiantly behaued himselfe, that to Ferdinand's great losse and preiudice, he recovered his Duchie: in whose behalfe sundry Princes in Germany carried themselves so towards the Emperor and Ferdinand, that they permitted the Duke peaceably to enjoy his estate: Yet vpon condition, that from thenceforth the Duke should neuer take Armes against Ferdinand or the house of Austria.

After this peace, Ferdinand received Letters from Lvves Gritti, importing a request, which was, that if Ferdinand would be content to permit Gritti during his life to enjoy the Kingdome of Hungary, he would so deal with Soliman, that hee should confirm the same after Gritti's decease to Ferdinand and his heirs: which his demand, refused by Ferdinand, did much offend Gritti, who had been sent into Hungary by Soliman who fauoured him very much; so the end hee might assist John Serviss as his Protector, and haue a care of the confines of that Kingdome against Ferdinand and the incursions of the Christians; giuing him full authority both in peace and warre: Lvves Gritti parted in great pomp, Soliman hauing giuen him certain companies of Ianitories, with seven thousand other souldiers, bringing with him two Hungarian Captains his friends, who were in Soliman's pay; called John Doccia and Vahan Bacciano, with two companies of horse for his guard.

Being come into Transilvania, he made a publick proclamation, that as absolute Commissioner for Soliman he was come into that Kingdome to compound all differences. Amario Bishop of Farradine was Gouverner of Transilvania for King John Serviss, a Noble Gentleman, endued with many vertues, of great iudgement and generally beloved of the people; with whom he had great credit; who came not to meet and honour Gritti as he Soliman raised his siege from before Vienna.

Guinz freed from the Turkish Army.

Soliman came into Hungary with 200000 men.

The Emperour Charles lost the wars against the Turkes in Hungary, 1526, so to war against Christians in Italy.

Lvves Gritti sent by Soliman into Hungary.

thought he was bound, representing the person of SOLIMAN. JOHN DOCCA, one of his Hungarian Captains hated this Bishop of Varradine, of whom hee had spoken much euill in their voyage, and that he was in secret a capital enemy to SOLIMAN and all his ministers, whereof hee had alwaies shewed effects, speaking much of his haughtinesse and pride: And GRITTI, seeing the Bishop stay long before he came vnto him, did easily beleue his malicious suggestion, who being of himself proud by nature, and very glorious, desired to be honoured at his first entrance into the Kingdome: whereupon, he grew much discontented with the Bishop, which DOCCA perceiving, hee thought it then time to bee reuenged of AMARIO, telling him, that he should neuer gouern wisely during this mans life, offering to go and kill him, or to bring him bound: whereto GRITTI consented. AMARIO was then vpon the way to meet with GRITTI, marching softly with 12000 men to do him honour: for, the season of the yeer was very hot, which caused DOCCA to breed more ielousie in GRITTI, saying, that he came for no good intent with such forces: whereupon he grew into choler, and gaue him order to go and do the effect, so as taking with him some companies of horse, he came in the night to the Bishops Tent, his people lying scattered abroad, and cut off his head. Then going to horseback, hee returned and presented it to GRITTI, whose choler being now past, and he better aduiled, repented the fact. The Bishops Tent with some others were spoiled by the Turks; and his people rising at the noise, found him dead, and vnderstood the manner: so as he being greatly allied in that Country, many of the chief Barons conspired against GRITTI, and resolved to be reuenged for that Noble Prelate: for whose death all the Transiluanians were so much grieved, that they ran generally to Arms without calling; so as in an Instant there was an Army of neer 40000 men, horse and foot. GRITTI hearing hereof, retired himself to Mega, into which he was receiued with some difficulty, where he meant to defend himself. The Army coming, the multitude ran rashly to giue an assault without battery, but they were repulsed with losse. MAIALATO (who was Generall of this Army, and a great friend to AMARIO) resolved to take it by siege, knowing they had no store of victuals. GRITTI seeing no succours come, both for that the Turkish Captains which liued on those frontiers, excused themselves that they could not leaue their charges without expresse commission from their Generall, who was farre off; and King JOHN (who hated him much, both for that he was come to be his competitor in the gouernment of the Realm, as also for his great cruelty committed vpon his Gouerner, and so worthy a man), in words made shew that he would assist him, and began to leuie ment to send him; but they came not in time.

GRITTI seeing himself thus abandoned, and all things desperate, fell sick and had recourse to the Moldauians who were in the Camp, intreating them to receiue him and his sonnes into their Quarter; which, PETER, their Prince promised: so as, coming forth at a little Port the next night, he was encountered by MAIALATO and the friends of AMARIO, who laying hold on him, they led him to the Generals Tent, where they caused his head to be cut off by a hangman; his children were taken, and (as some think) were secretly put to death by PETER, the Moldauian. DOCCA (who was the cause of this foule fact), was tormented and cruelly slain, with most of the Turks. Some write, that when as the hangman stript GRITTI, he found in his breeches a bag of iewels, to the value of 100000 crowns: His death of GRITTI was pleasing to many, especially to FERDINAND, for that he might now with more facility contend against King JOHN, his enemy, being no more supported by him.

After the death of GRITTI, King JOHN entered into Transilvania, and within fewe daies became Lord thereof; but being still molested by FERDINAND, he was forced to succor SOLIMAN for aid; who, hearing of the miserable death of GRITTI, was much displeased: but being certified that KING JOHN had no hand in it, and supposing that King FERDINAND had been the author, he sent MAHOMET, ATAGOLI, an old expert fouldier and wise, to defend the Frontiers of King JOHN against FERDINAND; who being very diligent, had in short time taken many places, ioyning with the Sangiac of Bosna, FERDINAND being unable to resist him for his many hinderances. Among others, they took a Castle in the Province of Pozsac called Esfecchio, very commodious for the passage of the Riuer of Draua, to enter into Hungary, the which he fortified very well, and manned with a good garrison: from whence he made incursions into FERDINAND'S Countrey, notwithstanding that there was a truce betwixt SOLIMAN and him, made before the coming of GRITTI, whereby he was content that JOHN SAPYSIO should be called King, and enioy that which he held, during his life. FERDINAND seeing the spoils which the Turks made, and being importuned by his sub-

subiects, he drew an Army together of eight thousand horse, and sixteen thousand foot, and gaue the charge of Generall to JOHN CATTIANIER an old fouldier, who had won much honour at the defense of Vienna; and the Earl of Ladron was Generall of all the foot. This Army marching towards the enemy, being much staid vpon the way by their great Ordinance, they began to growe in distresse for victuals, their Commisaries failing them; yet being a little supplied, they marcht towards the enemy, their foot companies being much decayed: so the younger men cried out to fight; whereto the Generall CATTIANIER consented: so as they marched neer vnto the enemy lying at Esfecchio, where there passed many skirmishes betwixt the two Armies.

The Turk, seeing the Christian Army in great distresse of victuals, would not suffer his soldiers to go out of their Camp: wherefore the Commanders consulting together, they resolved to rise and march to Ermano, a Castleten miles off, whereas MAHOMET had drawne together much victual, the which they thought would satisfie their hunger; but hauing yielded, they found little corn and some wine, which would not suffice the Army two daies: wherefore they resolved to passe the riuer of Bedrego, and to go to Valpiano, where they heard there was great store of victuals. The Turks pursued them, and annoyed them continually with skirmishes, and the Christian Army grew into a general amazement. At night the Captains went to counsell, to consult what course they should take, and which way they should go. CATTIANIER was of opinion they should part that night towards Valpiano, a place of safety not farre off, where was store of victuals to refresh the Army, giuing order for the troops to march away at midnight: but there fell out great disorder, diuersle troops going away vpon the first watch before the word was giuen, euery company taking his owne way. CATTIANIER hearing this, was much amazed, and thinking that all the troops had taken the same course, he went away vnarmed and without his baggage. They write, that these unfortunate newes being deliuered to the Earl of Ladron (who slept, being oppressed with toil and watching) he returned to his rest vntill that some of his Captains awaked him, assuring him that their Generall was fled: wherewith this valiant man being troubled, he stood for a time in doubt, and could not beleue that a man practised in so many wars, and who had neuer yet deserved the name of a base coward, should with so great impiety do an act contrary to his honour. Then calling the Captains and chief of the companies together, he comforted them, and exhorted them either to dy gloriously, or to winne perpetuall honour by the victory: and being intreated by them all to take charge of the Army, he gaue order for their march, that they might recouer Valpiano if it were possible. Being ready to march, at the break of day they discovered the enemies troops, with whom they continually maintained skirmish, and continued their march: but being oppressed still with fresh troops of Turks, hauing lost many men, the footmen being tired with fighting, and almost dead with hunger, they were in a manner all cut in pieces. Count LODOVICK, being fore wounded, retired himself into a narrow lake adioyning, with three companies that remained: being oppressed with his hurt, and intreated by the Turks to yield, hee submitted himself.

MAHOMET, growne proud with this victory, sent the Earl of Ladron's head, and many of the chief Captains, with a great number of their noses which were slain, vnto SOLIMAN. FERDINAND, hearing of this unfortunate successe, was wonderfully grieved, considering that it hapned by the basenes of his Generall, and other fugitiue Captains who were growne a scorn both to women and children. CATTIANIER, hearing hereof, wrote to FERDINAND, that he vnderstood his honour was much blemished in Court by his aduersaries; desiring, his Majesty would be pleased to giue him a safe conduct to come to Court to iustifie himself; the cause of this great ruine proceeding not from him, but from the Commisaries who had not according to their duties brought victuals to the Camp. FERDINAND granted his desire, and CATTIANIER came; but he had such cold entertainment from the King and the whole Court, that he repented his coming. He spake much in his owne excuse: but not able to defend his going from the Army, and hauing giuen no signe to depart, the rest were slain, euery man called him a base Traitor. FERDINAND hauing committed him to custody to punish him as he deserved, fearing with the losse of his honour, his life would bee in question, he made an escape by night, and fled to MAHOMET; who receiued him kindly, promising him great entertainment if he would bring Austria vnder SOLIMAN'S command: the which hauing promised, he parted and went to NICHOLAS SADRINIO, a man of great power in that Country, seeking to drawe him to serue the Turk: but NICHOLAS, hauing giuen him

Ferdinand
sends an Army against the Turk

The flight of Cattianier.

The Christian overcome by the Turks.

The death of the Earl of Ladron.

The Bishop of Varradine slain
by order from Lewis Gritti.

The death of Lewis Gritti.

The Turks enter into Hungary.

him good words, flew him. Having cut off his head, he carried it to FERDINAND, making an ample relation of his wicked designe: for the which the King honoured him much, and rewarded him with the estate of CATTIANBR.

Peter, Prince of Moldavia, was constant and faithful.

About this time 1538, PETER gouerned in Valachia or Moldavia: he was nephew to DRACOLA, who had made the league with King MATTHIAS against AMVRATH. This PETER although he were a Christian of the Greek Church, yet was he a man of an ill disposition, faithlesse, inconstant, greedy of spoil, and without any conscience, to make his owne estate great. He was Tributary to SOLIMAN: but he carried himself so, that when any occasion was offered whereby he might annoy him for his owne good, he had no respect so as hee might do it covertly, or haue any colour to excuse it. He had friendship with King JOHN, and likewise with FERDINAND, and yet he laid wait to murder them. He assaulted FERDINAND'S Camp traitorously, neer to Brassovia: for which, King JOHN gaue him great thanks, thinking he had done it for his relief. PETER (who neuer took Arms but for his owne profit) growne proud by that former victory and the artillery which he had taken, soon after he invaded Transilvania, took many places, and spoiled the Countrey. King JOHN sent to expostulate with him, why he did him wrong vnder the colour of friendship; requiring restitution. The Moldavian answered, that he meant to be his friend; whereof he had giuen him good proof when he relieved him against FERDINAND. And if hee had made vse of VESTRICK, it was to secure CIZOUIO, against whom FERDINAND had a practice. He invaded the confines of Poland often: but at the last he was encountered by JOHN Earle of Tornau a valiant Captaine who fought with him, and ouerthrew his Army, and took forty peeces of Ordinance with FERDINAND'S Armes; he himselfe was wounded and fled into his countrey. King SIGISMUND was importuned by his subiects to make warre against him, and to ruine him, the which he would not doe without SOLIMAN'S leaue, being his tributary; who at that time hated PETER much, for that vpon his faith, LEVVS GRITTY had gone forth, and was slain, and also he had murdered his innocent children with great cruelty. And moreouer he paid not his tribute due.

Soliman hated Peter, Prince of Moldavia.

They write, that SOLIMAN took this request of SIGISMUND very kindly, shewing him such respect: to whom he made this answer. That he knew well the defects of the Moldavian, but it did belong to him as well to punish his seditious and wicked tributaries, as to defend the good; and soon after he entred Valachia with an Armie, but PETER fled out of the countrey: whereupon SOLIMAN made STEPHEN his brother, Prince in his place; and then returned, freeing both King JOHN and FERDINAND from the fear of his Armes. PETER being fled into Cizovia with his wife and children and chiefest treasure, King JOHN (who hated him very much) went to besiege the place; which being very strong, and well furnished with men and victuals, continued foure months, vntill that he had withdrauue the Transiluanians who were his subiects: whereat PETER being amazed, and seeing the danger, yielded himself and the place. King JOHN (who was pitifull by nature) although he knew his treacherous disposition, yet had he compassion of his miserable state, and received him courteously. Soon after, SOLIMAN wrote his Letters to King JOHN to send PETER to Constantinople: to whom JOHN made an humble relation in what manner PETER had yielded, and that he had promised him his life; beseeching him, that, as he was a Noble and generous Emperor, he would not suffer him, being his vassall and tributary, to fall of the faith he had giuen to that wretch, promising so to keep him as STEPHEN should haue no cause to fear. But SOLIMAN was not so satisfied, sending sharper Letters for him; and King JOHN, fearing to incense him, resolved to send him; but in such sort, that SOLIMAN, being a generous Prince, should bee forced to vse him with all clemency: and therefore being well accompanied, hee wrote, that he had sent him as an Ambassador, not as a prisoner; recommending him much. SOLIMAN vpon his submission, and the faith which King JOHN his friend had giuen him, was moued to mercy, and confined him onely to Pera. STEPHEN his brother, who reigned in his place in Moldavia, began to growe odious to all his subiects for his couetous disposition and cruell extortion of money; whereupon they slue him, which gaue good hope to PETER to recover his Countrey again: but the Nobility made choice of a young man called ALEXIVS, of the same house of DRACOLA. But soon after, those Noble men which are called Boiari, who made choice of him, cut off his head, and sent it to PETER, who was vpon the confines with an Army of Turks, to restore him into his estate; who by degrees put all those traitorous Boiari to death.

Peter restored to his Countrey.

In

In the beginning of the yeer 1538, DEVEL'S ASSEMBLER (a man of great account in Bohemia) seeing the negligence of SUPVSIVS his people, gathered together certain companies of foot and and horse; and going towards the Countreies guarded by the Turks garrisons, particularly to the City of Treacy, situate on the other side of the river Tissa, there hauing easily surpris'd those which had it in guard, in fewe houres took it: and hauing almost sacked it, he went through to the Citadell against a Squadron of the Turks horse; who vnderstanding of the surpris of Treacy, came to relieue the garrison: and coming to blowes with them, hee so distressed them, that they were constrained to retire; whereupon, returning to the City, and making an end of sacking it, loaden with the spoil, and hauing gotten certain peeces of artillery, he returned: whereat FERDINAND greatly rejoycing, bestowed many gifts vpon him. The Emperor, the Pope, and the Venecians being ioyned together in league against the Turk, he was comprised in the number of the confederats, in the yeer one thousand five hundred thirty nine. FERDINAND helping his brother the Emperor to suppress the Cantois, which rebelled against him, and tired with the continual warres of Hungary, he came to an agreement with King JOHN vpon condition, that each of them should continue in possession of what he held in Hungary, and that JOHN should freely enioy the title of king: and if that JOHN should haue no heires, that then the kingdome should fall to FERDINAND and his heires: provided alwaies that king FERDINAND should conceale this agreement from SOLIMAN, of whose displeasure JOHN stood highly in feare.

The matter was not so secretly handled, but that SOLIMAN had full notice of all their agreement. Whereupon being angry with JOHN, he often times charged him with ingratitude; and had it not been for his friends, and (that which did more import) the waite with the Persians, he had without doubt troubled him for it: who either for feare of SOLIMAN, or vpon some other occasion, being a while after displeased with FERDINAND, he took to wife ISABEL, the daughter of SIGISMUND King of Poland; who within fewe months appearing to be with childe, induced him to seeke to driue STEPHEN MALATO and BALASSO out of Transilvania, both gouernors of that Prouince: the one of which, which was MALATO, notwithstanding that he knew that SOLIMAN deadly hated him; yet he sundry times instantly sued to haue been by him crowned King of Transilvania: whereof JOHN being aduertised by SOLIMAN himselfe, who hated traitors and treason wonderfully; he sent to king JOHN the Letters which MALATO had written, blaming him for his carelesnes, to haue giuen the gouernement of his Prouinces to so faithlesse a man, exhorting him to repaire it, and to be more aduised hereafter when he should haue any occasion to make choice of the like gouernors: And to MALATO (whom he hated for the death of LEVVS GRITTY, and the Turkes which were slaine with him) he gaue a fowre answer, more by his countenance then his words; MALATO seeing himselfe rebuffed by SOLIMAN, and his treachery discovered to King JOHN, he entred into practice with King FERDINAND, who easily entertained it, by means of THOMAS NADASKY, brother in law to MALATO: who being receiued into FERDINAND'S protection, were assisted by him against King JOHN; but neither of them being of equall power to him, they were constrained, the one which was BALASSO, to retire himselfe; and the other being in Megess (a most strong place) was by King JOHN'S souldiers besieged: but King JOHN vnderstood that his wife Queen ISABEL in the meane time whilest he was about Megess had borne him a son.

During this siege, King JOHN lay at Sabin, being fallen into the relapse of a former sickness. The Captaines of the Army whom the King fauored most (being but a daies journey off) came to him to reioyce with him. Vpon this happy newes of hauing a successor to his kingdom, the king would needs be brought forth of his bed vnto the banquet, where eating more then was fitte, in the regard of the feuer which had neuer left him, his stomack hauing no strength to digest it, he fell againe into a feuer, whereof he died. By his testament (contrary to the Accord made with FERDINAND) he left his sonne heire to his kingdome, giuing him for tutors PETER VICENYO his kinsman, whom he had left for his Viceroy in Buda with the Queen; and Frier GEORGE Bishop of Varradine a man very faithfull and wise, vnder the protection of SOLIMAN. Who being nobly born in Croatia, after some time spent in the seruice of King JOHN, became a Monk in Buda, where hee had not long remained, but waxing weary of the Monastical life, he retaining still the habit, went out of the Couent, and returned to the seruice of JOHN in Polonia: to whom (being expelled his kingdome by FERDINAND, and remaining with IEROM LASKY) he did many seruices of importance; so as being very highly highly respected by him, he created him after the recovery of Transilvania, and the rest of Hungary, Bishop of Varadin; and at his death, left him together with the Queen (mother vnto the child) Governer of the Kingdome: who in the year 1540, compounding with MALETO, in the name of the Queen refused to stand to the agreement made between JOHN and FERDINAND; and temporising with him, leuied certain companies of horse and foot: and to the end to be in the more safety, suing to SOLIMAN for aid, as to the Protector of the pupill, hee together with the Queen and the yong King retired to Buda: wherewith FERDINAND being highly offended, and therewith hoping to recouer that Kingdome, he leuied an Army: and in the mean time, sending Ambassadors to SOLIMAN, hee offered to giue him that tribute which King JOHN was wont to pay; but he first perswaded Queen ISABELL, that she contenting herself in peace to enioy Transilvania, should resigne the rest to him, according to the agreement made between him and her husband. But seeing that hee could obtain neither the one nor the other of his demands, he sent LEONARD VELSCH one of his Captains, with a great number of men of war, to molest the Queen. VELSCH, entering the Countrey of the yong King, went from Strigonium to Visegard, which he took without any difficulty; and hauing taken it, staid there certain daies to refresh his Army.

Then passing the river Danuby, and with the like celerity hauing taken Pesthe and Vaccia, he presented himselfe before Buda; wherein VALENTINE DYRAC (who in former time had serued FERDINAND) lay then in Garrison. This DYRAC to his great credite, without standing VELSCH defended the City, vntill that constrained by the Turkish souldiers, sent by the Saniaque of Belgrado to the reliefe of the yong King, VELSCH retired to Visgard; where hauing in few daies space taken the Citadel, and garrisoned it; in the name of King FERDINAND; and wintred his souldiers in the same place, without any molestation by the Turkes, vntill the end of that year: in the year one thousand five hundred forty four, the Turkes took the field with such furie, as hauing suddenly taken Vaccia, they sundry times attempted Pesthe; where being resisted by the valour of the defendants, they departed, fearing that FERDINAND's Army (which being much increased, was come to make head against them) would haue defeated them, whose assaults they could not so well auoid; but being in ill plight, they lost many of their Arierguard. By reason of which good successe, FERDINAND hoping to haue taken Buda, gathered together 40000 men, which he sent vnder the conduct of WILLIAM ROCKENDOLPH, a Captaine of great worth, to take that City. ROCKENDOLPH comming thither, gaue many attempts: but being euery valiantly repulsed by the besieged, he saw that by assault he could not take the City, he therefore resolved to try what he could doe by siege: and besieging it round, he so kept victuals from the City, that had not FRIER GEORGE vied great diligence, the City doubtlesse had yielded. Neuertheless ROCKENDOLPH with words and threatnings frustrating the deuices of some seditious persons, continued the siege, till it was freed by SOLIMAN.

The Queen, being thus distressed in Buda, sent her Ambassadors to SOLIMAN to craue aid; who calling them into his presence, said vnto them, that hee had inuested King JOHN in that Realme of Hungary, the which should passe to his heirs; and that hee would, his promise should hold perpetually, as long as the heirs should remain obedient to him, and perform that wherunto they were bound: wherefore he confirmed his vassall and tributary. STEPHEN the pupill, giuing to the Ambassadors the Ensignes of the confirmation of friendship with the Infant; which were, a round shield, an iron mace with the handle of gold, a Semitar with a scabbard enriched with iewels, and a long robe of crimson veluet and gold; saying, that by those Ensignes which he sent him, he took him into his protection. These Ambassadors being thus happily dispatched, LASCO, sent by FERDINAND, arriued, and demanded the inuestiture of that Kingdome for him, with an offer of tribute, shewing the agreement which hee had made with King JOHN; but he could not be heard: and for that hee did often name the Emperor CHARLES, magnifying his power, SOLIMAN disdaining it, caused him to be put in prison. SOLIMAN vnderstanding that Buda was in great distresse, sent MAHOMET Basha with many men of warre, and a great quantity of victuals, to the reliefe thereof; promising to follow himself in person, as within fewe daies after hee did. Which so much troubled ROCKENDOLPH, that they forced him to retire into the Ile of Comer: for MAHOMET hauing victualled Buda, and being incamped within sight of FERDINAND's Army, after many skirmishes he so much prouoked his enemies, that they ioyned with him in battell; wherein, after sundry accidents, ROCKENDOLPH being ouerthrowne, was constrained to flee; and many of his Captains were taken prisoners. And MAHOMET Basha, sending to visit the yong king and Queen mother, perswaded her to hope well of SOLIMAN the great Turk; who, coming from Adrianople into Hungary, shortly after came to the Camp, bringing with him a great number of souldiers, with a resolution to free himself from troubles, and wholly to put FERDINAND out of all hope euer to recouer that estate.

SOLIMAN being come neere vnto Buda, he sent vnto the infant king three goodly hoiftes, with their furnitures of gold, set with iewels, and three Royall Robes of Gold, and to euery Hungarian Baron a Robe with a chaine of Gold: by his Ambassadors he sent word vnto the Queene that she should send the child with those Barons, vnto the Campe, excusing him that he came not to see her, being not the custome of the Otomans to see women in another house; neither would he in respect of her honor (being young and beautifull, the daughter of a King his friend, and the wife of his confederate) that she should goe into his campe. The Queene (they say) was much amazed, fearing for her son: but FRIER GEORGE perswaded her to send him speedily, least she should shew any distrust of that great Emperour. Being brought to SOLIMAN's pavillion he embraced him louingly, the Hungarian Barons were honoured, and dined with the Basha; but in the meane time SOLIMAN had giuen order, that some of his captaines (making shew to visit the city) should seile vpon a port and draw in their men; the which they did before it was discovered; whereupon they disarmed the citizens, and lodged their troupes, but with great modestie and shewes of friendship.

SOLIMAN being aduertised that the city was at his command, he sent the Infant back vnto the Queene, but retained five of the Barons, which were FRIER GEORGE, PETER VICCHIO, VALENTINE STEPHANIO, VERBESIO the head Chancellor, and VREAN BASHIAN who had the guard of the city. The Queene seeing the city taken by fraud, and her Barons deteyned, sent humbly to intreate SOLIMAN that he would not blemish his great name of clemency and magnanimity, but obserue the faith giuen; and send back her faithfull Barons, who had alwaies deserued well of his greatnes and of the Turkish name. SOLIMAN was three daies in counsell touching this action. Some perswaded him to put the Barons to death and seile vpon the whole state. But ROSTAN Basha his son-in-law whom he fauored much, was of a milder disposition, aduising him to restore vnto the Queene the city and the Barons, and that SOLIMAN being a iust Prince should not vniuilly take from that poore pupill his kingdome, seeing that the father was his tributary and the Queene had offered it for her sons; that he should remember he had taken the Infant into his protection, and had confirmed him in that Realme with the vssuall ensignes and ornaments, the which if he should now take awaie, he should purchase himselfe perpetuall infamie with the world, to haue by fraude vsurped the Realme of a poore pupill, who had recommended himselfe vnto him, and had been confirmed by him; giuing many other reasons to the like effect. SOLIMAN took a middle course, sending word vnto the Queene, that she should part from Buda, for that he meant to hold it as a Bulwark against FERDINAND; and that she should go and raigne at Lippa beyond the river of Tisus; that he would receiue nothing of that kingdome, but his ordinary tribute, and defend the city and castle at his owne charge, whereupon all the Barons were sent back, but VALENTINE whom she could not obtaine by any suites; yet he promised he should haue no harme, and withal he assured that the yong king should be no sooner able to gouerne, but he would restore what soeuer belonged to him and was in his power.

The Queene departed from Buda to Lippa with her son and all her Royall furniture, accompanied with all her Barons, except VALENTINE, cursing the infidelity of such a Tyrant, and repenting in her hart, that she had not accepted the conditions offered by FERDINAND, to giue the prouince of Sepuska, and other places which he had taken, where she might haue liued with more quiet of minde, then to haue her son king of the whole Realme, subiect to so perfidious a Barbarian, as she might doubt howeuer he would deprime him. She said that this happened for her sins, to haue rather trusted in the friendship of a ciuel Mahometan then in a Christian King; who was milde, iust, and of the same faith: but she durst not discover her thoughts. FERDINAND hearing of the defeat of his Army; in fear of some greater losse, being allso sorry for the losse of Buda, a place of great importance for the defense of Christendome, he resolved to send Ambassadors presently to conqueering SOLIMAN, with conditions of peace, who were dispatched vnto him with very rich Presents, and falling down the river of Dinnow, they came to the Camp lying before Buda, and were honourably entertained by ROSTAN Basha, and brought into the presence of SOLIMAN: to whom they deliuered their Amba-

The city of Buda, taken in the power of Soliman.

The Queene departs out of Buda.

Conditions proposed by Ferdinand to Soliman.

sage, requiring in the name of FERDINAND; that he would grant him the Realm of Hungary for the same tribute which King JOHN had paid; promising to satisfie the Queen in the behalf of her son, shewing also that the said KING JOHN moved in his conscience, who told him he had no title to that Kingdom, having vniuſly vsurpt it, had promised it him after his death; whereof they produced the contract: by reason whereof, FERDINAND made war.

After two daies pause, SOLIMAN gaue answer to the Ambassadors by ROSEY, that hee was content to giue peace to FERDINAND whensoever he should restore the Forts, Cities, and places in Hungary; and for that he had been often prouoked to war, and spent much, yet he would impose no other penalty, but the payment of a small tribute yearly for the Arch-duchy of Austria, and that he should quit his pretensions to Hungary; threatening that if FERDINAND did not accept of these conditions of peace, he would not fail to take those places by Arms which were vniuſly vsurped. The Ambassadors said, that FERDINAND could not resolve to accept of these conditions without the priuity of the Emperor his brother, and therefore they craved some time of truce that he might write to him, and receive his answer. But SOLIMAN knew well that their designe was onely to win time, to the end that winter might approach, and the war be deferred; assuring himself, that FERDINAND would neuer accept of such unreasonable conditions, and therefore hee would not grant any truce. After twentie daies stay at Buda he retired to Constantinople, having giuen charge to the Sanguac of Belgrade to make an incursion into Austria, and to put all to fire and sword; and hee commanded CAÇON General of the Adventurers to spoil Moravia; but God had compassion of his people; for there fell such abundance of rain, that they could not do any thing to annoy the Christians.

This yeer 1542, King FERDINAND lost Marano, a place of great importance, and a Port of the sea vpon the Adriatick Gulf, neer to Aquilugia and the confines of the Venecians: it was treacherously surprisid by BELTRANIO SACCIA of Vienna who pretended to be a great friend vnto the gouernour, promising to bring him two barks of corne, whereof the Castle was in want: by which colour he brought in diuers fouldiers and became master of the Castle, and put the gouernour his wife and sonne in prison: but soon after, SACCIA himself was shut out of the Castle by his companion TURCHETTO da Neme, and forced to flee to Venice. It was besieged by FERDINAND'S forces which lay at Gradisca and thereabouts. TURCHETTO did pretend to hold it for the French King, sending to PETER STROZZI (who was then leuying of men for the King) to send him some troops. FERDINAND, being aduertised hereof, caused men to be leuiet in the County of Tirol and the bordering places, for the recovery of Marano, sending also a little Army of Barks, besieging it by sea and land. Having after a long siege reduced the Castle to extremity for want of victuals, in the end there appeared certain Venecian Gallies; who gaue the Commander to vnderstand, that they should depart from thence, for that the Segnory of Venice had bought the place of the French: and so the Venecians entred presently, and it was yielded vnto them.

The Emperors Ambassador complaining hereof to the State, they answered that they had bought Marano (that is to say, the circuit as it stands in the water, not meddling with the firm land) to auoid a greater scandall, the French King being else resolved to deliver it to the Turk; which they hoped FERDINAND being a wife Prince would not take in ill part. And thus Marano continued in the hands of the Venecians, and doth to this day.

This yeer 1543, there was a great Assembly of Princes and Noble-men at Noremberg, where they conferred touching the aiding of FERDINAND in his Turkish warres; soas they had drawne together from the Noble-men and free Cities 30000 foot and 7000 horse, all Germans. GERRARD HASSIUS commanded the foot, and THEODORIC VOFANGO the horse; and IOACHIM Marquess of Brandenburg was General. Coming to Puenza, the Gouernor of Stiria came to them with ten thousand horse; and ther were almost 15000 Hungarians on horseback, vnder the command of PETER PERENO, who had alwaies commanded the old bands. The Councell being now assembled at Trent, King FERDINAND sent his Ambassadors thither to demand aid: whereupon Pope PAUL sent him 3000 foot commanded by ALEXANDER VIARELLI and SPORZA PALEVICINO; and fearing the Turke he had great forces on the frontiers, before commaded by the Marquess of Marignian.

The Army being assembled at Vienna, they marched in good order along the banks of the river of Danaw, and went to besiege Pestaneer vnto Buda; where were many encounters and skirmishes, with great losse of either side, but especially of the Turks. The Towne was battered, and a furious assault giuen by the Italians and the Hungarians; but in the end they were rerepulst with the losse of 700 men. It is written by VILLOA, that vpon their retreat a lanizary cried vnto them in the Italian Tongue, saying, You valiant Italians, retire and saue your selues, and let come those cowardly Durch-men: for, we desire to drawe the wine out of their heads, and to giue you all possible respects. After this repulse, the Commanders and Councell hearing of the coming of ACCOMAT Sanguack of Belgrade, and winter growing on, they refused to retire the Army, and returne to Vienna, much against the will of the Hungarians, the Marquess of Marignas and Viella; who perswaded them to batter it again the next day without giuing any assault, to the end it should not seem that the amazement of the former dayes success had made them depart: which done, they withdrew their artillery; and the Armie marched away in good order, being sometimes annoyed by the Turk, but still to their losse: and thus ended that shamefull enterprife.

At this time PETER PERENO, a Noble-man of Hungary, of great account, who had alwaies commanded the Hungarian horse, and done great seruice, being accused that hee practised to make himself King of Hungary, was by FERDINAND'S commission taken in the Castle of Strigenium by LESCANO a Spaniard, and giuen to MARIAN, who conducted him to Vienna, where he was put in prison, and could not be admitted to iustifie himself publicly. Which much discontented the Hungarians, seeing he was a valiant Captain, greatly beloued of them; som thinking he was falsly accused by such as were neer FERDINAND and enuid him.

FERDINAND, imploying himself to the affairs of Germany, vsed all means to hinder the meeting of the Princes of Germany in Smalcald, with the Ambassadors of the free Towns, who (as the same went) were assembled to the prejudice of the Emperor. Which for that he could not effect, he assaid to make peace between the Emperor and the French King, notwithstanding that both in the one and the other he found great difficulty: neuertheless, hee so handled the matter, that in the beginning of the next yeer they agreeing vpon sundry conditions, in the yeer 1544 the articles of peace were confirmed by them both.

In the beginning of the yeer 1545, FERDINAND sent his Ambassadors to the Councell of Trent, to the end that the disagreement in matters of religion in Germany might be reconciled according to the Emperors desire: but hee seeing the ill will which the Assembly at Smalcald bare to the Emperor, and that the same increased, by his Lettres hee perswaded each of them to quietnes: which perswasions taking no effect, the Emperor came from Flanders into Germany; where he obtained aid from the Duke of Bavaria, the Duke of Ferrara, and from euery Potentate in Italy some, but chiefly from Pope PAUL: who seeing that the warre should be waged against the Lutherans, countenners of his Holiness, sent him twelve thousand footmen and six hundred horse, commanded by his nephew OCTAVIUS FARNESSE the Emperors son-in-law, with his brother the Cardinall ALEXANDER FARNESSE, Legate à Latere for his Vncle the Pope. With which supplies, the Emperor having in the yeer 1546 and 1547 distressed his enemies, he restored the Duke of Brunswick to his estate; who from the yeer 1543, had by the Lantzgrau, and JOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, liued depriued of his duchy; and notwithstanding the promise made to Duke MAYRICK, assuring him that the Lantzgrau should be restored to his Countries; yet he neuertheless was likewise taken prisoner the same day that according to the agreement they spake together, soas Germany being in short space in quiet, Duke JOHN FREDERICK was depriued of the dignity of Elector, and together with many other Captains of the league committed to prison in the yeer one thousand, five hundred, forty seuen.

In the yeer 1545 SOLIMAN came again into Hungary with a great Army, sending to besiege Palponia, a Town belonging to PETER PERENO (who at that time was prisoner with FERDINAND) in the which his wife was, with a garrison of Hungarians: but hee yielded the place vpon good conditions, the which were duly obserued. After which, they besieged Sals, another Town belonging to this Lady; the which was valiantly defended, and many Turks slain: but being forced in the end by their continuall assaults to retire into the Castle, they offered to compound. ACCOMAT who commanded that Army, disdainig that so little a place should make such resistance, said, that he would accept of no other conditions, but discretion: whereupon, yielding they were all slain, to terrifie the rest. SOLIMAN being come to Buda, he sent to besiege Strigenium: in the which, SALAMANCA and LESCANO, two Spaniards, commanded for FERDINAND; the one hauing charge of the City, the other of the Castle: where, after many exploits of warre and assaults giuen, the Commanders began to faint, and resolved to yeeld (as it was thought) to saue the wealth which they had gathered together; which Solimans answer to the Ambassadors.

Marano treacherously surprisid.

The words of a lanizary.

The end of the war of Pest.

Petero imprisoned by Ferdinand.

Peace between the Emperor and the French King.

The Pope sent 12000 foot and 600 horse to aid the Emperor against the Protestants.

Ferdinand's preparations against the Turk.

Solimans comes into Hungary, Palponia taken.

Pest besieged, and the Christians are repulsed.

the souldiers discovering, cried out, that they might yet defend it valiantly; but they could not prevail: whereupon, the Town was yeilded to SOLIMAN, vpon condition to haue their liberties and liues.

From thence the Turks went to Tatta, a Castle neer to Gomora, the which was commanded by HANNIBALL TASSO of Bologna, and ANTONIO German, with a garrison of 800 men; who despairing to defend so small a place against so great an Army, yeilded it without fight, being sufficed to depart freely. The Earle of Tornello, who commanded in Gomora, put these two Captains in prison, and cut off TASSO's head, leauing ANTONIO to FERDINAND'S censure, who referred him to the same Sentence which Tornello had giuen of the Italian Captain: and so they died both of one death. Then the Turks went to besiege Alba Regalis; which they battered, and gaue diuerse assaults: but in the end it was yeilded to the Turks by the wilfulness of the Citizens, contrary to the will of the Commander and souldiers, vpon condition to haue their goods and liberties: the like was granted to the Italians and Germans, but not to the Hungarians; and they departed without the losse of any thing. After which, the Turk retired with his Army to Constantinople.

FERDINAND went against the Bohemians, which in the behalfe of the Duke of Saxony had rebelled against him: and being com into the Kingdome, after much resistance and apparant danger of his person, he at length got the Castle of Prague, wherein being entred, hee put the Bohemians in such fear, that notwithstanding the many difficulties, yet hee subdued them in such manner, that they yeilded themselves absolutely to his mercy. And so hauing accomplished this enterprize, he sent his eldest sounne MAXIMILIAN with certain gallant troops of horse to the aid of his brother the Emperor; and hee himself in the mean time neuer desisted, together with Duke MARYCIE, to trouble Duke JOHN FREDERICK. In the day of the battell beyond the Riuer Albis, he not onely assisted his brother with his forces, but with certain very good troops of horse came thither in person; where hee shewed himself no lesse a valiant man at Arms, than a most prudent Commander. After which victory, returning into Bohemia, he celebrated the obsequies of his wife ANNA, who in the beginning of the year died in child-bed: which obsequies he could no sooner solemnize, by reason of the wars in Germany, and the insurrections in Hungary.

FERDINAND, hauing ended the wars of Bohemia, and helpen his brother to suppress his enemies, in the year 1548, holding a Synode with the Emperor in Ausburgh, there were sixteen Institutions published appertaining to religion, with expresse order, that the same should be obserued till the dissolution of the Councell of Trent; which ordinance was called an Interim: wherein was contained what was commanded to be beleued till the determination of the said Councell. After which publication, the Emperor desirous that his son PHILIP, Prince of Spain, should be acknowledged by the Netherlands for their legitimate and naturall Lord, he married his daughter MARY to MAXIMILIAN Arch-duke of Austria, eldest son to his brother FERDINAND, to the end that they should make their residence in Spain vntill the return of PHILIP: and purchasing a dispensation from the Pope, hee publishing the nuptials, sent him into Spain, accompanied by the Cardinall of Trent, and the Earle of Mansfeld, and many other of the German and Bohemian Nobility. But first, before his departure, he obtained for him of his father FERDINAND the Kingdome of Bohemia, to the end that he should come into Spain with the greater dignity; where, as Gouverner of those Countries, he remained till the return of Prince PHILIP.

In the year 1551, FERDINAND receiued Letters from SOLIMAN the great Turk, wherein shewing himselfe discontent both with FERDINAND and the Emperor, for that Andræw Doria had taken the town of Africa from DRAVOT Ratis a Pirat, he protested, that if it were not redressed, he would cruelly reuenge the injury don to his Captain DRAVOT. Whereunto FERDINAND made answer, that for as much as Pirates were not comprised in the Articles of agreement, neither hee nor his brother were bound to anything. With which answer dispatching the messenger, in the month of May hee sent JOHN BAPTISTA CASTALDO into Transilvania, to assist Frier GEORGE against Queen ISABELLE who hauing in former time drawne great part of the Transilvanians to her deuotion, and sought to preferre that Province for her sonne, fell at open variance with the Frier: who, ambitiously desiring to continue his government, gaue FERDINAND to understand, that the Queen hoping by the Turks means to hold that Country, was again risen against him, and sought to driue him out of that estate: which for that he knew to be very preiudiciall to all Christendom, he had aduerted fed him thereof; therewith entreating him, that for the preferuation of the country, he would be pleased to relieue him against the Queens inuasions, which daily troubled him.

FERDINAND, induced by these reasons, sent (as before is said) Castaldo to the Frier: who as his Lieutenant General comming to Agria, leuied 5700 foote-men, and 1700 horse; with which passing the riuer Tissa, he went to Debrezen, where finding Andrew Batur, and Thomas Melaidi, principall Lords of that kingdome, he went into Transilvania: where hauing for the space of three months besieged Colofuarre in the behalfe of the Frier, he was aduertised that the Frier through a new composition with the Queen, hauing taken Alba Iulia, was retired from the warres; and that he had neuertheless sent him word, that if he would meet him at Egnet, he would speake with him. Whither Castaldo being come, after many discourses and treaties past between them, obtaining of the Frier the Citie of Alba Iulia to winter his people in; he had word from the Queen, that she would come to an agreement with FERDINAND, according to the covenants made with her husband: so that after many conuentions, comming to Colofuarre, whither were already come the most part of the Lords of that kingdome, ISABEL in the name of her sonne renounced, and gaue vp the kingdome and estate of Hungary to Castaldo, who in the name of FERDINAND accepted the same. After which renunciation, she granted to the most insatiable Frier all his demands, which were vnreasonable, together with the Archbishoprick of Strigoniun, being at that time voide. Castaldo accommodating that Province according to the order receiued from FERDINAND, and as he thought most expedient, celebrated the nuptials between one of FERDINAND'S daughters, and John, at the first called Stephen, the Queenes sonne. But the ambitious Frier, not content with the agreement, by the means of a Frenchman, who was a spie for the Turk in that kingdome, he acquainted Soliman with the whole agreement and composition made between FERDINAND and the Queen. Wherewith Soliman being highly displeased, shortly after sent the Beglerbey of Grecia; who passing with great celerity to Belgrado, came to Beche, and tooke it, with Bekerque and Senate: and hauing without any resistance, vpon composition taken Lippa, he went without any opposition made by the Christians, to Themeswar; where encamping himselfe, he understood that Castaldos Army was come. With much ado, he hauing induced Frier George, then made Treasurer of that kingdome, and Vauode of Transilvania, to leue forces against the Turk, he brought it so to passe that he constrained the Beglerbey to raise his siege from before Themeswarre; notwithstanding that the Frier euer endeouored all that he could to hinder Castaldos proceedings.

The Frier vnderstanding of the Turkes departure, went to Lippa; where he stayed not long, till by Pope Inlio at the request of FERDINAND, he was made Cardinall; yet he sought to crosse Castaldos designs, and to betray him and FERDINAND'S whole Army into the hands of the Turkes: hoping by this means, not onely to reconcile himselfe to Soliman, but to become absolute Lord of Transilvania. Whose wicked practice being made frustrate, Castaldo continued the siege of Lippa: which after many skirmishes and assaults, comming into Castaldos power, was giuen in prey to the Souldiers, who loaden with spoyle, presently besieged the Fortresse; about which hauing spent some daies, they had taken the same, together with Oliman Gouvernor thereof, if the Friers villany had not frustrated Castaldos purpose. Who desiring by these means to obtaine the Turkes good will, dealt so, that he set Oliman at liberty: where with Castaldo being infinitely displeased, sought to abate the Friers authority: but failing of his purpose, he dissembled the matter.

Winter being come, FERDINAND'S forces leauing Transilvania (he being vnwilling they should remaine there) stayed vpon the frontiers of the enemy. After whose departure CASTALDO conducting the Artillery into the kingdom, discovered to SFORZA PALLAVICINO that FERDINAND had commanded Frier GEORGE should be put to death; but being vnable, without great circumspection, to bring it to effect, he willed PALLAVICINO to be in a readinesse vntill he gaue him further direction. In the meane time repairing to the Citadel at Lippa, he stayed neere to Paradin: and sending his Army before, he ioyned with the Frier riding together in one Coach to Buise, in which place being againe solicited by FERDINAND to make away the Frier, CASTALDO speedily wrote to SFORZA PALLAVICINO that as soone as hee might, he should with his troupes come to conferre with him; about what course was to be taken in that business. Whereupon PALLAVICINO comming to Buise, and hauing laid the plot for the Friers dispatch, he went to seeke him iust at the time when he should haue said Masse: with whom CASTALDO holding a long discourse shew-Strigoniun taken.

Tatta yeilded to the Turks.

Alba Regalis taken.

Lippa taken by Castaldo.

Meanes used by Castaldo to betray Frier George.

Ferdinand's gaue Bohemia to his son Maximilian.

Castaldo sent to aid Frier George against the Queen.

ed him cher a good countenance, notwithstanding that he was in all occasions croft by him : and his infoleny was fuch, that he forbore not openly to negotiate with the Turkes. Whereupon CASTALDO directing thofe which fhould kill him, in what manner they fhould difpatch him; he appointed his fecretary MARCO ANTONIO FERRARI of Alexandria (vnder colour to get the Friars hand to certain Letters which SPORZA PALLAVICINO fhould beare to FERDINAND) to come to him, vpon the eighteenth day of December, the fame yeere. Who coming in the company of Pallauicino into the Caffe with certain Harguebuziers, and prefenting the Letters to the Friar, to the end he fhould fubfcribe them; after that the Friar had aduifedly read them, ftooping downe to write vpon a litle table which was in the chamber, Ferrari drawing his poynard flabbd him twice, which being of no fufficient force to kill him, it behoued Pallauicino (who vpon the noyfe ranne into the chamber) to fet his helping hand to the worke: for the Friar was a gallant ftrong fellow; who turning to him that flabbd him, threw him to the ground, and therewith made fo great a noyfe, that Pallauicino comming into the chamber and feeing Ferrari downe, fetting hand to his fword, gaue the Friar fuch a blow on his head, that he cleft the fame in two: an ad truly worthy of great reprehention, if the behaviour of the man had not deferved it. For Frier George was endued with fuch excellency of wit, and therewith was of fo generous a fpirit, and fo diligent in all matters of importance, that FERDINAND himfelfe (who caufed him to be flaine) would often lay openly, that he envyed the Yauode for nothing, but Frier George.

The Friar dying in this manner fuddenly, Cafaldo imprifoned his great friend Francis Thendi, who to efcape from FERDINAND'S forces, had after the Turkifh manner clad himfelfe in Scarlet, whole imprifonment was a great helpe to Cafaldo: for Thendi being reconciled, was the caufe that the Sicoli, a moft fierce people of Transilvania, yielded obedience to the King of the Romances; which people with others, through Cafaldo's endeuour, within fewe daies fubmitted themfelves. But in the yeer one thoufand five hundred forty two, Soliman vnderftanding of the death of Frier George, fent two Armies into Transilvania, to invade the fame in two feuerall places: where Cafaldo thinking by fortifying the frontiers, to enteraine the Turkes vntill the coming of an Army out of Germany, he fent Frier George treafure to FERDINAND; and taking Seghedine, had fundry fupplies from the Lords of that kingdom; and fortifying Lippa and Themeswarre he gathered thofe men together which (to auoide the rage of the Turkes) came to his Campe.

The death of Cardinall George bred great rumors and difcontents in Transilvania: the inhabitants being much affected to their King, imagined that the death of Frier George did not proceed of any treaty he had with the Turkes, but that FERDINAND taking away the dogge which kept the flocke, he might (as they faid) with more eafe afterward deuoure it: but in the Confiftory at Rome, they were much scandalized, and FERDINAND blamed to haue committed fo great an exceffe vpon a facred perfon, and of that eminency. The matter was much aggravated: and although that FERDINAND was otherwife well refpected, and held for a iuft Prince, and of great bounty; yet the Pope would not abfolue him, being excommunicate, without the confent of the Cardinalls: but making the truth appeare by his minifters, and the danger wherein thofe Realmes were, if he fhould not haue vfed that prevention, in the end hee obtained abfolution, not without the contradiction of many Cardinalls, where-to the Popes facility was a great helpe: And not long after, Sforza, and all the reft that were actors in the death of Frier George, were in like manner abfolued, but with farre greater difficulty.

FERDINAND vnable to fend fuch fuccours as he had promifed, by reafon of the warres in Germany between his brother the Emperour and Maurice Duke of Saxony, perfuaded Cafaldo to beare his fortune in the beft manner that poffibly he could; promifing with all poffible fpeed to relieue him. Who perceiving that the Moldauian, and Mahomet Balha were with a great Army come into Hungary, to invade Transilvania; he fent Felix Earle of Arco, to defend the Caffe of Brasovia. And obtaining great reliefe and victuals, from the City of Zibinio, he endeuored to reinforce his troups, and to fortifie many places; but this nothing furthered FERDINAND'S proceedings: For by reafon that the Articles of agreement were not obferued to Isabel, many of thofe people rebelled againft him, and after much contention, hee was constrained to come to blowes with them: For fpendng much time, both in lofing, and in recovering, the Turkes daily conquered more and more. Who taking Lippa, and Themeswarre, with many other places, by an order from Mahomet, the Balha, together with the

the Balha of Buda, marched to the Caffe of Drigall, before which lay Sforza Pallauicino with fix thoufand men, Germans and others: who valiantly affaulting the Caffe, was at vnawares let vpon by the Balha; with whom comming to fight, and performing the office both of a valiant Souldier, and prudent Captaine, he was in the end ouerthrowne, and fhortly after with many other Captaines taken prifoner, and brought (by a Turke which charging him in the flanke with his Cimitare had wounded him very fore) to the Balha: from whom he was afterwards ransomed for a great fumme of mony. After which, Mahomet to the great slaughter of his men, took Salonch, built by FERDINAND in a ftrong place beyond the riuer Tiffa; the loffe whereof greatly troubled FERDINAND. Who feeing that his affaires notwithstanding the valour and wife dome of Cafaldo daily went from ill to worfe, and vnderftanding that the people of Transilvania were wholly reuolted to the Queene, greatly fauoured by Mahomet Balha, and that they had often praftised to kill Cafaldo, he commanded him that notwithstanding Mahomet's retreat, defpairing to take Agria, long attempted by his people, he fhould retire. Which Cafaldo putting in execution, placed the Spanifh and Dutch fouldiers in Zibinio, and other places neere adiacent: and hauing fortified Dena, after much prouifion made, he went to Alba Iulia to winter the reft of his Army. In the meane time, abfolution came from Rome for thofe which kild Frier George. And the yeer 1553 being come, Francis Thendi, fauouring the Queenes caufe, brought it fo to paffe, that notwithstanding the many Councils, wherein Cafaldo was euer prefent, a great number of the Lords of Transilvania in the behalfe of the Queene, tooke Armes againft FERDINAND, and expulfing FERDINAND'S forces, reeftablifhed her, together with her fonne in her eftate.

That yeer being ended, and the yeer 1554 begun, FERDINAND fent his Ambaffadors to his Nephew Philip in England, to congratulate his mariage with Mary Queen of that Country, who fucceeded her brother Edward. And in the yeer 1555 dyed Joane, mother to FERDINAND, and the Emperour Charles the fixt, in Spain, whose death FERDINAND took very grieuoufly. In the meane time taking a truce with the Turke, who vpon an acknowledgement of a tribute, fuffered him peaceably to enioy all that he held in Hungary. King FERDINAND (as fome write) did vpon the conclufion of this truce yeeld to pay vnto the Turke a yeerely penfion of 30000. crownes, but not by way of tribute; for the confirmation whereof, he fent his Ambaffadors to Conftantinople. Yet the Balha of Buda had no will to peace: for in the beginning of the yeer, 1556 he complained of wrongs done vnto them by the Garri-fons of Sigeth, Babot, and other neighbour places; whereupon he drew together 10000. men, and fuprised Capofuiner and Babot fufpecting no danger, with the like hope he went to Sigeth, but tarried not: yet he returned fooner after with a great Army and began the fiege. The towne was defended by valiant fouldiers, vnder the command of Marke Horuato a worthe gentelman, and of a noble family. At that time FERDINAND was troubled with tumults in Transilvania, procured by Peter Vitechi: who not onely perfuaded Soliman to caufe Transilvania to be reftored vnto him, belonging vnto him as he faid by hereditary right; but he alfo difwadde all the fubiefts from their obedience to the young Yauode. Moreover George Bebequius infested the confines of Agria, taking certaine caftles with the helpe of the Valachians. FERDINAND being oppreffed with fo many enemies, he fent to the Princes of Germany being afsembled at Ratisbon, to craue aide, and in the meane time he leuied fouldiers with his owne reuenues. His troups being ready, the rendez vous was appointed at Camitia a towne in Stiria, where they refolved to befiege Babot, thereby to relieue Sigeth. The Turks left the fiege, and went with all fpeed to encounter the chriftians, where notwithstanding that they were more in number and had the aduantage of the ground, yet they were beaten and forced to retire with very great loffe; wherein 300 Aultrian horfe which they called the black bandes, did fo charge the Turks in the retreat as they confefled they neuer dealt with more fearefull enemies.

FERDINAND being aduertifed of this encounter at Babot he did much honour the Earle of Serine and the other commanders: and being defirous to finifh the warres he leuied new troups and made his fon FERDINAND Generall of the Army; but before he could attaine to the Campe, the Turks had againe inuefted Sigeth with a new fiege: affuring themfelves to carrie it, they planted their battailes, and vfed all perfuafions and threats to draw them to yeeld; but the gouernour nor his fouldiers would not be moued, although they were in fome want of powder and victuals, but made daily fallies and returned with much honour, and great fpoiles, which made the Balha defpaire of the event, and refolued to leaue it. They write that the befieged fhewed fuch valour, as the Balha wept, hearing that he had flaine but one chriftian in fixe daies

Sforza Pallauicino wounded, Georgi taken prifoner by the Turkes, before the Caffe of Drigall.

Sigeth attempted to raine by the Turks.

The Turkes to Raine at Babot.

The Turkes, leaue Sigeth, daies

The death of Frier George.

Exploits of the Archduke Ferdinand
in Hungary.

Advice made with the Turke.

The Turke
threateneth the Transilvanians.

daies, and so he retired. The Arch-duke FERDINAND being come to Canisio to the Army, they took Carioth, Babot, Saint Martins, and diuerse other Townes in those parts: and the garrison of Sigeth being now at liberty, went as far as the walls of Quinqueecelesia, and brought away great spoils. Charles Serotin, a Baron of Moravia, was sent to refresh Sigeth with victuals, powder, and all kinde of warlike munition: the which hauing performed accordingly, he returned within few dayes to the Archduke, who hearing that the Turkes drew all their forces together, and seeing Winter approach, and diseases to creepe into his Armie, hauing freed Sigeth from Siege (which was the chiefe end of that expedition) he resolved to returne to Vienna, being also called home by Letters from FERDINAND his father, who receiued him ioyfully about the end of November. In the Archdukes retreat, the Turkes (contrary to their usuall custome) neuer followed, but like men amazed kept themselves within their defences: soon after Soliman made a truce with FERDINAND, but the affaires of Transilvania would not suffer it to hold.

There came a Turkish Embassador into Transilvania, who bringing (as hee sayd) hope of peace, they intreated FERDINAND to giue them leaue to treat with him. A conference then being appointed by his suffrage, the Turke deliuered a farre other charge then they expected: which was, that expelling FERDINAND's soldiers, they should presently receiue John, (who was baptized by the name of Stephen) sonne to the first Vaiuode, for their King: which being done Soliman would accept of their tribute, and vouchsafe them his fauour; but if they did otherwise, he would take reuenge of them. He did also write vnto Andrew Batori, a man of great credit amongst the Transilvanians, complaining that they had receiued forraigne forces, who committed many insolencies, and that he would come with a great Army, to expell them, punishing them severely, if they did not obey his commandements. The Transilvanians being terrified with these threats, acquainted Castaldo withall: who came vnto the assembly of the Noble men; where he refuted all Soliman's threats, perswading the Transilvanians, rather to dye honorably, then to liue basely in the Turkish seruitude. Wherefore, it was concluded to pay him the promised tribute, the which if he refused, then to command him to depart out of their confines; but the Ambassador seeing he could obtain no other thing, receiued the tribute and returned.

After which, Isabell mother to John the Vaiuode, expelling all that fauoured FERDINAND got the whole government into her hands, partly through the peoples fauour, and partly relying vpon the Turks; and Polonians friendship: which she might effect the more easily, for that the plague had consumed many thousands of men, and made the whole countrey in a manner desolate. FERDINAND did forbear to take Armes against her though iustly incensed, knowing that the king of Poland and other Princes, would treat with him about a peace.

CHARLES the Emperour hauing giuen vp the states of the Low Countries, the kingdoms of Spain, and all his other kingdomes to his son Philip; FERDINAND sought to suppress and extinguish the preaching of the Gospell in Germany; and receiuing Letters of his brothers renunciation made to his son, he infinitely commended his resolution.

That yeere being ended, and the yeere 1556 being come, he was aduertised that his brother the Emperour hauing renounced the Empire vnto him, was retired into Spain, to lead a solitary life; for which yielding him thanks by his Letters and Ambassadours, he went to Vicna to make prouision for the warres, which (as it was said) Soliman would make in Hungary: where spending the rest of that yeere, he remained vntill the yeere 1557. In the beginning of which yeere, he interposed himselfe betweene King Philip and the Pope, perswading them to peace: for the Pope induced by his Nephew the Cardinall Cassia, made warre against the King. And that yeere being ended, in the beginning of the yeere 1558, he was by the Electors according to the will of his brother Charles, chosen and proclaimed Emperour; no man but the Pope contradicting his election, who affirmed that the resignation made by the Emperour Charles could not be done without the Popes consent: but his exception being reiected, FERDINAND was chosen and proclaimed lawfull Emperour. Not long after, hee had newes that his brother Charles was departed out of this world: for whose death he with his whole Court were very forie; neuertheless suppressing his griefe, he celebrated the exequies with great pompe, and presently sent his Ambassadours to King Philip, to condole the common losse. Soone after the deace of the Emperour Charles, in the beginning of the yeere 1559, FERDINAND vied all his endeavour to make a peace betweene King Philip, and Henry the French King; which after many treaties being concluded, and an alliance made, he was exceeding glad, for that after seuen-

peace betweene
King Philip of Spain and Henry of France.

tie yeeres continuall dissenion, peace was now made betweene those two mighty kings, which was proclaimed through all Christendome. A little while after, in the beginning of the yeere 1560, FERDINAND was confirmed in the Empire by the new Pope, who willingly approved his election, and held it an vnworthie thing, after a peace so long desired, againe to bring it into new combustions: and so following the desire of that Prince, hee consented to the calling of a Councell. In the yeere 1561 he made proclamation to all Prelates and Nations, of a Councell to be held the yeere following, wherein the Articles proposed by the Lutherans should be determined. And in the yeere 1562 a Councell was againe called, to be held in the city of Trent, whither FERDINAND sending the Prelates of his dominion, perswaded all the Princes of Germany to doe the like: and writing to his Nephew King PHILIP, and to the King of Portugal, and to all the other Princes of Christendome, he vied such means that all the Princes according to his desire, sent the Bishops of their countries with their particular Ambassadours to that Councell, wherein the matters of greatest importance were handled concerning religion. In which time FERDINAND desiring that some one of his sons after his deace might succede him in the Imperiall dignity, he called the Princes Electors to a Councell held at Frankford, where propounding to them his desire, he alleged that in respect of the Turke it was requisite it should be so; and after the matter had been long debated, he obtained his purpose to his content: which being concluded, he made his son MAXIMILIAN with in fewe daies after to be crowned King of the Romans. After which ceremonies, going to Jscrush to see his daughters, he vnderstood that the truce lately treated of with SOLIMAN, not only took effect for ten yeeres, but that at his sute Don ALVARO de Sande was released out of prison, together with three other principall Knights, taken in the yeere one thousand, five hundred sixty, in the enterprise of Tripoli, by DRAGOY RAYS. At that time were great wars in France between the Papists and the Huguenots, which the Emperour fought to haue pacified: but that nation was so extremely incensed, that the Emperours perswasions could nothing preail among them.

In the yeere 1564; the Councell of Trent being dissolved, FERDINAND came to Vienna; where falling sick of an Ague, and knowing by the vehemency of his disease that his life drew neere to an end, he sent for all his children, which then were disperised into sundry places: to whom after he had giuen his blessing, together with many good exhortations, hee rendered his soule to God vpon the fifth day of Iuly in the same yeere. He was a Prince by all men reputed to be of singular bounty and piety, and of a most gentle and pleasing disposition, not very strong of body; but replenished with so much majesty, that whosoeuer saw him could not but respect him: for, being of a pleasing and affable condition, hee would most curteously incline himself to euery one that came to salute him. He was naturally merry, free from surfetting, and wore his beard rather short than long, and his hair so long, that it couered his eyes; with some baulnes. He was in all his actions (prosperous or aduerse) alwaies constant, houlding all things to happen to him by the will of God. He confessed himself three or foure times in the yeere, and with great deuotion receiued the Communion; willing that euery one in his Court should doe the like: so that his house seemd to be rather a regular Monastery, than a Court of secular men. He left behinde him many children, and had in all fifteen; foure sonnes; and the rest daughters, which were married to sundry Princes in Christendome. ISABELL, which was his first, was giuen in marriage to SIGISMUND King of Poland: ANNE was wife to the Duke of Bavaria; MARY, to the Duke of Cleue; MAGDALEN, a chaste Virgin; CATHERINE, to FRANCIS, Duke of Mantua; ELENOR, to WILLIAM Duke of Alenia; MARGARET was a Nun; BARBARA was married to ALFONSO the second Duke of Ferrara; VERONICA a Virgin and a Nunne; HELEN lived but a little while; and IOAN was wife to FRANCIS the great Duke of Tuscany. Of sonnes, besides the Emperour MAXIMILIAN, he had FERDINAND and CHARLES, Arch-dukes of Austria; and JOHN, who died very young. Hee had but one onely wife, and (as it was said) neuer before nor after knew any other woman but her; whom he loued so entirely, that he would not marry the second time. Hee much loued learned men, and gaue them great pensions for their maintenance. Hee neuer vndertook any warres but for religion; either against the Turke or the Lutherans, whom he vehemently persecuted.

The Emperour
confirmed by Pope Sixtus.

The death of the Emperour Ferdinand.

FERDINAND hauing been King of Hungary and Bohemia foure and thirty yeeres, and Emperour seuen; to the great grief of his people, and of all the Princes of Christendome, ended his daies: After whose deace, his obsequies being celebrated with great pompe, sundry funerrall

Orations were made by diuers learned men : and his body being carried through Moravia into Bohemia, was buried in Prague by his wife.

FERDINAND seeing his end draw neere, called King MAXIMILIAN his sonne (who was to succede him in the Empire) to whom he made a long speech, touching the government of himselfe, and state, the which according to Aristotles relation, I haue presumed to set downe Verbatim, for that it deserves to be written in gold, for a perpetuall preside for all Princes to imitate: his words werethese. Deere son seeing it hath pleased his diuine maiesty to call me vnto him, and that my soule shall leave these earthly spoiles, I haue thought good to impart some things vnto you, which I hold very necessary : the which I intreate you to heare with an attentive care, seeing I deliuer them with a ioyfull heart: know then sonne that I leaue this world ioyfully, for that I found my selfe in a lodging which was not firme nor constant, wherewith I was much troubled : I repent not the time that I haue liued, hauing employed the whole course of my life in the seruice of god, and the increase of his holy faith: and I depart contented for that I leaue thee my son, in whom as in a liuely image of my body and soule, I trust, although I be dead, yet I shall in some sort liue, and that thou wilt imitate me in all my actions, according to my desire. The which I intreate thee to doe if thou louest me and thy selfe; and let it be thy chiefest study and care, to the end the world may know that thou art my son, and the strong pillar and firme support of the house of Austria: The which shall be easie when as thy counsels and actions, shall be squared by the rule of honesty and honor. Next if thou shalt see before thine eyes the reputation and glory of RODOLPHVS : (a great Prince, the honor of our house, and an excellent Emperor) of FRANCISKE thy great Grandfather, of MAXIMILIAN thy Grandfather, of Charles the Fifth thine Vncle, inuincible Emperours; and of my self who am thy father; and if like a good childe, thou shalt imitate their famous and worthy deeds, they will make thee glorious in future ages: but if thou shalt doe the contrarie, thou shalt reape nothing but infamy and dishonor; For they which spring from noble and glorious Princes are held base and vnworthy, when as their actions doe not concur with their progenitors whose deedes are not without great iudgement recorded in writing to posterity. It shall not be needfull to tell thee what helps the valiant and worthy deedes of our progenitors haue giuen to mee and the Emperour my brother, in the laborious course of our liues, for that our actions do shew them. Know then sonne, that I leaue thee a heavy burthen, that is the government of the Empire and of my kingdomes: but if thou proue a good and vertuous Prince, they will seeme light vnto thee: be then my son such a one, as thy subiects may not lament the losse of thy father: that is to saie, strine to exceede me in their good vylage and government. And to the end (with the Empire and state which I leaue thee) thou maiest haue Armes to defend them, I will put thee in minde like a good father what thou art to doe, the which will be happie and valiant Armes. Those things which I loued in my life (if thou wilt shew thy selfe to be my son) do not contemne after my death: I re commend strictly vnto thee the worship of religion, reuerence to the Sea of Rome, honour to God, and iustice, if thou wilt haue thy government continue long. Consider, all wisdom direct their actions to purchase fame in this world and eternall glory in that which is to come. I mean a good name, not by their vain glory, but that God may be honored, and by their good example of life and works, others (which shall succede) may take example. Thou must consider that a good Prince may attaine to both. Seeke not that fame which he had that burnt Diana's Temple; or that of ALEXANDER, and IVLIUS CESAR, which was so preiudiciall to the world. A good fame is purchased by good workes, not by bad. If thou wouldest truly attaine to that which all others seeke, strine rather to be called a good Prince then a great, haue a care rather to better, then to increase thine Empire, enduoring to imitate (such as gouerne their estates well, not those which got them or increased them) for that many seeking to gaine another mans, lose their owne: what the Prince is, such are his subiects: strine then to be such a one as thou wouldest haue thy people. If thou beest a gamester, all will play: if thou followest women, all will be luxurious; if ambitious euery man will seeke to rise, at what rate soeuer: and if thou beest superstitious thou shalt see superstition raigne. But if thou beest religious and a good Prince, O what profit will it bring thee? If thou wouldest free thy selfe from the heauie burthen of importunities, shew thy selfe to be much displeased with ambition. If thou canst doe this thou maiest call thy selfe happy: If thou shalt propound vertue for the reward of all thy labours, thou shalt neuer liue discontented, and thy subiects will do the like. If thou canst attaine to this, thou maiest sleepe securely: finally I put thee in minde that what thou art, such will thy subiects be: strine then to be good if thou wilt haue them good.

The

The greatest want we Princes haue, is of men that will tell vs the truth; wherefore giue liberty to all men, that they may admonish and reprove thee; and they that doe it freely, hold them for thy trust friends. As thou dost exceede other men in honor and dignity, so must thou exceede them in vertue. Remember sonne that a common-weale is not instituted for a King, but a King is ordained for a Common-weale: For that many Common-weales, haue flourishd without a Prince; but no Prince hath continued long without a State. Strine rather to be beloued then feared, for that no State is long preserved by feare. Whilest thou art only feared, thou shalt haue as many enemies, as subiects: But if thou art beloued, thou shalt not neede any guard, for that euery vasaile will be a Halberdier. If thou wilt be beloued, Loue, for that Loue is not purchased but with Loue. Loue thy subiects in such sort, as thou maiest alwayes preferre a general good, before thine owne affections, or thy priuate intrest. Be such a friend to truth, as there may be more credit giuen to thy bare word, then to another mans Oath. Haue more care to gouerne thy selfe, bridling thine affections, then thy subiects; for if thou wilt not obey thy selfe, why shouldst thou be obeyed by others? Maintaine thy grauity in such sort as becomes a prince; and on the other side, be pleasing, courteous, and affable. Remember how other Princes haue liued, imitating the good, and flying the euill. Let nothing proceede out of thy mouth, that may be iniurious or dishonest. Punish no man, being angry; for choler giues no way to reason, and thou maiest afterwards repent it. Be not carried away with the opinion of the Vulgar, but alwayes embrace the aduice of wise men: For, those Common-weales may iustly be called happy, which are gouerned by the wise. Gouerne thy subiects in such sort as all thy care may be, that no man shall exceede thee in good Government, and iustice. Whilest thou art yong, set alwaies before thine eyes, that thou art not only a Prince and Pastor: but reuerence the Christian faith, making account that it is most necessary for Princes to follow it. Strine to seeme a Christian, not only in outward Ceremonies, but with Christian works. Offend not God, seeing thou hast sworn him to be thy Lord. With what face darrest thou punish one that hath betrayed thee, if thou beest a Traytor to thy Lord? The more powerful a Prince is, the more staied and circumspect he should be, not respecting what he may doe, but what he ought to doe; imagining that he stands vpon a high Tower, whereas all the World beholds him, and that no vice can be concealed. If thou maiest defend thy State without preiudice to thy subiects, hold it the best course; for that the Prince was ordained for the Common-weale, and not the Common-weale for the Prince. Remember CONRVS and OTRO, who (although they were Pagans) desired rather to die, then to defend their estates with the losse of humane blood. Hold it better to be a iust man, then an vniust Prince; for that a good Prince deserves a great reward, and a wicked merits grievous punishment. If thou wilt be held a good Prince, strine to be like vnto God, not doing any thing which he would not doe. There are three things chiefly attributed vnto God, Power, Knowledge, and bounty; He that hath the first, and wants the rest, is no King but a Tyrant: Know that the difference betwixt a King and a Tyrant, is not in the name, but in the actions. If thou shalt doe the workes of a Tyrant, they may well, whilest thou liuest, reame thee king, but when thou art dead, they will call thee Tyrant. Wouldest thou know the difference that ARISTOTEL sets betwixt a King and a Tyrant? A King affects the good of the Common-weale; and a Tyrant seeks his owne profit. Endeavour to leaue thy kingdomes better then I now leaue them, and this shall be thy true glory. Consider there is a contract and conditions betwixt the Prince and the people: if thou dost not that which thou oughtst vnto thy subiects, they are not bound to performe their duties vnto thee; with what face canst thou demand thy rents, if thou dost not pay them? Remember that they are men and not beasts, and thou art a shepheard of men, and not of sheepe. Seeing that all men learne the Art whereby they liue, why shouldst not thou learn the Art to become a good Prince: the which is the most excellent of all others. Be contented with the name of King or Prince, not striding to be so; for it may be they will call thee Tyrant: For he is no true Prince, to whom a kingdom commeth by succession, but he who by his actions strives to be so. He is a free King which gouernes and commands himselfe, and the other is a slaue, who cannot restrain and bridle his affections. If thou vauntst thy selfe to be free, why shouldst thou obey thy passions, which is the most infamous and brutish servitude of all other. I haue seene many free-men serued, and many slaues to be serued: A slaue is a seruant by force, and cannot be blamed if he be so, seeing it is not in his owne power; but a vicious man, who is a voluntary slaue, ought not to be put in the number of men: Wherefore loue liberty, and learne to be truly a King. Be so careful of the good gouernement of thy sub-

Ferdinand's
speech to his son
Maximilian.

Princes should in their actions imitate their predecessors wisdom.

What Princes chiefly want.

subiects, as thou maist neuer sleepe one whole night without it: Studie not how to passe away thy time, but how to loose it. Barbarous Kings, especially in Persia, maintained their Majesty by hiding themselves from their subiects; but thou on the other side (following my example) shalt keepe thy gates alwaies open to the poore, rather than the rich; for they haue more neede of thy fauor then these. In thy answers follow the aduice of ARISTOTLE, Those which be good and milde giue thy selfe: the bitter and fowre leaue vnto thy Ministers, and let no man depart from thee iustly discontented. What thou hast to giue, giue it speedily and cheerefully, of thine owne free will; and giue them no cause to thanke others, for the fauors which thou thy selfe doest them. Banish from thee such as seeke out new meanes to oppresse, and giue thy subiects, and remember that the poore, not the rich, pay tributes and exactions. Be so desirous to doe good, as thou maist thinke to haue lost that day, wherein thou hast not assisted some one. Honor the good and vertuous, more then the rich and powerful, and thou shalt make all men to follow vertue. Admit no idle men into thy kingdome, for they will breede a world of mischiefs. Be tractable to pardon thine owne iniuries; for, if an equall to thy selfe hath done it, thou canst not take reuenge, without preiudice to thy subiects and his, who haue not offended: If a priuate man doth thee wrong, the greater thy power is to reuenge, the better will thy clemency appeare. Let thy exercises be honest, holy, good, and profitable to the Common-wealth. How well it becomes a Prince, to heare the afflictions and grieuances of his subiects, and to redresse them! Imitate not those who vnburthen themselves, all they can, of matters of iustice; for it is thy chiefe office. Think alwaies of the meanes, by the which thou maist gouerne thy subiects: endeavour alwaies to know the nature and manners, not only of thine owne subiects, but also of strangers. Be alwaies in peace and friendship with thy neighbors; contend not with them, lest it breede thee warre and discord. Learne rather by Histories, then by experience, how dangerous and pernicious warre is: Let this be a speciall remembrance vnto thee, that thou neuer vndertake warre, for hatred, or priuate interest; and when thou shalt be forced vnto it, let it not be so much for thy selfe as for thy subiects. Consider first of all (which will be most commodious) whether to vndertake it, or leaue it; and being forced vnto it, let it bee with extreme necessity. But first endeavour to make an accord: for, peace is better then iust warre; from the which thou must endeavour to flee, if it were for no other respect, but for the honor of the name of a Christian, being much oppositue vnto it. Make war against Turks and Infidels; for otherwise they will not only make Christians slaues, and force them by torments to deny the faith of Christ, but also ruine Christendome, and prophane the Temples of Christ: But let it neuer come into thy minde, to make warre against them, for thine owne priuate interest, or for Ambition. Consider, that vnder this colour of making warre against Infidels, there lurkes much poyson: and when thou hast conquered them, labor to conuert them to the faith of Christ, principally by good workes; For, with what face canst thou aduise them to become Christians, if thou and thine in your actions be worse then Infidels? It will be no great matter to conquer the Moores and Turkes, if they shall see Christian vertues to shine in thee and thine, wherefore with these labor to conuert them: It imports much whether thy conuersation be good or bad, and with whom thou dost conuerse; therefore strue alwaies to draw into thy company good and vertuous men, and chafe away the wicked and vicious, which may corrupt thee and be very hurtfull. Loue them which reprove thee freely, and hate such as flatter thee. Doe not obserue what company is most pleasing vnto thee: but what will be most behoouefull for thee; for there is no beast so venomous, nor creature so pernicious and hurtfull about a Prince, as flatterers, and ambitious persons: For, the vulgar sort, who know not the disposition of their Prince, doe alwaies thinke that he is like vnto his favorites; if they be vertuous, they hold him for vertuous; if wicked and vicious, they esteeme him the like: Consider then how carefull thou oughtest to be in making choice of such as shall conuerse with thee; chiefly make choice of a Confessor that is sincere, pure, incorrupt, of good life and fame, and not ambitious. The principall part of the good gouernement of thy kingdome consists, in that thou best good: and the second, that thou prouide good Ministers; wherefore consider well how thou giuest thy Offices, thy Benefices and thy Bishoppericks; there is none worthy of any administration in the Common-weale, but he that takes it by constraint, and against his will. Wherefore it would be very profitable vnto thee, neuer to giue any Office, Benefice or Bishopperick, to him that seekes it; but to him that being vertuous, and full of bashfulness, will not sue for anything. And know for certaine, that such as seek them, are insufficient to gouerne them; for either they know what they demand, or not. If they know not, they de-deserue it not; and if they know and demand it, they discouer themselves to be proud, ambitious, and wicked. Neuer commit matter of iustice, but to men that are vncorrupt and good, and who accept them being intreated: for committing them to others, thy subiects shall suffer oppression; for there is nothing more pernicious, then to haue conuolous iudges, who affect gouernement to oppresse the people. Let the iudges keepe their residence; and forget not sometimes to ouersee them, rewarding the good and punishing the badde; where I would not haue thee vse clemency, nor with thy seruants, which shall forget their duties: but punish them with more rigour then other men, both for that they are more bound to be good, being neere vnto thee; as also for that part of the infamy redounds vpon thee. Punish false-witnesses and scandalous accusers by TALION'S Law. In making of Lawes, haue more respect vnto the publike good, then to thine owne particular. What thou shalt see profitable to thy subiects, do it before they intreate thee. Be diligent and resolute in that thou hast to doe, lest in the action thou losest the occasion, and in the benefit the thanks. Striue euer to purchase a good name rather then riches or great estates: for, the one, wicked men attaine vnto by money; but the other good men only purchase by vertue. Loue and feare God, who will teach thee all the rest, and guide thee in all thy actions. I haue long desired to speake this vnto thee, but I neuer had opportunity; wherefore I intreate thee (deere sonne) so to imprint it in thine heart, that thou maist neuer forget it. Lastly, I commend vnto thee thy brethren, sisters, and kinsfolkes: intreate them in such sort, as they may not be disgraced, their old father being dead, nor growe proude seeing their brother Emperor. Moreouer I recommend vnto thee my old seruants, to whom my long cares, my troubles, warres, affaires, and my long infirmities, haue been the cause of much toyle. And if they serued me faithfully vnto death, it is reason they should be rewarded: and although my bodie remains in the graue with the Wormes, yet will I be alwaies mindefull of them before God. Herein thou shalt shew thy selfe a good sonne, rewarding those which serued thy Father. Aboue all things I will put thee in mind, and hold it for good aduice, Be euer in peace and league with PHILIP King of Spain, my Nephew, and thy Cozen, and sonne to that father whom I loued much; from whom thou maist alwaies receiue good assistance. And when it shall befit for thee to make a league with him against Infidels, I exhort you to doe it, for that with your two forces, you may with more facility ruine the common Enemy. I commend vnto you your brethren, whom I haue enioyned to be obedient vnto you. Loue them, and liue in Peace and Charitie, like good brethren: It shall bee a great ioy vnto mee, and my blessing shall bee with thee, and with you all together, with the Grace of our Lord GOD: to whom I giue infinite thanks, that hee hath done mee this fauour, that I might speake this vnto thee, and blesse thee with my hand, as I doe.

Nnn

THE

THE LIFE OF MAXIMILIAN.
SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND SEVENTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

(*)

THE ARGUMENT.

His life containeth little else, but the Countie, Parentage and Noble descent of Maximilian, with his acts in the warres in Germany against the Lantzgrauve, his going into Spaine to governe the same for King Philip, his assumption to the Imperiall dignity, with his warres with the Turkes at Sigerb, and the Election of his sonne Rodolph for King of the Romanes, with some other occurrents concerning the Turkish Warres.

THE house of Austria, amongst the chiefe houses of Germany, is every way very Noble, and hath beene so of long time (as it evidently appeareth) not only through the hereditary succession of the Empire, from the father to the sonne, in tenne Emperours, from the yeere 1273, at what time RODOLPH the First was chosen Emperour of the Germanes; but also in that it hath since that time in short space, with admirable felicity, not only in Germany enlarged the small confines of Habsburge and Hapsia (the ancient inheritance thereof) but through the singular protection of the heavens, it hath by inheritance attained to the kingdomes of Bohemia, and Hungary, the Duchie of Austria, the Countie of Flanders, with the estates of the lower Germany, the kingdomes of Spain, with all those countreies of the East and West Indies

(to the wonder of the World, by CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS a Genowaise, and AMERICUS VESPUTIUS, a Florentine, newly found and discovered; which for their greatness, and the nouelty of the action, are called the new world together with the kingdomes of Sicilia and Naples; and lastly the Duchie of Milan, farre exceeding all the other Dukedomes in Christendome. Of which family, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred twenty seven, the Emperour MAXIMILIAN the Second of that name, borne in the City of Vienna in Austria, had to his father FERDINAND, brother to the Emperour CHARLES the Fifth, sonne of PHILIP the First, King of Spaine, Nephew to MAXIMILIAN the First, son of FREDERICK the Third, Emperours of the Almaines: his mother was ANNE the daughter of LADISLAUS King of Hungary and of Bohemia, Nephew of the great SIGISMUND, sonne of CASSIMIR King of Poland, and sister to that LEVVS which through the vnadvised counsell of PAVLVS TOMOREVS Archbishoppe of Colossa, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand five hundred twenty six, comming to a battaile with SOLIMAN King of

of the Turkes, was not onely through the innumerable multitude of the Ottomans lamentably ouerthrowne; but also when hee sought to haue saued himselfe from his enemies, was (through the weightinesse of his Armour, wherewith hee was oppressed, and the stumbling of his Horse, which fell vpon him in a passage ouer a Marrieth or Fenne) most miserably drowned.

This Emperour shewing euen from his infancy the excellency of his wit, was by his father the Emperour FERDINAND committed to very learned men, by them to be instructed in good Literature, but chiefly in variety of tongues; wherein in short space he so much profited, that he not only spake Latin very elegantly, Spanish, French, Italian, Dutch, Hungarish, and Bohemish; but also very perfectly attained to the knowledge of the Sciences, particularly the Mathematicks. So that all men did confidently hope that he would proue no way inferior to his progenitors. And he no sooner came to yeeres fit to beare Armes, but that he sundry times gaue no lesse testimony and prooffe of his noble valour, seeking to imitate his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN whose name he bare, which he expressely manifested when in the yeere one thousand five hundred fifty six, in the warres which his Vncle the Emperour CHARLES the Fifth made against IOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, and PHILIP Lantzgrau of Hessen, he went to that warre, sent thither by his father with the command of twelue thousand horse; hauing before that time, been euer present in the warres which his father had with the Turkes. In that seruice of his Vncle the Emperour CHARLES, he so nobly behaued himselfe, that he therein sundry times deleuered to be compared with his Grandfather MAXIMILIAN; for he constantly enduring, with the greatnesse of his minde, all those wants and fortunes which the troubles of the wars bring with them, was euer the first man in all seruices, wherein he made no lesse shew of a valiant man at Armes, then of a discreete Chieftaine: which made him so deely beloued by his Vncle the Emperour, that the ciuill warre being ended (which continued little lesse then two yeers) he considering that his sonne PHILIP Prince of Spaine was to be inuested in the Countie of Flanders, together with the Prouinces of the lower Germany, and being vnwilling that Spaine should remaine without some man of authority to governe the same, fearing the pride of that Nation ordinarily desirous of nouelties, notwithstanding that he was his Nephew, yet by the dispensation of Pope PAVL the Third, he made him his sonne in law; giuing him his daughter MARY to wife, and therewith made him gouernour of those kingdomes. And those nuptiall rites being celebrated, MAXIMILIAN in the yeere one thousand five hundred forty eight, went into Spaine, being first by his father FERDINAND King of the Romanes, made King of Bohemia, to whom the Lords of that kingdom swore obedience as to their king and naturall Lord.

Before his comming into Spaine, passing through Italy, he was by all the Italian Princes visited and highly honoured; and being arrived at the City of Genoa, and there shortly after embarked in the Gallies of Priace DORIA, he passed to Barcelona: whence taking his way towards Valledolia, where the Spanish Court then lay, he was in the name of his epouse and of his coffin. Germane oftentimes visited by the principall Lords of Spaine.

Finally, within few daies after his comming to the Court, hauing with applause of the Spanish Nation celebrated his nuptials, he was settled in the gouernment of those kingdomes, in the absence of Prince PHILIP: which he with great quietnesse, to the contentment of that people gouerned, vntill that in the beginning of the yeere one thousand five hundred fifty one, the Emperour CHARLES summoned a Councell to be held in Augsburg; whither being by his father sent for, he came from Spaine into Germany, hauing first left the gouernment of those kingdomes to his wife Queen MARY, and to the Councell royall: and staying there till the end of the Councell, he went with his father the king of the Romanes to Vienna: where making his abode till the beginning of the yeere one thousand five hundred fifty two, and then passing from Germany againe into Spaine, to bring his wife into his Countie, he came from Barcelona, (after that he had been molested by the French fleet) to Genoa; and from thence comming to Trent, he went to Augsburg, where by the Emperour CHARLES the Fifth, he was kindly received, and together with his wife was by the Germane Princes much honoured; but particularly by his father, who then absolutely resigned vnto him the gouernment of the kingdom of Bohemia: which to the great contentment of the Bohemians hee euer after gouerned so long as hee liued.

From thence in the same yeere he sent great troups of men to the Emperour, for his warre against MARYCE, Duke of Saxony, who by reason of the imprisonment of the Lantzgrau

Mmm z

PHILIP

The dominions of the house of Austria.

The lineage of the house of Maximilian.

PHILIP warring against the Emperour, was proclaimed traitor : but it was not long before the Emperour was freed from that trouble. And MAXIMILIAN recalling his forces, peaceably applied himselfe to the government of Bohemia, without that any matter of moment happened, untill that in the yeere 1554, he together with his father sent his Ambassadors to congratulate the marriage of his cousin King PHILIP with the daughter of King HENRY the Eight, then by the death of her brother EDWARD, Queene of England.

In the yeere 1558, he was present at the Coronation of his father, who by the Emperour CHARLES the first was adopted Emperour, and accepted by the Princes of Germany. Afterwards taking his way with his father towards Viena, he returned into Bohemia; where within a while after, vnderstanding of the death of his Vncle and father in law the Emperour CHARLES, he with great pomp celebrating his Obsequies, sent Ambassadors to his cousin PHILIP to condole the death of the deceased Emperour. In which actions ending the yeere present and next following; in the yeere 1560, after foure moneths vacancie, JOHN ANGELLO DE MEDICIS being chosen Pope, and called PIVS the fourth, he sent his Ambassadors to yeeld his obedience to the Church of Rome. And in the yeere 1562, FERDINAND desiring that his sonne MAXIMILIAN should succede him in the Empire, assembled a Council in Frankford, where proponing to the Electors his determination, he so handled the matter, that by the generall consent and good will of all men, MAXIMILIAN was chosen and crowned King of the Romanes; with great applause of the Germanes and the Italians, who for his rare qualities dearly loved him. Then being according to his fathers desire created his successor, he departed towards Viena, first visiting his sisters which were in Spain, where he remained untill the yeere 1564, in which yeere his father dyed; whose Obsequies hee together with his brothers sumptuously celebrated. After which, hee received Ambassadors from the Princes, which as to the successfull Emperour and King of Hungary and Bohemia came to doe him honour: amongst many which came, were the Ambassadors of Spain and of Portugall; MAXIMILIAN being then received and accepted by the Christians for lawfull Emperour.

Having scarce finished his fathers obsequies, news came of new combustions. The Vaiuode of Transilvania, who was comprehended in the Turks peace and restrained with the hope of a royall affinity, continued for a time quiet; but now either thinking that FERDINAND'S peace had been dissolved by death, or incouraged by the ill aduice of some lewd persons, or else prouoked by his neighbours injuries, he surprised Satmaria, by a notable stratagem. MELCHIOR BALASSVS was gouernour thereof for FERDINAND, a valiant man and active, who in former times, had taken many townes from the Vaiuode vpon the confines of Transilvania. Having taken the towne, the Castle (although it were very strong) made small resistance: where the gouernour lost his goods, and his wife and children were led into captivity. BALASSVS (being fore wounded) escaped, and after his recovery he surprised Debraim, a towne of good note belonging to the Transiluanians; and having spoiled it he set it on fire. The newes of the losse of Satmaria was vnexpected to MAXIMILIAN, and the more troublesome for that hee was then diuerted with other cares. The Vaiuode was not ignorant that it would be displeasing vnto CESAR, pretending that he had done nothing against the peace, laying all the blame vpon the Emperours gouernours, especially vpon BALASSVS; affirming that the beginning of all iniuries sprang from them, who oppressed his subjects with vnaccustomed tributes, and daily incursions; adding that he had often complained, but could finde no remedy: wherefore it was no wonder, if he had found some meanes to reuenge those iniuries and to repaire the losses. MAXIMILIAN holding it not fit to indure this insolencie, sent for LAZARVS SVENDIE, a Baron of Swethland, a man of great experience in Armes, wise, vigilant, and valiant, to whom he committed the charge of the Transiluanian warre. But for that he was ignorant of the state of Hungary, he had given him for assistants ANDREW BATTORI, MELCHIOR BALASSVS, and GABRIEL PERENE, men well acquainted with the enemies affaires. SVENDIE marcht presently into the countie of Sepusie, from whence he sent to intreat MAXIMILIAN to giue him leave to manage that warre at his will, and not be compelled alwaies to send to his maiesty, lest before a resolution should be taken, a good opportunity might be lost. Hereupon the King of Poland sent his Ambassadors to let the Emperour vnderstand how much he was grieued with this war, the Transiluanian being so neere allied vnto him; wherefore he laboured to haue a surcease of Armes, and the offence remitted. The Emperour gaue him good words, but staid not his warlike preparation.

This

This yeere LAZARVS SVENDIE, went to besiege the Castle of Toccai, a place strong both by nature and art, standing vpon the confines of Transilvania and Hungary: The which FERDINAND had giuen to a Nobleman of Hungary, for his good deserts, who dying recommended it, and the guard of his young son to FRANCIS MENETVS. This man of a tutor became a Tyrant: he fled to the Transiluanian and deliuered both the the Castle and Pupil into his hands. This Castle being battered, and MENETVS the Traitor flaine, they yeelded vpon condition to depart with their sword, and not to beare Armes against the Emperour. After which he recovered Satmaria, the which the Transiluanian had abandoned distrustful of his owne forces; After which he took Erdad (the which FERDINAND had often attempted in vaine) with diuerse other places.

The Vaiuode finding himselfe too weake to cope with MAXIMILIAN, he craued aide from the Turk, who being busie at the siege of Malta, he sent STEPHEN BATTORI (who afterwards was King of Polonia) with other Embassadors to the Emperour to sue for peace; the King of Poland did the like, and SOLIMAN sent a Renegado to Viena to expostulate the wrongs done vnto his tributarie, and to finde some meanes of reconciliation. But CESAR was not ignorant, that this was a practice to stay the course of SVENDIE'S prosperous success, and daunt the mindes of the Hungarians with a hope of peace: but for that it should not seeme that he hindered the conclusion of a peace, he commanded his Army to forbear from spoile, but vpon this condition that all the townes on this side the mountaines should be his. This was of hard digestion to the Vaiuode: wherefore he incensed SOLIMAN, who being returned from Malta with losse and dishonor, refused to transport the war into Hungary, and to employ all his forces against the Emperour; hereupon he sends a new Embassage to Viena, for the tribute which had been long vnpaid: complaining much of the wrong done vnto the Vaiuode his client; saying it was not lawfull for him to make a peace with the Emperour, without his priuie, commanding restitution of all that had been taken from him, and withall he renounceth the peace, which he had obserued with FERDINAND. MAXIMILIAN gaue him good reasons for non payment of the tribute; that the peace had been violated by the Vaiuode and not by him; that all the places did neuer belong to the Transiluanian, but to his predecessors, from whom they had been violently taken away: whereupon SOLIMAN resolved to besiege Julia. This yeere the Vaiuode (in the absence of SVENDIE, who was gon to Viena concerning the warres) went to besiege Erdad with the helpe of the Turks: the which being battered, and valiantly defended, in the end they yeelded vpon composition to depart with bagge and baggage, but they were all treacherously slaine by the Turks.

This sommer 1565 AVGVSTVS Elector of Saxony sent 1000 Saxon horses to SVENDIE'S Camp, promising to entertaine them for five moneths, with whom there ioynd 350 Noblemen and Gentlemen. The Turkish and Transiluanian Embassadors were still in Viena treating of a peace, desirous as it seemed to protract time; yet SVENDIE did often aduise the Emperour by his Letters, not to trust their faire words, nor to be abused by their false promises: but new Embassadors coming from SOLIMAN and the Turkes having retired their Camp, the Emperour commanded his Generall to forbear from all hostile attempts. At that time the Earle of SALVIE gouernour of Iauerin, had an enterprife vpon Alba Regalis which hee had a great hope to surpris, by meanes of some of the towne: but the Emperour commanded him to surcease, and retire, so as his credulity made the enterprife frustrate, and the Turks discovered the conspiracie, and put 40 of the citizens cruelly to death.

The treaty continued still at Viena, and the Emperour sent an Embassador to Constantinople to conclude a peace with SOLIMAN, who detained him there untill the yeere 1567. In the mean time the Basha of Buda made an incursion towards Iauerin and carried away great spoiles, it appeared by probable coniectures that the Turks made shew of a peace outwardly, but prepared for warre. The which a Turk of good note being acquainted with the secret counsels of the Basha of Buda, confessed freely, being taken, and that SOLIMAN would come the next yeere with a great Army to besiege Julia & Sigeth. STEPHEN BATTORI one of the Transiluanian Embassadors was yet in Viena, who at that time had the wife & children of BALASSVS (being taken at Satmar as we haue said) in prison: wherefore BALASSVS made great suite vnto the Emperour to detain him untill his wife and children were set at liberty; CESAR importuned BATTORI very much, but he could not preuaile, and BATTORI refusing to stay any longer was dismissed: whereat BALASSVS being much discontented, the Emperour told him that there was a great difference betwixt their qualities, for they were Captiues taken in war,

N n n 3

Toccai besieged and taken by Svendie.

Satmar recovered by Svendie.

The Transiluanian sue for peace.

Solimian renews the war
in Hungary.

Maximilian chosen and crowned King of the Romanes.

Satmar taken by the Transiluanians.

LAZARVS Svendie generall in the Tran-siluanian war.

war, and hee was an Ambassadour, whom he might not stay, without doing wrong vnto his dignity.

After his departure, the Emperor imployd all his care to make prouision for the Turkish warres: and being vnable to encounter SOLIMAN with his owne forces, he assembled a Diet at Ausburg, this yeer vpon the tenth of March, to consult with the Princes of the Empire, touching the Turkish warres, and many other things concerning the Empire. In the meane time MAXIMILIAN was full of cares, the same of the Turkish warre increasing daily, and it was said the Transiluanians gathered together great forces. The Princes being assembled; ALBERT Duke of Bavaria, speaking in the Emperours name, promised, that touching matters of Religion, there should be nothing changed, so as the Princes would endeavour to expell all strange opinions which had crept into the Empire: That the publike Peace confirmed by so many Edicts, should be obserued: That such as had been proscribed for the fact at Herbipolis, should be punished, and iustice done to euery man in the Imperiall Chamber. But laying aside all other things, he perswaded them, first to consider of aide against the Turkes: whereupon they promised to entertaine twelue thousand horse, and twenty thousand foote, for eight moneths; and moreover to pay foure thousand horse, for two yeeres and a halfe: which the Emperour accepted very thankfully. At the same time the Arch-duke CHARLES, called an assembly of Hungarians, at Possonia, and of Austrians at Vienna, whereas euery house promised to giue a Florine: and the Nobility and Gentry, were so willing to contribute to these Turkish warres, as he that had but one hundred crownes of yeerely rent, was content to maintaine a horse, and the Nobility in generall promised to goe in person, if CÆSAR or any of his brethren should be there. The Pope, with the Princes of Italie, and the French king, were solicited for aide in this warre.

At the Assembly at Ausburg, GROMBACH, with his confederats, who had slaine the Bishoppe of Herbipolis, and afterwards surprised the City, and spoiled it in hostile manner, troubling the peace of Franconia, was by a new proscription condemned by a generall consent of all the orders of the Empire. JOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, sent his deputies, and lawyers to plead for GROMBACH, and to urge an abolition of the first proscription; among which HENRY HVSAN a famous lawyer was the chiefe; who being partly dissuaded by his friends, and partly terrified with the weightinesse of the cause, left it; and sought to perswade the Duke by his Letters to relinquish their protection; but hee could not bee diuerted.

In the interim, the Transiluanian Vauode slept not: for hauing prepared himselfe to Armes, he perswaded the Nobility of Hungary, to fall from their allegiance, writing Letters, by the which he said he was inioyned by the Turkish Emperour, to perswade all the orders of Hungary to yeeld him faith and obedience, whereon, and their good agreement, the hope and health of afflicted Hungary depended; and by that only meanes, the Turkish Army might be kept from their confines: and alleaging many other reasons, in the end he perswaded them, to meete at an assembly at Forda; or to send foure deputies with full authority. These Letters being diuulged in Hungary, SVENDIVS made an answer vnto them, whereby he discovered the Vauodes impostures, and gaue the World to vnderstand, that CÆSAR had alwaies fought for Peace with the Turke and Transiluanians; but it succeeded not, chiefly by this mans slanders, and ambition, who had often broken the peace, the which CÆSAR had so strictly obserued, as he had neglected many good occasions to aduance his affaires. Moreover if there were no hope left of any future Peace, yet the Hungarians should not feare that CÆSAR would leaue them; who being assisted first by God, and then by the Germanes, and all forraigne Princes, should haue power sufficient to resist all their enemies attempts, perswading them not to faile in their obedience both to their King and Countrey, the warre being not onely iust, and lawfull, but most necessarie; and therefore they should not doubt of the happy euent. Lastly, he commaunded them all in the Emperours name, not to haue any commerce with the Transiluanian.

The Transiluanian, what he could not get by faire meanes; he sought to attaine vnto by force; and the Turkes omitting no opportunity, surprised Aiut by Scalado, in the absence of the Gouernor, and part of the Garrison, where they slew all the Citizens and Souldiers most cruelly. They thought to haue gotten Sigeth with the like policy; but the Earle of Serin repulsed them with great slaughter; and afterwards, making an incursion into the Turkes Countrey, hee slue so great a number of them, that he returned to Sigeth with two carts full of their heads.

SVENDIVS

SVENDIVS besieged Hoff in vain, the Transiluanian coming with 20000 men to relieue it; but not without great slaughter of his people; whereas SVENDIVS took certain Turkish ensignes with much Ordinance. The Basha of Buda likewise besieged Palotta, which hee had brought, by continuall battery, to extreme necessity, the Gouernier being wounded, but yet would not yeeld. And thus, when all humane help did seeme to fail, God deliuered them miraculously. There were come to Iauerine twelue companies of Germanes; whereof 900 horse with ninety carts were sent out for forrage on the fourteenth of Iune: which the Turkish Scouts seeing a far off, and thinking them to be farre more in number, they returned amazed to the Camp; telling them, there was a great Army coming to relieue the Besieged: wherewith they were so terrified, that they presently left it, and departed in such haste, that they left behinde them their tents, much ordinance, powder, and other munition.

In the mean time, the Earle of Solmes, going out of Iauerine, besieged Vesperine, the which hee soon took, putting a garrison of Turkes to the sword. The like hee did to Tuisa, being sue German leagues from Iauerine: hee also took Gessse, with diuers other Forts vpon that Confiner; the Turkes being all fled to Strigonium, the which the Earle meant to besiege: but, acquainting MAXIMILIAN therewith, he would not suffer him to attempt so great a City with so small an Army, hearing that SOLIMAN was ready to march.

In the beginning of Iuly, SOLIMAN hauing all things ready for the warre, hee commaunded the Basha of Buda to cast a bridge ouer the riuer of Drave, being very swift: the which hauing often attempted in vain, hee sent word to SOLIMAN, that it could not be done; whereupon, hee sent him a halier, commanding hee should be hangd if it were not finished against his coming. The Basha terrified heerewith, setting 25000 men on work, finished his bridge in tenné dayes; where SOLIMAN passed an Army of 200000 men, the which hee diuided into three. The one hee sent to Alba Regalis, the other to Sigeth, and the third to spoil the Countrey. Vpon the way the Vauode of Transiluanians mette him with rich Presents, giuing him great thanks for his assistance.

SOLIMAN, hauing passed the riuer Drave, resolved to besiege Sigeth and iuia. Sigeth is a Town from both by nature and art, seated in a Marsh: it was commaunded by the Earle of Serin, hauing 1800 foot, 200 horse, 150 Citizens, with great store of Ordinance and munition. The Gouernier, seeing the Turkes forces approach, called all the souldiers and citizens together, making an Oration vnto them, to incourage them to constancy and resolution. After which, hee took an oath to lue and dy with them, and neuer to forsake them: the like did all the souldiers to him, swearing to obey him, and to lue and dy with him. The Turkes hauing planted their Camp, they presently attempted the new Town; the which, for that it could no longer be defended, hee caused to be burnt. They then planted their Ordinance in three parts, and raised three Mounts which ouer-lookt the wals. SOLIMAN, seeing this siege very bloody, sought to tempt the Earle with gifts and promise of great rewards; offering him the gouernment of Iliria, and the possession of Croatia, if he would yeeld him the Castle: but, finding him constant, hee tried him by another meanes. A Trumpetter which serued the Earles sonne, was by chance taken by the Turkes: him SOLIMAN sent into the Castle to tell the Earle that his sonne was a prisoner, and to perswade him to yeeld the Castle if he would preferre his sonnes life. But the Earle, neither by the hope of great reward, nor the unfortunate accident of his sonne (although it were false) could not be wonne; respecting more his Countreys liberty, and his faith giuen to the Emperour, than his sonnes safety, left by this fact hee should lay a foule stain vpon his former desert: This not succeeding, SOLIMAN goes to force, commanding many assaults to be giuen, not with small troops, but with whole armies, one succeeding another: so as the Besieged being oppressed with multitudes, and their forces and spirits spent with continuall fighting, towards night they were forced to retire into the Castle: the which the Turkes attempted twice in vain, setting fire in one part of it which was diuided from the other, there being a bridge betwixt them.

The besieged seeing all about them on fire, and themselves brought to despair, they resolved to open the gates, and to fall forth among their enemies, and there to dy fighting; whereunto the Earle encouraged them by a long speech, concluding it with these words: Knowe then, that our Emperour, our Countrey, and all Europe, look vpon vs, and are witnesses of our valor or base-nes. Think, that heere an occasion is offered vs, either to vanquish or to dy gloriously. Heere, necessity hath set the bounds of our labour, whereas euery man, posselt with a certain despair betwixt victory and death, must endeavour to vanquish; or if God will not suffer it, it is better to fall

Nan 4

fall

Palotta besieged by the Turkes in vain.

Exploits of the Earle of Solmes.

Soliman passes Drave with 200000 men.

Sigeth besieged by the Turkes.

The Earle of Serin speech to his souldiers.

A Diet called at Ausburg.

The Princes of the Empire aide Emperour against the Turke.

Grombach proscribed against at Ausburg.

Succession and suer to the Transiluanians Letters.

Aiut taken by the Turkes.

fall fighting than fleeing: wherefore going to this warre, remember you carry, in your hands, immortal fame, religion, liberty (which no good man loseth but with his life) and your country which bare you and bred you vp: wherefore endeavour that you fall not vnreunghed nor taken, or be slaughtered like sheep; but may leaue to the enemy a bloody and mournfull victory: whereto the souldiers gaue a ioyfull consent, all vowing to dy with their Commander.

A singular example of constancy in a wife.

At this time there fell out a memorable accident. One of the souldiers, preparing himself to fight and dy, having a wife of a Noble family & very fair, resolu'd to kill her lest she should be subiect to the lusts and reproaches of the Turks: which his wife perceiving, shee intreated him to forbear; saying, that it was a wicked thing for a husband to imbrue his hands in the blood of his wife whom hee had loued so much; but it was more vnworthy, if a good and chaste wife should leaue her husband in the extremity of danger. I knowe, quoth she, I haue sworn neuer to forsake thee: wherefore I will be thy companion in death, that whom loue in life hath ioyned together, death may not part; whereupon the put on mans apparell, and her husband leaue her Armes wherewith the ioyned herselfe to her husband.

The Duke of Serin, seeing his men in Arms, attired himself in his richest robes, as if hee had been going to some solemne feast, putting 200 crowns in his pocket, the which he said should be a reward for some Barbarian to bury him. After which, he put the keyes of the Castle in his bosome, saying, With these the Emperor put me in trust, and whilst I breathe no man shall take them from me. He would not couer his body with any Arms; saying, that he had no need of them seeing, hee desired nothing but a fair death by wounds. He made choice of the sharpest of his swords, saying, With this sword I first wonne my honour, and whatsoeuer I enioy, and with it I will willingly bear whatsoeuer God hath decreed of me, where I shall finde an end of danger or of life. So, hauing a great Standard carried before him, calling vpon the Name of IESVS, he commanded the gates to be opened, crying out; Follow mee noble souldiers, as you haue done euer, and let vs perform this last work of mortall men: and so, thrusting into the midst of their enemies, they made a great slaughter vpon the bridge. The Earle was shot thorough, and fell as he came on the land: of 300 there were not foure which came aliuie into the enemies power, and the woman (of whom we made mention) fighting valiantly, died by her husbands side. Thus Sieghel fell into the Turks hands, but they had no great cause to ioy of it: for, the Earle hauing laid a traine of powder, a great number of Turks being gotten into the Castle was blowne vp; wherewith there were three thousand men slain, and many others sore wounded.

Sieghel taken by the Turks.

Solimans death.

During this siege, SOLIMAN died of an Apoplexy, the seueneth of September; the which, MAHOMET Basha concealed from the knowledge of the Army: and, lest it should be discovered, hee sent his physician, and such as had attended him. In the meane time hee caused the trumpets and musick to sound after the accustomed manner, his diet to bee prepared, and his guards to be set before his tent as if hee had been liuing, vntill the comming of SELIM his sonne.

Maximilians preparation against the Turks.

Whilst that SOLIMAN was at Sieghel, MAXIMILIAN had drawne a great Army together at Vienna, whereof he made his brother FERDINAND Generall, and the Earle of Swartzenburgh his Lieutenant: wherein he was assisted by the Pope and many Princes. Many Noble-men came out of England to serue in this warre at their owne charge. From France came the Duke of Guise, the Earle of Brisack, Lanfack, & Craffe, and many other Noble-men. The Duke of Ferrara sent 400 Gentlemen and 300 shot; the Florentine, 3000 foot; the Duke of Savoy, 400 horse, buisiers on horseback, and other Princes did the like: neither did some Princes of Germany faile to send voluntary supplies; so as the whole Armie consisted of fourescore thousand men.

Whilst that SOLIMAN was busie before Sieghel, he sent BARTHA Basha to the siege of Julia, a strong Castle vpon the confines of Transilvania, hee hauing in his Army 80000 men; Transiluanians, Moldauians, Turks and Tartarians. The Gouerners name of the Castle was LEONDISLAVS SREBETZIN, by whose inconstancy and treachery it was yeilded five dayes before Sieghel vpon certain conditions, but not observed: for, the garrison marching away, the Turks lying in ambush fell vpon them; who making resistance for a while, in the end they were oppress by multitudes, and in a manner all slain, only some fewe (which would not consent to the yeilding of the Castle) escaped miraculously. SREBETZIN was taken aliuie, and carried captiue to Belgrade, who afterwards was put to a most cruell death in Constantinople.

SOLIMAN'S third Army lay neere to IANXIME to infect the Emperors Camp; so as there were daily daily skirmishes betwixt them, in one of the which MAHOMET Basha of Alba Regalis comming to charge the Imperials was taken prisoner by George THVRIGER: who presenting him to the Emperour, hee rewarded him with a chaine of gold, and gaue him the honour of knight-hood. There was a Spaniard then present, who hauing conueried much in the Turkes court, had heard this Basha bragge, that he alone would subdue the Germane King: the which he denied not, but with an vndaunted minde answered, that such was the fortune of warre, he had not onely spoken this, but might haue done it; but now he was a slaue, and could not doe any thing.

The Vauoide of Transilvania, required to haue the Castle of Julia, which BARTHA Basha had taken, restored vnto him, for that it did belong to Transilvania; the which the Basha promised to doe, if he would pay him 400000 crownes, for the charges of that siege: which the Vauoide being not able to performe, it continued in the Turkes power.

SELIM comming to the Army was proclaimed Emperour of the Turks; and then retired towards Constantinople: vpon whose departure IANXIME was by chance set on fire, wherewith the whole towne except the Temple, the Palace, and some few other buildings was consumed: but the Emperour knowing it to be an excellent bulwark against the enemy, caused it to be repaired; & seeing the Turks retired, hee dissolved his Camp, and went to Vienna, leauing the Earle of Solmes gouernour of IANXIME.

SELIM left BARTHA Basha in Hungary with a great number of Tartarians, who committed vspeakable cruelties. The Vauoide had drawne part of them vnto him, to the siege of Töcsay, whereas SVENDVS lay sick, hauing formerly provided for the siege, and received succours from the Emperour; but the Vauoide hearing that the Tartarians spoiled his countrey, he raised his siege to relieue his subiects. The Emperour being returned to Vienna, he assembled the estates and obtained a yeerely ayd of 138000 crownes against the Turk, and for the repairing of IANXIME 13000. Then he gaue Letters to AVGVSTVS Elector of Saxony, to execute the sentence giuen against JOHN FREDERICK Duke of Saxony, who had undertaken the protection of WILLIAM GRAMBATH and others condemned by the Emperour: whereupon the Saxon soldiers who had serued in Hungary were commanded to prepare for the siege of the Castle of Götha, whither AVGVSTVS went with his forces, being accompanied by the Emperors commissioners, commanding all gentlemen, citizens, and country men, in the Emperors name to leaue him, and to returne to their houses, vpon paine of losse of life and goods, and absolving them from their oath vnto the Duke; but these persuasions could not moue them to leaue him: whereupon they prest the siege, so as on the thirteenth of Aprill the Castle was yeilded, and JOHN FREDERICK became a prison to the Emperour. In the Castle Grombachius (being seuenethy three years old) with seuentene more of his confederates were taken, and all publicly executed.

1567.

Götha taken, Grombach with his companions executed.

The 12 of May there was a Diet ended at Ratisbone: where although that neither the Emperour nor any of the Princes of the Empire were present, except ALBERT Duke of Bawaria, who represented the Emperors person, yet it was decreed that the contribution promised at the Diet of Augsburg for three yeares should be paid in two; That the defences of the towne of Götha, and the Castle of Grimenseine should be raised, and that the Elector AVGVSTVS should be paid for that expedition.

MAXIMILIAN hearing that SELIM the Ottoman Emperour was tractable to a peace if it were required, he sent his Embassadors to Constantinople, where after some treaty it was concluded: and then they returned to Vienna, accompanied with an Embassadour from SELIM. A peace was made for 8 yeares, vpon these conditions: That euery one should hold what he had gotten by warre; That the Vauoide should be comprehended; that the bordering countrie men who paid rents both to the Turke and CESAR, should now pay onely to the Turks, and performe their workes onely to them; and the tribute or pension of 30000 Hungarian dukets which FERDINAND did yearly pay, should in like manner be paid by MAXIMILIAN to SELIM. This peace was very pleasing to all Christendome, and did much increase the Emperors power in Transilvania by the helpe of SVENDVS.

In the yeere 1570, the cruell warre, which had continued long betwixt the Kings of Denmarke and SVENHVA, was compounded by the mediation of MAXIMILIAN, the French King and the Princes Electors of Germany, who sending their Embassadours to a treaty at Seims in Pomerania, a peace was concluded to the content of both the Kings. And about the same time died JOHN SIGISMUND, the Vauoide of Transilvania (who had formerly beene called

A peace betwixt the Kings of Denmarke and Swedens.

STEPHEN

Mohomet Basha taken comming to charge the Emperors Camp.

STEPHEN being but 30 yeeres olde: his father was JOHN Earle of Silinia (whom after the death of King LEVVS, the Barons of Hungary had chosen for their King, contrary to the will of the Emperour FERDINAND) his mother was ISABEL daughter to SIGISMUND King of Poland; during his lifetime he usurped the title of a King; and studying for innovations, with the Turks aid he engaged Hungary in many miseries. STEPHEN BATTORI (who was afterwards called to the Kingdom of Polonia) succeeded him, CASPAR BRESSEVS (whom JOHN had appointed for his successor) being rejected, and driven out of Transilvania; but seeking to raise vp a sedition against STEPHEN, with the Emperours help he was vanquished and banished for ever; and STEPHEN gouerned that Prouince being separated from Hungary, with more quiet and peace.

The peace continued still in Hungary; and RODOLPHVS, eldest son to the Emperour MAXIMILIAN, was chosen King of Hungary with his fathers consent, who willingly yielded the Kingdom to him. And in the year 1575 hee was declared and crowned King of Bohemia in Prague with great solemnity, hauing receiued the Diademe of Hungary three yeeres before at Poesonia. After this, the Emperour calling a Diet at Ratisbone, RODOLPHVS was chosen King of the Romans with a joynt consent of all the Electors; and by his fathers desire was on the first of November, one thousand five hundred seuentie five, crowned in the Cathedrall Church at Ratisbone with accustomed ceremonies.

HENRY the French King, who had retired himself secretly out of Polonia, was now by a publike decree rejected: whereupon, they called an Assembly at Warlaia, for the chusing of a new King; in which, the high Chancellor, with the greatest part of the Counsellors, made choice of the Emperour MAXIMILIAN: and some others, with a great part of the Nobility (dissenting from the Councelly desired to haue a King issued from the Poland blood; and therefore they made ANNE, sister to the deceased King, a Virgin almost fifty yeeres old, their Queen; giuing her for husband STEPHEN BATTORI Prince of Transilvania, and proclaimed him King. Presently some write Letters to MAXIMILIAN, and perswade him not to accept of the Kingdom of Poland, relying vpon the suffrages of a few Senators and Noblemen. On the other side, they which had chosen MAXIMILIAN, sent to dissuade the Prince of Transilvania from accepting of that Kingdom; whereof the Emperour MAXIMILIAN was chosen lawfull King by the generall consent of the Senate of Polonia, Lithuania, and all Prussia. Such as fauoured MAXIMILIAN, sent to intreat him to make haste and come into the Kingdom before that STEPHEN BATTORI should get possession: but (whether presaging his death at hand, or busied with the affairs of the Empire, or vsing his naturall slownesse) he sought delays, requiring a more ample resolution touching the heads of his election. The Ambassadors told him there was danger in delay, and importuned him to set downe a certaine day for his coming into Polonia, and that he should signifie so much by his Ambassadors to the Nobility assembled at Leontia. CAESAR found new delays for his iourney, and propounded new conditions; requiring, that the Virgin ANNE, who onely remained of the family of the Jagelons (which the Polonians honoured so much) might be married to his son ERNESTVS, and he to be crowned King in his place.

While time was spent in these differences, Letters came from the Assembly at Leontia; whereby they complained much of his delay, the which was very prejudiciall to his affaires; and gaue him to vnderstand, that vlesse he came speedily, they should bee forced to giue the kingdom to him that came first: whereupon, the Emperour sent Letters to the Estates which were to meet at Marjania, propounding conditions touching the marriage of ERNEST with ANNE; requiring in the mean time, that nothing should be decreed that might prejudice his lawfull election.

In the mean time, STEPHEN BATTORI, being called out of Transilvania by the Noblemen of his faction, posted speedily into Polonia; and, taking ANNE to wife, was crowned in Crasnoia, the first of May, hauing first taken an oath to obserue all the rights, priuiledges and liberties, as they had been obserued by CASIMIR and other Kings his Predecessors; adding withall, that if he should violate them in any part, he should then lose all the right he had in the Kingdom, and the Noble-men should be freed from the faith and obedience which they did owe him as their lawfull King.

During this, the Emperour MAXIMILIAN called a Diet at Ratisbone, whither the Noblemen of Poland sent Ambassadors to him after the Coronation of King STEPHEN; intreating him, that seeing amidst the diuisions of Noble-men, and factious Citizens, he could not attain to that kingdom, he should take it in good part, the Realme being now come vnto a king, who was his friend, and deuoted vnto him: to whom he answered, that it should plainly appeare, that he would not so easily renounce the right which hee thought he had by this election. At this Diet the Emperour confirmed FRANCIS de Medici, with the consent of these Princes, in the title of great Duke of Tuscane, the which Pope PIVS the Fifth had graunted to COSMO the Great in the year 1566.

MAXIMILIAN (living but few moneths after the election of his son to be King of Romans) departed this life on the twelfth of October in the yeere 1577. He left great testimonies of his wisdom, piety, and vertues, worthy of an excellent Emperour: he had often that symbol of ABRAHAM in his mouth, Dominus providebit, and did much blame them which made fortune a goddesse. He condemned those Princes which would commande ouer the beliefs of their subjects, affirming that there was no greater sinne then to force mens consciencies: for (said he) they that wrest the soule, whilest they couet after heaven, lose earth. He desired to suppress all controuersies of religion: He was mercifull to his enemies, and louing to his faithfull seruants: he honoured and respected Princes and Noblemen: he was an enemy to intemperance; he loued naturall Philosophie, spake many tongues readily, of an exquisite iudgement, admirable of memory, eloquent, graue, and ponderous in his speech; An obseruer of equity and bounty, a seuerer censurer of couetousnes, and much delighted in gardening: he conferred off of the holy scriptures, of the immortality of the soule, and of the resurrection from the dead.

To conclude, he was a Prince full of al piete and bounty; and if the troubles & civil wars in Germany had not crost his good resolutions, and weakened his power, he would haue left nothing vnattempted to haue ruined the Ottoman Empire. Hee was of an ordinary stature, his countenance full of grauitie, and his head somewhat balde. He was a great fauorier of Learning, and learned-men, to whom he gaue great pensions, and especially to Mathematicians, and Antiquaries, being greatly delighted in those faculties. He was very actiue of his body: by AVOGUSTA MARIA daughter to CHARLES the Fifth, and his cousin-germane, he had sixteen children, whereof tenne were liuing. Of his foure daughters, ISABEL was married to her Vncle PHILIP King of Spain, MARY was wife to CHARLES the Ninth, the French King. ANNE and ELEANOR were then but children. His sonnes were RODOLPH and MATTHIAS, both Emperours: ALBERTVS, a Cardinal and Arch-bishoppe of Toledo (but afterwards renouncing his Ecclesiasticall dignities, he married with ISABELLA Infanta of Spain, in whose right he is duke of Brabant, Earle of Flanders, &c.) ERNESTVS, MAXIMILIAN, and VENCESLAVS. He had but one wife, after whose decease he would not marry any other. Hee was, blindly, very Religious: and respecting much the greatness of the Pope, hee endeouored also to haue drawne all the Princes of Germany to haue done the like.

The death of
the Emperour Maximilian.

THE

1575.
Rodolph chosen
king of Hungary, of Bohemia, and of the Romans.

Controuersie for the Kingdom of Poland.

Stephen Bat-
tori crowned K.
of Poland.

THE LIFE OF RODVLPH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND EIGHT-TEENTH ROMANE
EMPEROVR.

(*)

He Imperial dignity (being in a manner made hereditarie to the house of Austria) after the death of MAXIMILIAN the Second of that name, was by a generall consent of all the Electors, confirmed to his son RODVLPH, King of Bohemia, and Hungary, chosen a little before King of Romanes, at his fathers intreaty. At his first entrance, he gave great hopes to restore the Empire to her ancient dignity and splendor, and to recouer such countries as had beene vsurped from the Empire: But he was a prince of too soft a spirit, and loved peace and ease, referring the government of affaires to his Counsellors. He lived much in the Castle of Prague, and was much delighted in the gathering together of precious stones, and the exquisite setting and working of them. He bid Armes Adue, yet he valiantly protected

Hungary, Bohemia, Austria, and other prouinces. Presently after his coronation (for the better settling of his new dignitie) he sent to the Pope to be confirmed by him, and to intreat him to declare him the eldest son of the Church. Then calling a Diet at Ratisbona, he employed all his credit and meanes, to haue matters concerning the Romane Religion reformed, pressing the Princes of Germany to consent to his new reformation. After this, he sent an Embassadour to the Ottoman Emperour, to haue a confirmation of the truce made betweene him and his father MAXIMILIAN, and in the meane time hee perswaded his brother MATHIAS (who was gone into the Nether-lands, with hope to make himselfe Lord of those prouinces) to abandon that enterprise, and to returne into Germany, shewing him, how dishonorable it would be if through his fault, the troubles of those countreys should be increased: But his perswasions could not preuaile against his resolution: yet soon after (being discontented with the estates of those countries) leauing them he returned (with little honor) into Germany.

This yeere SALENTINE B. of Paddborne, and Elector of Cullen, a iust man, and valiant, more fit for war then to make a priest, being the last which remained of the house of the Earls of Ifenburg, married a daughter of the Earle of Aremburg, and gaue ouer both his Bishopricks. HENRY Duke of Saxony and Archbishop of Breme succeeded him in that of Paddborne, vpon condition that he should euery yeer keep his court three moneths in the diocesse of Paddborne; as much in Osnaburg; and six moneths in Breme. And to the Electorship of Cullen, succeeded GEORGE TRVCHSES, sonne to WILLIAM Baron of Walbourg. STEPHEN BATTORI going to bee King of Polonia, had left his brother CHRISTOPHER to succede him in Transilvania: who being worne with continuall infirmities, died, leauing STOISMYND his sonne to succcede him, the which was confirmed by the consent of all the estates: and STOISMYND

PHEN

PHEN BATTORI, King of Polonia, sent an Ambassador to AMVRATH the Turk, to intreat him, that (seeing Transilvania was tributary to the Turk) he would suffer STOISMYND to enjoy it, as other Princes before him had done; and if any thing were attempted to the contrary, he said he could not abandon his kinsman and his country: but AMVRATH yielded easily vnto it for King STEPHEN's sake, who at that time was in war with the Muscouite touching Lithuania which he detained: And the Muscouite in the mean time sent Ambassadors to the Emperour RODVLPH, and to the Bishop of Rome, promising succours against the Turk, the common enemy of the Christian Name; hoping by this means, that he should easily obtain a peace with the King of Poland.

TRVCHSES, having succeeded SALENTINE in the Archbishoprick of Cullen (as wee haue said) in proesse of time resolved to take a wife, and yet retain his Electorall dignity and Archbishoprick: whereupon he married ANNE, daughter to GEORGE Earle of Mansfeld. The marriage was secretly consummated at Bona, in the presence of her brother & sister; which marriage bred great confusion in Germany. The marriage thus consummated, TRVCHSES left Bona: and hauing drawne some horse and foot together, hee selfe vpon Marpourge, and tied his subjects to him by a new oath. Then he called an Assembly of the Estates of Westphalia and Cullen: to whom the Elector and the other Palatines, with the Lantzeграue of Hesse, sent their Ambassadors: and LEVY Elector Palatine laboured faithfully with the Emperour, with the Chapter, and with the Senate of Cullen, for the retaining of TRVCHSES his dignity: which others did oppose strongly: and the Earle of Aremberge leised vpon Bona, in the name of the Chapter; whereupon TRVCHSES flew to Arms, and craued aid of his friends. In the mean time, the Pope sent down ANDREW, Cardinall of Austria, to depriue TRVCHSES of his Electorship of Cullen, and to giue power to the Chapter to chuse another; but the Elector Palatine would not suffer them to passe: whereupon, afterwards the Pope by a publike decree made in Rome, dated in April, in the year 1583, declared the said GEORGE TRVCHSES to be a notorious Heretick, periured, fallen from his Archiepiscopall dignity, and vncapable of all spirituall charge: and soon after, ERNEST of Banaria, sonne to ALBERT Duke of Banaria, was chosen by the mediation of the Pope, the Emperour, the Duke of Parma, and others. Whereupon, the war grew hot betwixt them, either of them fortifying himself with his friends: but ERNEST still kept possession, and liues at this day.

In the beginning of this year, Pope GRAZIORE the Thirteenth took vpon him to reform the Calendar, for that there was some small difference or distance, the year being not precisely fitted, equal to the course of the Sunne; so as in the beginning this little error did produce many discomforts: whereupon the Pope, desiring to haue the honour of this reformation, published his Bull for the adding of ten daies. The Emperour, being at a Diet at Ausburg, propounded the publication of this new Calendar: which the Protestant Princes reiected; not for that it was rashly done and needlesse, but for that the Bishop of Rome had ordained it without the priuiey of the Emperour to whom that office did belong, nor with the consent of the Princes of the Empire; the Elector of Saxony grauely admonishing them to haue a care, lest vnder this colour of reforming the Calendar, they did not giue to the Pope a new iurisdiction and commanding power ouer the maiesty of the Empire and the Emperour himself. Wherefore, when as none of the Princes or Cities which embraced the Confession of Ausburg, would allow of this Calendar in Germany, he commanded that the old form, obserued in the Imperiall Chamber, should be for that year kept.

In the year 1584, there was a truce concluded betwixt AMVRATH who had succeeded SEIM his father, and the Emperour RODVLPH, the which was to continue for nine yeeres. The Emperour sent his Ambassadors with Presents, who came first to Buda, where they concluded this truce with SINAN Basha; and then they went to Constantinople to haue it confirmed. In the mean time, ten thousand Turks entred vpon the confines of Carniola, where they committed great spoils, and carried many poor Christians into slavery: but they were pursued by two thousand Christians, who ouertrew them and put them to flight, freeing all the captiues, in which conflict there were foure thousand Turks slain. AMVRATH was somewhat moued heerwith: but, being duely informed that the wrong proceeded from the Turks, hee was soon pacified, and held them worthily slain; saying, that hee would not haue his people attempt any thing vpon the confines of Hungary that might trouble the peace; commanding the Bashes of Buda and Temeswarre, very strictly, to contain their bordering souldiers in their duties: the like he required from the Christians.

Ernest of Banaria chosen Arch-bishop of Cullen,

The Calendar corrected by Pope Gregory the 13.

The protestant princes in Germany refuse to admit the new Calendar.

A truce betwixt the Emperour and the Turk.

Salentine Elector of Cullen marries and resignes his Bishopricks.

Sigmund Battori chosen Prince of Transilvania.

A controuersie
compounded.

This yeer 1585, the Citizens of Magdebourg were in great controuersie with their Archbishop touching the ecclesiasticall and political iurisdiction, and for one of the Cities gates ioyning to the Bishops Palace, by which he did usually come in and go out at his pleasure. The Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh by their intercession compounded these quarels; whereby it was concluded, that the City should haue free exercise of the religion of the Confession of Amburg, with diuerse other priuiledges, and the Archbishoppe should haue the gate opened whensoever he would enter; but the keyes should be kept by one of the Senators, and the Porter should be appointed by the Senate; who should enter into bonds, both to the Archbishop and to the Senate, to giue free egress and regress to either party, and at all times when need should require, without any prejudice to the other party; but yet so as no Counsellors nor Ministers should be admitted, vnlesse either the archbishop, or the administrator, were there in person.

Competition for the Crowne of Poland.

STEPHEN BATTORI king of Polonia, dying this yeere 1587, the Nobilitie met at Vasania, for the chusing of a new king. There were many Competitors for the Kingdome, namely, ERNESTVS, MATHIAS, and MAXIMILIAN brethren, Arch-dukes of Austria, recommended by the Emperor RODOLPH their brother, by the king of Spain, the Pope and other Princes, whom also many Noblemen (enemies to SAMOSCIVS the Chancellor) did fauour. The second was SIGISMUND, king of Swethland, grand-child by the mothers side to JAQVLON king of Poland. THEODOR, great Duke of Muscovy, did much affect this neighbor kingdome. Some would haue one PIASTVS, a Noble-man of Polonia chosen; and other desired to haue SIGISMUND, brothers son to the deceased King: yea, there were some which gaue their voice to ALEXANDER FARNES for his singular vertue, and glorious exploits.

After much contention, in the end the Nobility was diuided into two parts: the one made choice of SIGISMUND of Swethland, the other, of MAXIMILIAN of Austria, the Emperors brother: so as either of them challenging the kingdome they fell to Armes; but the Swethen being a young Prince of one and twentie yeeres of age preuailed: being supported by the Chancellor SAMOSCIVS who was very powerfull, he came into Poland, and was crowned in Cracovia this yeere in December.

Maximilian of Austria besieges Cracovia.

The yeere following, the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN seeking to get the possession of the Kingdome, came speedily with 16000 foot and horse, and planted his Camp within sight of Cracovia, requiring to be admitted and crowned. The Cracouians who fauoured the Swethen would not receiue him, but sent vnto the other to hasten his coming, and in the meane time they fortified their City, burnt their suburbs, and salied forth daily. During the siege many Germanes died: and MAXIMILIAN hearing, that the King of Swethen was come to Perriconia, he raised his Campe, and marcht to meete with him, to decide their quarrell by a battaile; but either knowing by the way, that the Swethen was farre stronger, hauing thirty thousand men in his army, or for some other consideration, he changed his aduice, and returned to Cracovia, which he attempted againe in vaine: and SAMOSCIVS the Chancellor followed him with a thousand two hundred choice men; the report whereof, did so terrifie the Army, as MAXIMILIAN retired to the confines of Silesia, putting himselfe into the towne of Pisense; whither SAMOSCIVS pursued him, and besieged the towne: where MAXIMILIAN (no longer able to defend himselfe) was forced to yeeld, and so was carried backe Captiue into Polonia.

MAXIMILIAN being committed to custodie, the Bohemians did expostulate with the Polonians, for the breach of the League which was betwixt them, for that during the peace betwixt both the kingdomes, the Polonians had entred in hostile manner, into Silesia, and had besieged their friend MAXIMILIAN, and carried him out of the prouince captiue, for whose disgrace many Princes were grieved.

Notwithstanding the truce betwixt the Emperour RODOLPH and AMVRATH the Third, yet the Turkes did often breake it: and this yeere they hauing gathered together their bordering troupes at Saramum, vpon the lake of Palata, meant therewith to invade the confines of the Christians, but they thought it fittest to preuent them: wherupon they set vpon the Castle, and forced it, wherein they took 190 men of special note, 70 women, with a great number of ordinary souldiers, whom they carried away Captiue; but ALI BASHA the motiue of all these broiles escaped: whom AMVRATH afterwards without any respect of affinity (hauing married his sister) caused to be hanged, for that he had broken the truce with the Christians. But

Captiues taken from the Turkes.

But this execution did not terrifie them from making incursions, spoiling some townes and many villages.

GEORGE SERIN sonneto Count NICHOLAS, imitating his fathers glory, was sent against them, of whom he made a great slaughter, the which was the more gracious to the Otoman Emperour, for that there perished many choice souldiers and excellent Captaines: wherat being incensed, he rewarded the Gouverneur of Sigeth, the author of this expedition, as he had done ALI BASHA. Afterwards SINAN BASHA to reuenge these former losses, and to wipe away the ignominy, had gathered together ten thousand men, horse and foote, meaning to spoile all Hungary. Nere vnto Sixa, CLAVDIVS RVSSEVS opposed himselfe with one thousand seuen hundred men, with whom the Gouverneur of Agria ioynd, and both together set vpon the Enemy, and put them to flight; in the which there were three thousand Turkes slaine and drowned; all their Waggon, with great store of victuals, and thirty Ensignes were taken. This victory was not so pleasing to the Emperour as was expected: for notwithstanding that he had a faithlesse peace with the Turkes, and knew well that they gouerned their counsels by the euent of things, and would willingly imbrace all occasions to annoy the Christians, yet he would not be the cause, the truce should be infringed: Wherefore he dismist all the Captains from their charges, pardoning the souldiers, but when he vnderstood that the beginning of these wrongs proceeded from the Turkes, hee allowed of their excuse. AMVRATH depriv'd SINAN BASHA of all his goods, and committed him to prison in Constantinople.

The Turkes defeated by the Christians.

The question betwixt King SIGISMUND and the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, being a prisoner, was yet treated of in Poland by Cardinall ALDOBRANDINO Legate for the Pope, and the Ambassadors for either party. There were manie difficulties, and still new did arise; but in the end, by the diligence and care of those Ambassadors, a Peace was concluded betwixt the Polonians and the house of Austria, vpon certain conditions, which the Emperour should confirme by oath, and so SIGISMUND the Third enioyed the kingdome quietly. After which, there being an Assembly of the States called, the Emperour sent his Ambassador, who complained much of a Decree made the yeere before, wherein it was mentioned, that no man, hereafter, in the election of a new King of Poland, should presume to name or recommend any one of the house of Austria; if he did, he should be (ipso facto) infamous, requiring that this ignominious exclusion (the like whereof had not bene seene in any other Nation) might be abolished: Which done MAXIMILIAN should take the oath he had promised, and the Emperour, with the whole house of Austria would suffer them to leaue men, and to buy victuals in their Countries, if Poland should be invaded by the Turke. Whereunto the King answered; that hauing conferred with his Councell he would satisfie him; in the meane time he could not concale, that he had ben aduertised from the Turkes Court, and by the Ambassadors of other Kings, that the Emperour had prest the Turke to make warre against Poland, being a most fit time, the Noblemen there being then in factions, that they had no firme peace with the Princes of Germany, nor with the Muscovite, neither had they any store of money to leaue and entertaine strangers.

A peace betwixt Sigismund of Po. and, and Maximilian of Austria as liberty.

When the Ambassador had excused all this, he afterwards receiued his answer: That the Polonians had been forced to make that constitution concerning the house of Austria, to auoide greater daungers. But if the King of Spain, and MAXIMILIAN would performe the promised Oath, they would doe that which was iust and fit for the dignitie of the Common-wealth; that the Decree did onely concerne MAXIMILIAN; but if the other Arch-dukes and his kinne-menne did support him, then it should extend to the whole house of Austria. Thus the Ambassador took his leaue, and departed with a sallowe answer: notwithstanding afterwards these houses were thoroughly reconciled, by reason that King SIGISMUND married with ANNE of Austria, who was daughter to the Arch-duke CHARLES.

The truce continued still in Hungary with AMVRATH, to the great content of the subjects, and AMVRATH was well pleased to haue prolonged it eight yeeres more: but hauing made a peace with the Persian, his Bashas perswaded him to imbrace the occasion, and to send a good Army against the Christians, they being now engaged in ciuill warres. This counsell pleased AMVRATH and his sonne, wherupon hee commanded preparations to bee made both by sea and land. In the beginning of the yeere they entred vnexpected, and forced diuerse townes. After which the Army turned to Camisa: but they were repulst, and put 1592.

Amvrath renews the war in Hungary.

to flight by the garrison, losing in a manner all the fruites of their former victory. AMVRATH (being importuned by his sonne and others) sent ASSAN Balha with a strong Army into Croatia, where at the first hee tooke Castrotrium by treason: after which hee went to Vehitium the Metropolitan City of Croatia, the which after some small batery yeelded; after which he put to flight ERDOD with fifty thousand men, lying betwixt Vehitium and Carlostad.

This Army in Croatia increased daily, which strooke a great terror into all Hungary, Bawaria, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Moravia, Silesia, and all the neighbour provinces. The Emperour assembled the states of Silesia and Moravia, acquainted them with the danger, and perswaded them to ioyne all their forces, to resist this barbarous enemy, although he did not doubt but AMVRATH would disauow this warre, and the breach of the truce; yet hee knew that the Turks property was, that having once taken any townes never to restore them: wherefore hee sought by all means, to get aid to resist this tyrant. On the sixteenth of Iuly the Turks came with a forraging troupe to Senderine, thinking to surprize it in a miste: but they were discovered, and some few daies after, the gouernour of Agria meeting them but with small troupes and forces, they put him to flight, hauing lost in a manner all his footmen.

In Iuly, ASSAN Balha, growne proud with this successe, laid siege to Sisseck, a Monastery standing betwixt the riuers of Saua and Calapa, it being defended by a Chanon of Agria, with a good garrison: this he battered six dayes together with foure and twenty peeces of Ordnance; but it was valiantly defended, and he was forced to retire with shame and losse. Hauing lodged his Army not far off, he attempted the Chanon with promises of reward, giuing him to vnderstand that hee knew well in what estate they were. The Chanon wondered who should discouer their secrets to the enemy; yet hee brought in his Messenger and shewed them the whole Monasterie, being very careful to discouer the traitor: In the end, hee findes it was the Steward, wherupon taking him and the Turke, hee cast them secretly into the Riuier: ASSAN wondering at the long staie of his Messenger, sent to know if any violence were offered him. The Chanon answered, hee had sent him away presently with a kinde answer, and if any accident had happened vnto him vpon the way, he was not acquainted with it; adding withall, that seeing there was but little hope to defend the place against the Turkes forces, hee would treat with the Balha to yeeld it, so as hee would send some honourable persons, the which (for that it concern'd his reputation much) should receive the place, and withall appointed a day for the deliuerie. The Balha was glad of this answer, making choice of a troupe of the better sort to goe into the Monasterie; in the meane time the Chanon planted his Ordnance, and couered it that the enemy might not see it, lodging his garrison armed in secret places, that when a signe were giuen they might fall out vpon the enemy.

The Turkes came on, all richly attired, and riding three in a ranke, whereof fiftie were receiued in at the great gate: but presently the herse was let downe, and the Ordnance discharged vpon them, and at the same instant the garrison salied forth vpon such as stayed without, and such as could escape, made what haste they could to returne, cursing their entertainment at Sisseck. The Balha wrote proud Letters to the Chanon, that he would not giue ouer the siege till he had taken the place, and that he would sley him alive to the reproach of Christendome. But the Chanon was not much moued with his threats, neither did the Balha any memorable thing there this yeere.

The Beglerby of Greece entred Hungary with a great Army: hee attempted Toggy, a strong Castle in vaine, from which he attempted Gompyrha seated in a marish, and easily to be defended. ASSAN Balha was still in Croatia and Carinthia, putting all to fire and sword. In September he came to the Emperours court, that CANISA was straightly besieged with an Army of 160000 Turkes, yet there was good hope for that the Christian Army increased daily, the Arch-duke ERNEST being made General. The Camp lay then at Carlostadium, where the Turkes came to view the Army from the top of a hill: and the Christians sending out souldiers to discouer the enemies Army, found no more then what they had sene on the hill, so as the Christians slept securely without feare of any enemy, who came and charged them so suddenly as they had scarce leisure to put on their Armes: The fight was long and furious, and the slaughter great on either side: but the Christians being oppress'd with multitudes, fell in the same place where they fought, so as in all there scarce escaped fourescore: the commanders and Captaines fled betwixt: but afterwards they lost their heads, as a iust reward for their basenes. This victory was great, yet purchased with much blood: for many wrote the Turkes lost 12000 men. All the neighbour provinces were so terrified herewith, as they abandoned their townes.

Captaines

The Emperour sent to all the Princes, and Imperiall townes, laying before them the danger wherein Germany stood, vnto the enemy were presently repulst from their borders. The Princes of Germany, both to obey the Emperour, and to prevent the danger of the Christian Common-wealth, did presently giue order for the louing of men and money, and the Pope, the King of Spain, the Princes of Italy, and others did contribute bountifully to so necessarie a warre. The citizens of Aix, of the reformed religion, did not onely enioy the free exercise thereof, but also required to be admitted into the Senate, contrary to an edict, made by a general consent, whereby none but Romane Catholikes might be admitted to be Consuls, whereupon the auncient Magistrates complained vnto the Emperour: who enioyned them strictly to reduce their Common-wealth to the auncient forme. The new Consuls and Senators pretended that the peace of religion was infringed, and employed all the Princes and orders of the Confession of Ausburg: the Emperour taking aduice hereupon at a Diet at Ausburg, commissioners were sent to Aix, who hearing both parties, and leauing the cause vndecided, made relation vnto the Emperour, who gaue a seuerer sentence against the accused, dissanulling all that had bene done, and reducing the gouernment to the same estate it was in the yeere 1560: That they should pay all the charges of the suit, the Emperour reseruing to himselfe the penalty for the offence committed &c. The execution of which sentence, they of the reformed religion laboured to stay, by the mediation of the protestant Princes.

This yeere the Turkes came againe to besiege the monastery of Sisseck, with 30000 men. ASSAN Balha (who was there General) planted his Ordnance, and battered it; furiously tenne dayes together, so as the besieged were brought to that distresse, as they had small hope to defend it any longer. The most resolute did encourage the rest, so as in the end they resolu'd to attend all extreames, rather then to yeeld themselves to assured death and shame. They aduertised the Bishop of Agria, and the gouernour, of their desperate estate, whereupon the Christians hauing drawne an Army of 5000 men together, after much consultation of the danger, in the end they resolu'd to charge the enemy: The two Armies ioynd: and although the Turkes exceeded them farre in numbers, yet God gaue strength vnto the Christians, who defeated them, and put them to flight: their Camp, baggage, ordinance and munition was taken, and carried to Sisseck. They write that there were eightene thousand slaine, amongst which ASSAN Balha was one, with many morre of speciall note. And of the Christians there died not about fiftie two.

The Emperour being aduertised of the victory at Sisseck, he wrote vnto AMVRATH concerning this expedition, and to know whether he would continue the truce and peace, which had hitherto bene kept betwixt them, or that he would hereafter proceede by Armes: and withall he sent a present to the Sultan, according to the vsuall manner, commanding his Embassador to stay at Commorha, vpon the confines of Hungary, with the present vntill the returne of his messenger: and if that AMVRATH would continue the peace, he should proceede; if not, then come backe to the Emperour. In the meane time he was came vnto the Christians camp, that SYMAN Balha had receiued commandement from AMVRATH, to invade Hungary with forty thousand men, to reuenge their late losse: that he should not be moued with CANISAs Embassie, and if he should by chance meete with the Donatue, he should take it away and distribute it among the soldiers, and so proceed in the action.

At this time the Turkish Emperour proclaimed warre against the Emperour both in Constantinople and at Buda: he gaue the charge of this warre to MAHOMET Balha of Temesuarre, and to the Beglerby of Greece, SYMAN Balha being chiefe General. SYMAN marcht with his troups to Buda, and the Beglerby led his Army by Croatia, meaning to besiege the monastery of Sisseck, which they had twice attempted with great losse and shame, but now they battered it with such fury, as in the end they took it, almost in sight of the christian Army, who were nor able to relieue them. The defendants were all cut in pieces, and the Monk was slaid alive and then consumed to ashes.

The Emperour being aduertised of the denouncing of this war, resolu'd also to Armes, and to provide all things necessary for his defence, and the rather for that he was giuen to vader-

O o o 3

stand,

The Emperour
craues aide against the Turks.

The Emperours
sues aide against the city of Aix.

The Turks besieged Sisseck.

The Christian victory at Sisseck.

The Emperour sends to Amvrath.

The Turke
proclaimes war against the Em-
perour.

Sisseck taken by the Turkes.

The Turke
proceede into Croatia.

The Turkes
sleue into Croatia
at Sisseck.

The Christians
sleue in their camp by the Turkes at Car-lostad.

stand that his Legier Embassador at Constantinople was kept in chaines, and his seruants miserably torne in pieces. SINNAN, after the taking of Sisseck, went to Vasperine: the which hauing battered some dayes, the garrison finding themselves vnable to resist to great a power, by night fled out at a Postern gate; whom the Turkes discouering followed, and slew many of them. Thence he went to Palotta: where hauing battered down the vpper part of the Castle, the Gouerner compounded for himself and the garrison, to depart with their liues & liberty: hauing plighted their faiths, the enemy being admitted into the Castle, this periured Barbarian taking the Gouerner and two others, they slue the rest. The garrison of Pappa had the like successe.

The Emperor, hauing by his spies discouered the enemies strength; leuied new forces, and commanded his Captains to draw all their men into one head; where vpon a muster there were found to be 8000 able and resolute men, besides the Hungarians and the horlemen. The Army, hauing passed the Dannow, encountered the enemy, and slue some thousands of them, freeing an infinite number of Christian captiues. The Turkes made halke to besiege Tuta. MACHIOR RUDER with a good troop of horse charged them vpon the way, and slue many, freeing many Christians of all Ages. These two victories strook a great terror into the enemy. The Commanders of the Christian Army went to Councell touching the managing of this warre: in the end, after some diuersity of opinions, they resolved to besiege Alba Regalis; whither they marcht as secretly as they could, and took the suburbs: but the Bascha of Buda, being aduertised heereof, posted thither with an Army of 20000 men, who came marching directly towards the Christians Camp, who resolved to attend them, and to fight with them: wherein God gaue them a speedy and an easie victory: for, the Turkes lost, in fighting and fleeing, 16000 men, and as some write but 12000; whereof the Bascha of Buda was one, and SINNAN their Generall was sore wounded: there were taken 40 of the enemies ensignes. Hauing gathered together the spoils, they took counsell for the continuing of the siege: but winter growing on, there being no great store of powder and shot in their Camp, and the Town hauing a strong garrison, they thought it fit to draw their men into good Towns to winter.

In November, FREDERICK DIEREMBACH, Gouerner of Cassonia, went with 14000 men to besiege Sabat, a strong Castle, which did much annoy the Christians; the which after some dayes battery he took. From thence he went to Fillee, whither PALEYS came to him with new supplies; where hauing battered three daies together, in the end they gaue an assault: but the enemies trusting to their numbers and strength (being 4000 choice men) defended the breach valiantly, and repulst the Christians; who, nothing daunted therewith, resolved either to dy honourably, or to enter the Towne: the which they did vpon a second assault, not without some losse. There yet remained two Castles to force, the which, the valour of the souldiers, and the indiscretion of the Bege of Fillee, made easie: for, in the beginning of the siege he had gone forth to seek for aid, and had brought with him the Bascha of Temeswarre, and 18000 men.

The Generall of the Christians, knowing that his intent was to force his Camp, went in the night and charged him, ouerthrew his Army, slue some thousands of them, and the Bascha himself, with the Bege of Fillee. And from thence they returned to Fillee, where hauing taken one of the Castles by force, the other yielded vpon composition to depart with their liues without Arms, they being in number 800 good men. The prey which they took in the Turke Camp and in the Castles, was very great. After the taking of Fillee, the Castles of Dylin and Honnasck were abandoned: they took the Towns of Seschem, and Brauenstein, and Salac, which the garrisons had left and fled. PALEYS in the mean time took Pregel and Palanc. Samsse a strong Castle yielded, with Arnac and Holac. Thus, by the great bounty of God, a great part of Hungary was freed from the Turkish slavery: after which, the vnseasonable weather forced them to go to garrison.

A while after, the garrisons of Petrina, Sisseck, Castronitz, and other neer to them, to the number of 3000, went forth to spoile the Christians Countrey: but GRASVNIUS, meeting them with 900 men, set vpon them, and slue 500, and forced all the rest in a manner to flee into the riuier of Collapa, so as fewe escaped. The diuers victories and rich spoils which the Christians had gotten, gaue great cause of ioy to the Emperor and his brother MATHIAS: to whom they sent Ordinance, Turkish horses, with many other rich Presents to Vienna.

This yeere, one thousand six hundred ninety foure, the Arch-duke MATHIAS brother to the Emperour, was made Generall of the Christian Army, against the Turkes: who hauing intelligence by a Turke which was their captiue in the Christian Campe, that Nouagrade, a strong Towne within three miles of Buda, was but weakly mand, they resolved to besiege it. The Garrison, seeing the Army approach, remembering that the Bascha of Buda had promised to relieue them, they prepared themselves for defence; but finding the Towne too weak to be defended against so great a power, they retired into the Castle, the which was strong both by Nature and Art, built vpon a Rock, with thick walles and high, the ditch was exceeding deepe, cut out of the Rock. Right against it there was another hill, vpon the which the Christians with great toyle planted their ordinance, with which they battered the Castle, and withall set fire on their fortifications, wherewith being much terrified, they offered to treat: whereupon the Arch-duke gaue them leave to depart only with their swords, there being 450 goodsoldiers in the Castle. The Gouernor going to Buda was committed to prison by the Bascha; & not able to purge himselfe was afterwards hangd, for that he had yielded vp so strong a place, without losse of men.

The Emperour finding the burthen of the Turkish warres to be heauy, he demanded aide from the Duke of Masconie, the Polonians, and Transiluanians. The Mulcouite receiued his Ambassador, honorably, and dismissed him with great hopes. The Polonians, although they were in peace with the Turke, yet they promised the Emperor all the assistance they could: And the Transiluanians desirous of liberty, and to purchase the Emperours friendship, did willingly embrace the occasion. The Earle of Serin and Nadassius, hauing gathered together some small forces, went to the Castle of Precentin and Segelesan which they found set on fire by the Turkes; but Serin besieged Babotes, a strong Castle seated in a marish ground, the which the Turkes basely abandoned.

Nouagrade being taken, DIEREMBACH went with twenty thousand men to Hatvan, a strong Towne six miles from Buda, the which he battered furiously, and brought to despair of all safety, if they were not speedily relieued by the Bascha of Buda, who had gathered together an Army of fifteen thousand men, past the riuier Saua, and marcht to charge the Christians behinde; which the Generall vnderstanding, he left the siege, and put his Army in order, taking some places of aduantage: the Armies met, and the encounter for a while was furious; but in the end the Christians put them to flight, and took their ordinance and munition, with seuen-teen ensignes. After this battaile they tooke Vasperin, which was abandoned by the Turkes, in which they found good store of corne, great ordinance and munition for warre. The Turkish Garrison which remained in Zabolz, hearing of the ouerthrow and death of their men, being terrified, abandoned the place, without any necessity: the which for strength and bignesse is compared to Toccai or Agria. The Arch-duke MATHIAS encouraged with this good successe, resolved to besiege Strigoniun, the which would open the way to Buda: whither bringing his Army, he battered it furiously, yet could they not keepe out the succors which were sent vnto them: notwithstanding they prest the siege, and the Turkes defended it valiantly; but the Citie being terribly torne with their continuall batterie, and in danger to be lost, newes came vnto them that Sinan Bascha approached with a great Army, which did much reuiue the besieged, and made MATHIAS for feare to raise his siege, contrary to the aduice of many of his commanders, whereupon he past the Dannow.

During this siege at Strigoniun, the Emperour assembled a Diet at Ratisbon, at the which hee assisted in person, making them acquainted with the whole progresse of the Turkish war; that in the yeer 1591 he had by his Ambassadors concluded a truce with the Turkish Emperour for eight yeers; yet, contrary to his faith, he had in hostile manner spoiled Hungary and the neighbour Provinces, taking many places, and carrying away 5000 Christians into seruitude: that he had often complained thereof to AMBRATH by his Ambassador, and required restitution: but he could haue no good answer; yea, AMBRATH Bascha, the Author of all this warre, was honoured and aduanced; whereupon he fell to open war, and besieged Sisseck. Being again put in minde of the truce, he invaded Hungary with a greater Army, forcing the poor peasants with fire and sword, to pay him an excessive tribute; that contrary to the law of Arms hee had cast CRCOVITZ his Ambassador into bonds, who being brought captiue to Belgrade, he there in great misery ended his daies in a filthy loathsome prison. That he for his part hauing drawn his forces together, had ouerthrown his enemy in some battailes, and taken diuers Townes and Castles from him. Yet it might be well coniectured, that he was not growne so weak as he could soone repaire his forces; yea it did appeare plainly, that the Turke would employ all his power, to reuenge his former losses and ouerthrows. He had therefore called that assembly with the consent of the Princes Electors, to the end they might conferre of those

The Emperour
craves aid from the Muscovites, and Polonians.

The Turkes defeated by the Christians.

Strigoniun besieged, on waies, by the Archduke.

The Emperour
speech at a Diet at Ratisbon.

Vasperine taken by the Turkes.

Palotta taken.

Alba Regalis besieged by the Christians.

The Turkes overthrown by the Christians.

Sabat and Fillee taken by the Christians.

The Bascha of Temeswarre with an Army of Turkes overthrown.

Nouagrade taken by the Christians.

those things which did belong to the preferuation of the Empire, but especially of the Turkeish warres, how it should be managed and with what supplies: Whereunto the Archbishoppe of Mentz (after conference with the Electors, and Princes of the Empire, and with the other Orders as well Ecclesiasticall as Secular) told the Emperor, that he should haue aide against the Turkes, and that Ambassadors should be sent vnto forraigne Princes, to inuite them to put to their helping hands, to suppress the common enemy of Christendome.

DIEFFENBACH was still at the siege of Hainau, and had brought them to that extremity, as they sent word vnto the Basha of Buda, that if they were not relieved within three daies, they should be forced to kill their wiues and children, to set fire on the Towne, and to make their way through the middle of their Enemies, by the Sword: The Basha, hearing in what danger the besieged were, hauing gathered together many thousands of Turkes, marched towards the Christians, whom D I E F F E N B A C H went to encounter, with fūe thousand horse; and charging them on the suddaine, slue fūe thousand, and returned to the Campe with rich spoils, whereupon they were in hope the Towne would haue yeelded; but the besieged endured a fresh assault wherein, the Christians being repulst, they lost 1000 good men, wherewith they were out of hope to take the City; wherefore fearing lest the Basha should returne with new forces, the Christian Army, being much wasted, D I E F F E N B A C H was forced to leaue the siege.

S I N A N Basha, in the meane time, entred Hungary, with an Army of 125000 men, his first attempt was vpon Tatta, a Towne lying betwixt Strigoniū and Lauerin, which yeelded: From whence he marched to Lauerin or Rhab, which is twelue German leagues from Vienna, the Christian Army lying in fight on the other side of the Riuer Dannew; but they were so weake, as they durst not passe it, to fight with S I N A N, daily expecting new forces: and the rather for that they heard, there were 2000 Italian foote cometo Vienna with 90000 duckets from the Pope, for the Hungarian warre.

In the beginning of August, the Arch-duke M A X I M I L I A N tooke Castroville, hauing put all the Turkes and Valachians to the Sword; from thence he went to Petrinia, a Fort built some few yeeres before by the Turkes, vpon the Emperors territorie: this Castle had fix strong Bulwarke well fortified, which made it seeme inexpugnable; yet M A X I M I L I A N battered it in such sort, as the Garrison being terrified, set fire on the Castle, euerie one escaping away as hee could, leaving it to the Christians; and in like manner they of Sisseke, setting fire off their Fort, abandoned it: After which exploits M A X I M I L I A N retired to refresh his Army.

In the meane time S I N A N Basha prest the siege of Lauerin (in which Count H A R D E C K was Governour) battering it with sixty peeces of great Ordinance, but he preuailed little: The besieged made many sallies, in one of the which they slew two thousand Turkes, with the Governour of Greece. There were great difficultes both in Armies; the Enemies forces were much decayed, both by sickness, and their daily exertions, wanting victuals: The Christian Army was much weaker, wherefore they were forced to keep themselves within their strength; but being not so vigilant as they ought to haue been, the Turkes suddenly cast a bridge ouer the Riuer, and intaded the Christians Campe; where, after some resistance, they were forced to sūe fearfully, to Altenbourg. The Enemy tooke that day great store of money, brought for the payment of the Army, all the furniture of the Campe, one thousand Waggon, two hundred Barques laden with Munition, and ten Gallies. S I N A N still battered the Towne, and gaue assaults, and was still repulst with losse, so as within two daies space (as some write) there were twelue thousand Turkes slaine.

The report was, that when S I N A N could not take the Towne by force, he sought to corrupt the Governour Count H A R D E C K: the which he imbracing, he euer after secretly, favoured the Enemies attempts, by the which they tooke away some of their Bulwarke, wherby they had small hope to defend the Towne. H A R D E C K conferring with some of the Captaines, resolved to send Messengers to S I N A N to craue a Truce for some daies, that they might in the meane time treat of the conditions of yeelding: In the meane time, fearing they should be taxed with infamy, if they should yeeld vpon a Towne so well fortified, without necessity, they wrote Letters to the Barons of Hungary, to excuse themselves, and to iustifie their action: And in the mean while, hostages were sent on both sides, and in the end it was concluded, that Count H A R D E C K, with his Captaines and Soldiers should depart with baggage and baggage with their full Armes and colours flying, and be conducted safely to Altenbourg. Thus the strongest fort of all Christendome, by the treachery of Count H A R D E C K was yeelded vnto the Enemy, being abundantly furnished with Wine, Corne, and all munition for Warre. For the which, the Earle, coming to Vienna, was committed to prison: and the yeere following, by the sentence of certaine Commissioners, who were choosen for that purpose, hee had both his hand and head cut off; which was a iust reward for so foule a Treacherie.

S I N A N, full of ioy for this victory, presently repaired the ruines, and fortified the Town: after which he resolved to besiege Gomorrha, seated in the lland foure miles from Iauerina, in which E R A S M V S B R V N N E V S commanded with a strong garrison; S I N A N, remembering how well he had sped with Count H A R D E C K, sent Letters by a country-man to B R V N N E V S, promising him mountains of gold if he would yeeld the place: but he would not look on the Letters, commanding the messenger to depart presently, saying, that he had no skill in the Illirian Tongue; neither was he made Gouverner there to conferre with the enemy, but to fight; and that S I N A N was deceived if he thought to finde a H A R D E C K in Gomorrha: After which answer S I N A N began to presse the siege with all the speed he could. The Arch-duke knowing, that after the losse of Iauerine, all the hope of miserable Hungary next vnder God, consisted in the preferuation of this place; hauing gathered together a good Army of Germanes, Hungarians and Bohemians, went with all speed to Nitra, not far from Gomorrha: which the enemy vnderstanding, hauing set fire on his Camp, he left the siege, and went to Iauerine. The Arch-duke entred into Gomorrha, repaired the ruines, fortified the defences, and caused new bulwarke to be made.

This yeer 1595, A M Y R A T H the second Emperor of the Turkes, sonne to S E L I M, left his life and Empire; whom succeeded M A H O M E T the Third: whom all men supposed would continue the warre against the Christians with more violence. Wherefore the Emperour, besides the aid which was granted at the Imperiall Diet, desired an extraordinary supply of horse and foot; the which diuerse Princes willingly brought at their owne charge: From the vpper Saxony came 12000 horse, from the lower, 600; from Francia, 1000 horse. Sueuia sent 4000 foot; Austria, 2000 horse and 6000 foot; Trill, 4000 foot; Bauaria, 3000; Westphalia, 500 horse and 1500 foot: the Silesians, Morauians, Bohemians and Lusatians, sent great supplies. Besides the Pope, the Dukes of Florence, Ferrara and Manua, the Emperour required the Poles to ioyne in league with him, and to make a social warre against the common enemy of Christendome. This proposition was much debated; S A M O S C I V S and many other holding that they should not violate the peace, which had continued fūe 75 yeeres betwixt them and the Turkes, and draw vpon them an vnecessary warre; yet for that they would not utterly deny aide vnto the Emperour, they lett him vnderstand, that they held it fit, that the Pope, the King of Spain, and the rest of the Christian Princes should ioyne in a firme league against the Turke: that these counsels should bee imparted to the Princes Electors, to the end the league might be made, not with the Emperour alone, but with the whole Empire: and soon after, the Emperours ambassadors coming to Craconia, Commissioners were appointed to treat of the conditions of the league they were to make with C A S A R and the Empire.

S I G I S M V N D B A T T O R I, Prince of Transilvania, hauing wrested many Forts from the Turke, did this yeer annoy them with many incursions: and the better to fortifie himself and his authority against the common enemy, he resolved by all means to ioyne in league with the Emperour, sending a stately Ambassage to Prague: where a league was soon concluded vpon certain conditions: that the Emperour should constantly prosecute the warre; that if he should conclude any peace or league with the Sultan, he should impart it to S I G I S M V N D, and comprehend Transilvania, Moldania and Valachia therein; that S I G I S M V N D should promise and confirme by oath for himself and all his subjects, to continue the warre against the Turkes, and not to conclude any peace with him without the priuiey & consent of the Emperour; that S I G I S M V N D B A T T O R I should enioy Transilvania, with those parts of Hungary, as his Predecessors had formerly done, with all their rights and reuenues, acknowledging the Emperours maiesty and his lawfull successors for their lawfull Kings; for the which they should take the oath of fealty when he should enter into the possession of the Prouince: and if the Prince or his Successors should dy without issue male, then Transilvania should be annexed to the Kingdome of Hungary. There were many other Articles set down in this league, the which to auoid prolixity I omit.

1594
Gomorrha besieged by Sinan Basha.

The Turke learnt by the siege of Gomorrha.

The Princes of Germany assist the Emperour for the Turkish warre.

League betwixt the Emperour and the Prince of Transilvania.

The articles of the league.

The Turks
seek to surpris the Prince of Transilvania.

The reasons which moved the Transilvanian so much to affect this league with the Emperor, was the treachery of the Turks against his owne person, and the excessive tributes where- with his Country was opprest: for, in July 1594, the Tartarians, who had been drawne down to aid the Turks against the Hungarians, were sent into Transilvania to seile vpon that Province by the Sultans commandement, and to expell Prince SIGISMUND, or to send him captiue to Constantinople. It was not vnknowne, that he fought to fall from the Turk to the Roman Empire, by reason of the intolerable tribute: which desertion many Noble-men of Transilvania fought to hinder; who, conspiring with the Tartarians, undertook to deliuer them the whole Province, and to send the Prince captiue to Moss, where they were incamped: whereupon they perswaded the Prince, that the great Chancellor of Poland attended him on the confines of the Kingdome with a great Army, to treat with him vpon matters of importance, deliuering him counterfeite Letters from the Chancellor; whereunto giuing credit, he began his iourney: but being on the way, he was aduised by some that were more honest and faithfull, to proceed no further; and that he was not expected by the Polonians, but by the Tartarians, who were resolved to depriue him of his estate. Being amazed at the newes, he retired with his company into a place of strength, untill he had drawne his forces together: and then he called an Assembly of all the Nobility to Clanfenbourg, dissembling the treason intended against him; where at a banquet he apprehended 14 of the conspirators, and put them to death. After which, he carried open Arms against the Turks.

The Transilva-nians conspire against their Prince.

The league being concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Prince of Transilvania, the warre grew hot in diuerse places, and the Christians recovered Vasilia with a rich prey. SINAN, resolving to go from Belgrade to Constantinople to salute the new Emperor, and to present him with the treasure which he had taken, was intercepted by the Valachians, who defeated his troops, and took all his treasure, he himself with some few others escaping the danger. MAHOMET hearing that the Valachians, being his tributaries, were now become his enemies, was much incensed; sending MICHAEL the Vaiuode (who was of that Nation) with great forces to invade Valachia, and to keep it for himself. MICHAEL goes with his Army of Turks into Valachia: but, before he would attempt any thing, he attended the Tartarians coming out of Hungary; but first the Valachians and Transilvanians met with them before they could ioyne, and slue eight thousand, the rest being put to flight: and then they attended MICHAEL with great resolution, who contained himself within his Camp. After which, CHAMOS the Tartarian, by the commandement of MAHOMET, entred Moldania and Valachia with a great Army, whom AARON the Vaiuode fought withall in three seuerall battells, and slue twelue thousand Tartarians.

The fraudulens propositions of the Turks.

SINAN Basha, being at Belgrade, called to him certain seruants of the Ambassador CROCOTIVS, who (as you heard) died there miserably in prison; telling them, that if their master had liued, he would haue set him at liberty as he did them, hauing brought him thither on- ly to treat of a peace betwixt the Sultan and the Emperor: but he being dead, hee would send his seruants to CESAR to let him vnderstand, that MAHOMET had giuen him charge to be- siege Vienna, the which he knew was farre more easie than Ianerin. He extolled his Emperours power, and disgraced the Germans, wishing that the Emperor would in time aduise (before the Army should march) how a peace might be made. He then sent them to Buda to his son, being Gouverneur of Greece; who, calling the Secretary before him, hee made many complaints of the wrong done to the Turks: he put them in hope of liberty, sending in the mean time one to the Emperor, with conditions whereby he said a peace might be concluded; that is to say, If the Emperor would restore all the Castles and Forts which he had taken, and their Territories; if the Christians would leaue Sisseck; if CESAR would not take into his protection the Transilvanians, Valachians and Moldauians; and, lastly, if he would duely pay the annual tribute that had been for many years omitted.

The Emperours
answers to the Turks propositions.

These conditions were giuen to one in writing, with this condition, that if he returned not with an answer in 15 daies, the rest should dy. BARLING returned from the Emperor with this answer, that he neuer had other intent but to maintain a firm peace with the Sultan, hauing alway fought it with such conditions, as their subiects might be freed from that fatal war. And making a repetition of their injuries and the success, he said, that the Beglerbey was much de- ceined, if he thought the Roman Emperor were reduced to those Streights, that he would ac- cept of any conditions of peace, how vnjust soeuer, and the Turks should soon knowe, that he neither wanted force nor courage to defend himself, and to recouer that which had bin lost by treachery: and as he had been alwaies carefull of the quiet and good of his subiects, and to a- void the effusion of innocent blood, so would he not now be auerfe from a peace, if SINAN would restore those places which he had taken. That the Transilvanians, Moldauians, and Va- lachians, had for many ages past, been vnited to the crowne of Hungary, as the members to the body: and therefore the Turke should not take it ill, if the Emperour undertooke their pro- tection, but rather promise neuer to invade those Provinces in hostile manner. If they perfor- med this, and made satisfaction for the wrong done vnto his Ambassadour (which all Prin- ces did detest) and set his seruants at libertie, there might be some meanes for a Peace, but if they did otherwise, there were no way of reconciliation.

(treachery)

CHARLES Earle of Mandsfeld, sonne to PETER ERNST (hauing spent many yeeres in the warres of Blanders and France) was by the Emperour (with the King of Spain's good liking) called into Hungary, to gouerne those warres vnder the Arch-duke MATTHIAS: he carried with him two thousand horse, and six thousand foote, most Wallons; with these forces he came to the Prague, where the Emperour did him much honour, after which he began to reform the martial discipline, and to leade the Army with more circumspection then formerly it had been. He marched, being accompanied by the Duke of Ferrara and Mantua, and others of great note, from Vienna to Altenbourg, with fifty thousand foote, and fiftene thousand horse, and laid siege to Strigonium, where at first assault he took the old town; the Turks flying into the new: then he planted his Ordinance, with the which he so battered the new Towne, and Saint THOMAS Fort, as a small breach being made, they entred, and put all to the Sword: then planting three batteries, and making a large breach, he commanded an assault to be giuen to the Castle; but they were repulst with great losse.

Count Mand-
feld goes into Hungary to command the Christians Army

Strigonium besieged by the Christians.

The Beglarbey or Gouverneur of Greece, drew together a great Army, to relieue the besie- ged: approaching neere vnto the Christians, MANDSFELD went forth to meete them, ha- ving put his Army in bataille: but the Basha of Buda, seeing himselfe inferior, both in valor and multitude, retired confusedly, and the Christians pursuing them, put the whole Army to flight; but comming againe to renew the bataille, the Christians were disordered and fled: Count MANDSFELD, knowing that he must either vanquish or raise the siege, resolved to giue them bataille with his whole Army, in which (hauing made a great slaughter of the Turks with his ordinance) both Armies comming to ioyne, he defeated them quite, and slew six thousand; among whom died the Basha of Ianerin and his son, and the Beglarbey of Greece (being fore wound- ed) fled to Buda.

The next day Count MANDSFELD summoned the Towne to yeeld, whereunto they answered: that although they despaired of all help, yet they had resolved to preferre a glorious death, before an ignominious life; whereupon the Christians (being incensed with this answer) returned againe to a fresh charge. Count MANDSFELD did not lye to enioy the fruits of this victory; for, hauing spent his force and his spirits in the bataille, playing the part of a com- mander with his tongue, and of a souldier with his hands, sweating and distempered, he called for drinke, so as he fell into a Fever, whereof he died soone after, at Gomorra, before the yeelding of the Towne. The siege was still continued with great violence; the Arch-duke MATTHIAS comming to the Campe; so as in the end, being brought to despair, they compoun- ded to yeeld the Town, and the soldiers to depart with their swords by their sides, euery one carrying a pack at his back.

Count Mand-
feld dies.

Before the yielding of the Towne SINAN Basha prepared a great Army to invade Valachia, Moldania, and Transilvania: who hearing of his intent, raised an Army of twenty thousand men, and charged the Turkes at the passage of a Riuer, where there was a long and furious bat- tle, being doubtfull to whom the victory would incline; but on the suddaine there came a supply of six thousand horse to the christians, which did much relieue those that were tired with fighting, by whose helpe they obteyned the victory, making a great slaughter of their enemies, and many being drowned in the Riuer of Dannew, the bridge breaking, with the weight of those that fled. The Germane Chroniclers write, there were 25000 Turkes slaine, and halfe as many Christians.

Sinan Basha enters Transilvania twice.

SINAN hauing recouered a new Army of seuentie thousand foote and horse, he passed the Riuer of Dannew, vpon the confines of Moldania, neere to the towne of Giorgum, lodging part of his Army in the Castles and Townes, vpon the borders of Valachia and Moldania. Thither came vnto him HASAN Basha, MICHAEL the expulst Vaiuode of Transilvania, with many o- ther Turkes and Tartarians of note. SINAN with the rest of his Army went to Terguist, a famous famous Monastery, which he converted into a Castle, and fortified it with all things necessary; refusing, not to depart before that he had subdued those Provinces: but the event proved otherwise.

In Hungary, HEBERSTEIN, Gouverneur of part of that Country, burnt the Towns of Cheeringa, Majlona and Bellahina; where he slew many Turks, and carried away many prisoners: among the which there were some of great authority. And at the same time the Haiducs took the Town of Wakmer on the other side of the river of Dannow, where they found a great prey. And about the same season, ALDERANDIN General of the Popes forces, and PALFI, besieged the Town and Castle of Pisgrade, lying betwixt Buda and Strigoniun, upon the right bank of the river Dannow, wherein at antient time the Crown of Hungary was usually kept: this place the Turks held invincible, neither could they force it in the year 1543, when as Strigoniun was made subject to the Turkish yoke; but two years after, the Christians abandoned it for want of victuals. Having planted their Ordinance, they battered it incessantly; and having made a large breach, the souldiers lodged vnder the wals: which the besieged perceiving, they began to faint; which fear opinion increased that there was no relief to be expected. Wherefore, on the twenty fifth of September, they made a signe of parley; and being admitted, they offered to yeeld both Town & Castle, so as they might have the same conditions the Turks had at Strigoniun; but it would not be granted: onely they had leave to depart with their lins, without Arms or baggage; which they accepted, and yeelded the place.

The Turks, which were vnder the command of the Balha of Bosna, had an intent to spoile Croatia neer to Petrina. The Christians living in those parts, hearing of their resolution, making a body of ten thousand souldiers, meant to encounter them. The Turks being twenty thousand (if that were true which themselves report) coming to fight, the Christians shewed such resolution and courage, that they due the greatest part of the Turks, the rest fleeing away. The Christians returning from this expedition, their forces increased, many fresh supplies being comm vnto them: and there joyned with them the horsemen of Croatia, Carinthia, and the neighbour Provinces, and the Baron of Herbenheim, with certain Hungarian Troops. All these forces being united, they came to Petrina, which they battered for the space of two houres, and lost in the assault 120 men. And finding that they should not prevail without greater Ordinance (the which was hard to bring through the mountains) they desisted, and retired to Sjsek, there to consult what they had to do. The same night, one BIZBO, very familiar with the Bege HURSTAN, fled out of Petrina; giving them to vnderstand, that the Bege being shot into the body, died soon after; that if they returned to Petrina, without doubt they should take the town, for that the Inhabitants were so amazed, that vpon sight of the enemy they would all forsake the Town. The Christians with this hope marched speedily away, and came to Petrina, which they found abandoned; the which they entered, and fortified with a good garrison, wherein they found ninety barrels of powder.

Whilest that these things passed in Hungary, the quiet of Moldavia was disturbed by SAMOSCIVS the great Chancellor of Poland, who sought to expell the Vaiode whom the Transilvanian had appointed, and to bring in a new, besieging the chief City of Moldavia. He was twice beaten and put to flight by the old Vaiode: in which encounters the chief Authors of that counsell were slain, and the new Vaiode expelled again. The Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN was then cald with his whole Army into Transilvania. This summer, not onely men, but even the elements did fight against the Turkish Sultan: for, after many defeats, another mischief followed; for, Rhab being set on fire, most of the Towns victuals were burnt: and NADASTI, meeting with a convoy of come going to Rhab, hee slew the souldiers, and carried away all the corn.

After Count MANDSELD's death, his Netherland and Walloon souldiers fell into a mutiny. MANDSELD had brought them into a Countrey which did not abound with gold and silver, like to the Belgick Provinces; but desolate, exhausted and wasted, where there was nothing to be expected but blows, wounds, and death. They often complained of this in his life time: but they durst not, by reason of his severe discipline, threaten any open defection. Being now in a mutiny, the Captains laboured fourteen daies together to pacifie them, and to contain them in their duties. In the mean time, many fleeing away, some were brought back and imprisoned, others were slain by the peasants. On the tenth day of October, foure and twenty foot and horse came to Pienna: being let in and lodged, they were fought for, and at length found. In the beginning they defended themselves valiantly; and one of them shotte himself himself through. At length they were taken, and deliuered ouer to the Iudge as Traitors.

MAHOMET, having received so many losses, especially by those who were wont to be his friends and confederates, was wonderfully transported with rage and indignation; swearing by his scepter, and by his Prophet MAHOMET, that he would reuenge those injuries, and prosecute warre against the Transilvanians, Valachians and Moldavians, vntill that hee had slaine them all; sending forth into all places to leue men, and to make prouision of corn and munition. SIGISMUND the Transilvanian, being aduertised heereof, fortified his Army with new supplies: hee caused five troops of Silesian horsemen, which were vpon the way, to aduance, and to haue the greater forces to encounter his enemy, hee granted to a certain people of his Countrey, called Dockeieri (who had resolved to forsake the Turk) their ancient liberties, rights and priuiledges, giuing them withall great possessions; but, vpon these conditions, that during the wars they should entertain 40000 armed men at their owne charge, and yeerly euery house should pay a dollar, with a certain measure of wheat, oats and barley; and if the Prince had a son which did succeed him, then euery family to contribute a fat Ox. These conditions pleased them well; and withall they promised a good donatie at the birth of a son. These things were proclaimed in the Camp of the Dockeieri, which all did confirm by oath: and hauing but 25000 men in their Army, they sent to leue the other 15000, the which was soon effected. The Prince, finding in his Army 80000 foot and horse, left the delights of Court, and went to Camp; where his onely care was, how to intercept and overthrow the enemy. Being aduertised by his spies, that SINAN and HASAN Basnaes, with the fugitiue Vaiode of Moldavia, were encamped by Tergouissa, and threatened utter ruin to his Countreies, the Prince resolved to fight with them. Wherefore, hauing commanded all to Arms, he put his Army in battell, and marched towards the enemy.

Being come neer to Tergouissa, the Prince called a Councell, to resolve (by their aduice) what was fittest to be done. In the afternoon, two Christians (which had been freed from the Turks) were brought to the Prince, who told him; that there had been such an amazement for two daies together in the Turks Camp, that no man could easily beleue such an alteration: for they, which but few daies before had deuoured the Prince in hope, and had resolved to meet him with his whole Army, were now stricken with such fear, that, had not SINAN staid his Janizaries within the Camp both by threats and promises, yea and by force, all had fled away: but some hundreds brake out in despite of SINAN. In the end, SINAN, no lesse terrified than the rest, fled with his whole Army, leaving in the Camp his tents, ordinance, warlike preparation and victuals; carrying nothing with him but what was most precious. Hee left HASAN Balha and MICHAEL the Vaiode in Tergouissa with 4000 horse and foot, promising to send them speedily supplies: after which, hee fled in all haste to Bacaresa, a daies journey off, to attend the event; writing Letters presently to HASAN, and aduising him if it were possible to defend the Castle, or else to provide in time for his escape: which Letters were intercepted by the Christians.

The Transilvanian, hearing that the Turks meant to send away 4000 Christians, men, women and children, by the bridge into Turkie, sent 500 choice foot men to pursue them, and to free the Christians; who got before the Turks, slew them all, and freed the captives. The Prince of Transilvania entered SINAN's Camp, and enioyed what they had left. Then hee summoned HASAN to yeeld Tergouissa; who, considering of SINAN's flight, of the great power of the Christians who had spoiled his Camp, resolved to yeeld the place, and to saue himself and his souldiers: but the Janizaries (who were 2000 in number) would not consent to the Basnaes aduice, but prepared themselves for defense. The Transilvanian presently overthrew the wals, and assaulted the Town and Castle; the which within fewe houres hee forced, putting all the garrison to the sword: he spared the Balha (whom hee had taken with his owne hands); and MICHAEL the Vaiode (who was turned Turk) was slain in the fight. SINAN a little before his sight had sent foure thousand men forth to spoil; who returning to the Camp (being ignorant of what had past) were slain by the Christians, losing all the booty they had taken in Valachia.

The Prince, leaving a good garrison in Tergouissa, marched with the rest of his Army to Bacaresa, hoping to finde SINAN there. But he, hearing of the losse of Tergouissa (doubting of his safety) left the place, with nine and thirty pieces of great ordinance, and great store of powder, victuals and other munition; and fledde to Zorza or Georgia. The Transilvanian took Bacaresa without any losse or labour; and sending some Troops of horse before, hee slew many

Ppp

Turks

Mahomet and the Transilvanian prepare to fight.

Feet in the Turke Camp.

Sinan flies.

The Transilvanian takes Sinan's Camp.

Sinan's second fight.

Pisgrade taken by the Turke.

The Turke slaines Croatia.

Petrina besieged

The Christians take Petrina.

Turkes in the flight, himfelfe following SINAN with his whole Army: but before his coming hee had renoued his Camp toward the river Dannew, which seeking to paffe, in this tumultuous flight the bridge brake, where many Turkes were drowned. SINAN himfelfe was carried into an Ifland from whence the yeere before he had expelled the Chriftians, and in the night efclaped by boat.

The Transilvanian after this happie victory, befieged Georgia: the which he battered continually, and hauing made a breach entred it by force; in which were flaine 30000 Turkes which could not follow SINAN in his fpeedie flight: they found in it 40 peeeces of Cannon, with fuch ftore of Armes, and munition, as would fuffice two kingdomes. They took many thips laden with ftuffes and other commodities; many Captiues were freed, with which the Prince triumphing returned to Bucareffa. It is written, that the Ottoman houfe for many ages, neuer receiued fo great a loffe. For which victories, the Prince commanded publick thanks to be giuen to God, throughout all the towns of Transilvania.

SIGISMUND Prince of Transilvania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and Earle of Dacia, wrote Letters vnto the Pope, fending him certaine Tartarian and Turkiſh enſignes, making a relation of the victories which he had gotten, by the ouerthrow of SINAN's Army: wherewith the Pope was greatly pleaſed, promiſing vnto the Prince all aſſiſtance of men, counſell and mony: and if neede required he would fend him his Army which was in Hungary. Soone after the Pope ſent a Nobleman, to the King of Poland, to perſwade him not to ſuffer his Chanceller, to moleſt the Transilvanian in Moldauia and Valachia, but eſpecially to perſwade Cardinal BATTORI, to forget the hatred which he had conceiued againſt his Nephew SIGISMUND, being moſt vnworthy in a man of the Church; and that he ſhould aſke the Prince forgiveness both with tongue and hart. The Emperour ſent an Embaſſador, with the like charge to the Polonian, and the Pope wrote his Letters of admonition to Cardinal BATTORI, and cited him to Rome.

SAMOSCIVS the Chanceller, puſt vp with ambition, without reſpect of religion or honor, fought to effect his deſignes. He perſwaded himſelfe that Moldauia did of right belong vnto the Kingdom of Poland, perſwading the King and the ſtates to ſuffer him to inuade that prouince, to expell the old Vaiuode, and to conſtitute another at his pleaſure; giuing them many reaſons, which had more apparance then truth. The Transilvanian he ſaid was inferior to the Turke in power; and therefore it was to be feared, hee would be expelled out of all his countries, and Moldauia become ſubiect to the Turkiſh tyranny: whereby Poland ſhould haue a trecherous and troubleſome neighbour. Wherefore it were better they ſhould take it, who could better defend it, whereby the Turkes might be kept farre from the Polonians: promiſing vnto himſelf ſuch fauour with the Turkiſh Sultan, as the Polonians ſhould eaſily enioy their deſires in this point. The Polonians being perſwaded with theſe and ſuch like reaſons, gaue him commandement to proceede: whereupon he expelled STEBHEN the old Vaiuode and ſub-regated a new, who ſhould be for euer a tributary client to the crowne of Poland. After this he ſent to SINAN Baſha, intreating him not to take it ill, that he had ſeized vpon Moldauia, and inſtituted a Vaiuode, but rather would get his inſtitution confirmed by his potent Emperour: promiſing that Moldauia ſhould be ſubiect vnto him, as it had been, and pay a greater yearely tribute. SINAN (whom ambition and pride made to dare any thing) answered the Chanceller, that it was not his Emperours pleaſure, the Polonian ſhould inuade Moldauia, and that the Sultan was able to defend it, without his helpe. That he had giuen it formerly vnto CZAR the Tartarian, who was now coming with many thouſands of men, women and children, to enioy it; but yet the Chanceller deſisted not from his enterpriſe. The Prince of Transilvania ſoone after (finding that the Polonians had ſome ſecret intelligence with the Turkes) aſſiſted STEBHEN the old Vaiuode of Moldauia with good troupes of horſe and foote, to ſee if he could expell the Polonians and recouer his loſt dignity. Coming to fight the Polonians had the victory: and STEBHEN defending himſelfe valiantly hauing had two horſes ſlaine vnder him, and being vpon the third, in the end was taken fighting: whom the Polonians after ward murdered cruelly.

The Turkiſh Emperour, hauing receiued ſo many ouerthrowes the yeere paſt, from SIGISMUND Prince of Transilvania, he reſolued to bend all his forces againſt him; who (hearing of this Turkiſh preparation) aſſembled the eſtates of his Countrey; whereby a generall conſent they reſolued to prepare to war, to repell this common enemy: and to the end that they might haue the Emperour an aſſociate with them in this difficult war, he reſolued to go to him. He came to Prigue in Feb. where being met by the Emperours Nobles, he was conducted to the

Arch-dukes

Arch-dukes Palace. The Emperour, vnderſtanding what preparations the Turke made, ſent to the Princes Electors to require mony for the leuying of an Army; the which was granted, and forces were accordingly made ready: but there wanted ſome one of great authority to command it. ALTONVS, Duke of Ferrara, offered to be the Emperours Lieutenant, and to entertain eight thouſand men for a yeer, if the Pope would grant the inueſtiture of Ferrara to his brothers baſon: whereto he would not yeeld. Wherefore the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN was made General, the Germans and Hungarians preſſing it, for that they deſired not to fight vnder a ſtranger which differed from them in tongue and manners.

The Emperour concluded with the Transilvanian, that, hauing gathered together a good Army, he would join with him; and he bound himſelf by ſecret Articles, to entertain euery yeer two thouſand horſe and three thouſand foot in Transilvania: for the payment wherof, he ſhould giue monthly foure and twenty thouſand dollers. And if SIGISMUND ſhould bee expelled his Countrey by the Turkiſh Tyrant, then the Emperour did promiſe to giue him land in Sileſia with an honourable penſion: and the Popes Nuncio promiſed forty thouſand duckets monthly, with ſome Italian Troops towards this warre. SIGISMUND hauing ſettled his affaires after this manner with the Emperour, he returned ſpeedily vnto Vienna: where the people flocke in the ſtreets, to ſee this young Prince who had wonne ſo many noble victories againſt the Turkes.

In Croatia there is a kinde of people who knowe no other art but ſtealing; wherein they exceed all mortall men, being Chriftians in ſhew: theſe, being gathered together in Troops, had concluded with two Chriftian Renegadoes to ſurpriſe Cliffa, a very ſtrong Fort in Illiria; the which they effected, and ſlue the gariſon. The Turkes preſently drew their forces together to recouer this Town; where the Croats annoyed them much, neither did the Baſha of Bosnia ſee any means to preuaile but by treaſon or famine. The Beſieged were ſo oppreſſed with hunger, that they ſent word to the Emperours Lieutenant in Siria, that if they were not preſently relieved, famine would force them to yeeld; ſo as he preſently gathered an Army together, and provided ſhipping with victuals, landing his men within foure miles of the Turkes Camp, marching ſpeedily to charge them; who, being terrified with their ſudden approach, fled. The Illirians and Croats who were in the fore-ward, breaking their ranks, fell to ſpoil; which the Baſha perceiving, commanded his men to returne to the charge: in which, the Chriftians, who were the cauſe of this diſorder, were ſlaine; and the reſt, being amazed, were put to ſhamefull flight. After which, Cliffa (deſpairing of all ſuccours) yeelded, vpon condition to depart with bag and baggage.

The gariſon of Tetta drew the Turkes of Comorra by a ſtratagem into an ambuſh; in which the Gouerner was ſlaine, with all his Troops: and the ſame day NADASTI, who commanded in the lower Hungary for the Emperour, hauing lodged 1500 horſe in a wood, ſent ſome of his Troops to Iaurine to get ſome prey, and to draw out the Turkes: who, following the Chriftians that fled, fell into the ambuſh, and were moſt of them put to the ſword.

The laſt yeer, the Transilvanians hauing taken Lizza, the Turke ſent forty thouſand men to beſiege it. The Transilvanian ſent 5000 men to relieue it, who valiantly defended the Towne, and made great ſlaughter of their enemies. The Baſha of Temefuarre fearfully raiſed his ſiege by night, leaving all his warlike inſtruments. The Hungarian and German Writers ſay, that there were 4000 Turkes ſlaine at this ſiege.

Lizza being freed, the Transilvanian beſieged, Temefuar ſending forth 2000 horſe and foot to diſcouer and ſpoil; theſe brought him word, that a certain Baſha, with his wife and children, with great ſtore of commodities, lodged in a poor Town, the which they ſcaled in the night, put the ſouldiers to the ſword: gathering together the priſoners and ſpoils, they ſet fire on the Town, and departed. The gariſon of Nicopolis, hearing which way the Chriftians marched, went to encounter them, where there was a cruell fight: but in the end the Chriftians had the victory, and ſlue 3000 Turkes, and ſo returned to the Camp at Temefuar with their ſpoile and captiues. The Barbarians, drawing all their forces together, came to charge the Transilvanians; where at the firſt the victory was doubtfull: but in the end the Chriftians preuailed, hauing ſlaine about five thouſand of their enemies; but yet they were at length forced to raiſe the ſiege.

MAHOMET conceiuing that his Commanders had either been negligent or vnfortunate in the warres, and reſolving to ruine the Chriftians, came in perſon to Belgrade, where he drew together an Army of 150000 men, with which he beſieged Agria; the Gouerner NIARVS

Ppp 2

An accord betwixt the Emperour and Sigismund.

Lizza beſieged and ſeized by the Turkes.

Temefuar beſieged by the Chriftians.

A great ſlaughter of the Turkes.

Sinans third fight.

Georgia taken by the Chriftians.

The Prince of Transilvania ſends to the Pope.

The Pope ſends to the King of Poland for the Transilvanian.

Samoscius ſummons Melchior.

The Emperour prepares to war.

having bin a little before supplied with men and victuals by the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN. There was a Town and two Castles: the old stood vpon the declining of a hill; and the new on the top. The Christians left the Town, and retired into the old Castle without any force; which the Turks having battered, they left this also, and fled into the new Castle; where they carried themselves no more valiantly than they had done before: for, after they had endured some assaults, and repulsed the Turks, the souldiers would needs yield to have their lives saved, contrary to the will of the Gouverner and Captains: but the Turks, violating their faith, having kept the Gouverner and other chief Commanders, slue all the souldiers, but such as impiously, to save their lives, would abjure their religion.

The Archduke Maximilian fights with Mahomet.

The Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, General of the Emperors Army, having ioyned with the Prince of Transilvania and the Hungarians, and making an Army of 60000 men, resolved to give battell to the Turks, contrary to the advice of his counsell. After diuerse skirmishes the Turks past a river with part of their Army, and came in good order to charge the Christians; who attended them resolutely, and repulsed them valiantly, forcing them after great slaughter to turn their backs, and repasse the river, the Christians following them even vnto their Camp: where falling greedily to spoil, and busying themselves in MAHOMET's Tent, to free the Gouverner of Agria from bonds, they were let vpon by CIGALA, who led the reward of the Turkish Army, and put to the sword whilft they were busie in spoiling; so as by their greedy desire they lost the glory of a famous victory. MAHOMET, having not been so fortunate in fight as he expected, and being weary of the Hungarian wars, returned to Constantinople to his delights and venvy: and the Christian Army was dissolved, and went to garrison.

In the beginning of this year 1597, MAHOMET resolved to return again into Hungary as soon as the season of the year would serue, and to besiege Vienna: but all Turkie being oppressed with famine, and MAHOMET failing of a peace with the King of Persia, whereof they then treated at Constantinople, he was forced to desist from his resolved enterprise. And for that the defection of Transilvania, Valachia and Moldavia, did much trouble him, being very necessary for the feeding of his Countries and Armies, he therefore sent Ambassadors to the Prince of Transilvania with rich Presents, to the end hee might draw him from all league with the Christians. The Prince entertained them courteously; and in the beginning answered them doubtfully, to the end he might protract the warre, and discover the enemies counsels: but hearing that the Turks were on foot, and marched towards Valachia, he drew his Army presently together, and charged them; at which encounter the Turks were in a manner all slain. After this exploit hee went with 40 coaches to Prague; where having had secret conference with the Emperor, hee received the Order of the golden Fleece, with many rich Presents; and then returned into Transilvania, the Emperor having promised to assist him with 6000 foot before the end of May.

The Turks seek to gain the prince of Transilvania.

Exploits of the Christians.

In May, PALFI, NADASTI and BERTIN, Bohemians, with some of the Emperors forces, having by night forced one of the gates of Tolia, a Castle in Hungary, they entered it without any losse, and slue the garrison. And the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, in August following, after six daies siege took Pappa; from whence he went to the siege of Iaurime: but hearing that the enemy came to relieve it with a good Army, he raised his siege, and went towards Vacua; whereas MAHOMET Basha offered him battell: but the Imperialists being far weaker, they kept themselves within their Camp; which, MAHOMET attempted to force, and was shamefully repulsed, with the losse of 700 Ianizaries, a Basha, and many of his choice horsemen. The next day, having by his messengers obtained a treaty of a counterfeit peace, with this subtle device he retired with his Army, and went to Buda. Soon after, the Turks returned to Tolia or Tolia (taken a little before by the Christians) and laid siege vnto it. CHRISTOPHER WEIDA commanded in this Castle with 250 souldiers; who although he performed the duty of a good Captain with great valour and resolution, yet in the end he was forced to yield, and to provide for his owne safety and his souldiers: for, the Turks having battered it continually, and made a breach, they gaue diuerse assaults, and attempted to force it; but they were alwaies repulsed by the valour of the garrison. In the mean time they had undermined one of the Bulwarks of the Castle, and blew it vp; which made a great breach. The souldiers being moied with this ruine, many of them being slain, some wounded, and some burnt with the fire, they persuaded their Captain not to cast himself and them away desperately: whereupon, in a tempestuous night they issued secretly by a postern gate, and went to the river Danow. The enemy this while giues an assault, and enters the breach: but he found the Castle empty, the souldiers before their departure having laid a train of powder, which taking fire slue many of the Turks.

In

In March 1598, the Earl of Sauerzembourg Lieutenant to the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, and the Baron of Palfi, laid a plot for the surprizing of Iaurime: they brought ladders, bridges, and all other instruments of war, secretly by night to Comorra, and prepared forces fit for such an enterprise, giuing to euery man his charge, exporting the souldiers to abstain from spoiling, and to regard the general good of Christendom more than their owne profits. The Earl having prepared all things ready for the execution, finding the draw-bridge down, and the vtter gate open, they made fast their Petard to the inner gate, which they forced. The souldiers which were in guard cried To Arms, and discharged their Pieces: but the Christians entered, scaling on the ports, ordinance, and places of strength, according to their directions. The Turks in this sudden amazement went to Arms: but they were all put to the sword, without respect of age or sex: The conflict lasted 5 houres; and the Turks fought with such obstinacy, that they willingly offered their throats to their enemies swords: the Basha, having defended himself long, was slain. SVARTZENBOVRG (having got this victory, not without the losse of much blood) caused all the spoil to be gathered together, attending the Emperors pleasure; who, reseruing only the ordinance and warlike preparation, commanded all the rest to be giuen to the souldiers.

Iaurime surprized by the Christians.

The fame of this unexpected victory as it reuiued the spirits of the Christians, so it daunted the Turks, who relied much vpon this place; as appeared by certain words grauen in a stone, which were brought to the Emperor: that is to say, Iaurime a Towne of the Turks is the key which can open all the Towns and Forts of the Christians. SVARTZENBOVRG was made Gouverner of the Town, with a garrison of 10000 men; and PALFI FABACORT the Pezardier, a French Gentleman, with others, was honoured by the Emperor with the dignity of Knighthood, and had great rewards.

In the mean time, SIGISMUND BATTORI Prince of Transilvania, who hitherto had fought against the Turks with great courage and valour, and faithfully entertained the league with the Emperor, whether now moued with the desire of a quieter life, or drawn by some other consideration, resolved to giue out the dominion of those three Prouinces to the Emperor; so as he might haue some duchy giuen him fit for his person within the bounds of the Empire. The Emperor accepted of this condition, and offered him a Duchy in Silesia; and the business was concluded in April, conditionally that Transilvania, with all the Towns, Cities and suburbs, should hereafter acknowledge the Emperor and the Princes of the house of Austria, for their lawfull Lords, and yield them all obedience due to their natural Princes; and that they should accept of the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, whom the Emperor had named, to be their Prince; and should enioy their religion as they formerly had done. This being concluded, the Prince, calling his Noble-men together, acquainted them with this action: and, freeing them of their oath of allegiance, he willed them to obey the Emperor, and then went to possesse his Duchie.

The Prince of Transilvania resignes his Countie to the Emperor.

In May, SVARTZENBOVRG attempted to surprize Alba Regalis, but in vain. Having drawn together 8 Cornets of Austrian horse, ioining with them of Hungary, and some footmen out of Iaurime, he marched secretly towards the Town: but this project was discovered to the Turks, so as the same night they fortified the Towne with a stronger garrison, and kept good guards without it; so as the Christians vnderstood by their spies, whom they had sent to discover, that there was small hope to take the Town. The Army was come within half a mile; and for that they would not return without some exploit, NADASTI was sent before with 150 horse to draw forth the enemy: whereupon, there falling forth 600 horse, they pursued NADASTI; who drawing them into an ambush, there were about 250 slain. The Turks, returning to Alba, came forth again with greater forces: whom SVARTZENBOVRG encountered, defeated and put to flight, having slain many, and taken some prisoners.

Alba Regalis attempted by the Christians in vain.

The Prince of Transilvania, having taken possession of his Duchy in Silesia, was not much pleased with that estate: but repenting him of his exchange, on the one and twentieth of August disguising himself in a Friars habit, he retired secretly with two more in his company into Transilvania. And coming to Clausenbourg, he found his wife at her deuotion; whom having kindly saluted, he took a new oath of the Citizens, and carried himself for Lord as hee had formerly done. Then, sending messengers into all parts, hee advertised them of his coming, requiring them to obey him as they had formerly done. He also sent Letters to the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, to whom the Emperor his brother had giuen the government of those Prouinces; intimating, that whereas the Duchies of Opelia and Ratibon, which the Emperor had exchanged with him, did in no sort equall his Countries, he had therefore great reason to return into Transilvania, and that he now held Clausenbourg the chief city of that Prouince; that he neither could Sigismund returns again into Transilvania.

The Prince of Transilvania writes to the Arch-duke Maximilian.

nor would yield it, or such other places as had continu'd in his power, or return'd vnder his command, but would endeavour to defend them from all forraigne force; wherefore he intreated him to desist from his intended enterprise, & not to attempt any thing against him in Transilvania, but rather to bend his forces for the recovery of Agria, lest hee should force him by necessity (whilst he seekes to defend himselfe and his subjects) to deserue ill of them, to whom he wished all good. Moreover that he would honour the Emperour, and the whole house of Austria, with the maiesty of the Roman Empire; and would endeavour to do any thing that might tend to their profit and good: His wife did also accompany them with her Letters, by the which shee exhorted MAXIMILIAN, not to attempt any thing against her husband: which if he did, it would not onely be hurtfull, and dishonorable to himselfe, but also to the Emperour, and the whole Christian Common-wealth. Whilst that the Transilvanian was busie in settling of his estate, the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN intercepted certaine waggons laden with siluer and other rich commodities, the which he caused to be brought to Cassovia: the Transilvanian taking this very ill, layed hold vpon certaine Commissioners of the Emperours, which were then in Transilvania, the which he said he would not release, untill he had restitution. This was the cause of great warre, which not onely afflicted those Countries, but bred great security to the Turks.

The peace of Germany was much disquieted this yeere, by the Lowe Countries Army: for the Arch-duke vnder the command of MENDOZA Admirall of Castile, who had lodged his Army in Cleues, Westphalia, and the countries adjacent, taking many townes, and committing more then barbarous cruelties; the Duke of Cleues, who was a Prince of the Empire, complained to the Emperour and to the Princes and imperiall townes, of the insolencies committed by the Admirall and his Army: to whom the Emperour and the Princes sent often to demande restitution: which the Admirall neglecting, in the end the Princes raised an Army of 10000 foote and 3000 horse to force him to retire out of the quarters of Westphalia, and Münster; whereupon the Spaniard, fearing that this would draw all Germany into Armes, left those countries, which they had spoiled.

MAHOMET to reuenge the losse of Iauerin sent OSMAR Basha with an Army of 60000 men to besiege Varadine a towne in Transilvania, in which MELCHIOR REDER a Silesian Gentleman, bred vp in Arms, commanded: who seeing the towne vnable to resist so great an Army, set it on fire, and retired himselfe with all the victuals and munition vnto the Castle, drawing in such inhabitants as would runne the same fortune, making them sweare, not to parly with the enemy nor to make any motion of yeelding, vpon paine of death, and he himselfe did likewise promise to dy with them. They endured a siege of six weekes, and repulst many sharpe assaults. The Historie commendeth him, to haue by his valor and diligence recompensed the losse of about 13000 Christians before Varadine, with the death of 13000 Turks, and forced the enemy to retire with shame and confusion to Buda. The Emperour to encourage the Nobility to the like vertue, honored REDER and his Lieutenant, with the order of Knighthood. On the other side, Smazembourg, and Palfi attempted Buda: they took the suburbs, with the fort of Prenetiana vpon the Danow; after which they battered the town, and made such a breach, as the inhabitants, women and children, pressed the Basha to enter into composition. But the Bashes of Caramania, Natolia, and Bosnia coming to relieue them, and the continuall raine hauing made their powder vnprofitable, they were content to retire their troupes in safety, hauing slaine 15000 Turks at Buda.

SIGISMUND BATTORI Prince of Transilvania, in the beginning of March resigned all his countries, vnto Cardinall ANDREVV BATTORI, shewing a strange example of humane inconstancie: for a little before hauing sent an Embassador to CESAR, desiring him to free his subjects from their oath which they had taken, and to restore Varadine with the country adiacent; the Emperour refusing this, he then sent vnto him the Bishop of Alba Iulia, to renew the former contract, requiring to haue the iurisdiction of Drebnits in Moravia, added to his two Duchies in Silesia, with a yearly pension of 50000 crowns, out of the Imperiall chamber: That the estates of Transilvania should be pardoned, for their breach of faith to the Emperour, and haue their liberties and priuiledges confirmed. But during the absence of his Embassador, he makes transaction with Cardinall ANDREVV, and causeth his subjects to swear obedience vnto him. This new Prince sent presently to GEOFFREY BASTA the Emperours Lieutenant in those parts, promising to ratifie whatsoeuer SIGISMUND's Embassador should conuolue with the Emperour: That he would not attempt any thing, but what should be for the good of the Christian Common-wealth; hoping that BASTA would take his actions in good part, and attempt nothing in hostile manner against him.

of

The Emperour was much displeased with these newes, sending presently to stay SIGISMUND's Ambassadors: who were but newly departed from Prague, and to put them in custody. The Ambassadors being com to Terna, hearing what had past in Transilvania, resolved willingly to stay there and attend the Emperours pleasure. Cardinall BATTORI wrote Letters vnto the Emperour, by the which he promised to doe all good offices that might tend to his Maiesties service, and the Peace of Christendome. The Emperour delaying to make an answer, commanded BASTA to draw what forces he could together. The Cardinall being in some doubt sent to BASTA, letting him vnderstand that he had neede of a Patron, by whose helpe he might defend his Countries, and therefore he desired that the Emperour would expaine himselfe, whether he would hold him as a friend and client, or as an Enemy: That there was a Turkish Ambassador then with him, who willingly offered him aide from his Emperour, & required but 100000 ducckets for his yearly tribute, yet he had rather ioyne his forces with other Christians, and doe good and faithfull service to the Emperour, then be guilty of betraying of Religion, and his countries liberty, to a cruell enemy, to which BASTA made no answer, but referred him vnto the Emperour.

The Turke, seeing that the great warres he had against the Persians, did exhauste his treasure, and that the Christians daily surpris'd places, and slew his men; he was desirous to haue a peace with the weaker, that he might be able to encounter the stronger: He sent thirteene Tartarians to Vienna, to make an ouerture of peace; but this was to craue almes (as they say) by command: For, the Soldiers did not forbear to spoyle the Countrey; and the Imperialists desired to haue alviolences and acts of hostilitie to cease: so as they carried no satisfaction to the Turke; but were sent away without any answer. This contempt thrust the Tartarians into rage, breathing nothing but rage and furie, putting all, as they past, to fire and sword. A great conuoy with victuals, money, cloath of gold and siluer, and other sundry moneables, was coming forwards to Buda, for the furnishing of the new Basha and garrison.

ORSPETER, Lieutenant to the Governour of Sirigenium, set vpon them vnawares, and defeated them that guarded this conuoy, making himselfe rich, both in honor and spoile. This victory begot a second: The Fort of Wille was fallen; he marched thither, defeated the garrison and the Governour, freed them of Bischie, and carried a great number of sleepe vnto his Garrison. SVARTZENBERG, Generall of the Christians Army, is commended for that he had alwaies his spirits banded to some new Stratagem. He had once failed to surpris Buda, and yet he would attempt it so often as he might aduance the Emperours affaires, by an honorable victory, ouer that strong Towne. He drew together twelue thousand men, and lodged them closely in a valley, that he might surpris it at the opening of the gate: But the enterprise being discovered, the suburbs smarr'd for the Towne; the enemy hauing no will to filie forth. And the next day he defeated a conuoy, which carried pay for the Garrison of Agria, slew 400 Turks, and took the Bege, who was Governour of Hatvan. These victories made SVARTZENBERG to attempt Buda the third time; but he failed to take the Town, though not the Basha: who, walking abroad, was surpris'd, and sent for a trophy to the Emperour, with certaine Ensignes, which the Barrons of Palfi and Madafi, had taken from the Tartarians.

The Turke was so oppress'd, on the one side by the Christians, and on the other by the Persians, as he would willingly haue embraced a peace; but he would make it with such aduantage, as he seem'd to want neither force nor means to encounter both Enemies. The Turke demanded to haue Iauerin, Billec and Serkeim, restored; and he offered nothing but Agria: whereupon the assembly brake off, without any effect; and presently after PALFI defeated seuen hundred Turkes; and the Hussars (which be Hungarian Knights) cut in peeces 3000 Tartarians neere to Billec.

In the meane time Cardinall BATTORI, hauing gotten the gouernement of Transilvania, thrust on with blinde ambition, and the desire of command, treated with the Turke, and promised a certaine annual tribute, so as he might be maintained in the possession of what he had vsurp'd. Doubtlesse the nature of man is blindly furious, and mad, being once transported with passion. The Pope foresaw the Cardinals ruine; and, by his Nuncio, laboured to retire him from temporall Armes to his profession: God beheld his enterprise, full of iniustice and treachery, and stirred vp a scourge to punish him. MICHAEL Vauoide, or Lord of Valachia,

The proceedings of Cardinall Battori.

The Tartarians propound a peace to the Emperor.

A great booty tak'n from the Turks.

The Turkes demand a Peace.

Cardinall Baticor makes a league with the Turke, and this success.

chia, who wholly depended vpon the Emperor, hauing leised an Army of 30000 men entred into Transilvania and took Cronstar to stop the Polonians passage, who he thought would assist the Cardinall.

Cardinal Bassa
and his suite.

After which he came with his Army neere vnto the Cardinals Camp, giuing him to vnderstand, that he came not to shedde Christian blood, but would willingly spare it: but whereas he had refused to take an oath to the Emperor and to restore that which he had vnderpied, and being forced by no necessity, had craued aid from the Turke for this cause if he did not presently yield himselfe into the Emperors power, he would prosecute him by Armes. The Cardinall refusing to performe this, the Vainode led his Army against him, and the Cardinal did the like; in the beginning the fight was furious, but the victory inclined to the Vainode, who sent to pursue the Cardinal being fled, and to bring him backe the Valachians; ouertook the Cardinall in the mountaines, where they slew him and carried his head to the Vainode. Which being done he brought all Transilvania subiect vnto the Emperor, whose Embassadour was receiued by them, vpon condition to maintaine them in their rights & priuiledges. All Transilvania set vp the victors ensignes, who fortifying himselfe in the strongest townes, ministred occasion to call the sincerity of his designs in question: which opinion was fortified when they saw the Turke seeke his friendship, by an Embassee which he sent vnto him; but hee weakened that opinion by retaying the Embassadour, which the Turkish Emperour had sent vnto him, whether it were that he doubted some fraude, or that he ment by that policie to couer the malice of his heart: but he gaue some satisfaction, by putting to death certaine spies of the Basas SERRER and deliuering the whole estate of Transilvania into the Emperors hands.

The turkes send Embassadors to treat of a peace.

In October SERRER Basa made a great shew to affect peace, sending Embassadours to the Arch-duke MATHIAS: whereupon a place of treaty was appointed, in an Island betwixt Strigonia and Pisgrade, and Commissioners were sent on either side. The Turks demanded restitution of all those places which had beene taken by the Christians, the last five years, especially Strigonia. The Christians yielded to all except Strigonia, which the Turks did venge much, offering Agria in exchange. In the end, the Emperours Commissioners finding that the Turks meant nothing but fraude, they brake off the assembly and retired: yet soone after, SERRER Basa sought to renew the treaty againe, but it took no effect.

1600.
The treachery of Michael the Vainode.

MICHAEL the Vainode of Valachia, hauing yielded the estate of Transilvania vnto the Emperour, after the defeat of Cardinal BATTORI; The Turke knowing him to be a man of seruice, sought his friendship. And although that he induored to free himselfe from all shew of suspicion: yet GROGEBASTA Lieutenant for the Emperour in Transilvania, had discouered certaine secret intelligences which he had with the Turke, whereof he gaue him notice. Soone after he gaue ouer his secret practices, & receiued the Turks Embassadors & his maisters presents publicly: and caused them to be carried before them, entring into Cronstar with the Embassador. And to the end they should giue no sinister impression of his fidelity to the Emperour; he told his ministers, that his desire was to haue that action performed, in view of the whole towne; to the end they should not thinke, he would do any thing in secret to the preiudice of Christendome. And withall he intreated them to moue the Emperour, to reuoke BASTA's Commission, for the private quarrels that were betwixt them, and to substitute some other of a more tractable disposition.

His demands of the empire.

The Emperour being aduertised, that MICHAEL would escape from him if hee did not stay him by some meanes, he sent him thirty thousand crownes in gift: but he thinking it too small a recompence for his seruices, told the Emperours agents that Transilvania did belong vnto him by hereditary right; wherefore he demanded, that he might enioy it as his owne, and for satisfaction of his seruices, he should giue him Varadin, Husf, Ragban, and the confines of Hungary, with other demands which were so arrogant, and vnciuile, as they did purchase him deadly hatred and were the cause of his ruine. After which he ouerthrew SIGISMUND BATTORI who sought to enter into Transilvania againe, with IRAZMI the Vainode of Moldavia; but being annoyed by the Chancellor of Poland in Valachia, he craued aide from the Lieutenant of the Imperiall Army in high Hungary, and promised the Emperour by his Letters, to serue him faithfully in this occurrent, so as he would but call BASTA out of Transilvania. The Emperour would not that his vassall should capitulate with him. It was a president of bad consequence; and therefore he commanded him to obey BASTA. Afterwards hee grew hatefull to all the Polonians, BASTA pursued him, and surprised him being incamped at Pisburg with 18000 men, where he slew foure thousand, and chased him into the Mountaines, where he was reduced ced to that extremity, as he was forced to goe an humble suppliant to the Emperour, and to offer his wife and children for hostages.

Pappa betrays the garrison.

The Garrison of Pappa, consisting for the most part of Walloons and French, fell into a mutinie for their pay, hauing also some scarcity of victuals; they made one called LA MOTT their Captaine, forcing their companions to signe their resolue; they seized vpon MAROT their gouernour, and of the other Captaines: They set all the Turkes at liberty (who by the counsell of these Traitors, carried euery man his hostie prisoner to Alba Regalis, or to Peperine) and withall, they promised to deliuer them SVVARTZENBOVRG, lieutenant Generall of the Imperiall Army, or to giue them meanes to take him at Zolnock, when he should come with their pay. MAROT the Gouernour found meanes to aduertise him hereof, and he went thither presently with nine thousand men; where, at his first coming, he tooke one of their Captaines, whom he caused to be sleied aliue, and his head to be set vpon a Pike, to terrifie the rest; hee took from them a Balha, whereby they did hope to be relieued by the Turke, who could not assist them either with men or provision: hunger prest them, and they grew desperate, hauing no hope of any humane aide; whereupon they sallied out by night, and made a great slaughter in one of the Quarters; SVVARTZENBOVRG runnes thither to repaire this disorder, but he was ouerthrowne with a shot and slaine: his death caused great heauinesse in the Imperiall Army, and all Christendome had cause to lament his losse. These Wretches made a second salie, saying that before they would yeeld, they would feede vpon their Gouernour MAROT, and their other prisoners.

MELCHIOR REDER, who had wonne much honor in the defence of Varradine, had the charge of the Army, and pressed the siege, and the Traitors indured the last extremity. They had a posterne gate behinde, in which they did put all the hope of their safety, seeking to make dry a poole, which did inuiron the Towne of the one side; but for that the mudde would not easily carry them, they could not couer it so secretly, with hardles, strawe, reede, and such other materials, but REDER was aduertised. Hereupon he sent NADASTI the Earle of Thurne and Colonis; who ouertaking them neere vnto a Wood, brought some of them back prisoners, and slew LA MOTT their Captaine, with some hundred others which would not yeeld; forcing the rest to keepe themselves within the Fort. The Gouernour MAROT with certaine others, who had freed themselves from their bondes, came speedily vnto the Campe.

The crueltie of the Turks in Pappa.

REDER then enters the town, kils some of the remainder, and referues the rest for their deserued punishments, whom he sent into diuers garisons: and that by the horror of their example they might abhorre the like treacherie. Some were impaled, others broken vpon the wheele, or roasted at a slowe fire, basted with Larde; others had their bowels pulled out of their bellies, and burnt before their eyes, their thighs, shoulders, and other parts being pinched with hott pincers: Some had their hearts pulled out of their bodies aliue, others their throates and mouths stufed full of Sulphur and Powder and then fired, and some were buried in the ground vp to the neck, and their heads bruised with bullets. And thus were those traitors cruelly tormented by order of martiall law.

Babotes yielded basely to the Turks.

Pappa, a fort of importance, being then preferred, Babottes could not so escape: the town was strong, and fortified with five hundred men, hauing store of all sorts of necessary provision. But the Garrison (terrified by the descent of twelve thousand Janizaries, sent from Constantinople) yielded it vpon the first attempt; and by their baseness, made the losse of Canisfa easy, she which followed to the preiudice of all Christendome. It was an ill president for the Gouernour of that place, being the strongest fort for the Christians had in Stiria: an example the which, it may be, he would not so easily haue imitated, if the Gouernour of Babottes had receiued that punishment which martiall law inflicts vpon those that yeeld v a place of importance, without extreame necessity; but the Christian Army, had neede of a commander of greater authority, who by his presence might containe both soldiers and Captaines in their duties.

The Duke of Mercur, would not accept the charge of Lieutenant generall of the Armie of Hungary, but with the kings good liking: who hauing signified his pleasure, the Duke came into Hungary, and was saluted Lieutenant generall of the Army in Tauerin; an Army weak in forces, but strong in courage and resolution, to fight for the defence of Religion. He marched with fiftene thousand men, of diuers Nations, to relieue them, being resolu'd either to lodge in Canisfa, or to die in the field. The first of October, he gaue a signe vnto the besieged of his coming, and fought to keepe from his enemy the knowledge of his small Army; Canisfa was was besieged by 50000 men vnder the command of the Vetzier Balha. The Duke resolves to hazard a bataille to relieue the Towne. The Vetzier, vnderstanding, by his spies, the weakness of the Dukes Army, aduised him, not to oppose his small troups, against so great forces. The Duke made answer: That, he did not feare to assaile a greater number of Insidels, with fewer Christians; and, that God fauoured the iustice of his cause.

The Duke aduanced towards Canisa, and the Vetzier attended him in his passage with a battalion of twenty thousand men, which came to charge him with their accustomed cries. The Dukes Artillery amazed their furious clamours, staid their hear, diminished their numbers, and beat them backe towards their Trenches; the Duke, remaining master of the fildes, of two Cannons, and of many slaine and hurt. The next day hee seeks to draw them out of their Campe, and takes foureteene fildes pieces: and on the other side, the Turkes intercepted the Christians victuals, comming unto them. The Vetzier, seeing that force could not preuaile, sought to vanquish them by necessity. The Army being in great want, they cried out to retire: The Generall preached patience; and would not consent unto a retreat, untill the Colonels and Capitaines had confirmed their opinions under their hands. In their retreat there fell a so daime amazement among them, which put the army in disorder: whereupon the Turkes arrived, and put many Germanes to the sword. The Duke rallied his men together, and encouraged them rather to dye honourably, then by flight to fall into miserable seruitude. Thus, encouraged by the presence of the General, they returned to the charge, repulsed the enemy, and made the retreat easie. The besieged in Canisa dispaired of all succours, and PARADIS the Governour was easily perswaded by them to yeeld. Thus Canisa, one of the chiefe bulwarks of Christendome, was made subject to the tyranny of this barbarous enemy. PARADIS, presenting himselfe to the Duke of Mercoeur, he sent him to the Duke MATHIAS, who was Governour of the Countrey: And having no sufficient reason to excuse his cowardise, he was by the Emperours commandment condemned to haue his right hand cut off, which had signed the rendition; and to lose his head.

This yeare the King of Persia sent his Embassadors to summon the Emperour, the Pope, the King of Spaine, and other Christian Princes, to invade the Turkes estate with their joynt forces, promising to assaile him with 15000 horse, and 60000 foote; and to grant free liberty of Religion and trafficke to their subjects in his kingdomes, so as they would not treat any peace with the Turke without comprehending him.

The Pope and Princes did thanke the Sophy for his affection to the good of Christendome; exhorting him to be a meanes, that the great Duke of Muscovie might give his consent and assistance to this general enterprize. MANOMET, aduertised hereof, sent his Physitian, a Christian Renegado, into France, to intreat the King, to mediate a truce for him with the Christian Emperour; and to call the Duke of Mercoeur backe into France: for (said hee) the Turkes do greatly apprehend one of their prophecies, which saith, that, 'The Sword of the French shall chase them out of Europe.'

The Transiluanians calling an assembly at Clausenbourg, SIGISMUND BATTORI was there proclaimed their lawfull Prince, by such as favoured his party, and all men commanded to obey him, and the Imperialists were put in safe custodie. They sent into Moldavia, to intreat SIGISMUND to come and take possession of his inheritance; and in the meane time they made ISCHIAEK, an ambitious and cruell man, his Lieutenant Generall; who, in the beginning committed the wife and sonne of MICHAEL the Vaivode of Valachia to prison. BASTA, having no power to hinder this resolution, nor the effects, demanded leave of the Estates to retire; exhorting the Transiluanians to persist in the fidelity which they did owe unto the Emperour. They, foreseeing that this act would be displeasing vnto him, sent STEPHEN CARREY vnto the Emperour; protesting that they were very sorry for these alterations: that hauing no Prince vnder whom they might be more assured, they had again opened their Arms to SIGISMUND BATTORI: That they would alway yeeld that obedience and fidelity which they did owe vnto his Imperiall maiesty, and would not conclude any peace with the Turke, but vpon such conditions as should not be any way displeasing vnto him.

BATTORI comes into Transilvania: from whence by his Letters to BASTA, he laments the miseries into which he had vnderferredly beene reduced. He craues pardon for that which had beene done in his absence, to the preiudice of his maiesties service, and that he might be suffered to send his excuses by an Embassador to the Emperour. BASTA answered him, that all depended vpon the Emperours pleasure, whose commandment he attended. The Vainode MICHA

The Duke of Mercoeur repels the Turke.

Canisa taken by the Turke.

The Persian intreats the Christian Princes to war against the Turke.

Battori returns into Transilvania.

he took the captiuitie of his wife and sonne impatiently. Hee pretended to be able to doe the Emperour great seruice, if he would assist him with some forces, hoping soone to reduce the whole Prouince to obedience. This Valachian had his designs apart, fortifying himselfe vpon diuers occurrents, both with the Turke and Emperour: But to reiect the seruice of this Prince, were to thrust him into furie; and make him either seeke vnto the Turke, or reconcile himselfe with SIGISMUND, and so to crosse the Emperours affaires with their joynt forces. The Emperour therefore furnisht him with men and money, to ioyne with BASTA, who had a watchfull eye ouer his actions, lest he should attempt something to his masters preiudice: They had drawne together twenty thousand men, and camped vpon a mountaine, attending some horse-men from Silesia. SIGISMUND had eightene thousand horse, and twenty two thousand foote, with the which he resolved to charge them before their supplies came; whereupon, both Armies ioynded bataille; where, after a bloody fight, BATTORI was ouerthrowne, with the losse of tenne thousand men, forty peeces of great Ordinance, one hundred and tenne Ensignes, and all his baggage. After this, Clausenbourg was taken, paying three moneths entertainment for the whole Army, and, likewise, receiuing a good Garrison.

The Valachian, in this bataille, performed the part of a faithfull seruant; but hee thought himselfe rather borne to command, then to obey; and thrust on by his naturall ambition, he continued, secretly, his fraudulent intelligences with the Turkes and Tartarians. BASTA informed the Emperour of all his actions, and namely of his vigour against the inhabitants of the champaigne Countrey, vnder colour to reuenge their disloyalty to the Emperour. BASTA perswaded him, in the Emperours name, not to blemish his generous and well desering acts, with the infamous name of cruelty. To whom he answered, proudly; That he would no more obey his commandments, or the Emperours; And that he meant to enioy Transilvania, which he had gotten by his sword and valour; doing many acts of absolute power. Soone after, BASTA discouered by his owne Letters, that he treated with the Balha of Themeswar, and sought the friendshipp of BATTORI, to deliuer the Imperiall Army into the Enemies hands. Hereupon the Countsell sent for him, meaning to send him vnto the Emperour; but refusing to come, Colonell PETZ was commanded to inueit his Quarter, with his regiment, and some other troups, who comming into the Valachians Tent, and telling him that he arrested him as the Emperours prisoner, hee drew out his Sword, whereupon they presently slew him; and cut off his Head.

They found in his Tent, Letters which did manifestly discouer his treacherous designs: the which being imparted to the Valachians (who began to mutine vpon his death) they confessed that he had been iustly slaine. Most of them tooke a new oath to the Emperour, and inrolled themselves vnder BASTA's Ensignes. BATTORI was againe defeated before Clausenbourg, which he thought to surpris: and being pursued by BASTA, he fled, like a Vagabond, into the Mountaines and Deserts.

The Duke of Mercoeur having drawne together an Army of 18000 men, with Cannon and munition of warre, necessarie for a siege, gaue it out that he would attempt Buda, yet holding his enterprise so secret as the troups knew not where their Generall would employ them: vntill that after the taking of some Castles by composition, they found themselves in the suburbs of Alba Regalis, a small towne, but of great importance, inuironed with a deepe marish, which made the approaches difficult. Hauing obscured the situation, hee cast vp a trench towards Buda, from whence they might berelieued; resolving first to assault the bafe towne and the suburbs: where hauing planted his petardes and appointed a scalado at the same instant, the souldiers entred with little losse, forcing the Turkes to retire into their chief Fort. Then hee made his approaches: and hauing planted his batterie, within six daies he made two small breaches in the walles, commanding ROCHEVORME Marshall of the Camp, with 1000 good souldiers to seeke a passage through the marish, to one of the breaches, every one carrying a fagot in his hand, meaning at the same instant to giue an assault to the other breach; ROCHEVORME was discouraged by the Countrey people, who assured him that there was no passage that way: but giuing no credit to their words, he sent to discouer it, and they brought him word that the passage was difficult, but not impossible: whereupon at night they entred those fennes which they found farre deeper then was related, almost with the hazard of their liues; but they vanquished all difficulties, and came vnto the breach: which they entred, the Turkes being busie to defend the other; whereupon the towne was taken and most of them put to the sword, the Battori defeated by the Valachians and Balha.

The Vainode Michael slain.

Alba Regalis besieged by Duke Mercoeur.

Castle

Cattle, and a great part of the towne was blowne vp by certaine traines which the Turkes had layed. The which did so incense the victors, as they would not receive any to ransom, except the Balha, and some hundred souldiers, which were retired into a Fort; who, making shew to yeeld, had their lives granted them.

The plague did much afflict the Dukes Army, who hadde retired two miles off, aswell to refresh it, as to observe the countenance of the great VETZLER, who resolved in the absence of the Christian generall to attempt to reduce that place vnder his obedience, before the ruines were repaired and the victuals supplied. The Duke aduertised that the Balha turned head towards Alba Regalis, he approached also with his troups: and taking with him some 120 French horse, he put himselfe into the towne to assure them by his presence, where hee was presently inuicted by 8000 horse, the whole Army (being 60000 men) following after. The Duke hauing giuing order for the most vrgent affaires of the towne, returned by night vnto his Army: the which did much reuiue their daunted spirits; where they performed braue exploits against the enemy, by their daily encounters and skirmishes, in which they took 9 Cannons and slew MEHEMET TICIAA Balha, the Balha of Buda, 6 Saniaes, one CADIZ and many other men of note in the Army; whose heads were giuen in exchange, for many Christian prisoners. The rest of the Turkish Army being dispersed here and there, the Duke had liberty to assure his garrisons, and to returne to Viena with much honour.

In the meane time the Arch-duke FERDINAND went to recover Canisfa (which had bene taken the yere before by the Turk) with an Army of 4500 horse, and 13000 foot: of which the Pope and Princes of Italy had sent 12000, vnder the commande of FRANCIS ALDOBRANDINO his Nephew, and the Duke of Mantua was Lieutenant Generall to the Arch-duke. Hauing planted their Cannon, they made a resonable breach, and summoned the besieged, with offer of all fauour, if they yeelded; but if they attended the extremity, they must expect no better vllage then they of Alba Regalis. Their example did nothing terrifie the Wallones, and Christians Renegades, which commanded in the place: they found easily by their weak attempts to force them, that either there was some trouble & badde intelligence in the Army, or want of that which was needfull to giue an assault, letting them vnderstand that they had no more force then if their walles were freed. There was great confusion among the Italians: which troubled the whole Camp. The bridge, which they had made to passe couered ouer the ditch, was too weak and short. They were annoyed with raine, snow, and tempest; and many other difficulties were in their Camp, so as many souldiers died without helpe, and there was no appearance to stay any longer, without a total ruine of the Army. Whereupon the Arch-duke FERDINAND resolved to retire, in the which he wonne lesse honour then in the siege, for wanting all things necessarie to draw away their Cannons they were forced to breake them, to burne their tents, and to abandon their sicke men, to the spoile of their enemies.

The Duke of Mercur hauing taken Alba Regalis the yere before, it was now againe made subiect to the Turkish tyranny, whereas the garrison was all put to the sword; the gouernour laying the fault vpon the negligence of the Souldiers. The spoile was very great; in which they found all the old Ordinance, with twelue peeces new cast, an infinite number of Swords, forty tunne of powder, 200 tunne of meale, eightie of Bisket, with ten thousand Florens to pay the Garrison.

After the death of the Duke of Mercur, RVSOVRMB was Generall of the Christian Army, preparing to relieue Alba Regalis, if he had not been aduertised of the losse. And hearing that the Turkes Army was disperied (some gone against the Scribiano, and others into Transilvania, against BASTA) he marched directly to Buda, the chiefe towne in Hungary, with five thousand horse, and twenty thousand foote; hauing in his company the Duke of Nemcs, a valiant Noble-man of France. At their first approach they attempted the bafe Towne, by land and water, and took it by night. Buda was diuided from Pesta, by the Riuer of Danubius, hauing a bridge whereby they might assist one another. The Christians resolved to cut off this bridge, the which they effected; and whilest the Turkes were busie in the defence of the Riuer, they took Pesta by Scalado, and put all they encountered to the sword: the rest being retired into some places of strength, compounded for their Liues, Wines and Children, and promised to cause them of Buda to doe the like; but there were more men, and they had greater courage.

The Turkish Army hearing hereof, posted presently back to saue Buda, leauing the designes of Transilvania. RVSOVRMB being thus surprisid, puttes men into Pesta, and prepares for his retraite, of Transilvania. RVSOVRMB being thus surprisid, puttes more men into Pesta & prepares for his retraite, hauing first battered the towne, and made a small breach, at which there were 2500 Christians slaine and wounded; and the Duke of Nemcs performing all parts of a valiant Noble-man was shot in the left side, but it was not mortall. After which the Army retired in safetie.

The Noblemen of Transilvania fauoured SIBIRIUMUS BATTORI their natural Lord: they seized vpon Bisbrick and vowed to defend it against all assailants. BASTA went speedily to besiege it, battered their walles, and gaue an assault, but his men were repulsed with losse. To reuiue their courages he promised them the spoile of the towne. The inhabitants grew amazed: and apprehending the insolencies of conquerors, they declared that they would not endure the extremity of warre, for the pleasure of some ill affected to the Emperors seruice: they executed themselves to the General, that they had not consented to this rebellion; but by force, & demanded peace: the which he granted, but with such conditions, as the Magistrates would not accept. Whereupon BASTA renews his batterie, and prepares for a new assault, the souldiers growing resolute with the hope of a rich spoile.

BATTORI giues his word by an Embassador, that hee would not make war against the Emperour, and that the citizens of Bisbrick should submit themselves vpon reasonable conditions: whereupon hee received the inhabitants, paying 30000 dalleris for reparation, promising that all that would depart should be conducted to a place of safety with their goods, wives and children. Vpon this assurance 300 men went out of the towne with 100 waggons, the which were spoiled by some of the Army. BASTA detecting this treachery made diligent search for the Authors, restored what could be found, and punished the chiefe with death.

BATTORI seeing his enterprises succede ill, resolved to make his peace with the Emperour: and during this treaty (all things seeming to be quiet) MORTAS Duke of Zeileria took Armes; and foreseeing that BASTA would besiege him in Pisiburg, he layed an ambush for him: After some messages past on both sides, BASTA went and ioyned battaile with him, in the which he slew 3000 of his men and forced MORTAS to fly to the mountaines. BATTORI seeing this faction ouerthrowne, came speedily to BASTA, to purge himselfe of the result of MORTAS: he entered with him into Pisiburg, and submitted himselfe wholly into the Emperors power, and so Transilvania was for that time pacified.

This yere the Emperour being daily annoyed with the incursions of Turkes and Tartarians into his Countries, he called a Diet at Kalisbome whither he sent the Arch-duke MAXIMIAS his brother, with instructions not onely to acquaint the Princes and estates of the Empire, with the present necessities of the Turkish warres, and the daily incursions of the Tartarians; but also to require such aide as the turbulent estate of things did presently require: who after much consultation, granted a good supply of horse and foote.

COLLOMIT a man of great seruice, and who had carried himselfe valiantly in the Hungarian warres, did this summer take two strong forts, and had put to rout 2000 Turkes neere to Comorria, and sent thirteene ensignes to the Emperour: he beate the garrison of Canisfa, and resolved to attempt the towne. There was a French-man in his Army a subtil fellow and daring any thing, who counterfeiting himselfe a Renegado, fled into Canisfa and desired to be entertained by the Turkes; the which hauing easily obtained, hee laied traines of powder in diuerse fit places, all which should take fire at one instant, so as when the Turkes were busie to quench it, COLLOMIT might assault the Castle. The French-man performed what he had vndertaken, and the fire brake out with such violence as it consumed all the houses vpon the South and West parts, yea the carriages of their Ordinance: but the Turkes neglected the fire & obserued the enemy; so as COLLOMIT being out of hope to take the Castle, left it wasted vnto the Turks. By the like Stratagem, the Turks soon after fought to take Sirigomium.

The estate of Transilvania was much troubled by the Zeelerian; who thinking to reuenge his last affront, crept into fauour with the Turke, who promised to make him his Lieutenant generall, as soone as he should reduce that prouince, vnder the Turkish obedience and religion. With this hope, he had appointed him 150000 men, for the recouerie of Pesta and Sirigomium; and nothing staid the progresse, but want of victuals in Turkey. Hauing received 10000 Tartarians, with a great number of Transiluanians, he besieged and took Pisiburg, perswading all men to ioyneth their Armes with his, vpon hopes of great fauour, and commanding the souldiers to abandon BASTA's Camp.

BASTA was weak both of men and money. RADVIEL the new Vaiuede of Valachia, remembering how BASTA had succored him in his necessity against the Tartarians, came speedily

The Transilvanians who were themselves a great help to the Emperor.

Basta overthrew the Moscovite duke of Zeileria.

1603

The enterprise of Collomit.

The exploit of Moses the Zeelerian.

Alba Regalis inuicted againe by the Emperor.

Canisfa besieged by the Arch-duke Ferdinand in winter.

Pesta taken by the Christians.

The Turkes into the siege of Buda.

dily with 8000 men to requite him: without which succors, he was in danger to have fallen into the hands of the Infidel Mosses. And Basta armed speedily, to joine with the Valachian, that they might make the body of an Army. He attended two thousand Silesian horse: which, Mosses was resolving to defeat, sent some part of his Army to seize upon the passages, and to stop the entry into the Countrey. By chance, they encountered with 800 Valachians, led by Colonel Max: who, finding his troups weake, retired, and left his Camp. Mosses men triumphed very much at this petty victory: and, thinking that Max was farre retired, neglected their guards. But Max returned presently, and fell upon them like a whole winde, putting many to the sword: the rest he chased to Themeswar, sending 25 Ensigns to Basta. Mosses himself, present at this defeat, was slain; his body being found upon search by the Valachians, and the Emperor advertised thereof by Basta.

Albarrat Nasir succeeded him: who, swimming in the Gulfes of Infidelitie, like to Mosses, drew together 6000 Rebels, and other people of diuers Nations. Basta sent to assaile him suddenly by his Caualry: who slew most of his men; himselfe escaping with some few. The general Enemy of the Christian name, might have been expelled Hungary, had the Emperor received the contribution money granted at the generall assembly of Ratisbona in March last, to entertaine an Army for six yeere and eight moneths. The Princes of Germany had freely offered their contributions. The collections might have been made without grievance or oppression. But as the rich fought to save themselves, and to lay it upon the weaker sort: so the effects did not second the hopes which were conceived. Some did contribute more then was demanded: The Elector of Saxony gave the Emperor twelve field pieces, with the furniture necessary for a year. The Duke of Brunswick sent 1000 horse and 2000 foot. Others assisted this publique cause, with the like bounty. Some also, under that pretext, have extorted from their subjects farre greater summes then their tax, imploying it to their own use; to the dishonour of their order, and against the dignity of their ranke.

Buda was much pressed with famine: they had eaten all their horses, and tumultuously carried away all the victuals in the Basha's house: which threatened some dangerous effect, if shortly they were not relieved with sufficient provision. The great Vetzier brought them victuals: but, Collonitz with his horse-men by land, and Svltz and Althem with their foote-men upon the River, were alwaies watchfull to intercept it. Victuals were so scant, as if the second convey had been lost, there had been no hope to have furnished a third. In the end, the Vetzier put it into the Towne, but not without encounter and great losse of his men. And if Svltz, fearing some ambush, had not by force retired his men, who pursued the beginning of a victory, they were likely to have reaped great benefit of that daies service: For these Barbarians carried with them one whole yeers entertainment, due to the Garrison of Buda. The Cham of Tartaria returned much discontented: For, the Vetzier had quarrelled with him, as if by his negligence he had hindred the victualing of Buda, carrying great forces with him, notwithstanding that the Vetzier intreated him to stay in Hungary, wherewith the Turkish Army was much weakened, and disabled to doe any great exploits this yeere. The Vetzier, after the victualing of Buda, fought to expell the Christians out of the Island of Adonis, making great preparation both by ships and bridge, to transport their men. Rysorm encountered them with his troups: where, after a long fight, they forced them to flee to their ships in confusion. The Christians followed them vnto the River Danubius: the which for many daies after was died with Infidels blood: and they, which ran by troups into their vessels being overladen, were drowned. There was slain in this battail a Basha of great authority, the Bege of Belgrade, with many other of note, and 1500 Janitzaries: but the number of the drowned was far greater. Finally, it was known by a certain Turk, who after this conflict followed the Christian party, that of 4000 horse and 6000 foot there were scarce saved 1000; & those returned without Arms. The Vetzier began his retreat towards Belgrade, and gius means to the Christians to assaile Hatua, which hindred the victualing of Pest. Rysorm, upon his approach, summons the town; threatening them that if they yielded not willingly (but taken by assault) they should suffer the like miseries and indignities, as before time; where the Walloons had committed vnspcakable inhumanities. The remembrance wherof made a great impression in these miscreants: wherupon, they yielded on condition to depart with their wives & children, and what goods they could carry. It was a town reasonable strong, well stored of corn, powder & cattell, with 24 peeces of Ordinance mounted.

Manomet, the Turkish Emperor having received many losses and disgraces in Hungary, and troubled with the revolts of Asia, he resolved to treat a peace with the Christians at what rate

rate sooner: hee gave charge to the Vetzier, and to Aschnat and Mvrat Bashaes, to move the Emperors Ministers thereunto. They had often treated, but the issue did shew they proceeded with fraude: to free them from which feare the Bashaes did write vnto the chiefe commanders. That their most mighty Emperour had a will to treat a firme and stable peace for the ease of the poore people and quiet of their estates: the which we in like manner did hartlie desire. The which if you neglect said they, many provinces will be desolate. Whereupon Commissioners were sent by the Arch-duke Matthias, and they met in an Island about Pest and Buda. The Turkes intreated that Althem might go to Buda; where he was received with great shewes of ioy: to whom the Basha delivered great presents for the Emperour, and the Arch-duke Matthias, which were very rare and rich, and likewise for himselfe and the other Commissioners. The Basha had reason to presse a peace Manomet being dead: and the new successor could not better settle his affaires, then by a peace, which his father had procured before his death. Whereupon the Basha of Buda wrote his Letters to Althem, that Aschnat succeeded Manomet his father, not only in his estates, but in his intentions, for the settling of a good peace in Hungary; that he desired to understand what had bin concluded, that he might ratifie it; that, if the businesse were not yet finished, they should vite all diligence to bring it to a good end: but yet for that time it took no effect. Yet on the twenty fifth of Feb. they returned to Pest, with an intent to treat; whereas the Emperors Commissioners fasted them solemnly in Tents without the Town, being 600 in number: but, going to repasts the river, they attempted to surpris Pest with the help of the forces of Buda; but they were repulled with shame and losse, leaving their ladders behinde them as witness of their treachery. The Bashaes disfavoured the fact, and intreated the Christian Ambassadors to come the next day to Buda: but they were advertised, that there was no safety for them. And thus the hope of this peace, which all Christendome expected, was lost.

After this, they went to Arms. Aschnat promised to go in person to the conquest of Hungary, Valachia, Transilvania, Vienna and Austria. He sends Sioala against the Persian, and gives the Vetzier the charge of the Hungarian warre. He commands the Beglerbey of Greece to leue 80000 men. He sends Hassan Basha towards Belgrade to provide victuals for the army. He draws, from Egypt to Belgrade, an infinite quantity of basket and powder: and it was concierd, that the Ottoman power was able to vanquish the King of Persia, and to prescribe a lawe to the King of Vienna (as he called him); but hee was deceived in his account: for, the Persian defeated Sioala, and took 80 Towns, with a great Country in Asia; who continuing the course of his victories, the Turk returns to his ordinary practices, and demandeth a peace of the Emperor: who although he knew there was little to be hoped for from so perfidious a Nation, yet he gave charge to some in Hungary to hear upon what conditions they would treat. The Bashaes demanded, that the Emperor should pay yearly the tribute which had bin formerly paid; that he should send Presents to Aschnat; that he should keep an Agent in Constantinople; that he should yeeld to him the places taken during this warre of Hungary, with the Countries of Transilvania and Valachia: which done, they would send to intreat the Sultane to restore Camsia. To which the Emperor answered: If they would have a peace, he would willingly embrace it, so as they would restore to him Agria and Camsia. I cannot abandon Transilvania, holding it by a iust and lawfull title: as for Valachia, there might happily some means be propounded, which might be accepted by both parties; so as they spake nothing of any tribute, or of entertaining an ordinary Agent at the great Turke Port.

The Emperors answer was received with scorn from the Bashaes. The Vetzier approached with 10000 Janitzaries, and a great number of Tartarians: they onely fought to diuert the Christians from all enterprises vntill their forces were arriued. Iagenevter a German, Gouerner of Pest, hearing that the Vetzier had charge to recover that town with other places; growing amazed, he packed vp his baggage, and retired without fight of any enemy, and went to Strigomium; hauing no other excuse for his desertion, but fear and amazement. Althem the Gouerner put him in safe keeping vntill the Emperor had otherwise ordained. They of Hatua with the like basenes abandoned the Town: which made the Turkes undertake the siege of Strigomium; the which was valiantly defended. They endured many assaults with the like valour. The Janitzaries, seeing there was nothing but blowes and death to be gotten at this siege so obstinately defended, they forced the Vetzier and Serdar Basha with threats to retire.

Belliovsus, Lieutenant to Basta, had brought the forces of Transilvania for the succours of Strigomium, to his General, foreseeing no enemy in the Countrey. But he had no sooner

Q 992

tur-

Mahomet demanded a peace of the Christians.

Death of Manomet.

1604.
Aschnat, on desire, to continue the treaty of peace.

Aschnat great preparation for war.

The Turke seek a peace, and their usual demands.

Mosses the Z. celebrated and feared and back thrown by Colonel Max.

A great contribution granted at Ratisbon, ill managed.

Buda press with famine.

Turks defeated

Hatua taken by the Christians.

The Imperialists defeated by Botskay in Transilvania.

turned his back but a new combustion forced him to return: for, BOTS KAY ISTVAN, a Noble-man of that part, had made a great leue of souldiers, and proclaimed himself Prince of Transilvania, and demanded aid from the Sultan for the conquest of the Country. BELLIO RVVS draws what forces he can together, and ioyneth with the Earle of Tampiery, whose Troops, being three thousand horse, were of BOTS KAY'S faction, and desirous to bee freed from the Imperiall yoke: who, when they came to fight, abandoned the Emperors partie, and went to BOTS KAY; yet the combat was long and furious. The Germans and Silesians performed their duties valiantly: but, wanting powder and shot, they were defeated; where, there were many brave men slain. BOTS KAY sent certain Ensignes to S E R D E R Basha, who in recompence qualified him with the title that he affected vnder the Turks authority, vpon condition that he should employ his Arms to reduce the Province vnder his obedience, hee furnishing him with men and money.

L I P P A Y, who had been taken in the battell, and wounded, became BOTS KAY'S Lieutenant; who, in the beginning of his new authority, made proclamation, that whosoever would undertake the defense of religion, should come and enrole themselves: so as in fewe daies an infinite number both of the Nobility and others came vnto them; all binding themselves by oath, not to carry Arms against the Emperor, nor for the Turk, but for the defense of religion. They seized vpon Cassovia, took an oath of the Citizens, expelled the Imperialists, seized vpon the Churches, drave away the Priests and Clergie, and laid wait to surpris BELLIO RVVS. BASTA, hearing of this combustion, posted thither with 14000 men, and summoned them by a Herald to return to their duties; but it was in vain: so as the enemy growing very strong, and winter approaching, he was forced to retire.

Achmat venues
the propositions of peace.

A C H M A T, being much croft by the dissensions of his Bashas in Asia, renewed the treatie of peace; and, to dispose the Christians thereto, hee was content that all prisoners should be exchanged which had been taken for three yeeres space, suffering his subjects to carry all kinde of merchandize to the Christian Towns. S E R D E R Basha made the oeuerture vnto the chief Commanders in Hungary. At the same time, the King of Persia had sent an Ambassage with a small train to the Emperor and Princes of Christendome; protesting, that hee was resolved to aduance that warre with all his power, intreating them not to make any peace with A C H M A T, and offering money for to continue the war, and to send great forces to ouerthrowe their common enemy. A C H M A T grew jealous thereat, and entertained better correspondence with the Princes of Christendome than he had formerly done.

Botskay his demands.

The tumults increasing daily in Transilvania and Hungary, BASTA admonished BOTS KAY by his Letters to lay down Arms, and to draw the seditious multitude, to the Emperors obedience. BOTS KAY made answer, that he thought a peace might be made vpon these conditions: that the whole government of Transilvania should be left to him; that he should be Lieutenant Generall in Hungary; that none but Hungarians should bee there in garison; that the Walloons and French should be retired out of Hungary; that the Hungarians should bee maintained in their degrees and honours; that the souldiers should be duly paid; that there should be free exercise of the protestant religion; that BELLIO RVVS, and they which had bin the causes of their troubles, should be delivered into their hands; that the Emperor should come in person to the States at Pounson; and that the Germans should contain themselves within their garriisons, and not go to the Viceroie. BASTA would make no answer to these demands, as being too rash.

The Haiduques (for, so all BOTS KAY'S souldiers were called) continuing their enterprises, drew all the people of high Hungary and Transilvania into Arms: and BOTS KAY having the whole Country of Transilvania at his deuotion, he called the Estates of Hungary to a generall Assembly the last of Aprill. As for BASTA, being sick; his souldiers, wanting pay, committed greater insolencies in Austria and Hungary, than the Turks: they mutined against their Generall, and offered to force his lodging; and the Haiduques and Turks spoiled and wasted the Country as farre as Vienna; so as many which dwelt abroad, were forced to retire themselves into the City.

Neither was Moravia free from these common calamities, the Haiduques entring and putting all to fire and sword, carrying away foure thousand prisoners to sell to the Turks: And in the midst of summer there was a troop of theues entred into Stiria, who, finding no man to make resistance, spoyled the Countrey, carried away their goods, and forced the poore countrey men, to flee into Greta. In this present calamitie and danger; the Earles of Serin, Nadaszi and and Buda, who had fought so valiantly many yeares against the Turkes, for the Christian common-wealth, seeing themselves now reduced to the extremity of danger, yielded themselves and their fortunes to the mercy of BOTS KAY: BASTA, hauing recovered his health, drew his Army together, and raised the siege at Oedenburg, a place in the higher Hungary, then went to Campe nere vnto Comorria. During the siege of Nehenfessell, vpon the Frontiers of Austria, and of Oedenburg, Hungary was wonderfully spoiled by the Haiduques, and likewise by the Turkes: Yet the Imperialists tooke heart and courage in many places, and there were many strong Townes and Forts which held for the Emperor in diuers Provinces.

R A D V I L the Vauiode of Valachia, a partizan to the Emperor, went to field, and seized vpon the chiefe Fort which BOTS KAY had neer vnto Varadine, called Kercie, inuaded his partizans; burnt their houses and committed strange spoiles. BOTS KAY began to grow icalous of his Lieutenant L I P P A Y, who was gouernor of Cassovia. Some, that enuid his aduancement, made BOTS KAY beleue, that he went about to reconcile himselfe vnto the Emperor, and for assurance of his Faith, to yield Cassovia vnto his hands. He takes this aduice, for a preface of what might happen. To free himself from this feare, and to pull so troublefom a thorn out of his foot, he holds it the best course to take off L I P P A Y'S head, whom he caused to be executed, with 50 other Gentlemen of note, by the great Turke's consent (seizing on 100000 Duckets, and saucau chaines of Gold, which L I P P A Y had gotten being his Lieutenant.

Lippa Lieutenant sent to Botskay beheaded.

BASTA did still sollicite BOTS KAY to forsake the Infidel; from whom he could expect nothing but false friendship, with a dangerous Catastrophe of his bad faith, which had been so often tried. The Arch-duke MATHIAS, sent commissioners vnto him in the Emperors name, to treat of a Peace: and he, to shewe himselfe a Prince that would not make the warre immortal in his owne country, referred this treaty to H A L I E HASKAY, who, hauing conferred with the Emperors Commissioners, gaue them to vnderstand, that his master BOTS KAY would not refuse a Peace, if those conditions might be granted which had been propounded; demanding moreover, that in the Senate of Hungary, there should be but one Bishoppe, which should be Chancellor; that no man should be forced in Religion; and that none should be preferred to Bishop-ricks, if they were not borne in Hungary, and Noble; and that al that was past should be pardoned & forgotten. If these things might be performed, he promised to procure a Peace betwixt the Emperor, and the Turk, with the best conditions he might.

A party of a Peace betwixt the Emperor and Botskay.

During this treaty which was somewhat long, A C H M A T sends a Basha to BOTS KAY with a present of eight hundred thousand Florens to maintain the warres, with ten Horses of great price, and assurance not to faile him of his promise. In the meane time, BOTS KAY sends to the King of Polonia, to craue aide from him in this warre, which he made for the defence of Religion. The King accepted of his offered friendship: But, he could not approue his defection from a house to the which he was so neerly allied; yet he would acquaint his Lords with his propositions: who afterwards decreed in Councell, that no man should assist BOTS KAY, vpon paine of death. In the meane time BOTS KAY'S seditious Army ioyned with the Turkes, being fifty thousand in their Campe, and besieged Strigonium in the end of August: they battered it with forty peeces of Ordinance continually during a moneths space. Hauing overthrowne all their defences, and slaine nine hundred of their best men, with the Earle of Oettinge, then they attempted the Castle: the which they fired in such fort, as the souldiers were scarce able to quench it. Whereupon, they came running to the Earle of Tampiery, importuning him to yeeld it vp: who refusing at the first, he perswaded them to remember their oath, and to continue constant with him in the defence of the towne: but seeing the Turkes presse the siege more violently, and the Souldiers to cast away their Armes, he was forced to compound: And so on the third of October, they yeelded vpe the Towne and Castle, vnto the Turkes.

Strigonium yelled to the Turke.

All the Nobility of Transilvania, Moldavia and Valachia, hauing sworneto BOTS KAY, who had an Army of twenty five thousand men, he resolved during the treaty of Peace to take in the other places of Hungary. The Arch-duke MATHIAS had sent one of his chiefe ministers vnto him; who returned with this charge: That the Hungarians required MATHIAS for their King; and that he should keepe his Seate at Possion or Vienna, and gouerne the affaires of the kingdom in person: and if they could not obtaine this within one moneth; they would chuse themselves a King.

The Hungarians enquire the King for their King.

The Imperiall Army had lien long about Comorria, vnder the command of Generall BASTA: But, they were not able to giue the Turkes Generall battaille, and to relieue Strigonium.

Winter approaching, the Turkes began to disband, and to retire towards Buda; and the Christians left their lodging neere vnto Comorria. The 25 of November, 14000 Turkes came and charged a Regiment of Reistres, which made their retraite: But, the whole Army turning head, they fled back to the mountaines; but on the third of December, they came early in the morning, and charged the forward: but seeing the whole Army advance, they began to retire; and being pursued to the passage of a River, there were 1500 slain and drowned. In this charge the Earle of Laval, a yong Nobleman of France, was shot; whereof he died, to the great griefe of the whole Army.

The death of the Earle of Laval.

1606.

The Duke of Brunswick besieged the City of Brunswick.

There was an antient quarrell depending betwixt the Duke of Brunswick and the Citie, touching the iurisdiction. The Duke had formerly attempted to take it, by a Stratagem; where he lost many men: and now desirous to have his reuenge, knowing they stood watchfully vpon their guard for feare of surpris, he would try it by open force; and having raised a good Army came to inuelt the Towne. The inhabitants grew amazed, and sent Ambassadors to the Duke: but they stood so stiffly vpon their priuiledges, as the treaty was in vaine. They complained to the Imperiall Chamber; where they obtained Letters from the Emperour, commanding the Duke to giue ouer the siege, and to retire his Army, vpon paine of proscription: but he continued his siege. The Hanfe-townes leuied forces to relieue the besieged. Ambassadors came from the States of lower Germany: who concluded a Truce for a moneth; promising to doe their best indeauours to conclude this warre. The Emperour did likewise send his Ambassadors for the like effect: where, after some treaty, the Duke retired his Army, vpon certain conditions.

Lauerin attempted in waite by the Turke.

This yeere in May, a Tower in the Castle of Buda was set on fire: the which, being full of powder, flew into the ayre, and slue and hurt about 800 persons in the ruines. In the end of the last yeere the Turkes began to treat of a Peace with the Imperials: how pleasing it was vnto them, the Garrison did finde vpon the eighteenth of March. There was a day appointed at the Turkes desire, where both parties might meete to aduance the businesse: for which cause, there came not about fifty Turkes to the Gate, desiring to be let in. The Garrison, doubting no fraude, prepared to open the Gates, when as suddenly a Centinell espied three thousand Souldiers covered with a thick cloude: whereupon, he cried To armes, discovering the treacherie of the enemies, who were forced to retire by the great Ordinance.

Treache taken by the Haiduques.

Epper, a Towne holding for the Emperour, was so oppressed by the seditious Haiduques, as no victuals could enter into it; hoping that being prest by famine, and the want of all other necessities, the Citizens would yeeld. By the same meanes they had taken Toccai not long before; whereas the famine was so great, as they not only boyled their bootes and shoes to make food of, but the Garrison Souldiers had also slaine two children; and some of them had cast Lottes for the killing of themselves to make meate, vntill that extreame necessity forced them to yeeld.

On the fifteenth of Iune, the Turkish Garrison of Alba Regalis, ioyning with some other Troupes, made an incursion as farre as Mount Saint Maryn: Where they defeated and tooke the Gouernor, and carried away many prisoners of all sexes and ages. The Gouernour of Breslay went presently to horse with his troupes; and pursued them with such speede, as hauing overtaken them, hee fought with them, and slewe one thousand five hundred vpon the place: He carried away three thousand prisoners, and freed six thousand Christians from these Infidels.

Holi Haskies taken by the Haiduques.

Haskies (who had beene much employed for the treaty of peace with Botsca) wrote letters from Cassovia to Vienna, giving them to understand, that Botsca could performe nothing touching the peace, without the consent of the States; who had often told him, that They would rather seeke protection from the Turkes, then be subject to the seruitude of strange Gouernours: Yet hee would endeavour at the next assembly, to draw the States vnto him; so, as what had beene concluded at Vienna might not bee retracted: many fearing, that, what had beene promised for matter of Religion, would not bee observed: and therefore they would not lay downe Armes, nor renounce the Turkes protection, untill they had good assurance for the libertie of Religion, and their priuiledges. They would have no strange Gouernour, with whom they could not confer; nor suffer Clergy men to give their voyces in matters of policy: wherefore hee thought it necessary, the Emperour should gratifie the Hungarians in this point; and leaving Transilvania to Botsca, appoint such a Gouernour in Hungary as the States should require. That the conclusion of a peace with the Turkes, depended wholly vpon a peace with

BOTS CA Y

BOTS CA Y, and the Hungarians, whereof there was no hope, unlesse that BOTS CA Y and the Estates of Hungary did finish the treaty.

The grand Seigneur, being much troubled this yeare with the sedition in Asia, and the Persian warres; advertised also of the treaties of peace betwixt the Emperour and BOTS CA Y, hee sent his great Vezier into Hungary, with charge to conclude a peace with the Emperour and the house of Austria. Being come to Buda, BOTS CA Y sent Embassadors vnto him, to inform him fully of the propositions made for the peace of Hungary, betwixt the Emperours Deputies & his: And for that hee would not infringe the promise which hee had made to ACHMAT the grand Seigneur, not to conclude any peace with the Emperour RODOLPH without his priuite and consent, which hee now summoned him to imbrace, seeing that matters might be reconciled: hee intreated the Vezier, not to alter the affaires by any new siege; and to containe his Turks within their campe and garriisons. The Vezier, who came to no other end, was glad to see it so well advanced: whereupon it was concluded, that BOTS CA Y should send Embassadors to Vienna, to conclude this peace, and that of the Hungarians; and that the Emperour and the Vezier should send some of quality, to make a truce, whilst that the Deputies of either side should meete, for the conclusion of a generall peace.

Embassadors came to Vienna, from BOTS CA Y and the Hungarians, in September; and within few dayes after, the Articles of peace were signed by the Arch-duke MATHIAS, and them. First, that they should live with liberty of conscience throughout all Hungary, where there should bee no exercise of any other Religion, but the Catholike, the Lutheran, and the Calvinist. Secondly, that the Archduke MATHIAS should bee Lieutenant generall for the Emperour, throughout all Hungary; and carie the title of Viceroy. Thirdly, that BOTS CA Y should bee confirmed Prince of Transilvania, Earle of Siciles, and Palatine of high Hungary, to which principality and County, his heyres males should succeed; for want whereof, all should returne to the Emperours disposition. Fourthly, that hereafter the Palatine, Treasurer generall, and all the Receivers should bee chosen by the Estates of Hungary. Fifthly, that none should hold any benefit in Hungary but the natives. Sixthly, that there should be a generall abolition of all that had past during this last warre.

Articles of peace accorded with Emperours name only, Hons. Scy and the Hungarians.

In the meane time, a Truce was accorded betwixt the Arch-dukes Deputies, and the Veziers, and euery one prepared to meete at the place appointed, neere vnto Comorria: BOTS CA Y & Ambassadors returned to Neuburg, six French-leagues from Comorria, to be, as it were, arbitrators of such differences as might arise. The place of conference, was halfe a league beneath Comorria, in an Iland diuided in three parts by deepe Riuers, so as one could not go vnto another, but by boate; being thus chosen to auoide all treacherie. The Deputies for the Emperour, Grand-Segnior, and BOTS CA Y, met often and treated, and in the end concluded a Peace for twenty yeeres, contained in fifteen Articles, the which they signed the ninth of November. The same day the Articles were signed, the Bashaw of Buda made a stately feast vnto the Emperours Deputies, giuing to cyther of them a goodly horse, or some peeces of cloath of Gold, or of rare silkes. The same day, he sent three Posts to Constantinople, to aduertise the Sultan ACHMAT of this Peace; the which newes he receiued with so great ioy, as hee went presently to a Mosque to giue thanks to his MAHOMET, and the day following made a solemne feast.

Deputies for the Emperour and Turkes met and conclude a generall peace.

But BOTS CA Y, after so many toyles and labours, was no sooner acknowledged Prince of Transilvania by the Emperour, but (in steade of enioying the Peace which he had propounded to himself, with hope to leaue a posterity to eternize the memory of his valor) CATRAX his Chanceller conspired to poyson him; hoping, by the death of his Prince, to make himselfe heir of his Estate: BOTS CA Y hauing swallowed the poison, which made him die languishing, discovered that it was his Chancellors deede; whom he caused to be apprehended, and being convicted hee cut off his head in Cassovia, giuing that dignity to IAN IANVS: but no preferuatives could prolong his life, but soone after hee must go giue an account to the Eternall, for so many ruines, and so much Christian blood, spilt in Hungary and Transilvania. The Haiduques which had been accustomed to liue by Armes, some hauing neither lands nor goods to feede them; and other knowing no trade and being now to old to learne any, could not subiect themselves to this peace; and, notwithstanding any commandements, they trouped together, liuing vpon the Pesant, and left nothing but desolation where they past: But being come into the County of Bocasi, hauing set fire vpon three villages, the Commons came vpon them with such furie, as there were many slaine of either side in diuers encounters.

Botsca poisoned by his Chanceller.

Q994

BOT-

1607

The death of Botskay.Sigismund Ra-gotsi chosen Prince of Transylvania.Peace ill observed in Hungary.The proceedings of the Haid-duques.An assembly at Vienna.The answer of Ragotsi to the Palatine Ambassadors.
1608A Diet, at Ratisbonne, from
the

BOTS KAY to redresse these disorders, had appointed an assembly of the estates of further Hungary, at Cassiania in December: but feeling his death approach, he could not assist, but gave instructions to his Chancellor and others, what order they should observe, in the assembly of the States after his death; and what they should do for the tranquillity of Hungary, and for the commerce betwixt the Hungarians and Transilvanians; charging them not to infringe any thing of the peace made with the Emperour, and exhorting them to keep their faith with him. And so he died, the 30 of December, being much lamented by them of his party: yet soone after forgetting his advice, they made a change in Transilvania, for that he died without children.

The estates of Transilvania presently after the death of BOTS KAY assembled at Clausenburg, where they did choose SIGISMUND RAGOTSI for their Prince, to whom they went presently and took the oath of allegiance in the great Church. After which, they sent Embassadors to the Arch-duke MATTHIAS, who made their excuse for this election, humbly beseeching his Imperiall Majesty to beleeve, that they had done it forced by necessity, and to prevent the practices of many Noble-men of Hungary and Transilvania, pretending to seize vpon that state: and that the election of RAGOTSI should be no hindrance, but that they would alway acknowledge the Emperour for their true Prince. This RAGOTSI was a man admirable in bounty, and who had not affected this election, but did accept it for the good of his country, and left it againe for the quiet thereof, as you shall heare hereafter.

The peace was ill observed in Hungary of all sides. The Basha of Buda wrote vnto the Archduke MATTHIAS, that he should be forced to take Arms if he did not hinder the courses of the Imperials, the which he should be very vnwilling to do, protesting to observe the peace. The Imperiall garrisons continued their courses and Nehusol was sold and deliuered to COLONISTS.

Some discontented Haiduques trouped together, and ioyned their numbers with some Turkes, making a body of 15000 men, which spoiled all Hungary where they past. The Basha of Buda was the cause thereof, who gaue the commanders money to entertaine this mutinie. To prevent these disorders and the murmurings of the Barrons of Hungary, who desired to haue a King that might remaine in the country, and not at Prague in Bohemia, who by his presence might disperse all these new alterations, the Arch-duke MATTHIAS appointed an Assembly in the Emperors name, whither the Deputies of Hungary came: and attending the Arch-duke MATTHIAS long, in the end they made a solemne protestation, that hauing attended the said Arch-duke seauen weekes in vaine, they were forced to returne to them that sent them; that if pleased the Emperour to assigne another day for an assembly, and publish it, they would come; and if in the meane time their were any thing decreed contrary to the Articles of peace concluded at Vienna, although the Emperour should ratifie it, they protested a nullity against all that should be done in their absence.

The Nobility of Hungary refused to take Armes against the rebellious Haiduques, and Turkes which were ioyned with them; and they sent to intreate the Basha of Buda to retire the Turkes. The Haiduques continued their hostilities, and proclaimed that they were friends to the Turkes, and enemies to the Germanes and Walloons: They sent to intreat HYMANOY Governor of Cassania, to take the Diademe which had beene giuen to BOTS KAY, and to be their King, but he scorned their offer: saying, I will haue no other King but CESAR: finally, continuing their spoiles (being assisted with some Cannon from the Bashas of Buda and Agria and with 300000 duckets) they went to besiege Elack with 16000 men; BOSNIACK commanded in the place: who carried himselfe so valiantly against all their attempts as he forced them to raise the siege.

During the Assembly at Presbourg the Arch-duke MATTHIAS had called together the estates of Austria to Vienna, where there were Articles propounded vnto them in writing, touching the estate of the Country, whereon they were to conclude; but there were resolutions taken by the practices of the Arch-duke MATTHIAS contrary to the Emperours intention.

The King of Poland and his Palatines being at warres, the Palatines sent to RAGOTSI Prince of Transilvania for aide: who made them this answer; that it was a wicked thing to nourish warres betwixt Christians: That his Armes should neuer fight in a ciuile and vnjust warre: that it was treacherous to Arme against ones Prince, and that they which did fight against their Soueraigne were detested by their posteritie, and their memory buried in infamy; as for such as aided rebels they deserved to be called impious, a surname which I will by no means purchase: obey your King and God will blesse you.

This yeere in the beginning of Ianuary, there was a Diet assembled at Ratisbone in which the

the Arch-duke, FERDINAND of Graz, did preside in the Emperors name; which bred some jealousie in the Arch-duke MATTHIAS. All their deliberation was reduced to five Articles; whereof the first and principall was, To make provision against the Turkes, in whom there was little assurance for the entertainment of peace: and therefore he desired, that the Princes of the Empire would furnish yearly a certain contribution to resist the Turkes practices when there should be cause, that all the Estates of the Empire should entertaine 20000 foot and 4000 horse at their owne charge, or else; that they would yearly lay by so much money as the entertainment of such an Army would amount vnto: but there was such dissension among the Deputies, that after foure months continuance they brake off, and concluded nothing.

During this Diet at Ratisbone, the Arch-duke MATTHIAS practised by what means hee might make himselfe Soueraigne of Austria, Stiria, Moravia, and of all that the Christians held in Hungary. Hee came to an Assembly of the Estates at Presbourg in the beginning of the yeere, where, to attain to his designe, he propounded to the Noble-men of Hungary, that it would be very profitable to vniue the Estates of Austria and Hungary by an offensive and defensive league; so as Deputies being appointed, it was concluded, that for the good of Austria and Hungary they should not alter any thing in the Articles of peace, made the yeere before at Vienna; and that an offensive and defensive league should be made betwixt the said Countries. The Articles of the resolution were set down by the Deputies, and they were signed by the Arch-duke MATTHIAS, and proclaimed the first of February. The Arch-duke MATTHIAS, being returned to Vienna, called the Estates of Austria together; to whom he imparted what had passed at Presbourg; and that what he had done was for fear that Hungary should be wrested from the Empire, as well by the Turkes as by the Barons of Hungary, and that after this distraction the whole warre should fall vpon Austria; aduising them also to provide money for the entertainment of the Army which he must leue, if the rebellious Haiduques would not desist from Arms. The Estates gaue him great thanks, promising to follow and assist him with their liues and goods.

The Arch-duke MATTHIAS (who knew that for the effecting of his designes he must haue a peace in Hungary as well with the Turkes as with the discontented Haiduques) gaue charge vnto HELLHASKAY, that at one Instant he should take order with the Turkes for the reforming of the disorders which had hapned since the peace, and to draw as many of the Haiduques as he could to his pay, to the end the rest should be forced to disperse themselves, or bee careful to liue in peace: wherein HASKAY carried himselfe so politically, that hee drew fifteen companies of horse to the Arch-dukes pay; and the rest in an Instant were scattered and dispersed. GABRIEL BATTORI, the right heir of the Princes of Transilvania, hauing retired himself to the Turkes, was now restored to his principality. SIGISMUND RAGOTSI (who had bin chosen after the death of BOTS KAY) yielded it willingly to him, and retired to Sarenta; assuring BATTORI by Letters, that he had not accepted the election but to prevent the combustions among great men, who pretended to vsurp and trouble that state.

The Arch-duke, seeing all things succeed according to his desire, sent commandement to haue all his Troops come to the rendezvous vpon the Frontiers of Moravia by the fourteenth of April. The Emperour being aduertised of these leues (which they gaue out was for that his Majesty did not ratifie the treaty of peace made at Vienna) he sent the Cardinal of Ditrislein to the Arch-duke, with a ratification of the treaty; but with this clause, that hee would haue the offensive and defensive league, made betwixt the Estates of Hungary and Austria, dissolved: whereto the Arch-duke answered, it could not bee; and so returned the Cardinal with certain demands, who, finding that he had another designe than he made shew of, aduertised the Emperour, that he might provide for his safety. The Emperour growes amazed: hee presently calls the States of Bohemia to Prague: he summons all his forces together, lodges them about his person, and craves aid from the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire. The Arch-duke, hearing that the Emperour had taken the alarm, came into Moravia ioining to Austria, with an army of 20000 old souldiers and 28 Cannon. He sent to the Estates of Bohemia, commanding euery Town to send two Deputies to Czassa, where they should vnderstand from his owne mouth the cause of his taking Arms. The Emperour, hearing this, exhorted them to persist in their fidelity; as no man went to Czassa, but the whole Country took Arms for the Emperour: who, hoping to stay him with his Army in Moravia, sent back the Cardinal to vnderstand his complaints, being accompanied by the Popes Nuntio, and the Ambassadors of diuerse Princes. But hee marched into the Country towards Czassa; where the Ambassadors of Saxony and Brandenburg came vnto him the ninth of May, intreating him not to passe any further, but to grant a truce for eight

The Arch-duke
Mathias practi-sels to make himselfe a Soue-raigne.The Emperour sends to the Arch-duke
Mathias.The Emperour in fear of his brother
Mathias.The Arch-duke
Mathias enters Bohemia, and camps before Prague.

eight daies, to the end this trouble might be compounded: the which they could not obtaine by any importunities.

The Arch-duke MATTHIAS had a desire to see Prague; not as an humble Petitioner, but with a commanding power, being attended by 8000 horse. COLONITZ the Marshall of his Campe following with the rest of his Army. The poore Emperour was in a strange distress: he had two enemies to encounter and fight withall; without the walles his owne brother, and within the towne the assembly of the estates of Bohemia. And the deputies were of diuerse religions, where they importuned him with many Articles, both concerning religion and the state: all which he was forced to graunt, except that which concerned religion, the which was referred to the next assembly at S. Michael.

The Arch-duke vpon a safe conduct from the Emperour and the estates sent his Embassadors into Prague, who deliuered his demands in writing to the assembly: whercupon a conference was appointed at Debritz, where after much debate, the Emperour obtained a peace of his brother; but it was with the preiudice of his estate & honour: for he was forced to stripp off his clothes before he was dead, and to resigne vnto his brother the greatest part of his patrimoniall inheritance.

This peace was concluded in 17 Articles: whereof the chiefe were, That he should yeeld the Realme of Hungary, and deliuer the Crowne vnto the Arch-duke MATTHIAS, freeing the Hungarians of their oath. That he should yeeld presently all the Arch-duchy of Austria vnto him, and to his heires males. That if the Emperour died without issue male, the Arch-duke should succeed him in the Kingdom of Bohemia, and carrie presently in his titles, Designed king of Bohemia. And that he and his heires should haue the administration of Moravia, with the title of Marquesse, with diuerse others tending to the aduancement of the Arch-duke MATTHIAS.

This peace being confirmed, the Emperour sent the Crowne of Hungary, with all the Regall ornaments, to the Arch-dukes Campe: where they were receiued with great pompe. And thus the Arch-duke, king of Hungary being pleased, raised his Campe and returned to Vienna: where he made a stately entry, and was receiued with great pompe by all the estates of the country, who assuring him of their fidelity and obedience, congratulated his new souerainty, and he gaue them great thanks for their good affection. In October the estates of Austria were to take the oath of fidelity and allegiance to the king, as to their Arch-duke, the which was solemnely performed: but the protestants were not present, for that the king (by the aduice of the Arch-duke, LÉOPOLD, of Cardinall MELCHIOR the Popes Nuntio, and of Cardinall FÖRSTER) had by an edict forbidden the exercise of the protestants religion in Austria. This bred new troubles, for that the protestants assembled at Horne, and made their protestation, sending a petition vnto the King, signed by 150 Noblemen, gouernours and Capitaines; writing also to the Catholikes that if they tooke the oath of allegiance vnto the said King Arch-duke, before the trouble of religion were pacified, they should not be able to excuse themselves to be the causes of the miseries that would ensue.

The Ceremony being ended at Vienna, King MATTHIAS went to Presbourg, where on the 22 of October the Noble-men of Hungary receiued him with great state, there being about 10000 men in Armes, where soone after they presented diuerse Articles vnto him conformable vnto the edict of pacification made at Vienna, but with some explication. The protestants of Austria, sent their requests vnto the estates of Hungary, letting them vnderstand, that King MATTHIAS denying them the free exercise of their religion, they were forced to take Armes, requiring them to assist them with the succours which were promised by the offensive and defensive League.

The Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN was intreated by the Hungarians, to intercede in this difference, who hauing conferred with King MATTHIAS, brought them answer, that the king had neuer any intent to trouble the peace of Austria: but as for the free exercise of the protestant religion within townes, that his maiesty could by no means graunt it, partly in regarde of his confidence, and partly for feare of his Holiness, and of the king of Spain: yet he had his maiesties word, that if the Protestants of Austria would lay downe their Armes, and acknowledge their fault, they should haue liberty of religion allowed them out of townes; and as for publick affaires his maiesty would aduance his subsidies, without acceptation of religion. The Hungarians hauing receiued this answer, he perswaded them to lay downe Armes, and to submit themselves to the Kings will, refusing the aide which they desired; laying before them the dangers of

of a doubtfull warre. The Protestants returned to Austria discontented, yet afterwards by the intercession of the Morauians and others, after some little combustion, they obtained a peace and part of that which they demanded.

MATTHIAS was proclaimed King of Hungary in Presbourg, the foureteenth of Nouember, HARRY HASKAY being first chosen Palatine; and on the 19 day hee was solemnely crowned. After which, beginning to order the affaires of the kingdom, he was forced by the Hungarian Barons, to dismiss all the Germanes which had any offices in Hungary, and to aduance others of the Country. It troubled him much, and his brother MAXIMILIAN that COLONITZ should be deprived of his office of Marshall of Hungary, hauing done so great seruices for that crowne; but he was forced to indure it in regarde of peace. In the end of the yeere he returned to Vienna, so as in seauen moneths the Arch-duke MATTHIAS caused himselfe to be crowned king of Hungary, and acknowledged Arch-duke of Austria and Marquess of Moravia, forcing the Emperour to make his Will before he was dead.

This yeere the Turkes notwithstanding the peace, attempted to surpris Fellek. The Bassa of Agria had corrupted ANDREW DRACO a Captaine within the Cittadell, who promised to deliuer it for 20000 loachins: the hour was appointed at midnight, when as DRACO should set certaine houles of fire; and whilst that euery man should be busie to quench it, he should giue the Turkes entrie into the cittadell, and so into the towne. This enterprise was discouered, and DRACO quartered. The Bassa of Buda also seized vpon about 400 villages, causing the inhabitants to take the oath of allegiance vnto the Turke. The Emperour as we haue said had giuen his brother MATTHIAS what he demanded, and had pacified the estates of Bohemia as well as he could, suffering euery one to liue in the liberty of his religion, promising to set downe an order at the next assembly, which was this yeare in Ianuary. The Catholikes fought by all meanes to entertaine the Emperour in hatred with the Protestants, and to haue that disannulled, which had bene formerly granted; saying, that their opinions had bene condemned, and that the exercise of their religion was but by sufferance. The Protestants sent their Embassadors to the King of Hungary, and to the Electors and Princes of the Empire, to intercede for them to his maiesty, for the continuance of the free exercise of their religion.

The Emperour hauing forbidden the Protestants to make any assembly in the court of new Prague, they went vnto him, and besought him to appoint them a place where they might assemble, and to write their defence, and to present it vnto him, and to let the world know the iustice of their demand the which they could not obtaine: So as on the eight of May, they resolved notwithstanding the Emperours prohibition, to goe and make their assembly in the court of new Prague; where they brake open the dores, and entered, putting themselves in defence, if any should come to assaile them. The Emperour hearing of this alteration, sent the first Burgoane of Prague with his chiefe officers, who said vnto them, that his Imperiall Maiesty had alwaies had a will to loue them as his faithfull subjects; and that he was resolved, shortly to call an assembly, and to end that controuersie touching the liberty of religions. The Protestants made answer by the Barron of Budonitz, that they thanked his Imperiall Maiesty for his good will towards them; and besought him to beleue that they had bene alwaies faithfull vnto him: yet they knew well what had bene treated hitherto in the states by some counsellors, who vnder pretext, of aduancing the Catholike religion, were the cause of these troubles which had followed; and they did hope to let his Maiesty vnderstand, that the end of such counsells and practices, could bring nothing but ruine to Bohemia, and the losse of his Realmes, and prouinces. As for the publication of the assembly of the estates, they desired it might be within three daies, to preuent many accidents which might happen. Both parties, both Catholikes and Protestants, remained 15 daies in continuall ialousie one of another, fearing surpris. But as soone as the Emperour had published the assembly, all was pacified, by reason of the Emperours declaration; whereby he did aow, that what the protestants had done, was for his seruice and the good of the Kingdome. At which assembly, there was free exercise of religion graunted to the Protestants, and Temples allowed them to preach in the vulgar tongue, declaring all them troublers of the publick peace, that should any way infringe it.

The Iesuites were suspected to haue bene the cause of these broiles: both Catholikes and Protestants complained, and presented a petition vnto the King, that they being strangers, and come poore into Prague, had in a short time gotten great possessions, yet payed no tribute or contribution, neither bare any charge like vnto others: wherefore they required that hereafter they might beare the charges of the Common-wealth like others of the Clergie, that they should in distress.

The Emperour

A conference at Debritz.

1608

A peace concluded between the Emperour &
Matthias.

King Matthias enters into Prague

New troups in Austria for religion.

The Protestants
of Austria came aide from the Hungarians.

Matthias crowned King of Hungary.

All Hungarians displaced in Hungary.

The Bassa of Agria attempts Fellek.

A combustion in Bohemia for religion.

The troubles in Bohemia for religion pacified.

A complaint against the Ie-suites.

should not purchase any more, nor accept any donations, by testament or otherwise, without his Majesties permission.

The death of the Duke of Juliers and Cleves, and the pretensions.

In March, WILLIAM Duke of Juliers, Cleves and Berg, Earl of Mark and Ravenspurg, died without children: to whose succession there were many Princes and Noble-men pretended, which drew great miseries upon those Countries. Among the Princes of Germany, were the Elector of Brandenburg, who was issued from MARY ELIZABETH, eldest sister unto the said WILLIAM deceased. The Count Palatine of Newburg descended from ANNE the second sister. The third Pretendent was the widow of the Duke of Deuxponts. The fourth was the Marquess of Burgun, who married SYBILLE the fourth sister. The Elector of Saxony pretended these estates to belong to him as maleline issues of the Empire, and that they had been given to his Predecessors, and to their Successors for the services which they had done to the Empire and Emperor, in case the Duke of Cleves should die without issue male. In BRANNE was the Duke of Siewers, who maintained, that he was the only Prince which carried the name and Arms of Cleves; and the Earl of Markwiler, who is the right heir of the house of Mark, whereof he carries the name and Arms. Every one maintained his pretension, fortifying themselves by Arms, and engaging their friends: the relation of which war I refer to divers others which have written thereof; the cause being yet undecided.

In October, there arrived at Prague an Ambassador from the grand Seignior with many rich Presents to the Emperor: among the which there was a goodly pavilion, let with many precious stones, four goodly horse, with rich caparisons, a Turkish habit whereon there was nothing to be seen but gold and stone, with certain other precious stones. Having presented his Letters, and seen the Emperor confirm the truce, he returned with Presents.

About the same time, the Prince of Anhalt came Ambassador to the Emperor from the Princes and Estates of the Empire; giving him to understand by his Chancellor, that the Princes required to have DONAUERD in SUEBIA (which had been some years before taken by the Duke of Bavaria, by the virtue of the Emperors Letters of proscription) restored again to the Empire and to the former estate, some burdens being taken away; that justice might be duly administered, and the peace of religion confirmed; that Princes Ambassadors when they came, might be dispatched without delay; that suits in Courts might be amended: and for that Princes Ambassadors had been much neglected in Court, they required that some Protestants might be chosen into the Senat and Councell. The Emperor heard the Prince willingly; yet excusing himself, that by reason of the troubles in Bohemia he could not then attend it, he promised that he would soon give the Princes and States satisfaction.

This year there was an attempt against the person of GABRIEL BATTORI, Prince of Transilvania, by a Noble-man of that Country, being induced thereto by a wicked religious man: whereof the Prince being advertised, and of the day of the execution, he made shew to go forth to hunt, having first laid an ambush without the Town, into the which he drew the venturers, who followed him to execute their enterprise: whereas some of them were cut in pieces; and among them the religious man. Some report that BATTORI banished the rest, and some being fled into Hungary, he wrote his Letters to GEORGE TYSON, intreating him to cause them to be apprehended, lest they should attempt the like there, being incited by the Jesuits, and the hatred to religion.

The spirit of division had set all Germany on fire, and drawn them into factions, for the defence of the Pretendents to the Duchy of Juliers, either party seeking to fortifie it self, for the effecting whereof, they made severall Assemblies. The Princes Protestants Noble-men, with the Deputies of fifteen Imperiall Towns, holding the part of the Elector of Brandenburg and Palatine of Newburg, met at Halle in SUEBIA: where there assisted an Ambassador from the French King, who offered them protection in the King his Masters name; and to assist them with 8000 foot and 2000 horse, with cannon and munition, upon condition that they should not alter any thing in matter of religion within the Country of Juliers, and that the Catholics should be maintained in the same rights and priviledges which they enjoyed during the life of the last Duke.

At the same time, the Princes and Towns of Germany, holding the Emperors part, assembled at Pilsen in BRANANIA, where they resolved of the forces which every one should furnish for the Army which they appointed to raise: after which, they beganne to leue soldiours throughout all parts of Europe; what succeeded, you shall hereafter hear.

The protestant Princes, having concluded of their succours for the warre, published a declaration ration of the causes of their union; shewing, That their confederation was for the defence of the glory of the name of God, and the maintenance of iustice and peace in the Empire; and not contrary to their obedience which they did owe unto the Emperor or against any estate of the holy Empire: beseeching his Imperiall Majesty, and all the Electors, Princes, and States, not to give credit to such as had maliciously published, that their union was made in contempt of the Imperiall Majesty, and to oppress the Roman religion; to prophane the monasteries, and to take againe with violence those goods which their predecessors had given to Churches, employed in pious uses; and to trouble the peace of religion. Finally (relating the estate of the pretendents of Juliers) they concluded that they were united with them, to the end they should not be by force molested in their iust possession of the estates of the house of Juliers; intreating all Princes of the Empire, & others not to misconstrue their union; nor to hinder it, but rather to assist them; that all jealousies & distrusts being taken away, love & concord may be firmly settled hereafter.

The Electors, Princes and Towns holding the Emperors party, which had bin assembled at Pilsen, made another general assembly at Prague, in which assisted the Arch-dukes, MAXIMILIAN & FERDINAND of Austria. The propositions were reduced unto 4. heads. 1. The reconciliation of the Emperor with his brother king MATTHIAS. 2. The election of a King of the Romans. 3. The restitution of DONAUERD. 4. The composition of the trouble of JULIERS. The king of Hungary sent his deputies to this assembly; from whom the Emperor demanded: the restitution of Austria, & Moravia. The Elector of Cullen, the Arch-duke FERDINAND, and the Duke of Brunswick, went to Vienna to acquaint the King with the Emperors demand, and the proposition for the election of a king of the Romans. It was concluded in the assembly, that the Duke of Bavaria should leue DONAUERD to its former liberty, without any exception, paying him his charges. And touching JULIERS trouble, all the estates which had belonged to the last Duke JOHN WILLIAM, were conferred by the Emperor upon the Elector of Saxony, and his house; conditionally that the house of Saxony should prove that they had more right to the said estates than the Princes pretending; that they should alter nothing in the exercise of the Catholick religion; that the said Elector should satisfie the demands of the Duke of Siewers and the Marquess of Burgun, and should pay the charges disbursd by the Emperor & the Arch-duke LEOPOLD in this war.

The third of July a reconciliation was made betwixt the Emperor and his brother the king of Hungary, upon these Articles. 1. That king MATTHIAS should acknowledge his brother RODOLPH for Emperor, and the head of Christendome, king of Bohemia, Lord of the Marquissate of Moravia, and the first of the house of Austria. 2. That yearly the said king should send him 2000 vessels of wine and pay him 10000 florens. 3. That the said king nor the provinces granted unto him should not make any alliances without the consent of the Emperor. 4. That the king should demand pardon for those things which were past, of his Imperiall majesty, the which he should give him, in a particular forme. 5. That the soldiours of either part should be dismissed within one moneth. 6. That if it should be needful to make warre against the Turke, it should be done by the Emperors authority. 7. That Germans should be put in garrison in the forts of Hungary with the Hungarians: and that the Emperor should continue the ordinary payment, which Bohemia did furnish for the intertainment of the said garrison. 8. That the Emperor and King should hereafter ioyn their forces, to punish rebellious subjects. 9. That if any of their officers did not cause the said Articles to be presently observed, they should be deprived of their offices. 10. That the Electors & Princes assembled at Prague should subscribe the said Articles, and that they should be signed by ether part. 11. That the county of Tirol should be left wholly to the Emperor; and that neither king MATTHIAS nor the Arch-dukes his brethren and cosins should pretend any title unto it.

Soone after, the protestants Princes of Germany, who were united in the behalfe of the Princes pretending the succession of Juliers, seeing that Duke MAXIMILIAN of Bavaria, the head of the union of the Catholike Princes, had leaved many soldiours, they sent an Embassie unto him: where after many conferences, in the end they concluded, that by the first of November, the duke of Bavaria should dismiss his Army, but for that the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had great troupes in his Bishopricks of Passau and Straßburg, he might put part of them into garrison to be ready upon any new accident: moreover that all acts of hostility should cease, betwixt the subjects of the Archbishop of Cullen, and the States of Juliers; and if there should happen any difference betwixt the said parties, they should agree amiably, and not come to Arms.

The Emperor having given no order for the payment of LEOPOLD'S Army (it having committed

An Assembly at Prague.

Articles of reconciliation betwixt the Emperor and King Matthias.

The Protestants Princes sent to the Duke of Bavaria.

The prince of Anhalt sent ambassador to the Emperor from the prince of Germany.

Assembly of the protestant princes at Halle.

The Emperor giving out of Pilsen.

committed great spoiles in the Bishoprick of Passau they entred into Austria, where they committed barbarous cruelties, being led by Romeo. Many thought that he would passe vnto Prague, to force the Emperor to pay his Army: Others were of opinion that Leopold aspired to make himselfe King of the Romans, and that he would employ this Army to that effect. King Mathias (who was then disarmed) found presently that it was against him: wherefore he sent for all his subiects and friends, and fought to crosse the Leopoldians enterprises: He wrote to the States of Bohemia, that he would neuer beleue the Emperour would breake the Peace, so newly sworne; yet he intreated them, if neede were, to succour him in his necessity. The Leopoldians entred into Bohemia, and surprized Budenitz by policie and spoyled it; and then marched towards Prague. The Emperor (being required by the States) sent a Herald to the Arch-duke Leopold, with commandement to retire the Army to Cruman, and there to attend their pay.

Having deliuered his charge in secret to the Arch-duke, he was brought to Romeo; who willed him to returne to Prague, and to assure them, that they were friends to all such as were faithfull subiects to the Emperour, and were in Armes only to defend his authority; and that being entred into Prague (the which they hoped to doe the next day) they would not wrong any man: After whose returne, they marched to Prague. Many of the Emperours Councill had intelligence with the Arch-duke Leopold, fearing King Mathias; and had gotten Armes into diuers Monasteries, providing for all occurrences. They were Armed, and had gotten a gate at their deuotion, to draw Leopold's souldiers secretly into petty Prague; the which they surprized on the fifteenth of February early in the morning, by the treachery of the Porter: yet there was a great conflict in the Town, with losse on both sides; but, in the end, the Inhabitants were forced to yield. After which, the Castle of Prague was yeilded to Leopold, causing himselfe to be declared the Emperours Lieutenant generall, taking the oath of fidelity from all the Souldiers. In the meane time, the Nobility and Souldiers within old and new Prague, resolved to make a fallie vpon the Leopoldians which were in petty Prague: and they, on the other side, threatened to set fire on the Town.

On the 18 of February, the Emperour sent a commandement both to the Leopoldians, and to the States of Bohemia and Nobility, to present themselves the next day in the castle of Prague, and there to sweare all obedience, and fidelity to his imperiall Maiesty, and to promise not to offend one another by Armes. The Herald having published this command to the Leopoldians, the States would not suffer him to enter into the old Town; giuing him charge to tell the Emperour, that he should proclaim a cessation of Arms for three daies, to the end they might haue time to consult of their affaires. In the end, it was concluded, that the old and new town should giue 100000 Florens, so as Leopold's Army would leaue petty Prague, and depart presently out of Bohemia. During these combustions, King Mathias drew together his friends and forces: he had then two great affaires in hand. For Gabriel Battori Prince of Transilvania, in the beginning of this year, had surprized Hernstadt by intelligence, carried away his Lieutenant prisoner, thrust out all his partizans; and placed 1300 Haiduques in Garrison. The which did much trouble Mathias, hoping to haue had his reuenge this summer; the which he might easily haue effected, the Vauode of Valachia and Battori being in warre. But the King running to the nearest fire, caused his troups to turne head towards Bohemia, to succour the States which craued his aide.

The Emperour hearing that his brother Mathias was entred Bohemia with an Army of 18000 men, to succour the States; he sent them word by an Herald, that if they would not take some course for the payment of Leopold's Army, that it might be discharged, he would depriue them of their liberties: But they, hearing of the Kings approach, refused his demand. The Emperour, foreseeing the danger if these two Armies should meete, caused 300000 Florens to be giuen to pay the Army for three moneths; and so Leopold retired away by night, and requered the Frontiers of Bohemia.

Romeo, Lieutenant to the Arch-duke Leopold, would not leaue Bohemia as he had done Prague, without the full payment of his Army. Whereupon, he fortifies himselfe within Budenitz, and furnisheth it with victuals, Arms, and powder: he melts the Bels to cast Ordnance, and fortifies himselfe so well, as they must compound with him, before they get him out. As for King Mathias, hearing that Leopold was gone from Prague, he sent word vnto the States, that he would not arriue there before the 24 of March. Before which time, diuers of the Emp. Councill were imprisoned; & among others, Francis Dennaos who was also also of secret counsell to the Arch-duke Leopold. Being put to the Rack, he confest the Arch-dukes designs, and that he had beene sent by the Emperours to some Electors and Princes, to draw aide from them against King Mathias, they being at iarre: That Leopold's resolution was to change many things not onely in the gouernment of Prague, but in the whole Empire, and that some great men of the Emperours Councill must be disinitt. Whereunto Dennaos made answer; That it might be done in Italy, but that Bohemia was gouerned after, another manner. That the Arch-dukes intention was to seize vpon all the townes of Bohemia, to vnite his forces with those of Bohemia, to defend the Emperour, and to employ his Armes against King Mathias, whose entry into Bohemia they would hinder; And if this designe had succeeded, then by an Imperiall edict they would haue forbidden the exercise of the Protestants religion throughout all Bohemia. He also confest that he was seruant to the Arch-duke Leopold, and that he would gladly haue procured him the kingdom of Bohemia.

King Mathias having discovered his enemies counsells, marched on, and came within halfe a league of Prague; whither all the Nobility and others went to honour this rising sunne, leauing the sunne setting. He made his entry into Prague with great pompe: Where after his arriuall the Emperour sent to congratulate his coming, by such of his Councill as he thought should be most pleasing vnto him. The Elector of Saxony aduised the States of Bohemia to bee well aduised in the pacifying of these troubles, and not to belieue that the Emperour (who had so peaceably gouerned not onely Bohemia but the whole Empire these thirty five years) was the cause thereof; but that it proceeded from some busie and turbulent spirits, in the punishment of whom they must vse moderation; not chastizing the innocent with the culpable; That the lawes of Bohemia bee not violated, and the Imperiall Maiesty with the dignity of the Electors, and states of the Empire wronged: That all their counsells should tend to obey the Emperour onely, and not suffer his age to be opprest with cares and discontents. By other priuate letters he aduertised Henry Iuliers Duke of Brunswick, not to abandon the Emperour, nor to suffer any thing to passe preiudiciall to his Imperiall maiesty, and admonished K. Mathias that all things proceeding with moderation, the house of Austria would be much contented.

The Emperour assembled the States of Bohemia vpon the twelfth of Aprill: where hee gaue them to vnderstand, that he could not conceale the brotherly affection which he bare to Mathias: King of Hungary his first brother, and his successor designed in the Realme of Bohemia: he entreated them to resolute he might be crowned in his life time, as many of his predecessors had done to their successors; but with condition to suffer him to enioy the Realme during his life: As for certaine differences betwixt him and King Mathias, that they should treat thereof at the end of the Assembly. In the meane time he required them to giue him wherewith to entertaine the Imperiall Maiesty; That his officers might bee paid their wages; his counsellors imprisoned, set at liberty: And that all the power and royall authority in Bohemia should remaine to him.

The states in their Assembly drew many Articles, which King Mathias was to sweare before his coronation. And they were read in the presence of the Embassadors of Moravia: who also for themselves and the Silefians (who are incorporated to the crowne of Bohemia) presented their complaints and grieuances containing 49 Articles: And the inhabitants of Prague required the confirmation of eight Articles, before his coronation, the which concerned the priuate gouernment of their City: all which I am forced for breuitie sake to omit, and to referre the Reader to the originall, whereby hee may iudge what the estate of Bohemia might be after those demandes; the Emperour (who was the lawfull King) hauing nothing in a manner but the title. Hee had a good heart; but his body was growne old and weaker: Hee had the greatnesse of courage of his predecessors; but crost by fortune, hee is constrained to yeeld to that which they desire: And he that presseth him to this consent, we see him (being halfe forced) to quit some of the flowers of the liberty of this crowne, to those which did him homage, before that heauen had taken away him, whose successor he had beene without condition. King Mathias hauing sworne to all their Articles, and the Emperour hauing freed all the subiects of Bohemia and incorporated prouinces, from their oath of allegiance, they proceeded to the Coronation of Mathias; whom the whole court and the inhabitants of Prague honoured much, hauing much desired it. And after the Coronation, certaine Deputies being appointed to end the differences betwixt the Emperour and King Mathias, they concluded (and signed vnto) these Articles: Firstly, That the Castle of Prague should remaine to the Emperour, and that the Demagelacem: Jisim.

The Duke of Saxony writes to the States of Bohemia.

The Emperour propositions to the States of Bohemia.

Propositions of the States Mathias.

King Mathias crowned King of Bohemia.

1611

Articles of accord between the Emperor and K. Mathias.

king should lodge neere vnto it, hauing the Church common to them both. Secondly, That the gouernour of the Cattle and the guard should sweare fidelity to both; and if there were any change to be made, it should be left to the Emperours disposition. Thirdly, That the gouernment of the Empire should remaine in the Emperor, and that he should not be disquieted in any thing that concerned the Imperial iurisdiction. Fourthly, That the gouernment of Bohemia and the provinces depending, should be left to King MATHIAS, to whom the Emperor should yeeld all the right he pretended, but as for the difference for the title of king of Bohemia it should be referred to the next Assembly of the States. Fifthly, That in regard of the Cession, which the Emperour made vnto king MATHIAS of Bohemia and the provinces depending, he should pay yearly vnto his imperiall maiesty 300000 florens, at two equal payments. Sixtly, That the Emperour should enioy the Segniories, demefus and reuenues of Budouis, Brandefi, Lissau, and Petzerau, during his life; the which he should by no means engage, sell, or transport. Seauenthly, That the Emperor should haue liberty to dispose by his testamēt of 200000 florens. Eightly, That the king should effect his promise made to the Emperour, touching the county of Tyrol, and should satisfie his brother ALBERT, for his interest in Auftria. Ninthly, That the Emperor should recommend king MATHIAS to the Electors and Princes of the Empire to be aduanced to the Imperiall dignity. Tenthly, That at the next Diet they should labour by all means to obtaine contribution and succours against the Turke. Eleuenthy, That the priuiledges of the Arch-ducchie of Auftria should be deliuered into the Kings hands; with this condition, that if the Emperour had need, the king should assist him. Twelthly, and lastly, That within one year the Emperor should giue the iurisdiction of Bohemia to the said king.

The towne of Aix (whereas the Emperor receiues his first Crowne) was in great combustions by reason of religion. The Catholike magistrate, by vertue of the Emperours commandement, had hindred the exercise of the Protestant religion within the towne and territory; the which the others taking very impatiently, they fell into a tumult and took Armes, seizing vpon the towne-house and whole town, and dispossessed the Catholike magistrate. The Catholikes fledde to the Arch-ducke ALBERT and to the Elector of Cullen, for support: And the Protestants sent presently to the Princes possesing Muliers, for aide, and to send some men of note to reconcile their differences. In the end by the mediation of the French Kings Embassadors; there were certaine Articles set downe for their reconciliation, but they took no great effect.

Brunswick pressed by the Emperor.

The Duke of Brunswick had (as we haue said) besieged the city of Brunswick, but had left it by reason of the hope of a peace. This year the Duke was at the Emperours court, to pursue the proscription of the said towne, in case of disobedience. The Hanse-townes (fearing that his fauour in court would preuaile more then the iustice of their cause) intreated king MATHIAS by their Letters, to fauour the right of the towne of Brunswick. But the Duke preuailed: for hee obtained Letters patents for the proscription of the Senate and inhabitants of Brunswick, as violaters of the publike peace; declaring them guilty of treason, and all their goods confiscate to the Duke, if that within one year they did not submit themselves vnder his obedience. Whereunto the magistrate and citizens published a declaration, containing a protestation of their innocency.

An Assembly of Electors at Nuremberg.

Propositions made by the Electors at the Emperor.

About the end of September the Electors had called a Diet to Nuremberg: from whence they sent Ambassadors to the Emperor, who found not any person of quality but the Duke of Brunswick about his Maiesty. They acquainted him with the present estate of the Empire, telling him, That the Electors required, about all things, a reformation in iustice; That he should make choice of more faithfull officers and Counsellors then he formerly had done; That a general Diet might be called in the Spring following; That what King MATHIAS had done, was nothing pleasing vnto them; That the reason of the bad gouernment of the Common-weale, was, for that his imperiall Maiesty did not impart the important affaires of the Empire vnto them, as his predecessors haue usually done. They also besought him, in the name of the said Electors, that if he had no will to stay in Bohemia; to let them vnderstand the time when he meant to depart, and the place where he would make his residence: And as for the Election of a King of Romanes, they would not treat thereof without his consent; yet, not wishing that the Empire should goe out of the house of Auftria, they desired to know which of them he would haue to succede him.

The Emperour made answere, That he had long projected to appoint a successor in the Empire, but the troubles in Bohemia had diuerted him; That he desired before they did treat of him that should succede him, there should be a generall Diet, where he might assist; That he was of the Electors opinion, concerning the necessity to proceede to the Election of a King of the Romanes; but he aduised them to giue order, that he might tell them freely in the Assembly; what was necessary for the safety of the Common-weale. The Ambassadors being returned, with this answere, the Electors appointed a Diet to be held in Aprill following, in the year 1612, to choose a King of Romanes in the City of Frankford, after the accustomed manner.

of

The Emperour RODOLPH growing sickly (in the end of December, after the old computation) with extreame paines in his Legges (the which increased daily) he yeelded his soule to God, on the tenth of Ianuary; hauing reigned Emperour about thirty five yeeres. They thought to haue kept his death secret, vntill the coming of King MATHIAS, and therefore they sent vpps his seruice at dinner time into his chamber, to the end no man should suspect it; but soone after, being known to TRANTMANSTORF, it was diuulged ouerall Prague, and in the meane time they sent Postes to aduertise King MATHIAS, and the Electors of the Empire.

The death of the Emperor Rodolph.

THE LIFE OF MATHIAS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND HUNDRETH AND NINETEENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

(* * *)

After the death of RODOLPHVS (according to the Golden Bull, made by the Emperour CHARLES the Fourth; in the yeere one thousand three hundred fifty fixt) the Emperour being dead, the Elector Palatine, and he of Saxony, were appointed Vicars, Gouernors, and administrators of the Empire, vntill there were a King of Romanes chosen to be Emperour; either of them gouerning in his feuerall iurisdiction. The Electour of Monte, according to his charge, gaue notice to all the Electors to meete at Frankford in May, to proceede to the Election of a King of the Romanes; whither all the Princes came with their Traines; where, omitting the Ceremonies which were obserued in that Assembly; In the end, they ioyntly concluded to choose King MATHIAS, for King of the Romanes, who was crowned on the fourteenth of Iune, in the said City of Frankford with the ordinary Ceremonies; and on the sixteenth of Iune, the Queen, his wife, was crowned Emperesse, who was also of the house of Auftria, and descended from the branch of Tyrol. The Ceremony of his Election and coronation being ended

Rrr 3

1613

ended with great magnificency; the Electors, Princes and Noble-men left Frankford, to retire home vnto their houses.

The Emperour, as Emperour and King of the Romanes, hath not any City or Towne within the Empire: The whole Territory of Germany, belongs to the Electors, Bishops, Abbats, Princes, Earles, Noble-men and Free Townes; yet if the Emperour had no place where to remaine but within the Empire, the Bishoppe of Bamberg is bound to giue him his Towne, and himselfe to retire to Wylas. Wherefore the Emperour MATHIAS, who had kingdoms out of Germany, desiring to retire himselfe to Prague, the chiefe City of Bohemia, he parted from Frankford the three and twentieth day of Iune, being accompanied by many Princes and Noble-men, and past by Nuremberg in the beginning of Iuly, where he had a very stately and magnificent reception. Before the Emperours departure from Frankford, the Citizens came and presented a Petition vnto him; whereby they required that they might be made acquainted with the priuiledges of the City, which had remained wholly in the custody of the Senate; That the Iewes, whose number exceeded, might be expelled; That there should be a course let downe for vniuersity, and a meale market erected in the City. To whom the Emperour gaue good words, and put them in hope. But when after the Emperours departure, the Citizens saw no point of their Petition performed, there grew a great diffension betwixt them and the Senate: the which would haue grown to a great combustion, if some wise and temperate men had not interposed themselves. CÆSAR aduertised hereof, being yet at Nuremberg, he sent command to the Citizens to referre all controuersies to him; who made choice of the Archbishop of Mentz; and the Lantz-graue of Hesse, to heare the businesse, and to reconcile it, the which after many and trouble some treaties, by their wisdom and moderation, they pacified and gaue contentment to both parties.

The Emperour, leaving Germany, returned to Bohemia. The Estates, hearing of his coming to Prague, sent the Duke of Teschin with a thousand horse to receive him, being accompanied by the Duke of Brunswick, and many Noble-men of Germany, who conducted him to the Cathedral Church, and then to the Castle; where they made great shewes of ioy for his happy Election. Soone after, Ambassadors came vnto the Emperour from the Persians and Muscovites: The Persian, having deliuered his Kings Letters vnto the Emperour, he perswaded him to continue warres against the Turkes, as the deceased Emperour had promised, saying, That if he could prauaile nothing, he should then returne speedily home, his King hauing also resolved to conclude a Peace with the Turke, hauing made trial, to his griefe, that the Christians had made a peace with the Turkes, at such times as they might greatly haue annoyed them. The Muscouite Ambassador said; That the Muscouite intreated his Maiesty, to be an Vmpire betwixt them and the King of Poland; that he would procure a Peace to those Countries, and prouide them a good and worthy Prince: That they had formerly required the King of Poland's sonne, to be their great Duke, and to that end and purpose they had diuers and sundry times, sent vnto the King: but when as they found that he had no such intent, but that vnder the pretext thereof, he might the more easily subdue them, they fell from him againe; and, joyning battaile not farre from the City of Musca, they slew many Polonians; after which, they had an intent to call in CHARLES, son to the King of Sweden; but, if the Emperour could by any other meanes prouide for them, they would most willingly obey him.

News came then to Court, of a controuersie growne betwixt NAERONVS the Emperours Ambassador at Constantinople and NASSVS Basha, about the confirmation of the Peace which had been made some yeeres before. The Ambassador, perswading the Turkes to entertain the Peace which had been made, NASSVS Basha required him to shew wherein the Emperour had not been satisfied: To whom he answered, That the sixth Article of the Transfacion had been violated; for that CÆSAR, as King of Hungary, hauing a lawfull Title vnto Transilvania, he required to haue that Article ratified; the which NASSVS denied, affirming that Transilvania did properly belong vnto the Sultan: vpon which point there grew a great contention betwixt them, whereby it appeared the Turkes sought nothing, but some colour to infringe the Peace.

The Emperour, being aduertized hereof, gaue answer vnto the Persian Ambassador, That he would by all means embrace & entertain the friendship, which the king his master had desired of the deceased Emperour his brother: who, although he had resolved to continue the warre against the Turkes; yet, being hindered by the seditions of Hungary, he was then forced to make a Peace; but now seeing the Turkes (hauing seized vpon Moldania and Valachia) to practise to in-

uade

uade Transilvania, he would conferre with the Princes and States of the Empire, and aduertise the King what was to be done; perswading him in the meane time to continue the warres. He answered the Muscouites, that he would interpose his authority, for the making of a Peace, betwixt them and the king of Poland, and to prouide a great Duke for those Countries. Soone after, the Emperour sent his Letters to the Electors and Princes of the Empire, complaining of the Turkes iniustice, and shewing how dishonorable a thing it would be, for the Christian Common-wealth, to suffer so goodly a Prouince to be invaded, and spoiled by them, without any opposition: writing also his Letters to the States and Imperiall Cities; That, being aduanced to the Empire, his first and chiefe care was to settle peace and tranquillity; and that iustice might be duly administered, and that all jealousies and distrusts being taken away by a firme and desired concord, the States of the Empire might be ready vpon all occasions, with their ioynt forces to resist the enemy of the christian world, specially when against the peace made with him: (hauing gotten Moldania and Valachia) he practised to make Transilvania subiect vnto him: the which being lost, Hungary, and the Empire would be in great danger; and that hauing made a peace with the Persian, he had not desired to call the treaty of peace in question, and to make a challenge to Transilvania. Wherefore if he should violate the peace, it were necessary they should haue forces, and the finewes of warre ready, by a bountifull and necessary contribution; for the effecting whereof he appointed a Diet to be held at Ratisbone on the 24 of April, 1613.

The Emperour going from Prague to Viena, GABRIEL BATTORY Prince of Transilvania standing in feare of BATHAM GABOR (who they said had craued aide against him of the Turkes) sent his Embassadors, and craving the Emperours assistance, he promised him all subiection, and obedience: and withall he sent him many rich presents. Whereupon the Emperour aduertised the Basha of Buda, that this attempt of the Turkes did manifestly impugn the articles of peace; by the which it was provided, that the State of Transilvania should not be molested. To which the Basha made answer, that the Christians had driuen away much cattell from Janerin: That the king of Poland had violated the peace; and that it was to be feared, that he would seize vpon Transilvania with Valachia and Moldania; and therefore his Emperour was not to be blamed, if he did seize vpon this prouince, which did immediately belong vnto him. Soone after, the Emperours Embassadors at the Sultans Port gaue him to vnderstand, that he did nourish a monster, and that BATTORY had also sent Embassadors to the Sultan, and had secret treaties with the Bashes. There came also vnto the Emperour certaine Deputies from the Saxons which liue in diuerse cities of Transilvania who stole away in rustick habits, lest they should haue beene discovered, complaining much of the tyranny and cruelty of BATTORY; and that contrarie to his faith, and the oath which he had taken, he had deprived them of their priuiledges, and had in a manner ruined them. That from the first yeare of his tyrannicall rule and government, he had practised to extirpate and to root out the ancient families of the Saxons, making a relation of all his insolencies and tyrannies: the which I cannot set downe in particular, being tied to straighter bounds. They also vnderstood that BATTORY did craue fauour and aide from the Turkes against the Saxons of Transilvania, excusing himself that he had sent Embassadors to the Emperour, being forced thereunto by feare, and that he had sought to peruert and diuert the Emperours minde with presents. CÆSAR hearing all this, bidde them be of good hope, promising to prouide a remedy for their miseries, at the next Assembly of the States of Hungary and the Empire.

The Emperour called an Assembly of the States of Hungary at Pessonia or Preshourg, whither he went in person, during whose absence SIGISMUND BATTORY sometimes Prince of Transilvania, hauing liued some yeeres a priuate life at Prague, died there of an apoplexie, where he was honourably enterrd. At the assembly at Pessonia, there was much contention, for admitting of Germane soldiery into their frontier garisons of Hungary. There was great reason to indure it, for that Hungary could not be defended against the Turkes without the helpe of Germans; and that an infinite number of all degrees and qualities, had lost their liues in Hungary, it being commonly called the Church-yard of the Germanes. The Hungarians refused to subscribe to this request: but in the end the maior part yielded; but with a limitation, that both Germanes and Hungarians should be equally admitted; and whereas the Gouernour was a Germane, his Lieutenant should be a Hungarian, and that there should be an equality obserued in their paie; that Walloones, Italians, French-men, and other strangers, should be held for spoilers rather then defenders of the country, and be wholly excluded. And after the conclusion of all this, the Emperours wife was crowned Queene of Hungary, with great pompe & state.

The Emperour
hath no Towne in the Empire.

A controuersie
at Frankford reconciled.

Ambassadors come from Persia & Muscovy, to Prague.

The Emperour
appoints a Diet at Ratisbone.

Battory sends a counterfeit Kings message to the Emperour.

The cruelty of Battory against the Saxons in Transilvania.

An assembly of the States in Hungary.

The Emperours wife crowned Queene of Hungary.

1613.
The Turks, preparing to war in Hungary, it discovered by his rebell.

In the meane time, the Turks notwithstanding the peace had fired and spoiled many villages and carried away many Christians into captivity; committing many actes of hostility, so as all men feared a new warre in Hungary; but it happened by the providence of God; that the people of Natalia in Asia brake out into rebellion, and burnt and spoiled many places: And in A- rabia certain seditious fellow usurped the title of a King, having drawn vnto him 50000 A- thians; and seised on the strong Fort of Aden, vpon the red sea: this was a great prejudice to the Turks; and very beneficiall to the Portugals and Persians. Whereupon, the Sultan, being incensed with this new rebellion, and an indignity which the King of Persia had done him, reuoked his forces that were appointed for Transilvania, to be imployed against the rebels of Asia and the Persians; disposing of an Army in the garrisons of the Frontiers of Hungary, commanding them to contain themselves: so as at this time the Hungarians were freed from the feare of waite.

The day for the Assembly at Ratisbone being comen, all the Princes and States of the Empire repaired thither, and went forth of the City to meet the Emperor; whom they conducted into the City with great pomp, as you may read at large in diuerse Authors. In the beginning of this Assembly, the Emperor deliuered to them the chief points and reasons why he had called them; setting down at large the Turks practices to seise vpon Transilvania contrary vnto the Articles of peace; the spoils which he had done, and the preparations which hee had made for war: Moreover, although there were no feare of the Turk, yet it was necessary to leuie money to supply the frontier garrisons with munition, and for the building of two new Forts in Cani- sia. Wherefore, he intreated the States, that, considering the common danger, they would consent to make some contribution for the five next succeeding yeers, recommending this to the Electors, Princes and States.

Before they came to the conclusion of these heads, the Deputies of the protestant Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, presented a petition of their grieuances vnto him, requiring to be eased (as they had often done to the Emperor RODOLPHVS) but could not obtain it: But now, seeing that his Majesty did so much desire to settle a peace in the Empire, hee would also be careful to remove all obstacles that might hinder it; being the only thing they desired, that, being eased of their grieuances, they might liue friendly and quietly, with the rest of the Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire. After which, they made a particular relation of all their complaints, concluding again with a petition to the Emperor for the same; and that if they might be eased thereof, they promised to bee ready to aduance any thing that might concern the publike good or his Majesties dignity.

The Emperor made answer to the Protestants petition, that hee would take consideration thereof; yet admonishing them not to preferre their owne priuate interest before the generall good of the state: but they intreated him, that he would not take it in ill part if they preferred a petition of their grieuances; which they could not auoid, for that in the year 1608, when they would not take knowledge of their grieuances, the Diet proued fruitlesse. Thus they pressing relief, and the Emperor standing firm to his first answer, they forbore to come to the Assembly; so that nothing could be concluded. After which the Catholiques made a declaration for the defense of their league, and deliuered it to some of the Councell, wherein they inueighed much against the Protestants of the Vnion, and laboured to lay the blame of all the miseries on them, making a long repetition of their grieuances: which contentions troubled the whole assembly for a long time.

During these fruitlesse contentions at the Diet of Ratisbone, newes came vnto the Emperor, that the Turks had made an irruption into Transilvania. Wee haue formerly made mention of the tyranny of GABRIEL BATTORI in these Countries, and how much he had oppressed the Saxon Cities: wherefore, hauing by this means diuerted the mindes of the Nobility and others, BETHLEM GABOR, who (seeing his cruelty) had liued hitherto in exile, embracing this occasion, repaired to the grand Seignior, and solicited him to expell BATTORI out of Transilvania, and to substitute him in his place; promising to be his vassall and tributary, and to deliuer into his hands Lippe, Gemen, and certain other Forts. The Sultan, yielding to his request, commanded SANDER BASHA to expell BATTORI: whereupon, hee entered Transilvania with a great Army, and took diuerse places, being accompanied by BETHLEM. BATTORI, aduertised heerof, sent ISTVAN his Generall with a great Army to encounter him: but, being terrified with their numbers, he returned, perswading BATTORI to provide for his safety. There entered another Basha into Transilvania, by the straights of the mountains not farre

The Protestants
prefer a petition of their grieu-ances to the Emperor.

Bethlem Gabor is made Prince of Transilvania by the Turk.

1613

farre from Cromsrad, hauing defeated the Zecclerians who kept those passages; so as in a manner all Transilvania was in the Turks power. In the meantime, the Turks in Hungary forced many villages to take the oath of obedience to the Sultan, carrying away all their goods and cattell that refused it. The Basha of Agris hauing notice that they cried To Arms in Hungary, Bohe- mia and Silesia, to suppress these insolencies, sent an Ambassador to Cassovia to FORTGATS, Generall of the Army; assuring him, that all these things were vnknewne to him, and that hee was willing to entertain the peace with the King of Hungary & the Roman Empire; that BATTORI had been the cause of all these troubles; whom the Sultan required to haue punishment for his tyranny: but he would not attend and fight with the Turks, but fled vnto Varadine; saying, that hee did it to the end that hee should not fall away from the Emperor, whose aide hee had impleord.

The Palatine of Hungary and FORTGATS sent him some succours, but not such as were able to restore him; and the rather, for that the whole Prouince depended now vpon BETHLEM GABOR: who soon after was appointed Prince of Transilvania by SANDER BASHA; with this admonition, that being taught by the example of BATTORI, he should not follow his steps; that he should chuse his Counsellors out of Transilvania and Hungary, and should doo nothing without the Sultans priuity. He laboured to free the further Hungary from the feare of invasion; the Basha writing to FORTGATS, that he had onely charge from the Sultan, to expell BATTORI out of Transilvania.

The Diet at Ratisbone hauing been prorogued vntill the thirtieth of September, the Emperor came and made an ample relation of all that had past in Transilvania. He earnestly intreated all the Electors, Princes and States, that as he himself had so much preferred the publike good of the Empire, that leaving his owne hereditary Prouinces, he had come thither not without the hazard of his life by reason of the plague; so they would fall into consideration of their common danger, and raise a certain summe of money for forty months, to resist the common enemy; who, hearing of their readinesse, might be diuerted from his enterprises: but, after much debating of these businesse, the Assembly was prorogued till another meeting.

The Emperor remaining with his Court at Linze, an Ambassador came from Muscovy; who, hauing deliuered his Presents, said, that MICHAEL FANDROVITVS the great Duke of Muscovy, issued from the great Dukes of Muscovy, and chosen to that Empire by the generall consent of all the Nobles, desired to continue the loue and friendship which the Emperors his Predecessors had with that state; and that he would disswade the King of Poland from his vniust attempts against Muscovy; and beca means that (hauing released some Noble-men which hee held prisoners) he would liue in peace with them. The Emperor, promising to bee a mediator betwixt him and the King of Poland, dismist his Ambassador with rewards.

BATTORI continued at Varadine. The Gouerner of Tecsey brought him succours in the King of Hungary's name; who, hearing what numbers hee had brought, said, that they would preuail nothing against the Turks forces; sending presently messengers to Turnania and other places for greater supplies. In the mean time hee disdained the Gouerners company; resolving if he could obtain no greater forces, to make his composition with the Turks, and to yield them that Fort for his restitution. The Gouerner, understanding this, conferred with his friends; where they resolved to cut off this incumber, dealing with the Groom of his chamber to kill him as he slept: but when that succeeded not, he perswaded him to go out of the gates to view the Army; where he was shot by his owne souldiers. The tumult being ended, they took consultation with the Gouerner of Varadine to preserve the place for the Emperor: yet he perswaded them not to put any garrison into the Castle, lest the Turks should come and besiege it. Yet soon after, he yielded it vp to BETHLEM GABOR.

BATTORI being slain, the Turks left Transilvania. BETHLEM GABOR called the Estates to Clausenbourg: where they first of all restored all men that had been banished by BATTORI. They concluded free exercise of religion; that the Prince should acknowledge the Sultan for his superior; that he should entertain peace with his neighbours, especially the Roman Emperor; that he should make a league with the Princes of Moldania and Valachia; that he should chuse his Councell out of three nations, and do nothing without their priuity; that he should maintain all the ancient priuiledges; that he should maintain iustice; and that he should not hinder the free election of a Prince whom the Sultan should confirm. There were many other Articles concluded at this Assembly, which are too long to relate. After which, BETHLEM wrote Letters to the Palatine of Hungary, of all his proceedings in this action; concluding, speech to the States at Ratis-bone.

The Emperors

Gabriel Battori is Prince of Transilvania,
again.

Bethlem calls the States to Clausenbourg.

ding that he was aduertised, there were some that presumed to invade some places belonging to that Prouince: the which he admonished them not to attempt, seeing that he was ready to perform all good offices, to the Emperour, and King of Hungary: But, if they did continue in their designs, he would not dissemble, but that he, and the Sultan in like manner, were bound by oath to defend them, who would haue great care as himself of the Prouince, and would neuer suffer any thing to be drawne away. Wherefore he intreated him, for the loue of his Countrey, and of Peace, to command all his Gouernours and Captaines, not to attempt any thing, whereby any combustions or alterations might arise, but euery man to enioy his owne in Peace.

The Turks admonish the States of Transilvania to yield obedience to Bechlem

There were some yet remaining in Transilvania, who, allied to BATTORI, had raised some tumults; and some, desirous to draw that Prouince to the Emperour, had taken Huff and some other places in his name. The Sultan, hearing this, sent his Letters to the Noble-men and States, letting them vnderstand, that when as Transilvania yielded obedience to his predecessors and him, they liued in quiet; and had often craued aide from him, and obtained it; concluding that he had made BETHLEM GABOR their Prince, to gouerne the Prouince vnder his protection: But, hearing there were many things done on SEBASTIAN side against the Peace, and many Townes and Forts taken; he had fully resolved not to spoile any Fort in Transilvania, nor to doe wrong to any man, nor yet to suffer any man to doe it, but would defend that Prouince with all his power. Wherefore he desired the Emperour should know, that if he would haue this Peace inuoliable, he should presently make restitution of the said places, to the Prince of Transilvania, or else signifie his mind vnto him by Letters.

An Assembly made by the Emperour at Linz.

The Emp. continuing at Linz, called an Assembly of his hereditary Countis & Prouinces, viz. Bohemians, Austrians, Stirians, Carinthians, Carniolans, Silefians, Lufatians, Morauians, and Hungarians: To whom he propounded, that the Peace had been broken by the Turkes, by their many incursions, carrying away men and cattell, and committing many other insolencies in hostile manner: And the rather, that besides Polachia, and Moldania, they had now of late seized vpon Transilvania, and fortified it with Garrisons, vnder the command of BEETHLEM GABOR; that they had assembled the Estates, and admonished the Emperour by Letters not to meddle with it.

In the end, he made mention of BETHLEMS designe, hauing made himselfe a vassalle to the Turkes, to the end the Prouince might be vniued vnto them. Wherefore considering how preiudicial it was to the Christian state, and behoouefull for the Turkes, he held it necessary by all meanes to be recovered, seeing the time was very fit to make warre vpon either of them. It was further demanded, seeing the Sultan did challenge this Prouince as his owne, and would not suffer the Germanes, to prescribe any lawes to the Transiluanians, what he should answere in this point, That if a Turkish Ambassador, contrary to the expresse conditions of Peace, and instructed with no charge, should come, and that the Sultan should refuse to confirm the sixt Article of the Transaction; whether this Ambassadour were to be admitted, and his Letters to be accepted by the Emperour. The last question was, whether they should make a new Transaction with the Sultan, when as he would not stand to the first; and how they should proceede in the businesse of Moldania, Polachia and Transilvania; and what they should doe, if Hungary in like sort should be invaded before an Assembly. The Hungarians made answere, that they thought it fit to deuiſe some meanes how the Transaction made betwixt the Sultan, and the deceased Emperour might stand firme, and the Emperours authority maintained; and as for future necessity, it was fit some meanes were provided for necessary defence.

The Iews expelled as Wormes.

The inhabitants of Wormes had many yeeres complained of the intolerable vsury of the Iews: The Citizens desired much to be freed from this vnecessary loade, and to be vnburthened of their Interests; intreating the Senate, to punish their frauds as it was fit. The Senate therefore, meaning to set downe some course, made a new Edict: but the Iews desiring to prevent them, sent a Petition to the Emperour; who, desiring to be better instructed in the cause, required to haue all the Acts sent vnto him, with the priuiledges of the City concerning the Iews, which had been granted by former Emperours.

In the meane time, the cause was referred to the imperiall Chamber; and a penall injunction sent, to pay againe vnto the Citizens, whatsoever they had exacted, contrary to the constitution of the Empire. In the end, there was a decree made, whereby the Senate was inioyned by the Emperours authority, vpon a penaltie of 10000 marks of Gold, presently after the receipt thereof, to reduce all vsury, both future, and that which was past, and not paid, to fixe

in

in the hundred; and that they should suffer them to make a defalcation of that which was past, vnlesse they would incur the said penalty. This Edict was published in October the yeer before: which put the Citizens in good hope that all things would be well compounded. But, finding their hopes frustrate, in the end they resolved to call all the Iewes out of Wormes; the which they put in execution vpon the seuenth of April, being Easter Munday: at which time, some 300 of them coming together into the market place, they sent seuenteen into the Iewes street, to let them vnderstand, that they must presently depart the City, carrying with them what they held most precious, the rest should be put in Inventory; and whatsoever they had recovered by judgement, should be restored to them. Hauing received this message, they packed away within one hour, much lamenting their hard fortunes. The Magistrates blamed the Citizens for this attempt; and they constantly maintained the action: and after their departure they ruined their monuments, their Temple, and whatsoever belonged to the Iewish Ceremony.

The peace reconfirmed betwixt the Emperour and the Turks.

In May, the Emperour being at Vienna, there came a Turkish Ambassador, attended with a great train. Being brought to the Emperour, he deliuered his Presents which were many, with his Letters; containing in substance, that the Sultan desired much to maintain the peace with the Emperour; and that he should send Commissioners to the Frontiers, as he would do, to take view of the wrongs which had been done on either side, and to make satisfaction. The Emperour, hauing heard his Ambassage, went to Prague, and left certain Counsellors to treat with him touching the confirmation of the peace; who said, the Sultan had giuen him great charge to aduance it, for that, being engaged in diuerſe warres, hee could not attend all together; that the sonnes of EMIR, Gouernour of Saida, relying vpon the Persians aid, had lately slain the Basha of Damasco; and the sonne of NASSIR Basha had been strangled in Asia, where they put all to fire and sword. The King of Persia in like manner did not abstain from Arms; and the Cossacks of Polonia did much annoy his subjects. Being thus assaulted by many, he was forced to retire his souldiers out of Hungary to send them into Asia, and to desire a peace with the Emperour, the which was concluded vpon these conditions: that the treaty of peace, made in the yeer 1606, should stand firme; and for that, since the time of that treaty, there had been many controuersies for the space of eight yeeres; it was agreed, that the peace should be continued for twenty yeeres longer; that, for 150 villages belonging to the Arch-bishoprick of Strigonia, and had been formerly demanded by the Sultan, there should be sixty deliuered; that all controuersies vpon the Frontiers should be compounded within foure months by Commissioners; that the goods taken from the Turks at Pallanina by the Haiduques, should be restored, and the Authoits punished; the prisoners on either side should be released, and the Forts built, during the last eight yeeres ruined; that Priests, Iesuits and Monks, might repair their Churches in the Turks Territories, and celebrate diuine seruice; that merchants might freely traffick to Constantinople, hauing the Emperours Letters-patents to shew to the Gouerners of the Frontiers and to the Ambassador and Consull residing there; that the tribute once paid, the party might pass on freely, and be no more questioned; that a merchant dying in the Turks Kingdom, his goods should be deliuered to the Emperours Ambassador at Constantinople. These Articles were signed by the Commissioners, and were to be confirmed by both the Emperours.

The Empire, after the peace concluded betwixt RODOLPHVS and Sultan ACHMAT, had not been afflicted with the heavy burden of forraign warres: yet was it not free from intestine combustions. The pretensions for Iuliers had drawn all the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, into factions: and the troubles of Branswick, with the mutinies of Bransford and Wormes, had much troubled the Quiet of Germany. The Duke of Branswick being dead, there was hope of a reconciliation betwixt his sonne and the City of Branswick, by the mediation of the Duke of Wittenberg; but, it taking no effect, the Duke presently raised an Army, and besieged it; and the Besieged defended themselves valiantly. The hanse-towns raised forces to relieve them, vnder the conduct of the Earl of Solmes; who, approaching with his Troops, was aduertised from the Town, that, if they were not speedily succoured, they should be forced to yeeld: whereupon, he resolved to force his way by the sword, which after a long fight hee effected, to the great comfort of the Townsmen. After which, there was a truce made for ten daies, and in the end a peace concluded vpon certain Articles; which were confirmed by the Duke and the Citizens.

The City of Branswick besieged by the Duke.

At the inauguration of the Emperour MATHIAS, there had been some controuersie betwixt the Senate and the Citizens of Bransford; the which the Arch-bishop of Meitz and the Lantzgrau of Hesse compounded, vnder certain Articles: the which the Emperour ratified, and they

they

they promised to oblerue. In the yeer 1614, they fell into new combustions; so as a multitude, led by some of the baser sort of the Citizens, came to the Senate-house, and forced the old magistrates to giue-over their places. The Emperor, being aduertised hereof, sent a Herald with commandement to restore the old Senate: the which the Citizens refused to obey, continuing constant in that resolution. The Emperor after this sent a proscription against the chiefe Authors of this mutiny: whereupon, diuerse of them were apprehended, and seuen of the chiefe executed: some were whipt, and others banisht; being all men of base quality.

The Citizens of Worms hauing expelled the Iews as you haue heard, and continued all night in Arms, the Magistrates sent to the Elector Palatine (who hath alwaies had a right of protection over the City of Worms, and in acknowledgement whereof they do yearly pay him a certain fee) intreating him to assist them to force the Burgeses to their duties. The Elector, considering the importance of this innouation, sent forces presently thither, inuested the Towne, and planted the cannon. The Burgeses cried presently To Arms: but the Magistrate pacified them, letting them vnderstand that they were no enemies, but their best friends; assuring them, that there should be no wrong done to any man, nor their liberties infringed: whereupon, the gates were opened, and the guard thereof and of the walls giuen to the souldiers. After which, the Magistrates making search for the heads of this mutiny, there were twelue apprehended and put in prison. The next day, in the presence of the Electors Commissioners, the Inhabitants took a new oath of obedience to the Magistrate: and the Magistrate in like manner took the oath of allegiance to the Emperor and Empire. And thus the mutiny at Worms was pacified without any disorder or prejudice to any man.

The yeer before, SIGISMOND COLLOMITZ (a man famous for the great seruices he had done the Empire against the Turk) hauing called the Bege of Siragonia to combat for that he had willingly suffered the Turks to spoil his lands, was brought in disgrace with the Emperor, and committed to prison at Newstad: his seruants were put in custody, and all his papers & secrets searched by the Emperors command. But, finding nothing wherewith to charge him, he was released, promising to attempt nothing against the Emperor nor the house of Austria: but, seeking to be reuenged of those which made spoil of his lands, hee was taken again by the souldiers of Landaui, and brought wounded vnto Vienna; where hee was againe committed to prison.

The Burgeses of Wormer, who had been committed to prison for the former mutiny, did this yeer on the seuen and twentieth of May receiue their Sentence, which was to this effect; that a Doctor of the Law, who had pleaded the Citizens cause during the tumult, should binde himself by oath, not onely to depart the City, but also out of the Palatinate and the Bishoprick of Spier; and that he should plead no more, and moreover should pay 1000 Florenes for a fine: Of the prisoners, one of them should be shut vp in his house during his life, yet he should haue leaue to go to the Church to hear diuine seruice, and three should be whipt and banished the Empire.

The Emperor MATHIAS, being without hope of any issue, was very careful to leaue a successor in the Realm of Bohemia: wherefore he adoped FERDINAND Arch-duke of Austria for his sonne, recommended him to the Noble men, and sought by all means to aduance him to that Kingdome. Hauing imparted this resolution to the King of Spain, hee easily procured him to renounce his right; the which the Earle of Ognate the Kings Ambassador with the Emperor did by a solemn Act, in fauour of the Arch-duke FERDINAND: and the Arch-duke FERDINAND in like manner by a solemn Act did promise restitution thereof to the King of Spain; if he or his Descendents of the right line should dy without issue male: which seuerall Acts, being past at Prague, the Emperor did ratifie and confirm.

The Emperor, hauing obtained this renunciation from the King of Spain, and from MAXIMILIAN and ALBERTVS his brethren, called an Assembly of the States at Prague: where the chief Chancellor made a speech vnto them; that the Emperor, hauing found them so faithfull and ready to do him seruice, would not onely be thankfull vnto them during his life, but would also endeavour to settle a future peace in the Kingdome, all causes of discord being taken away. Considering therefore that he was mortall, and being dead the Realm with the Provinces annexed should be left without a King, whereby might follow dangerous innouations, he had therefore resolved (after the example of his Predecessors) to provide them a good and fit King. Wherefore, seeing that MAXIMILIAN and ALBERT his brethren were growne aged, and himself not likely to haue any heirs, he had thought it good to adopt the Arch-duke

FER-

FERDINAND for his many good parts and vertues, that he might bee sworn and solemnly crowned future King of Bohemia; and the rather, for that his brethren would not pretend any title to this Kingdome: and the whole house of Austria had giuen their consents to his election. Wherefore hee desired them to chuse FERDINAND for their future King, and that they would appoint a certain day for his Coronation; giuing them to vnderstand, that the Archduke FERDINAND was ready for his part to take the oath, to confirm their priuiledges, and perform all other things that former Kings were wont to do.

The States, hauing consulted on this proposition, soon after on the ninth of Iune made answer to the Emperor; giuing him first of all great thanks for his singular care for the peace and tranquillity of the Realm of Bohemia, and highly extolling the rare vertues of the Arch-duke FERDINAND. In the end they concluded, that they had chosen the said Arch-duke for their King of Bohemia, and that he should be proclaimed vpon condition, that if his Maiesty should dy without any lawful issue male, he should then take vpon him the government of the Realm: and the day of his Coronation was appointed on the 29 of Iune. Moreover, it was added, that he should confirm to the States before his Coronation by oath, to maintain all the priuiledges, charters, immunities, municipall rights, constitutions and customes, as the Emperor and his Predecessors had done; and for that this confirmation, during the Emperors life could not be performed, but must necessarily be deferred till his death, he should a month after deliuer it in writing to the chief Burgrauce of Prague if he were then liuing, or to the first officer of the kingdome. Moreover, before his Coronation he should promise to the States by writing, that hee would not deal with the government, nor attempt any thing without the Emperors consent, and the chief officers and Senates; that he should rest content till the Emperors death, with the title of elect and crowned King of Bohemia: the which if he should infringe, the States should not be bound to yeeld him obedience. After which, the Archduke FERDINAND was proclaimed King of Bohemia, and crowned with the accustomed ceremonies.

This made the hundreth yeer compleat after that MARTIN LUTHER had opposed the Romish doctrine, and propounded his questions at Wittenberg against THEOPHILVS his indulgences; reducing all to the triall of Gods word. JOHN GEORGE, Elector of Saxony, a Princefull of zeal and religion, in memory hereof commanded a Iubilee to be celebrated throughout all his Electorate; writing to the Diuines of Lipsick, that whereas 1000 yeeres before it had pleased God to stir vp MARTIN LUTHER publicly to oppose the Popish doctrines, and to begin to reform religion, which had hitherto bin maintaine in all his territories against their diuellish practices; He had decreed by good aduice to institute a solemn feast, to thank God; the which should continue 3 daies, from Octob. 31, till Nouemb. 2, commanding them to giue public notice in their pulpits, to the end the people might prepare themselves accordingly; that vpon the Eue the Psalms should be sung; and preparation made to receiue the Communion the next day; that on either of the feast daies they should haue two Sermons, one in the morning, the other in the afternoon, and their Text specially appointed out of the holy Scriptures to that vse. Which Iubilee was duly obserued in Saxony; and in imitation thereof, at Heidelberg in the Palatinate, and in other Prouinces and Cities of the reformed religion, was celebrated with great solemnity: and there were pieces of gold and silver coined, both by the Elector of Saxony, and by some other Towns, in memory of this solemnity.

In the end of this yeer, the States of Hungary were assembled at Pozsonia or Presbourg. The Emperor went to Vienna with his wife and whole Court; but not able to assist at this Assembly by reason of sickness, he commanded FERDINAND, King of Bohemia, to supply his place. The reason of this Assembly, was, to redresse many grieuances, and to chuse a King who might succeed the Emperor: in which, relation was made to the States of the Emperors great loue to Hungary, and his desire to haue bin there present, if his infirmities had not preuented his resolution; telling them, that as the peacefull government of that Kingdome had bin alwaies dear to him, so he would vse all means, that (peace being settled at home and abroad) all interrupting occasions might be taken away. And considering his great age, and the many infirmities which did accompany it, he feared that the estate of Hungary would bee very miserable, if hee should dy before a new King were chosen to succeed him, of whom the safety of the Country might depend, which otherwise might be subiect to popular tumults and the incursions of their neighbours: the which the Emperour desired might bee preuented. Imitating therefore his predecessors, he requested they would preuent the calamities of future times, by their present counsellors, and chuse a King to succeede him, and to take vpon him the government of that

Sff

Realm;

The Arch-duke
Ferdinand chosen & crowned King of
Bohemia.

A Iubilee celebrated by the Duke of Saxony in memory of Martin Luther

Collomitz put in prison by the Emperor.

The King of Spain renounced his title to the Realm of Bohemia.

The States of Bohemia assembled at Prague.

Realme, if his Maieſty ſhould dy without any lawfull iſſue male : for the effecting whereof, MAXIMILIAN, and ALBERT Arch-dukes of Austria his brethren had not onely renounc'd al their pretenſions by Letters to the crowne of Hungary, but had often intreated him, that (foraſmuch as they were aged and without children) he would provide for the neceſſity of that kingdom, by ſome other means. Wherefore he held it right, profitable, and fit for the good of the State, that FERDINAND king of Bohemia, his coſin German (whom his Maieſty for his excellent parts, had adopted for his ſon) ſhould be choſen, proclaimed, and crowned king of Hungary by the States. Wherefore he intreated them lovingly (the former reaſons conſidered) that they would chuſe and proclaim his deare choſen ſonne, King FERDINAND, for king of Hungary, aſſuring the eſtates that King FERDINAND ſhould promiſe faithfully by his reuerſall Letters, not to meddle with the government of that Realme, without his maieſties expreſſe wil, and the aduice of the Hungarians; but ſhould content himſelf with the bare title of king of Hungary, untill that his Imperiall maieſty ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe or dy; and if he ſhould attempt any thing to the contrary, the States ſhould be freed from their oath of obedience. Moreover: that he ſhould do any thing for the confirmation of the priuiledges of the kingdom, liberties, immunities, and all other things thereunto belonging, as the Emperor, and other kings of Hungary his predeceſſors had formerly done.

Whilſt they are about this propoſition at Poſſonia, the Proteſtant States of Bohemia, made an aſſembly at Prague, the Emperor being abſent at Piema, for that his Letters Patents had bene violated. The Archbiſhop of Prague, hauing cauſed ſome of the Proteſtant Churches to bee ruined, and the ſubiects who had complained thereof put in priſon; ſome Countellors which remained at Prague, excuſed the fact, maintaining that there was nothing done againſt the Emperors Letters, nor the prouinciall conſtitution. The Emperor being aduerted of this aſſembly, admoniſhed them by his Letters to forbear, hearing that this aſſembly was made againſt his perſon: That what had bene done by the Archbiſhop was by his command: That they had exceeded the boundes of his Maieſties graunt, and had preſumed to take vpon them the proteccion of others ſubiects, in an vniuſall cauſe againſt his ſentence: That they had complained of his Maieſties Letters for the abrogating of the tranſactions, and bringing in ſouldiers into Bohemia, whereby they bred iealouſies in the ignorant people, and had brought him in hatred with his faithfull ſubiects; whereby many dangers, and tumults, might ariſe in his abſence, which he neuer had expected from ſome of them: That they had abuſed his bounty, and exceeded his grant: And that it was their duties to preuent all innovations and combuſtions. He had therefore reſolued, after due inquiry to puniſh the authors. In the meane time he commanded them to forbear from all aſſemblies, untill he himſelf were preſent, or did otherwiſe determine: That they ſhould not meddle with other folkes buſineſſe, nor miniſter any occaſion of ſedition and tumult.

This admonition did ſo little preuaile, as the States were the more incenſed, ſeeking by all means to aduance the Aſſembly, againſt thoſe that oppoſed it. The day being comm, and the States being aſſembled, with ſome of the Citizens, out of all the Tribes of Prague, there was a Sermon in the Bohemian tongue for the preſeruacion of Religion, and the Churches not onely in Prague, but through the whole kingdom againſt their malicious aduerſaries who ſought to ſubvert them. On the 23 of May, the Noblemen came on horſeback to Court, every one hauing a ſervant with two piſtols charged; where they deliuerd their grieuances before the counſellors and chiefe officers of the kingdom. The chiefe Burgrauce, and POPPELIUS the grand Prior of S. MARCUS, did ſeeme to yeeld vnto their requēſts: but SLABATA chiefe Iudge of the prouince, and SMBSANSIVS oppoſed themſelues; wherefore the States calling away the other two, they took SLABATA, SMBSANSIVS, with a Secretarie, and caſt them headlong out at a window, into the court of the Caſtle, the which was very deepe, yet by the will of God they were preſerued aliue. There grew preſently in the caſtle a great amazement and tumult: whereupon ſome of the States, and among them the Earle of Thurn, went through the city on horſeback, perſwading the people not to ſcare, nor to attempt any thing, promiſing that no man ſhould be wronged; and that they would maintain what had bene done, and preſently aduertise the Emperor thereof. The people being pacified and the chiefe Burgrauce conducted quietly to his lodging, the States did binde the officers of the caſtle, with the gouernor, and porters and all the inhabitants of the three townes of Prague, vnto them by oath: and meeting daily in the prouinciall chamber, being guarded by 800 ſhot, they made a league, promiſing to fight againſt the common enemies of God, the King, and Religion; and in that cauſe to liue and dy; to which end they provided for the leuying of a good Army.

Hauing

Hauing afterwards published an apology, and declared the reaſons why they were forced to prepare for their deſenſe, they ſent Letters alſo to the conſederate Princes and States of Sileſia, Moravia, and Lufatia; whereby they acquainted them with all things that had paſt, and craued their aid in their future neceſſity.

By the deſenſe or Apology which they had published, his Imperiall Maieſty might vnderſtand (ſaid they) the reaſons why they had attempted to puniſh S. MARCUS, SMBSANSIVS, and POPPELIUS, as troublers of the publick peace; who by their traitorous practices, ſought to deſtroy them of all the liberties granted them; and confirmed by the Emperor ROBERTUS: and his Maieſty, and of all liberty of religion; praſtiſing ſuch dangerous faſhions; that they had bene able to ouerthrowe the State if God had not preuented it; that they muſt neceſſarily proceed to the puniſhment of ſome other factious people: of the ſame quality; whereof they thought good now to aduertise his Maieſty, as hauing regard to the dangers which threatened him in particular, and them in general, hauing means in ſome ſort to preuent theſe dangerous conſpiracies which tended to deſtroy his Maieſty, of the Realm, and them his faithfull ſubiects of their liberties: They had fought the means to maintain the Realm of Bohemia belonging to his Imperiall Maieſty: and for that the States could not alwaies continue vnited together at Prague, they had therefore choſen Directors of the State of the three Euangelicall Orders; that remaining ſtill there, they might ordain what they thought neceſſary for the preſeruacion of the immunities and priuiledges which his Maieſty had granted: wherefore they hoped his Maieſty would hold them excuſed, hauing not attempted any thing with an intent to offend him or any of his Catholick ſubiects that were louers of peace; being ready to imploy their liues and goods for the deſenſe of his Imperiall Maieſty their ſoueraign Lord.

After this, they made a decree againſt the Ieſuits, as the Authors of all the miſeries and afflictions which had hapned in Bohemia and in many other Realms & States of Chriſtendom; comparing them to the Templars, and ſaying that they had incited murderers to kill Kings, which would not liue after their manner; that they meddled with affairs of State, and held all them hereticks which were not Roman Catholicks; that they had ſlanderoſly deſamed the Proteſtant States, and had made an explication contrary to the Letters of pacification made in the year 1609; that they had drawn the whole Countrey into the hands of certain perſidious Catholicks, by whole practices the Countrey was in danger of ruine. For which cauſes they baniſhed them for euer out of the Realm of Bohemia; enioyning them to depart within eight daies, and neuer to return: and to keep them from ſpoil during the time prefixed, they ſet 50 muſketiers before their Colledge and Church. As for the other religious Orders, the ſaid State took them into their proteccion; and the Earle of Thurn provided daily to haue the begging Friars & the Cappuchens ſupplied with victuals.

The Emperor, hearing of theſe alterations, wrote to them, that he could not allow of that which they had done in the Caſtle of Prague againſt the Counſellors of State, before they had bene accuſed and heard; that they ought not to haue made ſo great leuies of ſouldiers without his priuity (ſeeing that no man declared himſelf their enemy) nor by conſequence to aduance the ruine of Innocents, who knew not to what end all this tended; wherefore he enioined them to diſmiſſe their ſouldiers, and not to attempt any thing againſt the ordinances of the Realm; that he would not conceal, that hearing of their preparation to Arms, he had alſo commanded leuies to be made, as well for the deſenſe of the Realm of Bohemia and of his faithfull ſubiects, as for the maintenance of the rank & authority which he held: yet he aſſured himſelf they would rather embrace peace than war, and not force him by their diſobedience to come to Arms, the which he would willingly forbear if they would perform their duties.

The Emperor, ſeeing he could preuaile nothing by his Letters and declarations; and that the Proteſtant States of Bohemia prepared ſtill to Arms, therefore wrote his Letters to the Electors, Princes, and other States of the Empire, thereby to hinder them from making any leuies in the ſaid States; aduertizing them of all that had hapned in the Caſtle of Prague; and that the authors of theſe combuſtions diſdaining all obedience, and making no account of his remonſtrances, perſiſted ſtill in their firſt reſolution; and that to the preiudice and contempt of his Imperiall Maieſty, and of his ſoueraign dignity of King of Bohemia, they leuied ſouldiers from all parts, yea in the Roman Empire: and for that they did it without his expreſſe command, and againſt the Edicts, he aduerted all the States of the Empire to take order that no leuies of ſouldiers ſhould be made in the Towns and other places of the Empire.

The Biſhop of Spire had for ſome yeers laboured to fortiſie the Towne of Ydenheim, ſeated

Sff 2

vpon

The Emperours complaints of the Proteſtant States of Bohemia.

The Ieſuits
and
the Proteſtants
of Bohemia.

Letters from the Emperor to the Proteſtant States
of Bohemia.

And to the Princes
and States
of
the Empire.

vpon the river of Rhine, with good walls, large ditches, and strong rampiers, against all external invasion. The Elector Palatine had often sought by persuasions to divert him from this work, and the City of Spire had a privilege, that no castle or fort should be built within three miles of their city. The report was that SPINOZA had been the Author of this fortification; and that he would man it with a strong garrison; it standing very commodiously in a marshy ground, to hinder the free passage of the river of Rhine. The united Princes and States of the Empire after their assembly at Silbbrunn, sent 4000 horse and foot, with 1200 Pioneers to this Castle, which (being yielded unto them, without any opposition) they raised and laid even with the ground; the Elector Palatine soone after publishing a declaration of the reasons which had moved him therunto.

The Estates of Hungary proceeded slowly, and were in a manner in suspense, by reason of the troubles in Bohemia; yet in the end they proceeded to the Election of Ferdinand king of Bohemia for their King in Hungary; but with these conditions: That hee should religiously observe and cause to be inviolably observed all the liberties, immunities, privileges, statutes, rights, and customs, of the Kingdom with the conclusions and treaties of Pisna, with all the Articles comprehended therein, and all others concluded both before and after the Coronation of the Emperours Maiesty in the yeares 1608 and 1609. The which Articles, being many in number I here forbore to set downe in particular, being tied to straighter bounds. Which Articles being ratified by the Emperor vnder his Letters Patents, they proceeded to his coronation according to the accustomed manner.

All things tending to Armes in Bohemia, the Emperour sent Letters vnto the Directors for the Protestants Estates, whereby he assured them of his fatherly love and affection, and gave them means to suppress the disorders and combustions within the Realme; yet in the meane time he had beene advertised of the attempts and violences committed by the Earle of Thurn, who marching with his Army to Budwitz, had summoned the Consuls and Senators, as hee had done the Magistrates of Croimlan, to dismisst the Emperours garrison, and to yeeld the towne vnto him, if not hee would put all to fire and sword: That it was not fit that hee being Emperour should endure these indignities: Wherefore hee was forced to commaunde the Leaders of his Army to enter speedily into Bohemia, to defend his faithfull subjects from all oppression: whereof he thought good to advertise them, that by the consideration of the ruines which would follow this war, they might desist from their enterprise, and thereby avoid the assured ruine, which threatened them and theirs.

To this Letter the Directors made answer, professing that the Earle of Thurn had not committed any spoiles about Budwitz; but onely advertised the inhabitants not to entertaine any strange souldiers; That he could not doe lesse then signifie these defences vnto them, being conformable to the ordinances of the Realme; That in case they would dismisst their souldiers and receive no new garrison into their towne, the estates would forget that which was past. But having made refusal, and declared themselves enemies to the country, it was no wonder if the Earle had vied some threats, although he had no intent to hurt them: Whereof the towne of Croimlan was a good example, whereas they forced not any man, nor put any souldiers into the towne, for that they had obeyed, and dismisst their garrison; and therefore it was not needfull, that the Emperour should draw an Army into Bohemia, in regard of Budwitz, hoping that hee would neuer willingly consent therunto, nor give way to the pernicious counsels of their enemies. After this there were other replies and answers, touching the bringing in of forces into Bohemia, which I cannot insitt vpon.

The Protestant States having assured themselves of many townes and places within the Realme, resolved to make two Armies: the one vnder the leading of the Earle of Thurn, which should ly about Budwitz and towards the frontiers of Austria, by the which the Emperours troups might enter into Bohemia; the other vnder the commande of the Earle of Mandfeldt to bessege and force some townes within the Realme, which would not submit themselves to the Protestants obedience. Finally their troups increased daily both of Germane souldiers and other strangers of their religion: And the protestant States of Silesia had leuied 6000 horse and foot, for the guard (as they said) of their prouince; But in effect it was to enter into Bohemia and to succour their confederates.

The Emperours Army consisted of 10000 horse and foot, with many commanders and Captaines: as the Earles of Buchheim, Tampierre, and Colate, HENRY IVES of Landezberg Prince of Saxony, Marada, and Molari. The Earle of Bacquey was expected with some troups

Troops, and should be General; the which in the beginning bred some iealousie, and crossed their designs. It was bruited they meant to bessege Prague, where the Inhabitants laboured daily in the fortifications of the new Town: yet this Army did nothing but preferre it self and Budwitz. The Earle of Tampierre had commandement from the Emperor to enter with his Army into Bohemia, and to crosse the Earle of Thurn's designs vpon Budwitz. Coming to Bistritz, it yielded; into which he put a garrison, thinking to do the like at Neubaus: but hee was prevented by a garrison the Earle of Thurn had put into the Town and Castle. Whereupon the souldiers fired the suburbs; giving new occasion of discontent to the Protestants against the Emp.

Some fewe daies after, he attempted to force Neubaus by Petard: but he was forced to retire with the losse of 2000 men. Notwithstanding this disgrace, he entred further into Bohemia, and took Pilgrum and Pohna. He had a designe to seile on some place vpon the river Sassna, within 7 or 8 leagues of Prague, there to fortifie himself, and to be daily at the gates of that great city: but the Protestants meeting him neer that river, there was a great skirmish and many good souldiers slain of either side. The Earle of Tampierre was forced to retire for want of victuals; who in his return lost many men, slain by the Peasants. These exploits did incense the Protestants very much against the Emperour, for the ruines and the burnings which the Earles Haiduques had committed.

But let vs come to Pisna. King Ferdinand being returned thither with the Arch-duke MAXIMIL, they took counsell to remove Cardinal LESSELYS from Court, sending him word to come vnto the Castle at two of the clock in the after-noon, on the 20 of July: whereupon he took his Coach with the Popes Nuncio, having much private discourse with him; where being arrived, he dismisst the Nuncio, and went towards the Arch-dukes Cabinet. Being met vpon the way, he was given to understand that the Arch-duke was not well, and desired to be excused; and being led into another roome, he was told that the house of Austria had decreed (with the Popes consent) not to suffer him any longer in Court, for his bad government in the Prouince, and many other causes: wherefore laying aside his Cardinals habit, he should take an ordinary black gowne (which was offered him) and should presently follow such as attended for him. The Cardinal (who could not auoid it by any protestations) was presently conveyed by a secret passage to a Coach, and so conducted vnto the confines of Siria, and from thence to Tirol, with 200 horse. His secretary and seruants (who attended for him in the Court) were cald into the Arch-dukes Cabinet, where being commanded to deliuer the Cardinals keys, they were committed. This was done with such secrecy, as no man discovered it in Court, neither did the Cardinals seruants know it, vntill at night they saw their Lords house searcht, and his goods seized. The Cardinal being sent away; the King and the Arch-duke went vnto the Emperor, whom they made acquainted with what had past.

In Bohemia the Protestant States, seeing the insolencies which the Imperialists had committed, wrote vnto the Emperor, and to the Electors Palatine and of Saxony, and to the Protestant States of Silesia, to make their complaints of the insolencies and violences which had bin done: And they did also write vnto King Ferdinand, and to the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN, to moue his Imperial Maiesty to giue care vnto a good Peace.

All the Protestant Princes and States of Germany, or neighbors to Bohemia, assisted them with men, money, or counsell, except the Elector of Saxony, who did all good offices to reconcile this quarrell, being a friend to the house of Austria. The Protestants of Moravia and Silesia in the beginning sent Ambassadors to the Emperor and the Protestant Directors at Prague. The Moravians imploied themselves effectually to procure a peace, and refused to aid the Protestants of Bohemia: but at the yeers end they changed their opinion. As for the Princes and Protestant States of Silesia, they made shew to haue a particular interest in this war with the Bohemians; to whom they sent 6000 horse and foot. They published a declaration to iustifie their action; concluding, that they found this trouble was meely by reason of the contraventions and persecutions made for religion; the Catholics having rased the Protestants Temples, and committed them to prison which had built them; that the Emperours Officers, of causes of religion made crimes of rebellion; that the Protestants of Bohemia had surpris'd Letters of the Iesuits, containing, that The time was come that Bohemia would be assured for the Catholics, and that the Protestants would be deprived of their privileges; and the edicts for the peace of religion, renoked: that the said Iesuits had often preach't in their Sermons: that if the Princes and States of Silesia had knowne there had bin any other action against the Bohemians but for religion, they would not haue succoured them; desiring about all things to be most obedient to the Emperour.

Ferdinand
obs'n and crowned King of Hungary.

The Emperours
letters to the Directors of the States of Bohemia.

The answers of the Directors to the Emperours
Letters.

The Protestants
Army in Bohemia.

The Emperours
Army.

Exploits of the Emperour's Army
in Bohemia.

Cardinal LESSELYS
seizes four captains in Tirol.

Princes and other States assist the Protestants
of Bohemia.

1618.

The Electors and Protestant princes write to the Emperor.

The Prince of Orange and the States of the united Provinces promised to assist them both with men and money. The Earl of Hohenlo or Hollack brought them goodly Troops out of the Duchie of Brunswick. As for the Electors and Princes of the Union of Germany, who did much affect the Bohemians for their religion, they wrote to the Emperor, that experience and nature taught how precious a thing public peace was; that they could never have imagined, that his Imperial Majesty would have suffered Bohemia to have been engaged in so violent and cruel a warre, seeing there had been means to preferre his royall authority, and to contain his subjects in obedience; that the successe of ciuill warre was doubtfull, and the end ruinous and miserable; that it was greatly to be feared, that this ciuill warre of Bohemia would set the neighbour States on fire, and breed a great alteration during his Raige; that the question being touching priuiledges granted to the Protestants of Bohemia for the liberty of their religion, they doubted not but if his Imperiall Majesty would grant them a fauourable hearing, all things might be well reconciled, seeing that many Electors and Princes offered to imploy themselves: wherefore they intreated him to continue the proposition of peace which they heard he had made, to pardon his subjects offenses, to restrain his souldiers violences, and to quench the fire which was in his State; it being also to be feared, that the Turk, embracing this occasion of ciuill warre, would break the truce, and invade the rest of Hungary.

The Earl of Bucquoy enters into Bohemia.

Count Bucquoy arrived in September with some Troops, and marched towards Budwitz, where, at his coming to the Army, he made a proclamation upon pain of death, that none should set fire vpon any place, nor commit any violence. They write, that, being at Pilsen, it would him that the rustick and new souldiers of Bohemia would be easily vanquished; but he found the contrary, being at Budwitz; where there were two Armies, one of either side the river of Malox: the which made the Earle to contain himself within his trenches.

Four Ambassadors appointed by the Emperor to treat a peace in Bohemia.

The Emperor hauing resolved to referre the difference betwixt him and the Protestants of Bohemia, to the arbitrement of four persons, two Catholiques, and two Protestants; that is to say, the Elector of Mentz and the Duke of Banaria, Catholiques; and the Electors Palatine and of Saxony, Protestants: to them he wrote his Letters, intreating them to take some paines to reconcile this difference; appointing the place of their meeting to bee at Pilsen. The Elector of Saxony sent one presently to Prague, to exhort them to accommodate themselves to the Emperors intention. To whom they answered, that they would willingly referre themselves to those four Princes: but as for the place of meeting (hauing resolved to besiege Pilsen) they could not yeeld vnto it, the Inhabitants being Catholiques, and great enemies to the Protestants; desiring him to consider, that the Directors absenting themselves, the Imperialists might make some enterprise vpon the Towns of Prague, whereof the surpris which the Earle of Tampierre had lately made of the Town and Castle of Cannitz, was a sufficient proof.

The Earle of Mandsfeld had commandment from the States to besiege Pilsen; and the Inhabitants, seeing the Army approach, set fire on the suburbs. The Emperor heerupon wrote to the Elector of Saxony, and taxed the Bohemians to haue besieged the Town, which he had appointed for the conference; desiring, that the said Electors Ambassador should return to Prague, and propound a suspension of Arms in the Electors name to prevent the forcing of Pilsen, and to resolve with the Directors vpon the assurance of the conditions and the place of conference. The Electors Ambassador went to Prague, where he had nothing but words from the directors. The Duke of Banaria wrote also vnto the said States, that if they continued this siege, they would shew the contrary to that which they had formerly published in their apologie and protestation.

The Protestants, growing then strong, made answer to the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Banaria, that they had not been well informed of the causes of the siege of Pilsen; the which they would not haue vnderaken, if there had not been great occasions offered; that the Inhabitants of Pilsen had promised to ioin with them in friendship, and had broken their faith, suffering a new garrison to come into their Town; which had ouerrun the whole Prouince, taken many Protestants of quality prisoners, spoiled the Country, and ruined the Farms of the Protestant Nobility; and seeing that no warning could diuert them from these acts of hostility, they had resolved to present a siege to draw them to their duties: but they grew more insolent, threatening to ruine all the Protestants houses within the Prouince: Whereupon, they had given commandment to the Earle of Mandsfeld to presse the siege, that the Inhabitants might be forced to vnit themselves with the other Towns of Bohemia, and to liue in peace.

The Earle of Thurn in the mean time going towards the Frontiers of Silesia to ioin with the 1618.

Mar-

The Earle of Thurn comes to charge the Earle of Bucquoy.

Marquesse of Lagerndorff and the Silesians, the Earle of Bucquoy made an enterprise vpon the Towne and Castle of Neubaus, meaning to surprize it by night; but it succeeded not, for hee found the garrison and inhabitants ready in Armes, so as hee durst not attempt to batter it. The Earle of Thurn hauing ioyned with the Silesians, being within twenty foure houres march, he returned with his troups to Budwitz. The Earle of Thurn hauing recovered Pilsen, with all the places which Tampierre had taken at his entrie into Bohemia, he made his Armie to turne head, to charge the Earle of Bucquoy in his lodging at Cannitz; whereof being aduertised he caused his troups presently to returne towards Budwitz: yet he could not doe it, so speedily, but the Protestants Foreward came to skirmish with the Rereward of the Imperialists, whereas Bucquoy had some difficulty to retire his Cannon: and if he had not broken a bridge, and lodged some Harquebuziers in a wood, where the Protestants were to passe, he had bene in danger to haue bene defeated. The Protestants hauing past the wood, they returned againe to fight: the which was valiantly maintained on both sides, during five houres space; but if the night had not favoured the Imperialists in their retreat, the Protestants had gotten an absolute victory. The losse was equal: but the Protestants had the place of battle, and 200 prisoners.

After this exploit the Earle of Thurn hearing there were 30 waggons comming from Viena to Budwitz, with a conuoy of 800 men, he laied an ambush for them: which charging them within a mile of Budwitz, they put the souldiers to flight, and took the waggons. The siege continued still at Pilsen; where hauing made a breach they were vpon teames of composition, but the inhabitants grew obstinate; whereupon Mandsfeld doubted his batteries, and made a great breach right against a house which the Emperor Rodolphus had built; the which the souldiers took by assault and lodged there. Yet the inhabitants and garrison annoyed them much from S. Bartholomewes Church, and began to set fire on their houses to keep them from passing: so as all things tended to a great ruine and desolation, if God in an instant had not mollified their hearts on either side.

The Protestant commanders foreseeing the ruine and inevitable losse of this town, and the consequence thereof, sent to aduise the Burgesses and souldiers not to lose themselves, and that there was means to giue them an honourable composition: that the Burgesses should be preferred in their goods and liberties, ioyning to the vniion of the Protestant Estates, carrying all their Armes into the palace, an deliuering the keyes of the town vnto the Earle Mandsfeld: As for the souldiers (if they would not serue the States) they should depart with their Armes and bee conducted to a place of safety: and so the town was yielded the next day vnto Count Mandsfeld, and some of the souldiers followed the Protestants Army.

After the taking of Pilsen, all the towns of Bohemia yielded to the Protestant Estates, except Budwitz, and some few places thereabouts, which were couered by the Imperial Armie: and the Earle of Bucquoy extending his limits took Cromlau; which he mand with a good garrison. Winter being farre aduanced, the Directors lodged part of the Earle of Thurn's footmen in Neubaus and other townes neare to Budwitz and Cromlau. With the rest (being in a manner all horsemen) the Earle transported the warres into Austria, making an incursion within nine miles of Viena, where they spoiled many Burroughes, Monasteries and Churches, and among others the Abbey of Sueball (which was a retreat for the Austrian Boot-halers) in the which they found a great bootie: they chased away the Abbot, who retired to Vienna; and hauing mann'd it with a good garrison, they returned into Bohemia with great spoiles. The Emperour hearing that the Silesians were in Count Thurn's Foreward, hee wrote vnto the Princes and Protestant States of Silesia, that he would neuer haue thought the Silesians would haue attempted to come and spoile his faithfull subjects of Austria: That the Protestants of Bohemia hauing demanded succours to defend themselves, he would not beleaue that they would haue imployed them to wrong him out of Bohemia, and in the view of his capital City of Austria: wherefore he aduised them to retire their troups.

The Silesians desiring to be satisfied in this point, The Protestants of Bohemia made them answer, that they were not to be blamed for this attempt, seeing that the Austrians had come into Bohemia; and committed horrible infolencies, and carried away great spoiles: the Abbey of Sueball being their first retraite; so as they had reason to seize vpon that Abbey, to prevent their enemies entring into their country that way: That their enterprise to transport the warre into Austria, was done for two ends. The first to force their enemies to seek a peace. The second

S I F 4

second, that there were many Protestants in Austria which desired to vnite themselves in the cause of religion with the Bohemians and Silesians, and to be assured of the liberty of Religion: That the same day they had received Letters from the States of Moravia, signifying, that they had dismissed their Governor and his Lieutenant, being Roman Catholics, and had established Protestants, and that they desired to vnite and combine themselves with all the other Protestants of the neighbour Countries, for the defence of Religion. That they also expected Letters from the Protestants of Austria, both above and beneath Ense, and their answer made vnto the Emperour: wherefore they intreated the said States, and Protestant Princes of Silesia, not to giue credit to their enemies, but to believe that the entry of their troups into Austria, concerned the generall good of the Protestants of all the neighbor Princes to Bohemia.

The Emperour demands to the Protestants of Austria.
The Protestants of Austria about the River of Enne, having built a Fort vpon the River of Danow, to hinder the passage of the Forreist by the which they entred into Bohemia, the Duke of Bavaria and the Townesmen of Passau, gaue charge vnto their Agents to make their complaints vnto the Emperour: who at their request sent the chief Marshall of his Court to the said States, to perswade them to raze that Fort, to leaue a free passage into Bohemia by the Forreist, to carry themselves lovingly and friendly towards the Earle of Bucquoy, Generall of the Imperiall Army at Budwitz, to relieue him with corne and victuals, and to suffer the Souldiers to passe freely from Bohemia into Austria, and from Austria into Bohemia. Thereunto the said States made a long answer. That the Fort was built vpon the lands of Austria, with no intent to offend any man, but only for the defence of the Country. That they were not resolu'd to open the passage by the Forreist, by reason of the Neighborhood of the Bohemians. That it would be dangerous vnto them to haue any familiarity with Count Bucquoy, seeing they were so neere to the Bohemians, who might easily invade and spoile their Country, as they had threatened by their Letters. As for the victuall and munition which was demanded for the Armie, they were ready to supply him, so as the Earle would send for it and fetch it at his own perill.

1619
A. Austria.
The Protestant States of lower Austria, being preist by the Emperour to make head and resist the Bohemians, and to preterre the publicke good before their owne priuate Interest, touching the point of Religion: they made answer, That they had great cause to complaine of the Catholics, for that they could not enioy the free exercise of their Religion, granted by the deceased Emperour Maximilian: That they could hardly believe that his Imperiall Maiesty would euer haue attempted a war against the Bohemians, without the generall consent of the States of Austria, and without their approbation being then assembled, and hauing not made them acquainted with the causes of that Assembly: That whatsoever concerned this warre of Bohemia, was kept hidden from them as a mystery, and that the Earle of Bucquoy, Generall of the Army, and the chiefe officers being strangers, it had giuen them cause of discontent and ialousie: For that they could not obtaine from the Catholics an answer to their iust demand, for the free exercise of their Religion: That they doubted not if they had taken aduice at the generall Assembly of the States of Austria before the beginning of this warre, all the ensuing miseries had not happened; as might be verified by former presidents: That his Maiesty refusing in this action to follow the ancient presidents, and to giue care vnto the whollom counsell of the Electors and Princes, it was reasonable that the miseries which had happened should be imputed to those which gaue him counsell to warre, who should now finde meanes to free their country from so many afflictions: That they would not aduize his Imperiall Maiesty to begin a warre, knowing that the end is alwaies doubtfull, and the errors irreparable: much lesse to such a warre as this, in the which we may behold plainly the ruine of Bohemia, with the ouerthrowe of Iustice, of the Lawes, and all good constitutions, and which drawes after it all sorts of miseries: That to diuert all these great calamities, and more, which threatened those Countries, they could giue his Maiesty no better aduice, then to make choice of some worthy personages of the States of Austria, to send them vnto the Directors of Bohemia, to exhort them to abstaine from all acts of hostility; and that his Maiesty for his part would doe the like, and then call a generall Assembly of the States of Bohemia, and there to consult of the meanes to settle a peace in their country.

An enterprise upon Cramlau.
On the 8 of Ianuary the Protestants had an enterprise vpon Cramlau, where the Hungarians were in Garrison: who were aduertized of this plot, and were in Arms; so as they returned to their quarter neere to Nephaus, without any exploit. In this returne, the Earle of Bucquoy sallied forth of Budwitz with 1000 horse, to giue them the chase: but he found opposition and sharpe encounters, so as the Protestants forced the Imperiallists to retire towards Budwitz: Some write that that there were slaine of both sides 500 men, and that the losse was equall.

In the beginning of the yeere, the Emperour wrote his Letters to the Directors of Bohemia, to induce them to a suspension of Arms; and the Elector of Saxony (to whom the Emperour had referred the conditions) sent his Ambassadour also to the Directors, to know their will: But, they excused themselves, that they could not giue any answer, without the aduice of the States of Silesia: Yet afterwards they sent him an answer, and intreated him to consider well how this suspension might be made, and vpon what assurance, that it should not be violated: For, all these troubles (said they) haue no other beginning, but for promises made and not obserued: That the Earle of Bucquoy, Generall of the Army, was a stranger, and had no dignity in the Roman Empire: That hauing many times transgressed even the Emperours commandements, and continued the burnings in Bohemia, he might when he pleased breake the suspension: And that in the last troubles of Austria, during the Truce, the Earle of Tampierre had transgressed; to whom they only made a verball reprehension. Hereupon the Elector of Saxony, seeing the Emperour with the States of Moravia, Silesia and Austria, desire a treaty for the concluding a peace with the Bohemians; he appointed the place of meeting in the Town of Egra, on the fourteenth of April: whereof he aduertised the Directors of Bohemia.

The Emperour was much incensed against Count Ernest of Mansfeldt, who had commanded the Protestants Army at the siege of Pilsen: whereupon, hee caused a proscription or banishment to be set vp against him in all the publicke places of Vienna; intimating, that whereas by the Imperiall constitutions, all men of what dignity or quality soeuer were forbidden to carry Armes against the Emperour, or against any State of the Empire vpon paine of Proscription; to the end that the Peace of the Empire might be the more religiously obserued: yet it was notorious, that Ernest of Mansfeldt had not only leuied souldiers without his priuety, conducted them into Bohemia, and employed them against his faithfull subiects; but also had besieged and forced the Towne of Pilsen, whereby he had incurred the punishments inflicted by the said constitutions: Wherefore according to the same he declared him a Proscript and banished man, abandoning his life and goods to him that could take them.

The Directors of Bohemia, being aduertised that they leuied in Flanders six thousand Foote and two thousand Horse for the Emperour, they sent forth a commandement, That all Bohemians, hauing attained the age of twenty yeers, should be ready in Armes; the Cavaliers with two horses, and the Souldiers with their Musket or Harquebuz, and reduce themselves into companies. Moreouer, they gaue them to vnderstand, that touching the suspension propounded by the Emperour, there had been nothing concluded by the Elector of Saxony, who had only said that the Assembly to treat of a Peace should be held at Egra, and that they should begin by a suspension of Armes; the which was not very certain to be concluded, for that the Earle of Tampierre, hauing leuied new troups, had renewed his incursions; putting all to fire and sword as he past, and that coming into the towne of Grauszen, and not able to take the Castle, he had set fire of the Town. On the tenth of March one thousand six hundred nineteen, the Emperour MATHIAS died in his Castle at Vienna, being sixty two yeers old and fifteene daies. After which FREDERICK the Elector Palatine; and the Electors of Saxony, being Viceroyes of the Empire during the vacancy, wrote their Letters vnto all the Princes and States of the Empire, in their severall Iurisdiccions, for the maintenance of the Peace of the Empire, vntill the Election of a new Emperour.

The Protestant States of Bohemia, by their decree, had expelled the Iesuites out of Prague; and out of the whole Realme, who retired to Brin in Moravia, which is a member of the Crown of Bohemia: Into the which the old Earle of Thurn was now entred with an Army, to draw them into an offensive and defensive league with the Bohemians, vnder fauour of whose Armes the Protestants of Moravia sent their Deputies to an assembly at Snam. The Cardinall of Dirisfein, who was great Master and Capitaine generall of Moravia for FREDERICK, had called an assembly of the Catholique States at Brin, and with the said Cardinall ioyned the Senate, the Prince of Lichtenstein, the Baron of Tseratine and others, who would gladly haue maintained their Faith to FREDERICK, but they wanted forces to make good their authority: For the Burgesses and Towne-houle inclined to the Protestants, whose deputies came with a conuoy of 800 horse from Snam to the gates of Brin; where they entred the third of May, and went presently to Councill: and soon after the Townesmen went to Arms, drawing in 7 Cornets of German horse-men: Then they seized vpon the keyes of the Towne, the Ports, Bulwarks, and all the approaches.

After

After this, the Protestant States came from Councell to the market-place : Where inuironed by the Towne-men they invited one another to take an Oath there publicly in the light of heaven, to maintain the liberty of Religion, the authority of the States and their priuiledges. From thence they went to the Cardinall, to the Prince of Lichtenstein, Tzserain, and other Noblemen Catholiques, being in their seuerall lodgings : who seeing this alteration and apprehending the danger, gaue them to vnderstand, that they desired Peace, and to maintain themselves vnited with the Protestants, for the preservation of the authority of the States. But this could not satisfie them : For in the end they commanded the Cardinall to forbear to call himselfe Capitaine generall of Moravia, or to execute the charge, which he promised to doe ; and also to send back his Commission to King Ferdinand, and to remaine vnited to the will of the States : And it is written that the same night of the third of May, they sent a Commandement vnto the Cardinall and to Tzserain, not to goe out of their lodgings vpon paine of death, placing guards about them.

Cardinal Dietrich and Tzserain, detained prisoners by the Protestants.

The next day, they changed all the officers, deposed the Papisticall Senators, and placed Protestants. In the end, they made an irrevocable Decree to banish the Iesuits out of Brin and Moravia, as the Bohemians had formerly done : And on the last of Iuly following, a generall League was concluded betwene the Protestants of Bohemia, Silesia, Moravia and Lusatia, vpon certain Articles, which are too long to relate.

The Iesuits expelled Moravia.

The Directors had resolved to presse the States of Moravia to chase the Iesuits out of their Prouince, for two reasons which moued them. First, That since they had been chased out of Bohemia, they had practised to breake the vnion and correspondency which the State of Bohemia had with the States of Moravia, and their neighbours : And Secondly, That they animated the people to hold good for the house of Austria. Whereupon, the Directors of Bohemia made a Proclamation in Brin with the consent of the Magistrats, that the Iesuits should depart out of Moravia within fifteen daies, vpon paine of corporall punishment : But, for that it was not made in the name of the States of Moravia, the Iesuits regarded it not. Whereupon the Directors of Bohemia sent two Commissaries, who (saouored by the Magistrats of Brin) went directly to the Iesuits Colledge ; and finding them ready to sit downe to dinner, commanded them in the name of the States of Bohemia to depart the Towne presently. The Iesuits desired leaue to take their refection : which being denied, they were forced to pack vp their baggage and begon. Before they were a league out of Brin their Colledge was on fire, and burnt with such violence as it was wholly consumed, and some twenty houses adioyning. The Protestants said that it was a practice of the Iesuits to ruine the Towne of Brin : and the Iesuits on the other side affirmed, that the Protestants had set it on fire to incense the people, to massacre both them and the Catholiques.

The exploits of the Imperials.

The Earle of Thurne after the Emperours death vpon an aduertisement giuen him by the Protestants of Austria, of an enterprize vpon Vienna (which they held assured by reason of the great intelligence they had with them of their Religion) being entred into Austria, hee was aduertized vpon the way that the enterprize was discovered : which made him returne into Bohemia, hauing receiued some losse by the Imperialists. The Earle of Bucquoy, being in Budwitz, with some forces more then ordinary, hauing receiued the Troupes of Hungary, and 1000 horse from the Low-countries, he resolved to goe out Budwitz with his Army to assaile the Castle of Atzels, the which being summoned yielded presently : After which, he went and forced the quarter of Count Mandsfeldt, and defeated all his troupes being 3000 men, at which charge they tooke seven Ensignes, two Cornets, the one being Count Mandsfeldt, three peeces of Ordinance, eight or nine hundred slain, one thousand four hundred prisoners, among which there was a Capitaine of Horse, seven of foote, foure Lieutenants, six Ensignes, and the Sergeant Maior to Count Mandsfeldt : And so hauing taken a great booty, they returned to Budwitz : Herupon the Protestants, being with their Army within two leagues of Budwitz, retired in order of bataille, towards Perinam and Newham.

Count Mandfeldt quarter forced by Bucquoy.

The Directors of Bohemia, seeing the Imperialists fortified, and to haue had good successe in some enterprizes, they sent vnto the Protestant States of Moravia, Austria, Silesia, and Germany, for succours : and withall they wrote Letters vnto Bethlem Gabor Prince of Transilvania, acquainting him with the estate of their affaires, and the cause of their warres ; intreating him to assist them in the generall defense of Religion. To whom he made a long answer, assuring them, that for the pacifying of those combustions in Christendome, he would not be an idle spectator, but would employ both heart and hand, to find out fit and holisome remedies :

But

But for that his Countrey lies in the very mouth of the Turke, who in his Connells (like vnto the waues of the Sea) is neuer quiet, but still watchfull vpon the least discord of Christians (and the rather now, when as all things were pacified in Asia and Persia) to take from them all meanes to annoy, and to invade the neighbour Prouinces, and (the diuision of Christians being speedily suppressed) to settle a more firm security, he had propounded vnto himselfe two things : The one, to procure the fauour and good liking of the Ottoman Emperour, for the working of this reconciliation ; the other, that he might truly vnderstand the state and intent of the States of Bohemia : wherefore by the Prouidence of God, these occasions did so concur, as he vnderstood by their Letters of the seuenth of August, how they stood affected vnto him : And in like manner, on the seuenteenth of the same moneth, he had receiued from the Sultan, his consent and fauour (beyond his expectation) for the preservation of Christian affaires. Whereupon, he promised to be with an Army the next moneth vpon the confines of Moravia, vnlesse some great cause should stay him in Hungary ; perswading them to preferue their forces together, and not to hazard any battaile before his coming.

Bethlem goes with an Army into Hungary.

The Directors hauing sent an Ambassadour with Letters in answer of his ; vpon the receipt thereof, hee presently gathered together a great Army at Clausenbourg : with the which, he marched into the higher Hungary, with eightene Cannon : Where, the people being terrified, hee reconciled the Noble-men vnto him, HVMANI only excepted ; who, being too weak to make resistance, fled into Poland.

Cassovia taken.

He sent part of his Army to besiege Cassovia : the which being vnable to make resistance, and out of hope of all succors, yielded vnto him, taking an Oath to BETHLEM, and the States of Hungary. This strooke a great terror into the Hungarians, and made the Iesuits and Clergy-men to flee the Countrey.

THE LIFE OF FERDINAND, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND HVNDRETH AND TWENTY TITH ROMANE EMPEROR. (*)

THE death of the Emperour MATHIAS being published, the Elector, Archbishop of Mentz, Chancellor of Germany (according to the duty of his charge) gaue notice thereof to the rest of the Electors of the Empire ; and appointed a day for their meeting at Frankford vpon Main, on the tenth of Iuly this yeere one thousand six hundred nineteene, for the choosing of a new King of Romans : Whither, Ferdinand King of Bohemia, with the Electors of Mentz, Cullen and Treuen came in person : but, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Marquess of Brandenbourg, sent their Ambassadors. Before they fell to the Election, they entred into consultation touching the combustions of Bohemia ; writing Letters to the Directors ; importing that they were desirous to employ their best care and endeavors to compound the diffusions which had growne betwixt them and the deceased Emperour MATHIAS, and their new king

The Electors met at Frankford to choose a King of Romans.

FERDI-

1619
They write vnto the Directors
of Bohemia.

FERDINAND, according to right and equity, and to settle a desired peace in the kingdom, entreating them to com to Ratisbon the 20 of Nouemb. following, removing all impediments which might make the treaty difficult; and in the meane time to abstaine from all acts of hostility: but receiuing no answer, they gaue them to vnderstand by other Letters, that FERDINAND (being chosen Emperor) had promised to be present at the treaty of Ratisbon, or to send his Ambassadors: wherefore they thought good to admonish them, that they might prepare themselves accordingly; and so moderate their counsels, as all extremities being layed aside, all men might conceiue an vndoubted hope of the conclusion of a peace.

The Bohemians
oppose against Ferdinand touching the Electionship.

The Directors of Bohemia were careful to send 3 Ambassadors to Frankfort to the election; but, they were not suffered to enter into the towne: whereupon, they retired to Hannau: from whence they wrote Letters vnto the Elector of Mentz, intimating, that King FERDINAND had no right to the Electionship of Bohemia, for that he had neuer bene in actuall possession of that kingdom; neither had the summation bene made immediately to the residence of Prague as it ought to haue bene, but was sent directly to Vienna. Wherefore they humbly entreated him to impart their Letter vnto the rest of the Electors, and take order that the Diet assigned might be suspended and deferred vntill the troubles and combutions were pacified, and the point of Election decided: If not, that they would be pleased to call the States of the Crowne of Bohemia to the Diet, for that they pretended a proprietarie right to the Election. But, this preailed nothing with the Ecclesiasticall Electors, who would needs proceede to an Election: so as on the 18 of August, FERDINAND was chosen King of Romanes, and crowned the 30 with the accustomed solemnity.

Ferdinand crowned king of Romanes.

This Emperour was called Archduke of Austria of Grets in Stiria, to distinguish the Families. For, the Emperour FERDINAND the First had three sonnes. MAXIMILIAN, the eldest (who succeeded him in the Empire) had diuers sons; all which were titled Arch-dukes of Austria, without any distinction. FERDINAND, his second son, was intitled Arch-duke of Austria of Grets; from whom this Emperour now liuing, descends. And CHARLES, the third son to FERDINAND the First, was Arch-duke of Austria of Inpruck.

These ciuill warres of Bohemia troubled the mindes of many Christian Princes, fearing that this distaction would open a gappe for the barbarous Turk to aduance his conquests in Christendome. Our Kings Maiesty of great Britannie (who hath alwaies been a Prince of peace) desirous to see these dangerous warres suppress in the breeding, by some good accord; sent an honourable Embassie by the Lord HAYS, Viscount of Danester, now Earle of Carlisle to FERDINAND newly chosen Emperour, to treat of a reconciliation betwix him and his subjects of Bohemia; but it did not sort with his Maiesties religious intent and desire; for in the Interim, the States of Bohemia (being distast with the reiection of their Ambassadors at Frankfort, and before the receipt of the Electors Letters after the Emperors Electors) being assembled together in Prague with the Deputies of the incorporated Prouinces, concluded and protested by oath, neuer to acknowledge FERDINAND for their King, resolving to proceede to a new Election; so as on the 26 of August Stile vnto they made choise of FRIDERICK the Fifth Elector Palatine of the Rhine to be their King; whereof they aduertised him by Letters, and that he had bene solemnlie proclaimed; yet he would not presently accept of this election, without the aduice of the Princes and Protestant States of the union in Germany; whom he entreated to meete at Rottenburg, to assist him with their counsells: where they were all of opinion, that he should accept of this dignity, as necessarie for the generall good of Germany, and of other Princes and states their confederates.

The manner of the Bohemians proceeding to winne the Elector Palatine to allow of their Election and to accept of the Crowne, hath not bene written so particularly by any Author, as I haue receiued it by the relation of a worthy iudicious Knight, who was in those parts, and informed himselfe curiously of euery circumstance how it pass. The States of Bohemia (as he saith) hauing made choise of the Elector Palatine to be their King, sent their Ambassadors vnto him being at Heidelberg in the lower Palatinate: whom although he entertained well; yet he gaue them a dilatorie answer, being not yet fully resolved: which was the cause of a meeting at Walsdon in the vpper Palatinate, betwix the Elector Palatine and the Directors of Bohemia. At this assembly, the Elector seemed not vnwilling to embrace so braue and free an offer: yet he held it not fit to accept thereof suddenly and rashly, knowing well to what cares, toiles, and danger, this dignity was subject: and therefore he entreated them to haue patience and to respite him for a time, vntill he had acquainted the King of great Britannie his father-in-law, with

1619

with their Election; whose approbation he much desired in the acceptance thereof: whereupon he sent CHRISTOPHER, Baron of Dum, as his Ambassador, to acquaint his Maiesty with their proceedings; promising, vpon his returne, to giue them a direct answer.

The Lords of Bohemia held themselves no way safe, vntill they had preuailed with the Elector Palatin, and wonne him to accept of that Crowne, being conceited that if he were once crowned, not only himself, but all his friends and allies would employ their forces, and be engaged in their defence: Whereupon, they took aduice, what persons they might treat withall, and who had greatest power and interest in the affection of the Elector: In the end they fell vpon CHRISTIAN, Prince of Anhalt, to whom they made such golden promises both for himselfe and for all such as depended vpon him, as he forgot the dutie of a true and faithfull counsellor, and became one of their partie; preuailing so much by his perswasions with the Elector Palatin, as he yielded suddenly to accept of the Crowne of Bohemia, before the arrivall of his Ambassadors into England.

The Elector accepts of the Crown of Bohemia.

The offers which the Bohemians made to the Prince of Anhalt and the rest, were, That the Prince should be Generall of all the Army: That CHRISTOPHER, Baron of Dum, should be Chamberlaine of Bohemia; That TOTHOSIVS, his brother (who was afterwards sent hither as Ambassador) should haue the best marriage in Bohemia; and (which was worst of all) that the Earle of Holoch should be made Lieutenant generall of the Army. These great offers drew all these great persons (who aymed at their owne priuate ends) to the Bohemians purposes: Besides, they gaue way to others in both the Palatinates, to come into those places which these men had formerly enioyed. The King being crowned, and these men possessed of those places, they did as needy greedy men vse to doe, looking only to their owne profit, and neglected wholly the honour of the King and safety of the State; still disgracing Count THURN and Count MANDSELDY, who were the only men that euer gaue good counsels, or performed any worthy and generous Act during the warre.

The newes of the Electors suddaine acceptance of the Crowne of Bohemia, were very distastefull to our kings Maiesty, the Prince Palatines father in law; who held it a president of dangerous consequence for all Christian Kings, to auow this suddaine translation of a Crowne by the authority of the people; nor yet warrantable by the word of God, to transerre a Crowne vpon any pretext of Religion, being bound to obey our kings and temporall superiors whatsoeuer they be; and therefore he protested to remaine Newer touching the affaires of the kingdom of Bohemia.

The Emperour, after his coronation, went to Ausbonig: and from thence (being accompanied by the Duke of Banaria) he came to Munich, the Dukes chiefe place of residence; where he had a princely reception. During his abode there, as some write, he had much conference with the Duke, touching the warres of Bohemia; promising, that if he would assist him in those warres, he would giue him the Electorshippe of the Rhine and the vpper Palatinate, for a reward of his labour: and for such summes of money as he should disburse, he engaged vnto him lands in the vpper Austria. This was a sweet baite, able to moue any ambitious Prince to forget all the ties & bonds of blood and consanguinity, vpon hope to adde a Princely title to his owne dignity, and a large extent of land to his Territories. You may presume by the future events what their conclusion then was: After which the Emperour went to Gretz, and so to Vienna.

The Emperour
promiseth the
D. of Banaria;

In the meane time before the Emperours returne into Austria BYCQVOY hauing taken Pissek in Bohemia, he resolved to goe to Thabor: But, being preuented by the Bohemians; he went and encampd at Merowitz. The Bohemians followed him, and campd opposite vnto him; obseruing all his enterprises; so as they had many skirmishes: And the fourth of September, a troupe of Spaniards, going somewhat farr from the Campe; were charged by the Bohemians, and five hundred of them slaine. Thus the two Armies lay encamped; when as suddenly BYCQVOY receiued aduertisement, from the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, of the vnexpected coming of BETHUN GABOR into Hungary, commanding him to man his chiefe Castles and Townes, and to returne into Austria: But, before his departure out of Bohemia he took the Castle of Rejemburg, and hauing fortified all the passages he left the Countrey. After which, the Bohemians sent part of their Army to recouer Rechin: the which they forced with the peard; slew most of the Garrison; and took the Governour with his Lieutenant, and sent them to Prague. After which, they recovered Thin, which BYCQVOY had formerly taken: and in the meane time the Earle of Tampierre had taken Lundelsburg in Moravia to the Emperour; but with great losse of his men.

Bethuny goes out of Bohemia.

Ttt

GABOR

1620 le and other ices taken by Transilvian.The Palatine of Hungary abouts

ethin to disj

GABOR, having settled all things at Cassovia to his will, sent RENEDI and SATSCHEV with 1800 men, and twelve peeces of Ordnance to Fillec and other places; which yielded unto them. Then writing their Letters to other towns upon the Frontiers, they exhorted them to submit themselves willingly to the Transilvian; assuring them that this expedition was made with the knowledge and consent of many States of the Christian Common-wealth. After which they subdued Vacia, Tirman, Nentra, Nemigrade, Posinga, and others: The Haidiques of Jeremah deliuered vp their Gouvernour with the Fort. After which, Neuenfals yielded, and the Gouvernour was sent bound to Cassovia. The Palatine of Hungary wrote his Letters to BATHLIN GABOR, exhorting him to remember his Faith to the Romane Empire and his common Country, and to desist from his enterprises. And withall, writing to RENEDI, he writ him to consider how great the powers of the Kings of Spain and France were, who were so strictly allied to the house of Austria, and that the Electors of the Empire (some few excepted) would undoubtedly send succours to CÆSAR. Whereunto they answered, that they doubted not of the forces of the Kings of Spain and France, or of the assistance of the Electors of Germany; but they did hope before their coming all should be finished, and their dinner made ready.

In the meane time there was an Assembly of the Princes and States, held at Preßburg in Silesia, for the confirmation of that which had been concluded by the States of Bohemia at Prague; where they had concluded, that King FERDINAND, now chosen Roman Emperour, had deprived himselfe of the kingdome of Bohemia and the rest of the Prouinces, and that the States and all the subjects were freed from their oath of obedience, whereby they had recovered their right to choose a new King; whereupon they had elected FREDERICK, the first of that name, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Banaria, and Elector of the sacred Empire, for their King. This was confirmed by all the States of Silesia; who exacted a solemn Oath from the Clergie of Preßburg, that they should faithfully observe and keepe what-focuer had been formerly decreed in the Assembly at Prague, and liue a quiet life, free from all practices against the Protestants: That they should attempt nothing against the Emperours Letters-patents, touching the exercise of Religion; that they should respect no mans fauour, nor hatred: that they should not be diuerted from their Oath with any intreaties, or rewards, promises, or threats; nor with any absolutions, treaties, constitutions of Councels, or Decrees nor to keep Faith with Heretiques, or any other exception what-focuer. All which they did wittingly and willingly renounce, vnder the penalty ordained by God and the Magistrates, and the losse of all their benefices, faculties, and goods which they held in Silesia.

The Elector Palatine having settled his affaires in the Palatinate, and committed the ciuill gouernement to JOHN Duke of Dupons, a Prince of that house, and the affairs of warre to JOHN Earle of Nassau the elder, he went with the Princeesse his wife, and children and his whole Court to Amberge, from whence he certified the Elector of Saxony by his Letters, of his resolution, and of the reasons which had induced him to accept thereof. To whom the Elector of Saxony made a generall answer; concluding, that he referred all to the prouidence and will of God, wishing with all his heart, that he might embrace such counsell, as might be fitting for his Electorall and Kingly dignity, profitable to his subjects, honourable to the whole Empire, helpfull to the kingdome of Bohemia and the annexed Prouinces, and might tend to the procuring of a Peace, and the auoiding of all ruine and desolation. In the meane time, he would pray vnto Almighty God to diuert all danger from the bounds of the Empire, and that no occasion might be giuenthe Turks, to obtaine that which hitherto they could not do by Arms.

The Transilvian plants ioyne with the Bohemians.

In the beginning of October, a Collonell called GOLSTENE, entered Bohemia with 400 shotte, committing infinite inuolencies and spoiles in the territory of Sasser: where the Country-men fell vpon them, and slew most part. Count BYEQVOY, being called out of Bohemia by the Arch-duke L. ROPOLO, presently took Horne a Towne in the lower Austria, and left it againe, and then marcht to Swam, a Towne in Moravia, with nine thousand Horse and Foote, which hee presently summoned: but the Garrison prepared for defence; and he, hearing that twelue thousand Hungarians and Transilvians drew neere, marched away by night, and went to ioyne with the Earle of Tampierre. In the meane time, the Transilvians ioynd with the Bohemians, and Morauians; and certaine companies of the Hungarians left the Earle of Tampierre, to goe vnto the Transilvians.

A great fight betwixt the Imperials and the protestants.

The Earle of Thurm, seeing himselfe thus fortified, hauing six and twenty thousand men in his Army; resolved, with RENEDI Generall of the Transilvians, to goe and fight fight with Count BYEQVOY; who, finding his forces too weak, left his first lodging; and went and encamped at the outward bridge of the riuer of Danubius: whither the Archduke L. ROPOLO came from Vienna to view the Army. The enemy came with great fury vpon the forward; and slue fute hundred of the Earle of Tampierre's men. L. ROPOLO preit Count BYEQVOY to fight: but he, finding his counsell to be very dangerous, contained himselfe within his Camp. In the euening they began to skirmish; the which continued almost till midnight; their ordnance playing continually, with no small losse on either side. In the morning, the Fight began againe very furiously; where many were slaine and murdered by the ordnance. The Earle of Bucquoy had a great losse in his Camp, there beeing three barrells of powder set on fire by negligence and carelesnesse, and very many slaine and drowned in the riuer. The Fight continued vntill it was night: but, being ouerpressed by the Bohemians; they abandoned a Fort at the end of the bridge, and retired vnto the other side, breaking the bridge after them. The number of the dead bodies was vncertaine: but there were very many carried the next day vnto Vienna in waaggons, whereof most died soon after. Count BYEQVOY was shotte into the arme; and his Lieutenant Generall had three seuerall wounds; but they were not mortall.

1619.

BATHLIN GABOR in the meane time marcht with a great Army to Preßburg, taking in the way the Castle of Petrard, the which he burnt. The newes heereof being brought vnto Vienna, they sent three companies of foot with three peece of ordnance by boat, which entred the suburbs of Preßburg on the 13 of October. The night was very tempestuous, rainy and windy; and the Transilvians embraced this occasion, and surprised the fouldiers, who slept without fear; whereof most of them were slain, and their Commander with some few others fled away. The suburbs being surprised, BATHLIN summoned the Palatine to answer him, whether he would defend the Town and Castle, or yeeld it without force. Hauing some daies granted to consult with PALEI and other Noble-men being not able to defend it, he resolved to yeeld it.

Bethlin takes Preßburg.

In the mean time, the new elect King of Bohemia, with his wife, children, and whole train, came to Walsacken; whither the Ambassadors of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces came vnto him: whereas one, in the name of all the rest, deliuered the reasons why they had rejected the Emperours gouernment in Bohemia, and made choice of him to be their King; giuing him many thanks for his acceptance, and praying for his happy and long continuance. Which ended, he deliuered vnto them his reuerfall Letters: by the which he promised before his Coronation to take the oath after the example of his predecessors Kings of Bohemia, to confirme all the priuiledges, immunities, liberties, rights, statutes, and the ancient laudable customes of Bohemia; and especially the Charter granted by the Emperour ROBERT the Second, as king of Bohemia, to the States and Inhabitants of the laid Realm, for the free exercise of their religion, or what-focuer else might concern the good of the Realm and the incorporated Prouinces: which Letters of reuerfall were confirmed vnder his hand and seal; these beeing receiued by the Deputies, they returned to Egra. After which, the King with his Queen and whole Court past on, and arrived at Prague the last of October.

I may not omit the Elector Palatines course before his going into Bohemia. Hauing met with diuerse of the confederate Princes at Rattenbourg, before his departure hee sent to the Arch-bishop and Elector of Mentz; to whom he propounded, that whereas it had pleased God that he had been lately chosen King of Bohemia, and was resolved to accept thereof, he desired to know of his Grace, in what terms his estate stood with the Electorall house of Mentz; and whether that correspondency which had for a long time been maintained betwixt both houses, should continue still firm and inuolable: and whereas the Prince Palatine vnderstood, that there were good forces neer at hand, hee demanded whether they went, and whether his Grace would vouchsafe them passage. To these the Elector of Mentz answered, that he would oblige the ancient correspondency which the Electors of Mentz haue had with the Electors Palatines, inuolably in all lawfull things; that touching that which concerned the tumults in Bohemia, hee was appointed no Iudge, neither did they concern him; as for the Army, he knew nothing certain: that hitherto he had denied no man passage, and continued still in the same minde, so as they gaue good security according to the constitutions of the Roman Empire, to repair all damages: yet he would conferre touching this Article with the other Electors. And soon after, the Vicar generall or Gouverneur of Heidelberg had staid all the reuenues of the Clergy, which they of Mentz, Spire, Wormes, and the Teuton Knights hold in the Palatinate.

The Palatine to the Archbishop of Mentz, and his answer.

The Elector of Mentz, being moued with the many complaints of the Clergie, sent vnto the Vicar general and the Councell of the Palatinate, to expostulate with them for the seizure of the Clergies rents; adding withall, that hitherto there had not onely a good concord been maintained betwixt the Electorall house of Mentz and the Palatinate; but, before the departure of the Prince Elector Palatine to Prague, he had sent an Ambassadour for the confirmation and future maintenance of the said correspondency betwixt both houses, so as he neuer expected this prohibition would have been made by so good a neighbour. Whereunto they made answer, That they were not ignorant of the promises made on either side; but, being advertised that the Clergy had promised a great summe of money to the Crowne of Spain, for the oppression of the Bohemians, to whom the Elector Palatine was especially bound; for this consideration they had granted this inhibition of Ecclesiasticall rents, neither were they to be blamed, nor any man of iudgement would thinke it fit for aide to go vnto forraign Princes, out of the territories of their owne Prince, to subdue the Bohemians, and their Lo. the PALATINE: If therefore the Elector of Mentz, and others whom it concerned, would take a course that there should be no aides sent to prejudice the Bohemians, and their Lord the Palatine; then no other resolution might be expected: And soon after the Elector of Mentz, having written other Letters to the Elector Palatine, freed the Clergy from this inhibition.

The Elect king of Bohemia (as we have said) being come to Prague on the last of October, was met by the Directors and Nobility, with certain troupes of horse and foot, and so was conducted into the City, they being all in Arms; where he was received with great joy and acclamations. After which, it was decreed by the generall States of Bohemia, That the king should receive a moiety of the tributes, rents, and contributions; and the Queen, a fourth part; and every man should pay his due, yearly, at the feast of S. GEORGE: That the Directors should be freed from their Oath, and giue an account vnto the Assembly, of such money as they had disbursed for the Common-weale; That the Directors and Gouernors for the kingdom, should yield the government of Arms vnto the king, who should employ them for the defence of himselfe, the kingdom, and incorporated Prouinces; vntill yet the aduice of the Gouernors of the Realm and Prouinces; That Commissioners should be sent out, to examine what harms had bin done in the Countries, that consideration might be had thereof at the next State-assembly, &c. MANDSFEELD, meaning to recouer certain places which BYCVOY had taken, marcht to Wintzenburg; where, the Gouernor refusing to yield vpon summons, the Earle forced a Port with the Petard; where, entering, he put all the garison to the sword, except some fewe that were taken prisoners: After which, diuers towns and Castles yielded willingly, the garisons departing to Endauitz. Then the Earle marcht to Praguditz, where the garison put themselves in defence; but he took the town by force. On the 24 of October the Army marcht to Wodeau: which they knowing was but weakly mand, and that two Noblemen of Bohemia (which had serued the Emperor) were retired into the town, having stopt all the passages, they fought to force it; but the garison made great resistance: yet the next day the Gouernor compounded to depart: the which was willingly granted, so as the two Noblemen might be deliuered vnto them, who were sent to Prague, and committed to prison.

All things in the meane time were made ready for the coronation at Prague; a Theater was erected in the Temple, no suspected person admitted; all cloysters and corners searcht for feare of treason; the Chanons and Clergy men remoued out of the Cathedrall Church, and another appointed them for diuine seruice, and a weekly stipend allowed them: They changed the Armes of the kingdom vpon the new-gate; and for those of the house of Austria which stood vpon the breast of the Lion of Bohemia, they set the armes of the Palatinate. All things being thus in a readinesse, FREDERICK was crowned King the fourth of November, all the Citizens and souldiers being in Armes. The office was performed by the Administrator and an Elder, who supplied the places of Bishoppes in that action, the which was performed with great pompe and zeale. The particularities whereof you may reade at large in GOTARDVS. And on the seauenth of November the Lady ELIZABETH, wife to King FREDERICK was in like manner crowned with the same ceremonies. After which, the King made publike declaration of the causes which had moued him to take vpon him the gouernement of Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces, sending it to all Christian Princes and States; and withall, writing particular Letters, That he had received the gouernement and Crowne of Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces, with the accustomed solemnities, and the generall applause of all the States and people; That no priuate profit of his owne had induced him thereunto; but, a desire to free the afflicted from a generall ruine had moued him to take vpon him their Protectiprotection; and that he would equally defend both Catholiques and Protestants, in the free exercise of their Religion; hoping they would ioyfully allow of his dignity, and not faile to assist him, with their counsel and aide, against the inuasion of his Enemies.

On the tenth of November there came an Ambassadour from BETHLIN GABOR and the States of Hungary to Prague, who propounded certain Articles to the Councell. First, They required that there should be a perpetuall League concluded betwixt Hungary, Transilvania, and Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces; and that they should fight with their ioynt forces for the common good. 2. That no Prouince should conclude a Peace or begin a war, without the priuity and consent of the rest; and that they should not make any peace with the house of Austria, to the preiudice of the other part: But if they would make any league with other Kings, Princes or States, it should be with the consent of the rest. 3. That they should continue the warre against the house of Austria, at the common charge of the Prouinces. 4. That whereas BETHLIN GABOR had assisted the Bohemians with his Army, to his great charge, and at their request; in consideration thereof, they should pay him 100000 Dollers. 5. That it being necessary in this dangerous Estate of affaires, that the limits and forts should be well mand against the Turkes inuasions; they required (for that the benefit redounded to the whole Christian World) that the Crowne of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, should pay yeerely 300000 Dollers. 6. That it was necessary, Ambassadors were sent in the name of the new King and States, with others from Hungary, to the Sultans Port; and that the Prince of Transilvania was ready to undertake that Ambassie. 7. That, whereas the treasure of Hungary was much exhausted, they required that the hereditary lands of the house of Austria (which in time might be conquered, in Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, and other places) should be annexed to the Crowne of Hungary. 8. That if the Polonians should attempt any thing against Transilvania and Hungary, in fauour of the Emperour; then all the Prouinces, especially Silesia, should be bound to lend aide vnto that Prince. 9. That the States should moue their King to confirme the said Articles; and that they should giue caution for the performance thereof: and they in like manner should receive assurance from them.

The King of Bohemia (before his going to the Assembly at Nurem, having heard the Prince of Transilvania's Ambassadour) made answer, that he could not presently giue him a full resolution; for that some of their demands concerned the whole Romane Empire: That as concerning the League, the Earle of Hohenloe should come presently to the States at Presbourg with full power and authority to confere with them touching the raising or leuying of a great Summe of money. With which answer the Ambassadour returned forthwith to Presbourg.

The King of Poland sent vnto the Bohemians to solícite them to a Peace with the Emperour, and they returned him in wrighting a declaration of their reicction; perswading the King and the States of Polonia, to remember their old treaties, and not to attempt any thing against them. Some Counsellors perswaded the King not to engage himselfe in these combustions; nor to attempt any thing against the Realme of Bohemia or the incorporated Prouinces: That hee should remember, that when as Polonia was on fire with intestine warres, they contained themselves: That they entertained friendshippe with the Turkes and Tatarsians: That the Hungarians, the English, the vnited Prouinces, the Danes, with many other Princes and States were their confederates: In so much that it appeared plainly the warre would bee long and bloody, and dangerous for Poland, if they ingaged themselves in it.

In the meane time, there being rumours of great preparations for warre in Polonia, and that HYMANOT (who fled thither from Hungary) would invade Silesia, Moravia, or Hungary, with a great Army; they commanded every twentieth man in Silesia to take Armes, and had eight thousand choice men alwaies in readinesse. The lower Austria was wonderfully afflicted by the insolvency of Souldiers, and the inhabitants were forced to flig with their wives and children. About Vienna, the Earles of BYCVOY and TAMPERRE, spoiled and burnt many villages, that they might not be of any vse to the enemy; which bred a great dearth in Vienna, especially when it came to be besieged. BYCVOY and TAMPERRE, hearing that the gouernor of Heinburg had been defeated by the Hungarians, they went to succour him with 6000 horse and foot, where there was a great encounter and many slaine on either side; after which they returned to Vienna: but there were 1600 Hungarians forsooke them, and went to their Country-men.

A complaint.

The auerture of the Elector of Bohemia, to the Electors of Germany.

The king of Bohemia enters Prague.

A decree made.

Diuers towres recouered by the Protestants of Bohemia.

The coronation of the king of Bohemia, and of the Queen.

Publike declaration made.

Ambassadour
from the Trans-ilvanian and Hungarian States of Bohemia.

Propositions:

The Polonians
perswade their King not to aide
the Emperour.

The miserable state of lower Austria.

The fire of these ciuill and intestine warres of Bohemia, beganne to flame out in Germany, the Electors, Princes and Imperiall Cities and States grew into factions, and made particular Assemblies, to prouide forces to support their parties; cyther pretending a feare to be supplanted in their religion. And although I am tied to strict bounds, and cannot relate actions at large, considering the copiousnes of my subject, and the short time this Emperour hath yet reigned, vnlesse I should make it exceed the liues of many of his Predecessors; yet, to giue the Reader the better satisfaction, I should it fit to set downe in particular how they were cantoned, as you may judge by their particular Assemblies.

The Electors, Princes, and Protestant States of the Vnion, met at Nuremberg in November, whither came in person the Elector Palatine newly chosen King of Bohemia, AVOUSTVS and FREDERICK Palatines of Newburg, JOHN ERNEST Duke of Saxony, WILHELMUS, with his two brethren, ERNEST of Brandenburg, Marquess of Olmsbach or Ambach, with his brother, JOHN FREDERICK Duke of Whitemberg, with his two brethren; MAURICE Lantzgrau of Hesse, and FREDERICK Marquess of Baden: the rest sent their Ambassadors; namely, the Elector of Brandenburg, the Duke of Deuzpouts, the Marquess of Culmbach, the Prince of Lunbourg, the Duke of Brunswick, the Marquess of Baden, the Earls of Peteravia, the Earls of Frankonia, the Earl of Oettingen, and in the name of the Nobles and Knights. There came also Deputies from the Imperiall Cities; as, Strasbourg, Bransfort, Nuremberg, Wormes, Vime, Spire, Rottembourg, Hall, Nordlingen, Landa, Vimpfen, Buren, and from the Protestants of the higher & lower Austria: all these fauoured the Bohemian party.

The Electors, Princes, and Catholique States which adhered to the Emperour, met at Virrbourg in Francia: whither came Ambassadors from the Emperour, from the Electors of Meinie, Cullen and Treuer, from the Dukes of Baharia and Lorraine, from the Palatine of Newburg, and from many Princes, Bishops, Abbats and Prelates; as, those of Salzbourg, Ausbourg, Virrbourg, Ratis, Wormes, Spire, Heildesheim, Constance, Strasbourg, Passau, Ratisbone, Brissigen, Balle, Munster, Paterborn, Liege, Fuld, Eluangen, Kepten, and others. Thither came also Agents for the king of Spain. In this Assembly, the means how to maintain peace in Germany were treated of, and how to defend themselves against the Arms of the Protestant Princes, and what leuies euerie one should make; so as it seemed all tended to warre in Germany, both parties being much incensed.

The Emperour sent the Earl of Hohenoller to the assembly at Nuremberg; who, making a long relation to them of the troubles of Bohemia, and of his Majesties peaceable inclination, exhorted the Electors, Princes and States there assembled, to giue credit to his words and promises, rather than to false impostures and slanders; and not to suffer themselves to be corrupted by the false reports of the Bohemians; but rather to employ their counsels and care to prevent so many miseries as would vndoubtedly growe in the Kingdome of Bohemia, if matters continued in the same estate they then were: the which might giue a great aduantage to the Enemie of Christendome, and be very dangerous for the Empire. Wherefore, they should direct their consultations to some good end, so as the honour of the Imperiall Majesty might be preferred; who protested, not to do any thing that were not iust and honest, and worthy of his Imperiall grace and fauour; promising to recompense the pains and merits of such as had imploy'd themselves to end so great occasions of trouble.

Heerto the Assembly at Nuremberg made answer, that they were glad of his Majesties good resolution, conformable to theirs, which was onely to prevent the miserable estate of the sacred Empire. They made repetition of the diffensions of the Empire, and of the grievances of the Protestants; which I must for breuities sake omit. But, touching the affairs of Bohemia, they said that they were not to be blamed, if, seeing the Catholiques begin motions of warre, they were carefull of the welfare of their subjects, and prepared themselves to some kinde of defense; knowing, that they are not onely bound to chase away the danger out of the frontiers of their Country, but also to succour the Protestants; yea, even the Elector Palatine FREDERICK, chosen King of Bohemia, especially when he shall be molested in his lawfull inheritance and seigneuries in Germany; being bound thereto by the Imperiall constitutions, and by their Vnion.

They therefore besought his Imperiall Majesty to dispose his counsels for the pacifying of the present troubles in Bohemia, and to be carefull that no disaster might fall vpon the Empire. As for them, they would neuer suffer themselves to be wonneby any contrary perswasion; hoping, that his Majesty should not giue ear to those which were more desirous to entertain for-rain forces in the Empire, than to seek the safety and authority of the Emperour; and that hee should rather giue care to the iust reasons of so many Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, then vnto the discourses of certaine men, who breathed nothing but warre; and a desire to ruine and roote out those whom they falsely called Heretiques.

rain

By this answer the earl of Hohenoller finding that this assembly at Nuremberg was wholly bent to support the Elector Palatine in the possession of his new Election to the Crowne of Bohemia against the Emperour, hemade a long Apology, and presented it to the same Assembly. It contained a short relation of all the troubles of Bohemia, during the life of the Emperour MATTHIAS, with answers to their oppositions against the admission of King FERDINAND to the Election of a new Emperour, and to their declaration touching their reiection of FERDINAND, and their Election of a new king: finally, his conclusion was, that the States of Bohemia had no free Election to chuse a king if any male or female of the blood royall were liuing, which hath bene the occasion of all their warres: a point which I will not decide, but leaue it to ENRIAS SILVIVS DV BRABIVS, and others which haue written learnedly thereof.

The Prince of Transilvania after the assembly at Presbourg, made an incursion with his Army towards Vienna, putting all to the sword: He took Eberdsdorf, with other townes and villages, spoiling some and wasting the rest by fire, and then returned to Presbourg. In their retreat, they writethat Count BYCQVOY and TAMPIERRE charged the Rereward, and slew 2000 Hungarians.

The Emperour commanded the States of high Austria, to send their Deputies to court, to take their dew oath of allegiance, whereby they might prevent the imminent danger, and giue no cause of greater miseries: But they delaying to make any answer, he sent other Letters vnto them, signifying, That they had not onely forborne to send him an answer, but had also made an incursion into the lower Austria, and surprised certaine townes; which were apparant signes of hostility. Wherefore he admonisht them againe to send their Deputies to take the oath; to call back their souldiers; and to desist from their enterprises; if not, he would vse other remedies. About that time there came out of the Duchie of Atlas, into the Bishopprick of Passau (having past the Alpes through Switzerland) 9000 souldiers, leaving behinde them mournfull marks of their bloody cruelty; who hauing no meanes to passe into the vpper Austria, the country-men hauing stoppt vnder the passages; part of them past into Bohemia towards Budwitz, vnder the leading of DON BERTHAZAR: who being entred, caused the Kings edict to be set vp in all places written to this sence; That it was knowne to all men, how that his subjects of Bohemia, partly through their owne malice, and partly by the perswasion of others, had runne into rebellion, violated the oath which they had taken to him, being their elected and crowned King, and had presumed to chuse them another King, and settle him in his throne. Wherefore to preferue his right and to defend his subjects from ruine, he had bene constrained to send in new forces; That he doubted not but there were many who either not pleased with these attempts, or changing their opinions, would performe their due obedience to their lawfull King; admonishing all others, that remembering the oath whereunto they were bound, and hauing a care of their wiues, children and families, they should speedily returne to their obedience, and giue in their names, to such commanders as hee should haue in the Countrey, and thereby preferue themselves from ruine; promising pardon to all that should demand it in this manner.

The Emperour being come to Vienna, the Hungarians and Bohemians marcht with a great Army towards the City; they took Eberdsdorf, and then laied siege vnto Vienna, spoiling all the townes and villages round about. The Countrey people flying into the City, there grew a great dearth of corne, which made the enemy hope that in short time they should force them to yield by famine. In the meane time HENNAVOI made an irruption into Hungary with 8000 Polonians: but he was incountred by RACOTZI, whom the Prince of Transilvania had left at Cassovia, and receiued a great overthrow. Then ioyning with RADUL, and the Earle of Althem, being in all three or foure thousand men, they encountered the Polonians againe: where there was a cruell combat, the which continued almost the whole night, there being slaine on either part three thousand men. The Polonians retiring, made a shew of flight; whereupon the Hungarian foot fell presently to spoile: but the Polonians returning suddenly (the Hungarian horsemen flying away) they were for the most part slaine. RACOTZI hauing escaped, cried presently To Armes, to repaire this losse: and BERTHAZAR being aduertised thereof, he forbore to presse

T t t 4

Vienna,

Assembly of the electors Princes at Nuremberg.The Catholique princes & states assembly at Virrbourg.The Emperour sends to the Assembly at Nuremberg.

Their answer.

An Apologie made for the Emperour.]Exploits of the Transilvanian.The Emperour requirer an oath from the States of high Austria.The Emperours edict against the Bohemians.Vienna besieged by the Hungarians and Bohemians.A great slaughter of Polonians and Hungarians.Bethlin Ca-
sovia slaine.

Vienna; and sending part of his Army into Hungary, to Rheda, he returned to Presbourg, having taken Edenbourg, and mand it with a garrison of 400 men.

The States of the vpper and lower Austria, had many consultations for their defence against the incursions of BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transilvania. Under the pretext of this defence, the Protestant States levied forces: and having drawne together some thousands of horse and foote, they seized vpon Lipsa, which they ruined for that the citizens had made resistance. After which they took Sibilsberg, Leisdorf and Bechling; and then they marcht to the Monastery of Melcha, which was very well fortified. The Abbat offered certain thousands of florens, to haue his monastery spared, but he could not preuaile: they having three feuerall batteries; they cut off the water from the Garrison: and the souldiers which fetcht it from the river of Danow, were much annoyed by the short, but it was relievied by BVCQVOY. Nor long before, the Earle of Mandsfield had recovered Piffek, after a moneths siege, being valiantly defended by Don MARTINO a Spaniard, who was taken prisoner with diuerse other Capitaines, and sent to Wilsen. The souldiers, being 400 in number, and many of them sick, were let goe freely with their baggage, and conducted to the frontiers of Austria. Piffek being taken after this manner; the Emperours souldiers left all the garrison towns in Bohemia (except Budnitz & CROMLAU) retiring into places of more safety, and carrying with them what they had gotten. There was such a stink in Piffek, by reason of the dead carcasses of men and beasts, that both souldiers and citizens were forced to leaue the towne: the which, MANDSFIELD caused to be repaired, and manned with a good garrison.

BETHLIN GABOR (as we haue said) being retired towards Presbourg to resist the invasion of HVMANOI, and the Bohemians being gone towards Moravia; Count BVCQVOY, embracing this occasion, followed the Hungarians towards Presbourg: Where having taken some places which had revolted from the Emperour, he slew one thousand five hundred Hungarians. And the Emperour, hearing there was some small difference betwixt the Hungarians & Bohemians, sent his Commissioners to the Hungarians to perswade them to obedience, and to dissuade them from entering into League with the Bohemians. During these several actions in feuerall places, the provinciall States of Moravia met at Olmu; whereas they seized vpon all the goods of the Clergy, amounting to many millions, and put all the plate which was in the Romane Catholike Temples into coyne; where with they payed their souldiers. And the States of Lusatia were also assembled to provide for the necessity of the prouince: who with the protestants of Austria (hearing that there were 12000 souldiers come out of Italy to Passau for the Emperour) drew all their forces towards those frontiers for their defence.

The King of Poland, meaning to assist the Emperour conditionally, made a declaration; That for as much as the troubles of Bohemia concerned Religion, and that the Bohemians with their confederats, had expelled a Bishoppe out of Silesia, and burthened the Clergy contrary to their priuiledges, liberties, and immunities; he was therefore resolved to assist the Emperour with thirty thousand Souldiers. But if the Bohemians and Silesians would restore their Bishop, Clergy; and other Romane Catholiques to their former dignitie, and maintaine them in their priuiledges, and withall reuerse what they had done against the house of Austria; he was then resolved not to meddle any more in those quarrels; yet, notwithstanding, he kept his forces ready, attending a finall resolution of the Bohemians.

In the beginning of November, certain troupes of the Earle of BVCQVOY; meaning to surpris Odenbourg, BETHLIN GABOR posted thither, and entered the Town, and mand it with two thousand Hungarians. That moneth, JOHN CHARLES the Emperours eldest sonne died at Gretz; and within few daies after, JOHN STOISMYNT Marquesse of Brandenbourg left this life. On the one and twentieth of this moneth, all the images in the Church of the Castle of Prague, were demolished by the kings commandement; and on Christmaffe day, the kings Preacher made a Sermon, prouing by the sacred Scriptures, That images were not to be allowed in Temples: After which, the King, with his brother, and the whole Court, receiued the Communion.

On the seven and twentieth of Nouember, the Lady ELIZABETH, Queene of Bohemia, was deliuered of a sonne, to the great ioy of his maiesty, and the whole court. The chiefe officers of the Crowne of Bohemia came vnto the King to congratulate the birth of his new heire, all the Bells rung, and the ordinance of the towne often discharged. This yeare in December the Earle of Fussenberg Ambassadour from the Emperour arrived at Paris, where he was receiued with great state, defrayed at the Kings charge and serued by his officers. The subject of his Dinner taken by the Protestants.

Piffek taken by G. Mandsfield.

Assembly of the States of Moravia & Lusatia.

The Poland promises to aid the Emperour conditionally.

The Queen of Bohemia delivered of a son.

1620

The Emperours Ambassadour comes to Paris.

his Ambassage was, To demand aid and assistance from the King against the Elector Palatine, who had invaded his Realm of Bohemia; from the which the Duke of Bouillon by his Letters did seek to dissuade the King; shewing, that those troubles grew not from any question of religion, but from matter of State; hoping withall, that his Maiesty would not fauour and assist the house of Austria against a Prince of the Electorall house of the Palatine, alwaies allied vnto his Crown and house, by whom the Kings his Predecessors, and especially his father of happy memory, had been assisted in the defense of his house and person, and of his lawfull succession. The King desired to let the Emperour and German Princes knowe, that if he intermeddled in their quarrels, it should be onely (after the manner of his Predecessors) in sending an honourable Embassie; which, visiting the Emperour, and the Princes and States of the Empire of both the Vnions, should labour to reconcile the troubles of Bohemia, and the combutions which began to growe in Germany among the Princes.

The Emperour had great succors promised him by the King of Spain: and the Pope commanded a great contribution to be made by the Clergy throughout all Italy, Spain, Brabant, Flanders, and other Prouinces, for the payment of the Emperours Army. And in the mean time the Elector of Saxony (lest he should seem to be too secure) took order for the leuying of certain troops of horse and foot, and the prouiding of sufficient Commanders. Count BVCQVOY, making an expedition towards the vpper Austria, took the Town of Lipsa, being without a garrison.

Before his coming, STARZENBERG, chief Gouernor of that Prouince, having left the siege of the Monastery of Melcha, marched towards the Frontier with his Army, to attend Count BVCQVOY. The peasants in the mean time, coming from the vpper part, moved with the zeal of religion, slue and put to flight all the Italians which remained of BALTHAZAR's forces. The lower Austria was much afflicted with hunger and other miseries. The States of vpper Austria were prest daily to come to Vienna to take the oath, the Emperour offering them vituals and a safe conduct: but they protracted the time from day to day. In the mean time, the Hungarians, with the Bohemians and incorporated Prouinces, being assembled at Presbourg; they concluded a perpetuall league vpon certain Articles; which I am forced to omit to avoid tediousness.

A league concluded betwixt Hungarians and Bohemians.

The Arch-duke LEOPOLD went from Vienna into Alsatia, where he leuiued many troops of horse and foot for the Duke of Banaria; and, there coming into those parts five hundred Venetians which desired passage, they were denied it, and sent to the Duke of Banaria to serue in his Army. There were also great forces leuiued for the Emperour and Duke of Banaria in the Bishoprick of Cullen and the Territories adjacent. To prevent these leuiues, the States of the vnted Prouinces wrote to the Electors of Cullen and Treues, exhorting them not to suffer any thing to be attempted against their confederates, especially against the Elector Palatine and his Territories, vnlesse they would haue the like done in their jurisdiction. Part of these forces when they could not get passage through Halsia and the County of Nassau, they entred into Brabant; where they were forced to stay some weeks, being hindred by the Princes of the Vnion: and in the end they they were constrained to repasse the river of Rhine, and to return the same way they came. The Duke of Banaria, being aduertised hereof, he sent to the Deputies of the vnted Princes and States: where there was a transaction made for the passage of these Troops, the number whereof was certainly knowne; and that the vnted Princes and States should haue also free liberty to passe through Banaria. The conditions were, that they should passe away within three or foure daies; the footmen by the Diocesse of Hamburg, and the horsemen by Wismberg; that the Army should commit no insolencies in the estates of the vnted Princes: that they should march on with speed towards Banaria, and should pay for that which they took in their passage.

After this, there followed a truce betwixt the Emperour and BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transilvania, the which should continue till the Feast of Saint MICHAEL following; that the Realm of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces should be comprehended in that truce if they would; and all troubles ceasing, a treaty should be made for the conclusion of a peace: that, during the truce, all things should remain in the same state they were in, and BETHLIN should hold the Countries, Castles, Forts and Towns which he had subdued, vntill it were otherwise disposed of; that an Assembly should be appointed at Nenheusall by the Emperours consent and authority, and there all grievances repaired, and all diffensions betwixt the Emperour and the States of the Kingdome compounded; that the commerce should be free in all places, and the passages open; that the souldiers of Polonia should forbear to enter into the Realme of Hun-

A truce concluded betwixt the Emperour & Bethlin.

1620

the Arch-duke
Leopold raised his forces in Bohemia.

Hungary; that the truce and league should be inviolably kept and observed, and all acts of hostility cease.

This year in January (for, they begin to account the year from the birth of CHRIST) the States of Austria met again at Horn; where the Emperor sent to press them to take the oath of allegiance: whereto they consented, so as the souldiers might be dismissed, the league betwixt Hungary and Bohemia confirmed, and a firm peace concluded; if not, they were not bound to do any more. About the same time, the Arch-duke Leopold searcht all the store-houses in Misissia, drew out great store of ordinance, and caused many troupes of horse and foot to be leui'd. He gaue commission to raise 1500 horse in Lorraine, and some thousands of foot there, and on the frontiers of France; and appointed money for the payment thereof.

In February, the Emperour held a secret Councell at Vienna, where there assisted the Popes Nuntio, the Embassadors of Spain and Florence, the Earles of Bucquoy and Tampierre, with other Commanders at warre; where they consulted of a new enterprize against Bohemia: For the recovery of which Countrey, the Emperor protested, that he would spend the last drop of his blood, and the rather, for that the Florentine Embassadour had brought eight hundred Souldiers to his Maistie; and moreover, there was promised from Spain, Italy and the Lowe-countries three millions of gold, with the which the Emperor thought to performe great matters. During this consultation, Niclasburg in Moravia was besieged by the Morauians; and in the end the towne was taken; but, the Castle held out, and was battered continually for sixteen daies together. The Cardinall of Dieherichstein, was much perplexed, and grieved, pressing the Emperour to send forces to relieue this towne, for that the Emperour and others had carried much wealth into it, as into a place of safety. Whereupon, the Earles of Bucquoy and Tampierre, resolving to take it from the enemy, cast a long bridge over the river of Dannew; but they were so hindred by great frosts and cold that they were forced to desist from their enterprize.

This month of February, the King of Bohemia went into Moravia, being accompanied by his brother and other Princes: he made his entree into Brin, where he was received with great pompe by the Senate and States, who conducted him to the Iesuites Church: where hauing heard Diuine seruice, he went to the Palace, and their receiued the oath from the States, and confirmed all their priuiledges: after which he took his way towards Silesia. He was scarce gone out of Moravia, but there entered 4000 Cossagues from Dolania: yet they staid not long there, but marche day and night vntill they came into Austria, sending some which knew the Countrey, to discover, breaking all the bridges behind them as they past. In their passage, they spoiled many villages and townes; and among others, Meseritz, where at that time there was celebrated a very solenne marriage: but, they marr'd the feast, and carried away their ornaments; which they sold afterwards at Viena for a little money.

The Horsemen of Moravia, being aduertised hereof somewhat too late, followed them with all speed, and ouertaking them in Austria about midnight, nere vnto the banks of Dannew, they slew 1000 of them, the rest passing over the River vnto Vienna. These Souldiers afterwards committed horrible murders and spoiles in the lower Austria: they wasted fiftie villages belonging to the Protestants, forcing many of the inhabitants to fly into the woods with their wives and Children, where they perished with hunger and cold. It was reported, that 8000 more followed them. Whereupon, the Silesians and Morauians went to Armes, and sent to Bohlin for aide: who gaue notice to the King of Polonia, that if he attempted any thing against him or his confederates, he would cause the Turkes and Tartarians to invade Polonia: and withall he sent word vnto Viena, that vntill they discharged the Cossagues (whom they had drawne in, contrary to the truce) he would presently assist the oppressed with 16000 Hungarians.

At the same time Count Bucquoy (hauing received some losse by the Bohemians at Chiefe) went with 8000 horse and foote to Langaus; where ther were seuen companies of the Earle of Amalsfelds in garrison, he himselfe being gone to Prague. Comming to the towne hee sent some troupes before, and laid the rest in ambush: The garrison slyng forth fell into this ambush, where there was a great fight: but the Bohemian horsemen being disperst, there were 900 footmen slaine, where the Imperials also lost 400 men.

Some write that this enterprize of the Earle of Bucquoy was vpon a quarter of the Bohemians Army, where the Barron of Pettis Marshall of the Army commanded, and who in the charge was slaine and their troupes put to rout: That there were slaine vpon the place 600 horsemen and 300 foote, among which were many Noblemen, Captaines & Commanders, and namely a Duke

Duke of Saxony who serued the Bohemian party. There were almost 300 prisoners taken; most gentlemen and officers, and as they write Bucquoy's losse was very final.

Some few daies after, they charged a troupe of the Earle of Halochs and slew 600. So pursuing their victories, they forced Laam, and slew 200 which were there in garrison. The Earle of Tampierre, hearing of this successe, ioyned his forces with Count Bucquoy; and then they resolved to goe to Prague, commanding the souldiers to make sufficient provision of poulder and victuall for six daies. But the Prince of Anhalt, hauing presently gathered together the Bohemian and Morauian forces at Egenbourg, stoppt all the passages, commanding all the officers and souldiers which were in Prague, to return to the Camp within 24 houres. The Spaniards, which came vnder BALTHAZAR, made an incursion towards Wodiam, and Pragadis, spoiling the countrey with fire and sword. After which they went to besiege Muldau; but, the garrison, not able to keepe it, yielded it vpon composition. Whereupon, there was a new commandement, that euery twentieth man in Bohemia should be alwaies ready in Armes.

FREDERICK K. of Bohemia comming to Preissau, the Princes and Noblemen of Silesia met him with a great traine: entering into the City, there marcht before three Senators, with many citizens, who had presented him with the keys of their City by their aduocate; after whom, followed the Gentlemen of Preissau; then the Bayons, and after them, the Princes of Silesia: After whom came the kings brother, betwixt the Duke of Lignis, and the Marquesse of Jagerndorf. The Marshall of the Realme, carrying a sword, marcht alone: and the King followed him; and after him, the whole Traine. There were 50 shot at the gate: and all the Citizens were in Armes euen to the Kings court. Comming to the market place, there was triumphant Arch, with very rare musick. From whence, the king was conducted to S. ELIZABETH's Church; where he was entertained by the chiefe Pastor, with an Oration in Latin: and hauing heard Diuine seruice he went vnto the Palace; where, on the seauen and twentieth of February, he receiued an oath of the Noblemen; and the day following, foure Chanons, the Abbats and Priors of the monasteries, came to court and took the same oath: after whom, the citizens did the like. All this being happily performed, and certaine Deputies being appointed by the Princes of Silesia to go in Embassage to Constantinople and Poland, in the behalfe of the Realme of Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces; the king hauing viewed the city and the bishopps Palace, and confirmed all their priuiledges, he prepared to goe vnto Lofnitz: but, hearing of Count Bucquoy's attempts, he deserd that Iourney and returned to Prague.

The Bohemians hauing resolved to assemble the States at Prague, by the kings commandement; the Emperour refused to doe the like at Budwitz, to hinder and direct the assembly, meaning to prosecute all the States which should not come to Budwitz with fire and sword, and in like manner to besiege Prague. Bucquoy and Tampierre marched forward with their Army meaning to seize vpon Horne, and the Castle of Echenberg, places neere adioyning; but being ready to assault the castle, the States of that prouince thinking it would be very preiudiciall vnto them, entreated the Prince of Anhalt (Generall for the king of Bohemia) to releue the said Castle: who although he were inferior in number to the Imperials, yet knowing how much it did import, hee resolved to stop Bucquoy's passage towards Budwitz: to which end he marched forward with his Army being fortified with certaine troupes which came vnto him, so as he was esteemed to haue 12000 men. The 10 of March the Armies met and ioyned battaile. Bucquoy thought to terrifie the Bohemians with a stratagem, causing the bodies of trees to be laid vpon carriages, as if he had had many Cannons; which at the first sight amased the horsemen: but hauing discovered his sleight by their neerer approach, they charged valiantly. The Prince of Anhalt vsed another policie, causing his Artillery to be charged with small shot behind his horsemen; who were commanded after they had set vpon the enemy, to open their ranks in the middelt: which being speedily executed according to direction, all their ordinance was discharged together, which made a great spoile vpon the enemies horsemen, and forced their Army to retire into a wood. Whereupon the P. of Anhalt, finding his aduantage, planted his ordinance vpon certaine hils, which did so annoy the enemy as he forced them to leaue the wood, and at their coming out pursued them so hotly, as they were forced to fly to Crembs a Towne 15 English miles from thence: the pursuit continued diuers daies. By report of prisoners they lost about 2600 men most Polonians and Cossacks, with their munition, baggage, bullets for Cannon and many horses. The Sergeant Maior of the Army was slaine, with the Generall of the Cossagues with his Lieutenant, and diuers other Captaines and officers: The Earle of Tampierres horse was slaine vnder him, and hee was relieued by a Cossaque who mounted

The king of Bohemia enters Pratibana.

Count Bucquoy defeated by the Prince of Anhalt.

Niclasburg taken by the Morauians.

mounted him vpon his owne. At his coming to Vienna he made great complaints to the Emperor of Count Bv q v o r; who they write was so much grieved for this losse, that hee would not for three daies together speak with any man. It is thought, the Bohemians lost not about 100 men in that fight, and some hurt.

An Assembly of the States at Prague.

In the mean time, there was an Assembly of the States at Prague; where they consulted of the confirmation of the league with the States of Hungary and the Prince of Transilvania, and to offer it to other Princes and States, for the sending of an Ambassie vnto the Turks Port; and to make a perpetual peace with the Sultan; to provide for the charges and presents of this Ambassie; to provide money for the necessary defense of the frontier Forts in Hungary every year, for the punishing of those traitorous rebels of the Country, which refused to acknowledge the King for their head; for the repelling of the enemies forces, and refusing of Edicts published within the Realm; for the providing of present money (after the example of the united Belgick States) for the payment of souldiers; for the providing of a storehouse with arms, victuals and horses for publike service; for the making of hospitals for sick and wounded souldiers; to make a necessary provision against all vnexpected irruptions, to prohibit the insolency of souldiers, to reform the prouinciall constitutions, to appoint a place for the keeping of the Crown and Regall ornaments, and to assign reuenues for the King, after the presidents of former Kings and Princes.

An edict against the King of Bo-
hemia.

This year in February, the Emperor sent forth an Edict against the election and crowning of the Elector Palatine K. of Bohemia; in the which, after a long deduction of the troubles and tragedies committed in Bohemia, and of the insolency and rebellion (as he terms it) of the Bohemians, both against his Predecessor the Emperor MATHIAS and himself, notwithstanding their fatherly care and affection to the good of their subjects, and their desire to reduce them to their obedience by all milde and friendly courses; which they had obstinately refused, and (contrary to all law and equity) had rejected him for their King, and chosen them another: this their election by his Imperiall and Royall authority he disannulled, and declared void and of no effect; protesting before God and the world, to bend all his thoughts and means to recover the Prouinces vsurped from him by force and rebellion, and to reuenge his Imperiall and Royall Majesty so much wronged in his authority. Lastly, he implored the fauour and aid of all Kings, Princes, and Christian Potentates, to whom the newes of this dangerous example of the rebellion of these traitorous subjects should come. But chiefly he exhorted and required the Electors of the sacred Empire, with the Princes and States thereof (much wronged in this election, made against all iustice) to giue him aid and assistance, promising to requite them with the like fauour and curse, and to imploy his Imperiall authority for the defense of their estates & seignories.

Assembly of the Catholick Electors at Mulhus.

This year, the Electors and Princes of the Empire, adhering to the Emperor, assembled at Mulhus in Thuringia; whither came in person the Electors of Mentz, Cullen and Saxony; and he of Treves sent his Ambassador; the like did the Duke of Banaria, and L. v. r. s. Lantzgraue of Hesse. Being come together, they treated of the means to free the Empire from so many dangers which seemed to threaten her ruine; sending their Letters to all the Princes, States and Imperiall Towns whom they held opposit to the Emperor; namely, to the Elector Palatine (whom they did not stile King of Bohemia in their superscription) to the States of Bohemia and incorporated Prouinces, to the Princes of the Vnion, to the States of Austria, to the Earles of the Cylerania, to them of the country of Suenia, to the whole Nobility of the Rhine, Franconia and Suenia, and to the Imperiall Towns of Nuremberg, Strausbourg, Vlm, Spire and Wormes (all, Estates depending vpon the Empire) and likewise vnto the States of Hungary: All which Letters were dated vpon the eleuenth day of March, and did wholly concerne the great troubles of Bohemia.

To the King of Bohemia.

In their Letters to the Elector Palatine King of Bohemia, they made a relation of his acceptance of that Crown, contrary to their former admonition and expectation; whereby he had approued the Bohemians attempts against the Emperor whom they had wholly reiected. They exhorted him to consider of the great error he had committed, being the first Elector, who had neuer been wronged by the Emperor, but rather honoured; hauing chosen him with the other Electors to treat of the peace of Bohemia: the which charge he had accepted, and often promised to perform; being his duty to aid the Emperor, his fellow Elector, and to endeavour by all means to see peace maintained throughour all the States of the Empire, willing him to consider what prejudice might befall the Roman Empire and the neighbour Kingdomes, especially

cially that of Bohemia, by this reiection and the new Election, which could neuer be approued either by God or men. That his posterity thereby would receive infamy, and his family in general danger. Lastly, they exhorted him, that as a Christian Prince born of German blood, and an Elector, to consider carefully of these things, and not to giue way to these miseries, but rather apply his counsels, that the Bohemians might lay down Armes; that all Leues of Souldiers might cease; That Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, might be restored to the Emperor; That all things might be againe compounded by a friendly Peace, according to the wishes and desires of all good men; and that he, being Elector, would make it appere to the World, that he had more regard to the safety of his Country, then his own particular.

To the States
of Bohemia.

The Electors Letters, to the States of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, were to the same effect; wishing them to giue way to their wholesome admonitions; and not to giue care to those who (rather seeking a remedy for their crimes and offences in confusion) had more respect to their private profit, then to the publike good of their Country: which if they did, it was to be feared that the other States, faithfull to the Empire, by the Emperours commandement, would seeke meanes to reuenge the losse of that kingdom of Bohemia, and free the Empire from danger and ruine.

To the Princes of the Union.

Their Letters to the Princes of the Vnion did import; that They did not beleue that, being Princes, they were pleased with these combustions, hoping they would not doe any thing which might encrease them, or hinder the Emperor from recovering his Realme of Bohemia; being bound, by the constitutions of the Empire, to assist the Emperor as souerain head of the Christian World. That it was a dangerous thing, if they allowed of this reiection, and the new Election which the Bohemians had made; That if they continued these troubles, not only Bohemia would be ruined, but also Hungary lost; and, in the end, Germany it self exposed to the spoile of the Barbarians; at the tyrannous discretion of the Turke. In the end, they entreated them so to employ themselves, both to the Elector Palatine and the States of Bohemia; that the miseries, which threatened these Realmes, Prouintes, and Frontiers of the Empire, might be diuerted; and that the complaint might not passe to their posterity, that they had beene the cause that their country had been shamefully reduced vnder the yoke of the Ottoman seruitude.

The Electors
Answer.

F. B. R. C. K. Elector Palatine, chosen King of Bohemia, made answer to the Electors Letters, whereby he complains that they had not giuen him the Title and qualirie of King; That the Emperor could not be iudge and partie in his owne cause; That they should forbear to counsell him any more to quitte the Realme of Bohemia, and that they should assure themselves he would not forget any thing to preserve the right of his vocation to the said crowne. The States of Bohemia made answer, That by the Letters sent (as well to their King lawfully chosen, crowned, anointed and sworne, as to them and the States of the incorporated Prouinces) appeared how diuersly the Electors and Princes assembled at Mulhus, had thought of the State of Bohemia, after so many publications made by Letters and Apologies, which iustified the equity of their cause; That they had sent threats made to their King, and them contained in the said Letters: But the question being now not only touching the preservation of their Country and Liberty, but also their Religion and Consciences; they would not resolve alone, but as all things had been formerly managed by their common consent with the incorporated Prouinces, so they would attend to send them an ample answer, with their ioynt aduice. What answer the Protestant Princes made vnto their Letter, you shall heare hereafter from the Assembly at Vlm.

The States answer.

After that vnfortunate battaile with the Prince of Anhalt; the Earle of Buquoy, being returned to Cremas, the Coslaques went to their ordinary spoiling in the lower Austria: where, sparing neither Catholiques nor Protestants, they grew so odious to all men, that their owne fellow Souldiers, namely the Wallons, slew some of them, and carried some Captiues to Cremas, for the Sacrileges which they had committed. The Emperor, publishing another Edict, commanded the States of Austria to appeare at Vienna on the 8 of April, there to take the Oath of obedience; saying, that he had now obtained from the Arch-duke A. B. R. T., a full cession of his right; threatening, that he would hold them for treacherous contemners, if they appeared not, and would force them to obedience. The soldiers, which had remained in Peterania; and could get no passage, came into the territory of Treues, being very troublesome to the inhabitants: and, seeking in vain to passe into the territory of Cullen, the Peasants armed withstood them; and though they had set some villages on fire; yet they, neglecting the fire, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight. Many which had got passage, being come to the confines of Banaria, fel-

The Emperor
calls the States of Austria to take the Oath.

1620 to a mutinie, who tearing their colours asunder, went to the Marquess of Onoltzbach camp, and most of the rest returned home.

The Marquess of Durlach commanding the Army for the Princes of the Union, went and planted his Camp betwixt Brylac and Priskow, giving notice to the neighbour States, that he had received commandment not to suffer any souldiers to passe into Asia. There went before in this expedition, three troupes of horse, with four peeces of ordinance, and 100 Caris full of Armes. Then followed foure troupes of Armed men foure companies of foote, with 70 Caris with Armes, and then three troupes of Horse, with 150 waggons loaden with Armes and other warlike instruments, amongst which there were some waggons with six wheeles to turne every way. Soone after, the Arch-duke L. A. R. O. T. O. sent to craue passage for these troupes: to whom the Marquess made answer, that it was not in him to grant, that they must goe to Onoltzbach, and that having obtained leave there he would not oppose.

The Christning of the Kings Sonne of Bohemia, was performed with great solemnity on the last of March. There were present the King himselfe, his brother, two Princes of the house of Saxony, the Prince of Anhalt, the Earle of Hohenlo, with many other Noblemen. There were Deputies sent to be the Godfathers for the Duchie of Silesia for BETHLIN GABOR Prince of Transylvania, for the States of Bohemia, and for the Marquissates of Moravia and Lusatia.

On the thirtieth of Aprill, the Emperour sent out his monitorial Letters to the Elector Palatine, for that the Bohemians had chosen him their king: where after relation of the whole proceeding of these Bohemian troubles, by his absolute power and Imperiall authority he did enioin & expressely command the Elector Palatine, vpon paine of his indignation, and the rigor of iustice, and the lawes and constitutions of the sacred Empire, to lay downe Armes and cease from al Acts of hostility towards his Imperial and Royall Majesty; and by the first of Iune next coming without al delay to relinquish all pretensions and wholly to abandon the said Realme of Bohemia. And if after that time expired, the said Count Palatine should continue obstinate and refractarie, he was then resolved to proceede against him according to the constitutions and ordinances of the Empire. And to the end he should not haue any excuse or pretend any cause of ignorance, he sent vnto him a copie of the said Letters.

There were also three other Monitorial Letters. The first directed to the Protestant Princes and States of the Empire which did adhere to the Bohemian party; containing, that against the Edicts of the deceased Emperour M. T. H. A. S., some Princes and Estates of the Empire fauoured his rebellious subjects of Bohemia, and assisted their new King vnlawfully chosen, with men and money; and contrariwise would not giue passage to such souldiers as he had leuiued for his iust defence, and to recouer his realm: To preuent the which he might iustly in this rebellion execute that which was ordained by the Imperial constitutions: But he preferred his clemency before rigour, admonishing them to abandon this faction, especially of the Elector Palatine their pretended head, and rather strue to maintaine the imperiall authority.

The second Letter, was to all the Colonels, Captains and Officers arwar, following the Bohemian party, enioining them to abandon it, & to return vnto their houses, vpon paine of proscrition and the losse of life and goods. And in the third, he admonished the Imperiall Townes, that hauing bin aduertised that som of them did aid his rebels of Bohemia and the Palatine there head, with men, monie and means, and to that end had leauied contributions vpon the inhabitants of their Towns (a iust subject for the which they had incurred the penalties of the Imperiall constitutions) preferring his clemency before his iustice, he admonished them hereafter to giue no succors nor aide in any sort whatsoever to the said Elector Palatine & Bohemians, vpon paine to incurre the said Imperiall punishments.

To this declaration or monitorial Letter of the Emperour, the Palatine chosen King of Bohemia made an ample answer, containing diuers points, which in breefe are these: That the Emperour hath not any right to the crowne of Bohemia but so farre fourth as it is a fee of the Empire. That the iudges of the Emperours court are no competent iudges in the cause of the Bohemians, neither can they determine of the right of the Princes and States of the Empire. That the Emperour cannot cause his pretensions to the crowne of Bohemia to be decided before his counsellors, but must seeke the iurisdiction of his aduerse partie and there demand iudgement: when as any one commence an action against the Emperour as he is Emperour the action is iudged by the Elector Palatine. The Emperour according to the constitutions of the Empire cannot denounce banishment or proscrition before the parties be first heard. The Elector Palatine as King of Bohemia is not bound to obey the Emperours monitorial Letters.

This

This he thought good to make knowne vnto the world, as he ought, for his necessarie defence: That he hoped that such as should know the vanity of this the Emperours Edict would not undertake the execution thereof; if he commanded any, nor imploy the charge, but rather refuse it; remembering what one owes vnto another being vnjustly oppressed in the Empire: that is, that they should repell all violence from their Provinces, and do their best endeouours to maintaine the Countrey in peace: which he required of all the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire.

On the twentieth eighth of Aprill the States of Banaria hauing ratified the league betwene them and the Hungarians, in the presence of T. V. R. S. Ambassadour to Prince BETHLIN and the States of Hungary; it was propounded in council, that their King hauing a sonne of six yeares of age, he should be declared King of Bohemia, after the decease of his Father; the which would for euer assure the peace, preuent all troubles, and settle the State of Bohemia: The which the Deputies aswell of the States of Bohemia, as of the incorporated provinces thought expedient to be done; whereupon they made a decree which they caused to be proclaimed. Their King was so well pleased with this declaration made in fauour of his Sonne, as feasting the States the next night at supper, hee caused all the Cannon at Prague to be discharged in signe of ioy.

Soone after there happened a strange sedition at Tabor in Bohemia; for many thousands of Peasants being drawne together, demanded either to be discharged from souldiers, or that they should prescribe them lawes whereby they should abstaine from all force and violence to their wiues and children. Commissioners were sent from Prague who reduced them to their duties. They also required to be freed from all impositions, alleging that it was offered them by the Emperour, the which they verified by Letters which they produced: Moreover, that part of the Iesuits goods and others, which had bene wholly confiscated, should be appropriated vnto them. The first point of their demande was granted, and likewise the third: As for the second it was referred to another consultation: By which means they were pacified, & returned to their countrey labours; many of them enuolled themselves and became souldiers. M. A. N. S. F. I. L. D. seeing his troupes encreased by 2000 Hungarians, made a roade towards Budwitz, where he tooke great store of Cattell, and entered into the Abbey of Guldencrone and took the Towne of Thien: the Hungarians, committed great insolencies, and entreated the Monks and Churchmen very roughly.

The warre continuing in the lower Austria, the Earle of Tampierre of the Imperiall party, hearing that 5 companies of Bohemian foote and 2 of horse were lodged in Carlshe, he went from the Imperiall Army with 1000 horse and 1500 shot, making such speede, as entering the Towne by night, he put all to sword which he found in Armes. Some seeking to saue themselves in the Castle, he pursued them so hotly, as the bridge being drawne many casting themselves into the ditch to auoide the sword were drowned. On the other side the Bohemians encountering a great number of Cossagues seeking for spoile after their accustomed manner in Gillelsdorf, they charged them so furiously as there were 200 slaine vpon the place and the booty recovered.

The Wallons and Cossagues of the Emperours partie, running between the frontiets of Hungary and Moravia, surpris'd Marcouzen, belonging to the Baron of Landan, which they wholly spoiled. Soone after on the eighth of Iune, the Baron recovered it againe, and put all the Imperiall Garrison to the sword. In like manner the Morauians being aduertised that in Sonneberg there lodged a Conuoy of many cartes which went vnto the Imperiall Army vnder the escorte of 200 souldiers, who being so neere vnto their Army, thought themselves to be secure, they made such speede as they surpris'd the towne by breake of day, slew all which made resistance and carried the conuoy to the Bohemians Army.

The Inhabitants of the lower Austria, bearing the whole burthen of the warre and sustaining great losses by both parties, made the States of that Countrey to send Deputies to Pienna, to present a Petition vnto the Emperour, shewing their complaints against the ruiues, spoiles, burnings, murders and rapes, committed by the Wallons and Cossagues: and therein they represented the ruine of Stocerau which was wholly inhabited by catholikes, and did belong to his Imperiall Majesty, whereas on the fourth of May after that the Wallons & Cossagues had committed all the villanies that can be spoken, they set fire on the towne and ruined it quite. They knew well his Imperiall Majesty was not the cause of these miseries, but they besought him by the mercy of God and by the wounds of our Saviour I. E. S. V. S. C. H. R. I. S. T., that taking pity of his subjects, he would be pleased hereafter to free them from souldiers, that 1620.

V V V

The State of Bohemia declares the kings son his successor after his death.

A sedition at Tabor pacified.

The Bohemians defeated Carlshe.

The Cossagues defeated.

A Conuoy of the Imperials taken.

Lower Austria complains to the Emp.

The Christning of the Kings son at Prague.

The Emperours monitorial Letters to the King of Bohemia.

To the Colonels and Captains of the Bohemian party.

The Prince Palatines answer to the monitorial Letter.

they might once againe taste of Peace and quietnesse; but the Deputies, which presented this petition, were forced to return without answer, for that they joined in league with the Bohemians, & would not take the oath of allegiance to the Emperor; whereto they had bin oft called.

The Earle of Strum, having leuied 500 horse in the Territories of the vniuersal Prouinces for the Bohemian party, marching through Westphalia, he was set vpon by the Peasants of the country, who defeated part of his Troops: yet he continued on his journey with the rest, and came into Bohemia. Soon after, JOHN BARST of Saxony, Prince of Weimar, hauing also leuied in the same Countiees 200 horse and 2000 foot for the Bohemians, found not any one to oppose his passage, but only the Earle of Buchheim, who (being not able to make head) was forced to let him passe towards Bohemia: where he arriued without any let, and had his Quarter next to Egra; where the Peasants, discontent with such guests, would haue risen.

About the same time, Colonell CRAV, a Scottish Knight, leuied a Regiment of 2200 foot, Voluntaries, English and Scottish, for the King of Bohemia's seruice. They landed at Ham-bourg in a manner all together, of which there were not aboue eight hundred Scots. They marched vnarmed, and, most, without Swords, through the Duke of Lunenburg's Countrey, where they found good visage; then they passed the River of Elbe into the Marquise of Brandenburg's, where they had very kinde entertainment, and so continued their Journey without any crosse (but by their own diuisions) vntill they came into Lusatia, where they receiued their Armes, and so passed into Bohemia.

The French-king being desired (by the Earle of Tussembourg the Emperors Ambassador, as we haue related, in the end of the last yeere) to giue his Maieity aide and assistance, being resolved to procure Peace, and reconcile the troubles in Germany, rather then to adde matter which might entertaine the warre; he made choice of the Duke of Angoulesme, Earle of Emergne, bafe son to CHARLES the 9, to goe into Germany as his extraordinary Ambassadour, accompanied with the Baron of Bezhunes and the Abbat of Prenaux; to goe aswell to the Protestant Princes and States (who are all antient Allies to the Crowne of France) as to the Emperour; to exhort them, first, to take some course that the said Protestant Princes and States, on the one side, and the Catholique Princes and States on the other, might not fall to warre as it was very likely; and that they might only giue succor to the Emperour, or the Bohemians, according to their affections, and that within the Realme of Bohemia and Austria, and not else-where. And, Secondly, to labor for some good reconciliation between the Emperour, and the States of Bohemia, and the Elector Palatine, whom they had chosen for their King.

These Ambassadors, being honorably attended with 400 horse, parted, in May, and arriued at Vime the sixt of Iune, wherethe Protestant Princes of the Vnion were then assembled. The French Ambassadors, comming into the Assembly, and hauing the place of precedence giuen them, the Duke of Angoulesme gaue them to vnderstand, that the king had commanded them to visite all in particular, and to assure them of his loue as his good friends and Allies, and to let them know, That, hearing of the contributions in in Germany, he was desirous (like vnto other kings his predecessors) to be a mediator in their controuersies, and to let them know, as a most iust Prince, that after he had giuen Peace to his owne subiects, he would be most glad if he might procure it to his good friends, neighbours and Allies, whom he coniuied to contribute what was necessary for their parts; considering, that if the Generall suffer by the fury of ciuill warres, whereas Religion and temporall interests haue a share, with greater reason reason priuate men shall be much oppressed: A feare which should touch you neere; seeing, that besides the miseries which are prepared for you by this present danger, the successe is most perillous and without remedy, but by reconciliation; the which vndoubtedly will come out of season if you suffer the Enemy of Christendome to make vfe of your diuisions: It is in you, my Masters, to lay open vnto vs the means of your rest and Peace: the which we will gladly embrace, as well to performe the commandement of the King our Master, as to discharge our Consciences for the generall good of all Christendome, & the particular affection we beare to all your interests.

The Princes hauing giuen thanks to the most Christian King, for his loue and affection towards them for the Peace of Germany; there were many propositions made, touching the grievances which they suffered, and whereof they had often complained to his Imperiall Maieity, and to the Catholique Princes, whereof they gaue instructions to the said Ambassadors, which was the subiect of a second speech, made by the Duke of Angoulesme on this manner: My Masters, It were superfluous to offer any new matter on his Maieities behalfe, seeing that his intentions being to good, and his assurances to certaine, there wants not any thing, but that his good offices might be seconded with a happy encounter, for the good and quiet of all Germany, which must be furthered by the iust and reasonable propositions of the parties interested, and not to stand vpon such things, which only seeme to colour the pretences of warre, and to make it not only more bloody, but also lesse iust in their eyes, which, hauing no passion vnto the businesse but the generall good, might rightly condemne them: That if the King had beleueed, that, from the complaints of the vniued and correspondent Princes and States, these present troubles would haue sprung, he would not haue failed to haue carefully embraced any occasion to haue vied all good offices for remedy thereof, well remembering himselfe of the good affection and seruices which they haue done to his Crowne: Which, the more easie they may beleuee, seeing that (following the glorious actions of his Ancestors) as well in the case of Wesell, as that of Gulich, he had contributed all the power and authority he had; and ioynd it with the king of great Brittain; which had surely brought forth a profitable agreement for both parties, had not both the one and the other seemed vnwilling to make any vfe thereof: a subiect, verily, which might haue occasioned the King to slight the course of their affaires; but that his bounty and goodnesse hath herein surpassed all common sense; for that being yet willing to doe the like through all Christendome, he hath now sent vs to procure the Peace and rest of all these people which are in combustion, and whose ruine is very neere if it be not prevented. That to stand talking of grievances past, will no way provide for the cause present; and yet we will willingly receiue your memorialls, which promise to giue all your assistance therein: which, when the Emperour shall deferre, the businesse will not be decided without an Assembly of both parties, in which, each forming his complaints, it will rather be a renewing of the causes of diuision, then a re-establishment of former order: That herein there is question of a Crowne taken from off the head of a Prince who was in possession thereof; here is the ground of the businesse whereupon dependeth not only the Peace of Germany, but may prouue the opening of a gappe vnto the generall enemy of the Christian Faith: That the leuying of Armes by the neighbour Princes on either part, doe intend the defence of the Palatinate: That verily it would not be iust the Emperour should be Iudge in his owne cause, and invade the Palatinate, and forcibly appropriate it vnto himselfe, without any other subiect then by vertue of the Imperiall Ban, But, in this Action, we must carefully obserue by the progresse of the businesse, who shall be in fault; from whom shall proceede the first offence; and, in a word, bend the eyes of equity and not of passion vpon the first motiue of these calamities. For, although it may be alleaged that the Elector Palatine (without any practice of his) hath been chosen by the States of Bohemia for their King: yet it doth not follow, that, in receiuing it, the Emperour hath not a iust cause to seeke a remedy for this mischiefe which so neerely toucheth him, transferring it vpon him from whom he receiued it; seeing it depended vpon the free will of the Elector Palatine, to refuse or accept the Crowne as others had done: yea, BATHEN GABOR Prince of Transiluania, shewed himselfe more staid; seeing, that refusing the Title of King, he only admitted of that of Prince; lesse significant, but as powerfull: That for these reasons wee neede not doubt that the Emperour and all his house will sooner lose all they haue, then leaue things at this lay: That the enemies of your Peace and quiet will be very glad that the troubles of Bohemia happen to hazard that Crowne, whereby they may haue meanes to invade that, which is next at hand and most commodious: That the forraigne forces, whereof you make reckoning, some of them are without vigour, and the other without power; seeing that opposition in Arms will impeach the one, and the other will want meanes to entertaine those which they haue leuied: That the zeale alone which we beare to their good, according to our Kings commandement, hath giuen vs this freedome of speech, which we pray you to accept as from your most affectionate friends and well wishers, as we haue fauourably receiued what was presented vnto vs by the Elector PALATIN's Deputie: vnto whom if our Presence might be ought amicable, and the causes why we doe not visit him were removed; we should be verie glad to assure him by word of mouth, of the King his good intention, and of the good affection which in particular we all should haue, to do him seruice, as we will make knowne when occasion shall serue; assuring you that we will be euerrude to be of the like mind towards you all.

The Duke of Bavaria, Generall of the vniued Catholikes in Germany, hauing sent his Ambassador to Vime, they began to treat of the means how to maintaine the peace in the Empire, and that the Armes leuied by the Catholikes vniued and the Protestant Princes (whereof the Marquise of Anspach was Generall) should not encounter: In the end by the mediation of the French Ambassadors, after a months consultation, an accord was made, as you shall heare hereafter.

Vuu 3

There

Ambassadors sent from the French King into Germany.

Assembly of the Protestant princes at Vime.

Their answer.

The Duke of Bavaria Genrall for the Catholiques, sends to the Assembly at Vime.

The Marquess of Durlach in Armes to stop the Catholics,

the Protestants
answers.

There had been leuied manie troupes of Horfe and Foote by the Catholike Vnion, and the commandement of the Arch-duke LEOPOLD Bishop of Sirasbourg and Passau, to the number of six or seuen thousand Foote, and one thousand five hundred horfe, in the Countreys of Trenes, Mauis, Luxembourg, Alsacia, Lorain, and euen in Flanders: But, GEORGE FRANK OF Brandenbourg, Marquess of Durlach (whose lands ly neere vnto Sirasbourg) as Lieutenant to the Princes of the vnion, prepared himselfe to oppose their passage which they would make at Brissach, betwixt Basile and Sirasbourg; and, having gathered some forces together, he went and encamped on the other side of the Rhine. The Arch-duke LEOPOLD, aduertised of this contradiction, sent him many Letters, but had no other answer, but that he must obtaine a passage from the Marquess of Ansbach, Generall for their Vnion, which obtained, he would not hinder them: So as the Arch-duke was forced to send vnto the Marquess; who, with the other Germane Princes (who are very warie in their resolutions) seeing that the Emperour had written vnto them, that all the souldiers should passe without doing any wrong vnto their Territories; they gaue charge vnto the Marquess of Durlach, to suffer them to passe, according to the constitutions of the Empire; whereupon the passage was open for their troupes, being seuen or eight thousand men, who marched speedily towards Bavaria.

At the same time the Princes of the Vnion, assembled at Vime, made answer to the Letters sent from the Electors and Princes assembled at Mulhaus, to this effect: That the troubles and dissensions happened in Bohemia, and which had spread farther, had amazed them, for the danger which might befall the whole Empire; wishing they had not happened or were pacified; That they had fore-seene these inconveniences when the Bohemians were reiected at the Election of the Emperour, and were not suffered to enter into Frankfort: Which, being done contrary to the law of Nations, had incensed them, and given them occasion to choose another King; That, matters being as they were, there was no remedy: they were grieved, and left the euent to God, who would call them to an account that were the cause of so many miseries; That it was a fearefull thing (as euery man might conceiue) when as in matters which concern Conscience they found no ease, and yet they would haue been glad they had applied milder remedies, to this euill, then that of Warre, being willing to haue employed themselves therein, if they had thought their labours would haue been taken in good part. To Iudge whether the reiecton or election of a new King had been done according to the laws of the Countrey, they could not doe it, being a point of too high a strain; neither would they, by their censure, preiudice the whole Romane Empire, leauing that businesse: yet, notwithstanding, they would preserve the authority of the Emperour, wherein their Vnion might assist him; That it had been more expedient for the Empire, if the Electors and Princes had suppressed all complaints, settled a generall peace, and reconciled the troubles of Bohemia; That they were doubtfull whether the threats, published against them, might bring any remedy; Finally, they did not see what might be desired more of them which directed all their actions to the glory of God, to the preservation of the Empire, and that Iustice and concord might be maintained throughout all Germany.

The Duke of Bavaria, hauing drawne his Army together, being twenty five thousand Foot and Horfe, passed the River of Dannew at Odenauer. The Marquess of Ansbach, Generall for the Vnion, hauing thirteene thousand Horfe and Foote, marched towards them, being fortified by some other troupes from Virtemberg and Vims: The two Armies came so neere together that they might talke one to another: In the meane time, this accord was made at Vime, by the mediation of the Ambassadors of France,

We, MAXIMILIAN Duke of Bavaria, Count Palatine of the Rhine; and We, IOACHIM EARNEST, Marquess of Ansbach and Brandenbourg, make knowne to all men, that considering the disorders, miseries and calamities which are crept into the Roman Empire and neighbour Nations by means of combustions and wars, threatening a total ruine and desolation; by means whereof, not onely the Electors, Princes, and Catholick States vnited, but also the Protestants haue taken occasion to make Leuies and prepare to warre: the which hath bred a bad intelligence betwixt them, mixt with iealousie and distrust; with this perswasion, that this raising of Forces by the Vnions, is to molest one another, and so to disturb the common peace of the Empire, and to bring it to the extremities of warre: To prevent the which, and to take away all occasions of bad intelligence, iealousie and distrust, by the mediation of the Ambassadors of the French King, they concluded these Articles following:

First, We promise for our selues in particular, and for all the Electors, Princes and States associated sociated of both the Vnions, that not any of them (vpon any cause or pretext whatsoever) shall assay or molest by way of hostility, force and arms, the persons and territories of the other party, nor inuolute any thing concerning religion and the publike peace.

Secondly, it was agreed, that if any one vpon vrgent necessity should require free passage (giuing good and sufficient caution, according to the constitutions of the Empire) for the defense of his person and subiects, it should not be denied, provided the demand were made in time and place, and not suddenly when they are vpon the Frontiers, or entred into another mans Countrey; which would be an oppression to their subiects.

Thirdly, the Duke of Bavaria and the Catholick States vnited did exclude out of this Treaty the Kingdom of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, and did onely comprehend the principalities, lands; countries and seigniories belonging to the Electors, Princes, and States of both Vnions; yea, the Palatinate and other lands adiacent and annexed by successiue right, in regard of the good intelligence and correspondency which was between the said Palatinate and the other principalities (the continuance whereof is in a manner assured): and the said Treaty shall not extend further, or haue any other interpretation.

And We, IOACHIM EARNEST Marquess of Ansbach, with the Electors, Princes and States vnited, refferre our selues wholly to the declaration which the Electors, Princes, and Catholick States haue made, as also to the exception of the Realm of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, not meaning to comprehend them in this Treaty, leauing those affairs to their ordinary course.

Fourthly, it is agreed, that in regard of the shortnes of time, and the absence of the greatest and foundest part of the States of the Empire, both Catholiques and Protestants, they shall deferre the restitution and compensation of losses and oppressions hapned by reason of Leuies of souldiers, to a more conuenient time.

After this accord, the French Ambassadors with their whole train embarked vpon the Dannew the six of Iuly, and arrived at Vienna the twentieth; where they found a hundred caroches attending them, euery one hauing six horses, which conducted them to their lodgings. As for their audience with the Emperour, their stay at Vienna, their mediation to accommodate the affairs of Hungary with BETHLIN GABOR, it belongs to the following History.

In the beginning of Iune and during the assembly at Vime formerly spoken of, diuers reports went throughout all Germany of the preparation of 2 royall Armies to be leuied in Flanders: the one vnder the leading of Marquess SPINOLA consisting of 30000 men for the conquest of the Palatinate; the other of 12000 foote and 3000 horfe vnder the conduct of Don LOUIS DE VALESIO to oppose the Prince of Orange and the States of Holland, in case they should undertake any thing in SPINOLA'S absence vpon those places which the Spaniard holds in Cleueland or vpon the Archbishoprick of Cullen.

Vpon report of the diligence which SPINOLA made to compose his Army for to goe into the Palatinate, the two Armies wee formerly said were encamped neere vnto one another vpon the other side of the Dannew, to wit, that of the Duke of Bavaria which was of 25000 at Vending; and the other of the Correspondent Princes led by the Marquess of Ansbach consisting of 15000 at Langenau neere Vime, raised their Camps: and turning taile one vpon another, the Duke of Bavaria marched along the Dannew into Austria: and the Marquess of Ansbach aduanced to get the Rhine, to the end he might come into the Palatinate to defend it if it were inuaded. What followed you shall here hear after.

The Emperour hauing receiued great forces both of horfe and foote which had been leuied in Croatia, Syria and Carinhia, with those which were sent him from Italy; and the Duke of Bavaria approaching the frontiers of vpper Austria, desiring (before he would vse extremities against the Protestants of Austria) to know whether they would persist in their rebellion, he sent them his monitoriall Letters, importing, That the Protestants of the lower Austria hauing confirmed the League with the Bohemians (which was contrarie to all diuine and humane lawes and the constitutions of the Empire) against him and the Princes of his howse, there was no reason he should make any fauourable answer, to their petitions, if they did not first desert from the said league with the Bohemians, and acknowledge it by some loyall action. Wherefore his Imperiall Maiesty desired that without any further delay, the Catholick States should come to Vienna, and the Protestants send their Deputies, to witness vnto him by a publike Act that they renounced the confederation and League of the Bohemians: This done, he would answer their petition to their contentment.

Souldiers come to the Emperours seruice into Austria.

1620 Protestants
the lower Austria
the concession of the Bohemians.

Then the lower Austrians seeing no colour of vying any more delays, perceiving the forces of the Emperour ready to execute his will vpon them, both the one and the other sent their Deputies to Vienna. The Protestants presented vnto his Imperiall Maieity, their Act of renunciation of association with the Bohemians, and besought him to giue them equality with the Catholics and free exercise of religion throughout all Austria.

Upon this supplication they had answer, that they ought not to doubt, but that his Imperiall Maieity would be a father vnto his faithfull and loyall States, and that he would spend his life to preserve and maintaine them in peace one with another; And as for what concerned the free exercise of the confession of Ambourg in Austria, he gaue them his word it should be observed as it had been in the time of the deceased Emperour MATTHIAS his predecessor.

Having received this answer, the States of the lower Austria, both Catholics and Protestants which were at Vienna, staied there to take the hereditary oath vnto the Emperour as Archduke of Austria. As for the vpper Austria, the Protestant States were assembled at Linz to oppose themselves against the Duke of Bavaria: who before he would undertake anything against them, sent a Commissary to let them vnderstand that hee was advanced with his Army by the Emperours commandment to reduce them to their obedience, requiring them to renounce the League they had made with the Bohemians, and to take the hereditary oath of allegiance, giuing them only five daies to resolve. In the meane time he sent HASLUND the chiefe Captaine of his guards with 1500 horse and a regiment of foote into the vpper Austria: where hauing defeated 300 souldiers and many Peasants neer to the castle of Hagen, he burnt the village where they were fortified: the Castle yeelded by composition.

The Castle of Starnberg was also summoned, and the Captain threatned to be hanged if hee yeelded not presently: wherewith being terrified, he gaue vp the place; and so did many other Castles and Churches whither the Protestants had retired themselves.

At the same time, ERNEST LEVVS Duke of Saxony, of the house of Lauenburg, going down the Dannew by boat, hauing landed at Aschar foure miles from Linz, and telling certain peasants that they should shortly haue other guests, they fell violently vpon him, and murdered him.

The Protestant States of the vpper Austria, assembled at Linz, sent to Count MANSFELD Marshall of the Bohemian Army, to intreat him to come thither in respect of the danger they feared, in regard the Duke of Bavaria was so neer them with his Army. To whom he made answer, that being so weak of men, he could not aid them; but that daily he expected greater forces, and then he would most willingly come vnto them: whereof he aduertised the King of Bohemia, giuing him aduice what was to be done for the fortifying of the Country; but his aduice was not followed, there being enuy and ialousies between the Commanders of the Bohemian Army. In the meane time, the Austrians fearing no hope of relief, and that their ruine was apparant if they made any shew of resistance against the Duke of Bavaria's great forces, that they had no expert Commanders, and that their confederates of Bohemia would not bee able to releue them; they sent their Deputies to the Duke of Bavaria to craue pardon, and to intercede for them to the Emperour, that they might be intreated liketo those of the lower Austria, and that they would renounce their confederation with the Bohemians. Answer was made them, that they should return to Linz, abandon the Castle, dismishe their souldiers, and that euerie man should retire to his house.

They of Linz hecrupon hauing taken vp the chains which crosse the riuer of Dannew, they not onely opened the passage, but exhorted all the people not to resist the Duke of Bavaria, lest they should cast oil into the fire. Thus, the Duke of Bavaria, hauing taken the chiefe Forts and Towns which the Protestants held, seized vpon all the passages, and defeated about eight hundred men which would haue ioyned with the States troups: he entred Linz with his Army the fourth of August, where the States excused themselves aswell as they could, promised to yeeld obedience, and took the oath of allegiance.

Meane while, the Bohemian Army lay at Thym, where they framed their camp and spent all the month of August vnprofitable: during which staie the souldiers grew discontented for their pay, and Count MANSFELD much more, both for the vaine promises he had receiued from the directors and officers at Prague, whereby he had beene disappointed of meanes to effect his designs, and disabled to doe any seruice for the crowne of Bohemia in time to come, as also for an affront he had receiued in Austria, which was after this manner: The Barron of Felz Marshall of the Army hauing beene slaine (as you haue formerly heard) Count MANS-

FIELD

1620

FELD, General of the Artillery, pretended the place due to him by the order of war: whereupon, he wrote to his Maieity, to the Officers, and to the Prince of Anhalt Lord General for the same; the which was granted him, and he executed the place of Marshall of the Camp at Egenbourg, during the space of two or three weeks, without any contradiction.

Soon after, the General, coming one day to visit him, could him, that in truth he had been made Marshall of the Bohemian Army; but as touching the office of Marshall of the royall army, it was refused for the Earl of Hohenlo or Hollock: whereupon, complaining of that wrong, he grew so discontent, that he desired the Prince to giue him leave to depart, and to withdraw himself elsewhere; the which he could not then obtain. Shortly after, the Prince of Anhalt came again to visit him, perswading him to rest satisfied with that office limited as aforesaid, and to suffer Count HONNLO to execute the charge of Marshall of the Army Royall: the which he wholly refused; saying, that if hee were but Marshall of the Bohemian Army, hee would go thither, and obey Count HONNLO as Lieutenant General: and for that there were many braue Commanders in the Army, there was no great need of him; beseeching thus the Prince again to doo him the fauour as to giue him leave to depart: which he did. Count MANSFELD, being much altered with these discontents, and still oppressed with enuy, resolved to retire himself. To this end he wrote to the King and the States; who made him a gracious answer, perswading him to continue their friend, and not to abandon them in so dangerous a time: yet after much importunity, and many messages sent by him, in the end they decreed, that he should presently receiue two months pay for his souldiers, who should be intreated like to those of the Royall Army; that he should execute his office of Lord Marshall as the Baron of Felz had done, and not attend the command of any other than the Lord General: whereupon he resolved to continue in his Maieities seruice till the end of October. So matters rested yet his malicious enemies laid a foule aspersiion vpon him, that hee meant to turn his coat and serue the Emperour; the which was generally bruited, and supported in Court: but the King would neuer harbour it in his thought, but still perswaded the Lord Marshall not to respect such malicious reports, assuring him of his royall fauour. I haue been bould to make this little digression, to shew what ielousie and diuision was among the Commanders of the Bohemian Army; which no doubt was very preiudiciall to the Kings affairs and to the State.

We haue formerly made mention, that at the truce made between the Emperour and Prince BATHLIN, it was concluded, that an Assembly of the States of Hungary should bee held at Nebenhsal, to treat of the means how to reconcile the dissensions betwixt his Imperiall Maieity and the States. It began in July; whereas Prince BATHLIN propounded the Articles following: that HE BATHLIN GABOR, Prince of Hungary and Transilvania, desired nothing more than to settle a peace in the troubled estate of Hungary, and the liberty of religion: and to shew that he desired nothing but peace, he had refused the Crown which had been presented to him; that the ground of a peace was to ratifie the league with the Bohemians; that the truce made with the Emperour, and that which should be treated of in that present Assembly, might help much to a peace; that during the truce he had iustly assisted the confederates, seeing that the Emperour had refused them a truce at their request. As for the resolutions they were to take with the Emperours Ambassadors, he desired the States to aduise speedily; that he had alwaies desired peace, but sincere and without fraud; that to obtain it, he was com to assist his confederates miserably oppressed and afflicted; that the Emperour desired not peace but warre, the which appeared by many signes; yea, for that his souldiers the Cossagues had entred into Hungary, and ruined diuers places with fire and sword:

That the Emperour hauing stopped and denied all passage to the Deputies of Bohemia and Austria, they ought not to treat of any peace with him, but of warre; that they should aduise by what means they might conveniently begin it and continue it; how to finde money, which is the sinewes of warre, to repair the Frontiers, and furnish them with things necessary; to send Ambassadors to the Turk, lest that the States being employed elsewhere, they might receiue some losse and preiudice that way; that it being lawful for the States according to the lawes to punish their bad affected Country-men who had done great harm to the confederates, they should do iustice.

The Emperour sent Ambassadors to this Assembly. They demanded to haue the league, made between the Bohemians and their new chosen King with the States of Hungary and the Prince BATHLIN, broken: but it was in vain. The Ambassadors of France which were at Vienna, sent also Letters to this Assembly, making offer of their endeavour to reconcile the differences between

A general Assembly of the States of Hungary.

Propositions made to the States of Hungary by Bath-Gabor.

Submission of the Protestants
of the vpper Austria assembled at Linz.

Linz yeelded to the Duke of Bavaria.

Discontentment of Count Mansfield & his troups.

1620
The assembly refuses to be given warre against the emp.

between the Emperor and them, But Prince BATHLIN made answer, that there was no appearance of speaking of peace, seeing that his Imperial Majesty having so great forces on foote, would employ them whilst they entertained them with an accord. It was therefore concluded in this assembly, at the request of the Ambassadors of Bohemia, that they should send 1000 Hungarians to succour the Bohemians against so many Armies as were falling upon their Country, the which was speedily put in execution: That there should be no continuance of Truce with the Emperour; the which being ended, they should beginne warre in Austria against the Imperials, to duert the Army marching into Bohemia; and that BATHLIN changing the name of Prince of Hungary which he had assumed in the beginning, should take that of King and be crowned at Presbourg in October. It is written, that the Turkes Ambassadors assured the assembly that the Sultan would give consent to this coronation; but the chiefe Noblemen of Hungary Catholikes opposed themselves, and continued constant to the Emperour.

The Bohemians, seeing Austria wholly reduced vnder the Emperours obedience, thought that the Duke of Bavaria and the Earle of Buquoy joining their forces, and making an Armie of 50000 men, would enter into Bohemia: They sawe that the succours which they expected arced from the united Princes of Germany, would be duerted to defend the Palatinate against Spinola's Army: that all their Forces were but 20000 men (besides 10000 Hungarians which came to their aide) commanded by CHRISTIAN, Prince of Anhalt, Generall of their Armie, in the which there were many Noble-men, but few good Commanders. Yet notwithstanding they were of opinion that with these forces they should be able to hinder the Imperiall Armie from performing any great matter, if they did furnish their Frontire Townes with men, monie and munition, to staie them at some Seege, which is commonly the ruine of great Armies: whereupon they commanded Count MANSFELD to march with all his Forces to assure the Frontiers of Bohemia against the Duke of Bavaria, assuring him that all the Countrie was in Armes, and that great numbers of horse and foote were commanded to ioine with him, neere to GLAS and TANX; but marching thither with his Troupes, he found not anie; and complaining vnto the Officers, they made an excuse that they had been countermanded and imployed in other places against DON BALTHAZAR's forces. MANSFELD being disappointed of succours & followed close by the enemy, fearing they should take the way of Pilsen before him, he resolved to retire thither, which he did in the end of September. He found the Towne full of wants, the fortifications little advanced, few labourers, and no money to supplie all; wherewith he presently acquainted the officers & with the danger if they were not speedily supplied; he requested them to send him some munition, whereby he might be enabled to hold out a siege, and money to satisfie the officer and souldier, who being already discontented, it was to be feared they might fall into a mutinie, to the great prejudice of the place and cause. To these Letters he had a faire answer, but no effects. In the meane time Count MANSFELD fortified the Towne all he could, drawing in what provision he might. The enemy was not idle but grew daily stronger, taking Podnari, Prachadus, Winterberg, and Pilsch with great effusion of blood: after which, Scottenhofen, TANX, and GLAS yielded by composition.

The Elector of Saxony, who made great preparation to Armes, did much perplex the Bohemians; for being assailed by him upon the North side, when as the Imperials should enter upon the South, they should then be shut vp betwixt them. Whereupon they presently sent Ambassadors to the said Elector, with particular instructions, to induce the Estates of his Countrie to duert him from attempting anie thing in fauour of the Emperour, from whom he had received Letters for the execution of the proscription against them, giving him authority to doe what he should thinke fit; to take Townes, punish rebels, and pardon those which should returne to their duties and take the oath due to his Majesty, and not to forget any thing for the recovery of the Realme, and settling all in peace. The Ambassadors of Bohemia being at Dresda with the Elector, they entreated his highnes to give their King and the States of Bohemia that contentment as to declare vnto them his intention, touching the Letters of execution sent vnto him from the Emperour, and whether he desired not to remaine Newer as hee had hitherto done. The Elector made a long repetition vnto them of the progresse of these troubles; concluding in the end, that he had accepted of this commission in regarde of his duty: hoping that it might be executed without force or hostile attempts, if they would shew themselves disposed vnto peace rather then to warre; That his onely aime was to maintaine peace, true religion, the priuiledges of the Realme, and the Imperiall and Royall authority: That if the Protestants amongst them had the like affection, it was the meanes to attaine vnto that end; That the Protestants

The Bohemians
send Ambassadors to the Elector
of Saxony.

The Duke of Saxony answers to the Bohemians.

1620

stants of high Austria had lately made proof thereof; who, accepting of the Emperours pardon, had by the same means obtained the exercise of true religion, with all their priuiledges and immunities, and freed themselves from a thousand miseries which follow warre. But if they did persist in their resolution, and continued the war (which he could not hinder) yet they should alwaies remember his faithfull aduice: and if affairs succeeded otherwise than they expected, he was to be excused, having shewed himself as well affected to their good as to that of his own subiects.

Marquesse SPINOLA having leuied a goodly Army in the Arch-dukes Territories vnder the Emperours commission, but with the King of Spain's mony, it bred a ieaousie in all the Princes of Germany, that it was to inuade the palatinate, & such princes as did assist him. The K. of great Brittaine, although he would not meddle with the affairs of Bohemia yet alwaies careful to preserve his daughters dowry in the Palatinate, and the inheritance of her children who had neuer offended, sent an Ambassador expressly to the Arch-duke being at Brussels, to bee informed of the subiect of this great preparation: to whom answer was made, that these forces were leuied in the name of the King of Spain, and that he might learn the cause from Marquesse SPINOLA, who, being demanded, made answer, that in the Letter which he had received from Spain, hee had found the Commission, but might not open it till he came to the place of Arms; wherfore if it pleased him to be there, he would impart it to him.

In the meane time, on the eighth of August, he took his leaue of the Arch-dukes, and on the seauenteenth came to Aix la Chapelle, where he attended his munition and carriages coming from Antwerp, consisting of 350 wagons loaden with powder, bullets, boats to make bridges, and all other munition of warre. He had forty cannons that came from Macklin, all with the Emperours Arms prepared for this Army; ouens of brasce, and milles vpon wagons sufficient to make bread for 20000 men in foure and twenty houres. All things being ready, he parted from Aix the one and twentieth of August towards Confluence; where he mustered his whole Army, being six and twenty thousand foot and foure thousand horse. Then hee opened his Commission, wherewith he acquainted the English Ambassador; which contained a declaration to make warre against all those which should be confederate and allied to the Bohemians, rebels to his Imperiall Majesty. Having giuen his souldiers two months pay, hee past the Rhine vpon a bridge of boats at Saint Sebastians: the which being presently taken vp again, coming to the head of the Army, he made an Oration to the Captains and souldiers, exhorting them to carry themselves valiantly; this warre being for the defense of the Catholique faith and house of Austria: whereupon, they all cried out, God saue the house of Austria, and discharged their muskets.

From Saint Sebastians, neere to Confluence, he wrote particular Letters to MAYRICH Lantzgrau of Hesse, and to some other Princes of the Vnion, aduertising them of his going into the Palatinate, and that they should assist the Emperour in his iust cause, or remaine Neuters: In doing so, they nor their subiects should receiue any harme from his Armie: After which, hee marched towards Frankfort. The Princes of the Vnion (who attended him in the Palatinate vpon this side the Rhine, with an Army of twenty two thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse) hearing that he had passed the Rhine at Confluence, thought that he had a designe vpon Frankfort and the Palatinate beyond the Rhine; which made them to turne the head of their Army in all haste to passe the river of Rhine, vpon a bridge of boats at Oppenheim; which Towne SPINOLA took loone after (the Princes being marched towards Wormes, fearing it should be besieged) being yielded by 800 men there ingarrison, who departed without Arms. There was found store of Munition, Wine, Graine, and other commodities, sufficient for the Army for half a yeere; with much moueables, Tents, Pauillions, and other Implements. This Towne of Oppenheim, is a very easie passage vpon the River of Rhine, for entraunce into the vpper Palatinate.

Whilst that SPINOLA busied himselfe to fortifie Oppenheim, he sent forth his Commanders with Troupes, like Harbengers with Chalke in their hands, to marke out his lodgings, as if he had feared no Enemy. DON CARLO de Colonia, Gouvernour of Mastrie, and now Ambassador in England, went to Circuise, which yielded by composition. DON GONZALEZ de Cordus, seized vpon Canb, Bacrae, and the Castle of Pelst; and towards the River of Mozelle, DON IANES MESSIA, also, with his Regiment of Spaniards, tooke Turbach and other places of importance: In these places, so taken, they put in Garrison some six thousand men: which the Arch-duke ALBERT vnderstanding, and desiring that thereby the Army might not be diminished,

Marquesse Spinola
marcels towards the palatinate.

his commission.

He writes to some Princes of the Vnion.

He takes towns in the palatinate

1620 nished, he sent a supply of 6000 vnder the leading of Mounſieur de la Motte Gouverneur of Maſſie.

ſir Horatio Vere ſent to the Palatinate with Engliſh Forces.

Our King's Maieſty, being aſſured that SPINOLA meant to invade the Palatinate, and deſirous to preſerve the inheritance of his grandchildren if it were poſſible, ſuſtained a regiment of 2100 Voluntaryes to be leuiſed vnder the command of that worthy Knight Sir HORATIO VERR their Generall for the Palatinate; being followed by two honourable perſons, the Earls of Oxford and Esſex with priuate commands, and diuerſe gallant Knights and Gentlemen.

Theſe Troops paſt into Holland; where hauing receiued their apparell and Armes, they marched vpon the Rhine till they came right againſt Weſel; whereas the Prince of Orange encamped with his Army, not far from Don Luyſe de Velasco, who lay about Weſel with 12000 foot and 3000 horſe, obſeruing one anothers actions. The Prince, doubting that the paſſage of Lippe would not be very ſafe for thoſe Troops which ſhould go into the Palatinate, cauſed a bridge of boats to be made ouer the Rhine right againſt his Camp; where the Engliſh paſt over with Count HENRY of Naffaw, who (as ſome aſſure) had 1500 horſe and ſixe hundred foot. After which, the Prince of Orange paſſed into an Iſland lying between Cullen and Bone; where hee built a Fort called Pſaffen-muiz, which might haue the command of the riuer, and annoy thoſe Towns.

SPINOLA, hearing that Count HENRY and Sir HORATIO VERR marched with their Troops, had a deſire to encounter them and cut them off in their paſſage (and for that intent he paſſed the Rhine with 9000 foot and 3000 horſe) and likewiſe to ſee, whether they of Frankfort would giue them paſſage through their Town, contrary to their promiſe; but he was deceiued in his expectation, by reaſon of their ſpeedy march (going ſome times twenty miles a day and more) and taking their way about Frankfort by the County of Hannau; and ſo they drew neer to Wormes, where they paſſed the riuer, and in the end ioyned with the Princes of the Vnion.

The day after the coming of the Engliſh and Prince HENRY to the Army of the Vnion, there was great expectation of a battell, for that Marqueſſe SPINOLA had drawn his Army out of his ſtrength, and could not well retire to his trenches without fighting; for that the Princes Army lay ſo neer them. The Commanders therefore reſolued to giue him battell: whereupon the whole Army was put in order, the foreward being giuen to Sir HORATIO VERR with his Engliſh Troops, being ſeconded by Count HENRY with his horſe. Euery ſouldier prepared himſelf to fight with great reſolution, the Engliſh being encourag'd by their preacher, who told them the cauſe was juſt, they fought for God and religion, for the honour of their Country, and to maintain the right of their Soueraign's daughter and her children. His ſpeech ſo inflamed the reſolute ſouldiers, that they caſt vp their caps for ioy, attending but the ſignall for battell; but their courages were ſoon danted: for, the Marqueſſe of Ansbach, the Generall (inſtead of crying To Arms) cauſed a retreat to be ſounded; whereby the enemy had occaſion to recover his trenches, to the generall grief of the Engliſh. He pretended this reaſon, That the day was too far ſpent: but, by the opinion of ſuch as were there, they loſt a fair advantage, and almoſt the hope of an aſſured victory; their Army being far greater than SPINOLA's, his forces being diuided. This retreat much blemiſhed the reputation of the Marqueſſe: of whom men ſpoke diuerſly, ſome tearing him a coward, others ſaying he was corrupted, and had betrayed the Army: but, doubtleſs, it much hindred the Palatinate's affaires, and gaue the enemy means to aduance his conqueſts; the Army of the Vnion retiring to Wormes, where they were incamped: but ſoon after, it being winter, and the German heat abated, their army was garriſoned.

Prince BATHUR, poſſeſſing Preſbourg, and willing to bring the war on this ſide of the riuer Dannew towards Vienna, had cauſed a bridge of boats to be made there, with a Fort at the end thereof: vpon which hauing paſt his Army, conſiſting of 10000 men, and his cannon, he went and beſieged Hainburg, but the intelligence which he had with the townſmen being diſcouered, he planted his batteries to win it by force: but, after a breach made, and foure aſſaults giuen, with the loſſe of a thouſand Hungarians, he raiſed his ſiege, and retired to Viſburg.

When the Imperials perceived Prince BATHUR's purpoſe to bring the war neer Vienna, for that he had paſſed the Dannew, there was a goodly enterpriſe propounded in the Emperors Councell (if it had happily ſucceeded) to go and break the bridge of boats at Preſbourg; and whilſt Prince BATHUR was on this ſide of the Dannew (where he had no Town of retreat, or means ſpeedily to repaſſe it if this bridge were broken) to force the Caſtle and Towne of Preſbourg; The Earl of Dampierre propounded this exploit ſo eaſily to be effected, that the execution 1620 cution thereof was committed to him, though many held it a dangerous attempt: but he, hauing a great ſpirit thiſting after fame, and iudging this would be a good means to reduce all Hungary to the Emperors obedience by attempting onely this hazard, could by no means bee diſſwaded.

The execution of this enterpriſe being then reſolued, the Troops of ANHALT, leuiſed in the Country of Truenis in the Spring, were embarked about Vienna at Griſenſtein and Cornelburg, together with thoſe Troops which were alwaies attending the ſaid Earl, which were compoſed of French, Walloons and other Nations. Foure Coluerings, twelue Petards, powder, wilde fire, and other neceſſary munitions were embarked at Vienna; ſo as his Army was held to bee eight thouſand foot, forty ſhippes and boats, and two thouſand horſe, which came through the lower Auſtria: neither could the extremitie of the weather on the riuer of Dannew, nor the ſinking of three boats laden with men and munition, loſt vnder the bridge of Vienna, feare him from this enterpriſe.

Thoſe which were embarked about Vienna being come thither the 8 of October, TAMPIERRE ſet ſail to go to Preſbourg. When they were come beneath Hainburg, one of his boats wherein there were 200 muſketiers was ſunk: and thinking to arrive by break of day within two miles of Preſbourg to put himſelf on ſhore, it was nine of the clock before he had landed all his troops. At his fiſt approach he ſeized vpon the ſuburbs, forced the Fort built vpon the riuer of Dannew, and brake the bridge of boats. All which ſucceeding well, he reſolued to attempt the Caſtle by Petard; conceiuing that if it might be taken, the towne could not long hold out. But being aduanced before the Countercarſe with ſixtie muſketiers and one of his Colonells called ESPAGNE, the Morauians which were within diſcouering him, ſhotte vpon him without intermiſſion: eight of his men were ſlaine neere vnto him, and a muſket ſhot carried his hat from his head. Heerupon they told him, that he was knowne and leuelled at from a certaine loop-hole, which cauſed him to retire: but as he went off he was ſhot into the reines of the back; and being led away by two of his ſouldiers, one of them was ſlain, and the Earl ſhot into the right ſide, which ſlue him out-right: whereupon, his Troops, growing amazed, retired with more conſuſion than good ſpeed; which thoſe of Preſbourg perceiving, the Hungarians iſſued out and ſlue a hundred or fixſcore of the hindmoſt of them: from whom they recovered the Earls body.

Prince BATHUR being come again before Hainburg, and hauing won the ſame, hee appointed this place for the French Ambaſſadors to meet at; who had ſent vnto him to knowe if he would vſe their help for the pacifying of the troubles. And knowing that they parted the ſixt of October to repair vnto him, he ſent them a conuoy of foure hundred horſe: which being deſcated and put to flight between that place and Vienna by the Imperialiſts, he forbore not for all that to ſend forth another conuoy ſomewhat ſtronger than the former, and to receiue and entertaine them two miles ſhort of Hainburg, by two hundred Gentlemen attired in cloth of gould, and with many precious iewels; who preſented them with the Princes carriages, in the which they were conducted with no leſſe than an hundred torches forgh on to their lodgings.

On the morrow, the day of their Audience, they were with magnificence led vnto the Caſtle through all the ſouldiers of the guard clothed in blew, and found the Prince in the Hall of the caſtle accompanied with 200 Gentlemen apparelled after the Turkiſh faſhion with long robes of velvet and cloath of gold lined with ſables; who after their reception conducted them vnto his Cabinet: what paſſed in this fiſt audience, and in a ſecond afterwards, is not knowne. A few daies after they returned vnto Vienna; where they endeauoured themſelues by all means to reconcile and bring to an end thoſe cruell warres, not onely with Prince BATHUR and the Hungarians, but alſo with the Elector Palatine king of Bohemia: and to that end they ſent one to Prague (who had bene alwaies Agent for France in the Palatines court at Heidelberg) before he had accepted the crowne of Bohemia to treat with Sir Richard Weſton, and Sir Edward Conway, now Counſellors of State (who were ſent Ambaſſadors from his Maieſtie vnto his Sonne in law, and had charge to employ themſelues ſeriouſly for the pacifying of thoſe troubles) touching theſe alterations, and to vnderſtand from them what courſe they would take for the attaining vnto a peace. But the battaile being loſt within few daies after by the king of Bohemia, it changed the face of all thoſe good intentions to treat of peace.

Whilſt they ſtaied yet at Hainburg, this Prince ſent for the body of the Earle of Tampierre from Preſbourg, and cauſed it to bee very honourably interred. The Baron de Prenen,

The Army of the Princes prepares to fight with Spinola.

Tampierre slain by two muskets shot.

Hainburg recovered by Bathur.

French Ambassadors magnificently received at Hainburg.

1620.

The Elector of Saxony writes to Lufatia, to renew the Emperor's Ban.

taking his charge, assembled 6000 foot of his routed Army, and all the horse; with which hee staid the courtes of the Hungarians and Transilvanians, which made their incursions even to the gates of Vienna. Let vs now observe what pass in the other places, and what in the mean time the Elector of Saxony doth in Lufatia, and the Duke of Bavaria and the Earle BVCQVOY in Bohemia.

The Elector of Saxony, having composed his Army of 20000 men with great store of cannon and munition for war, to begin the execution of the Imperiall Ban in Lufatia, he sent to the States of that Province IACVBS GRYNTHALL, one of his Counsellors, to publish an assembly of the States of that Province in the Town of Bausen on the seuenth of September, old stile, that he might communicate to the Emperors commission.

Whereof FREDRICK Elector Palatine being aduertised; as king of Bohemia and Marquesse of Lufatia, he sent to forbid ADOLPH of Gerfsdorf, Gouverneur of the province, to make any such conuocation. And withall gaue Commission to the Marquesse of Jagerndorf of Brandebourge, to enter into Lufatia with 6000 men to rescue it against the forces of the duke of Saxony; which hee executed with such diligence, as he was sooner at the gates of Bausen then they had any newes of his coming: where being entered, hee seized vpon ADOLPH of Gerfsdorf and GRYNTHALL with AVGVSTIN SCHMID, Agent for his Imperiall Maiesty; and some other Deputies which were already come to Bausen. This done and having left 2000 men in garrison at Bausen, and a new Gouverneur, he went to Gorlitz where he did the like and in other places of this Province. Which the Elector of Saxony vnderstanding, he enters into Lufatia with his Army, and layeth siege to Bausen, where he was 3 weekes before it: and then taking it by force at the fift assault, he caused 40 of the principall rebels to be hangd. Thus was Lufatia reduced, and the Marquesse of Jagerndorf constrained to withdraw himself into Silefia, having attempted in vaine to releue the Towne.

The Duke of Bavaria after his taking of Liniz as is aforesaid, having no more to do in Austria, and his Imperiall Maiesty being also desirous that the 2 Armies, that is to say, his own which the Earle of Bucquoy conducted, and was then vpon the frontiers of Austria & Moravia, and the D. of Bavaria's might ioin together, to enter into Bohemia and march towards Prague: He turned about the head of his Armie towards Smethall and went and ioined it with the Earle of Bucquoy.

Before he enters into Bohemia, hee sent the Emperors Letters-patents to the States; and by his owne he exhorts them to accept of the grace offered to them, to appear before him, to satisfie his Imperiall Maiesties Commandement; to provide better for their Kingdome, to receive their lawfull King to liberrall and benigne; and to prevent greater miseries, if they loued their owne good.

To these letters the States of Bohemia made answer the 30. of August, sending back th'originall of the Emperors Letters patents; Letting him vnderstand, that they would defend their party, to the hazard of their goods and liues: That they committed to God th'event, and did yet notwithstanding hope, that he whom they neuer had offended, but euer reputed as a friend, and a worthy and prudent Prince of the Empire, would not suffer himselfe to be perswaded to vse anie act of hostility against them and their Kingdome.

The Bohemians, seeing their Army nothing equal to the Emperors and the Duke of Bavaria's being ioined, they cause it to return out of Austria into Bohemia, to vnite all their forces with the 20000 Hungarians which Prince BATHILIN had sent to their succours. The Prince of Anhalt in his retreat put garrisons into all places, and augmented those which were weak, that they might make some opposition against the Imperialists: but their Armies being thus ioined, those which made anie resistance found but bad vantage.

For after the taking of Horne, they made so happie a progresse in Bohemia, that the Towne of Forsfontz having been succoured by them (which the Prince of Anhalt in his retreat would have forced) all the places between it and Bardvitz were reduced to the obedience of the Imperiall Maiesty. The 25 of September they encamped before Budna, which they constrained to yeeld, having for a space held out with great resolution: From hence the Earle of Bucquoy went and assailed Prorahitz, which he tooke by force, as also Pissa which sawe both the Armies before her gates; and in the end being also forced, they held on their course to Prague, and in the way recovered the towns of Risemberg, Salletshofen, and the fort of Walera which MANSFELD formerly held, with Stratowitz, Glasau, Chiffenbotten, Gratzien, Schmiffing, Witterberg, Mahren and Grimbach, all places of Note, to assure their passage towards Prague, from whence both Armies were but two daies iourney. About the 10. of Octob. the Emperors army with the Bauarians, began 1620.

Count BVCQVOY to court Mansfeld; from Aug. 15
to Sept. 15

began to shew themselves before Pilsen, and very near the Town. Their owne works were not yet defensible, neither had they forces sufficient to man them; besides many other discouragements which often happen where many wants: so as if the enemy at that Lusatia had attempted, the place with his great forces, he had vndoubtedly carried it; or putte it to great, CHURCHMAN MANSFELD intermitted no time to fortifie his works, and borrowed what money he could to content the souldiers; so as within fewe daies the works were in defense. The King was down with his Army to Rokozan, two leagues from Pilsen, towards Prague, being 24000. men, besides 10000 Hungarians.

Count BVCQVOY, seeing MANSFELD's resolution, and that to force it would both lose time and very many braue men, sought to get it by policy, having good intelligence how all things were managed amongst the chief men of that party, and of the discontent giuent to MANSFELD; knowing, that nothing can looner put a Noble spirit from his posture, than enuy. He therefore studies how to gain him that was most potent in that place, houlding himselfe sure to effect it. His deuice was to send IOACHIN DE CARPZA Lieutenant, Colonel of one of MANSFELD's regiments (who had been taken prisoner the year before by the enemy) to perswade him to leaue the place to the Emperors, in consideration of a great summe of money which he promised him. The Messenger accepts the Commission, and deliueis what hee had in charge to MANSFELD; who sent him presently to the Prince of Anhalt, who caused him oit to be examined. MANSFELD by his Maiesties consent gaue ear to BVCQVOY, and offers to treat with him; but on this condition, that restitution should be made to Captain LINTAVV, whose Troops had been spoiled contrary to the capitulation of TAVV, by BVCQVOY's souldiers; who, to further this treaty, endeoured what he could to giue LINTAVV satisfaction; wherein he spent much time: but, finding these practices not to preuaile, he resolved to attempt it by force, and to giue a general assault; yet, changing his minde, he departed with his whole Army about the 21 of October, and so marched towards Prague. His reere-ward being lodged but half an houres march from Pilsen; the next day the Earle of Hohelo came with all the Kings horse, as well Germans as Hungarians, and 3000 musketiers within one houres march of Pilsen; where Count MANSFELD meeting him, he propounded a means how to cut off the enemies Rere: that if it would please him to aduance his Troops, he would also ioin with him with the best he had in Pilsen; and so, charging the enemy together, they should cyther defeat his Rere-ward, or else greatly distresse it: but the Earle thought it better to turn back and take the passage, to intercept the enemies way to Prague. In the end of October the two armies lodged within a league one of another; where there were daily skirmishes with various successe, according to the fortune of war: and so drawing daily neerer and neerer together, it was conceiued that BVCQVOY would hazard a battell. Whereupon, the Priee of Anhalt inuited MANSFELD to come and attend his pleasure; who thanked him, and assured him he would not fail to perform his command; assuring himself, he should be entertained as Marshal of the field, to command according to his charge; desiring his Highnes to send him word speedily, what his resolution was, and to that effect sent a particular messenger with Letters; but before he could be heard and dispatcht, the overthrowe of the Army decided the question.

The Imperiall Army aduanced still, and no day pass without some action. On the fourth of November the Earle of Bucquoy was slightly hurt with a shot; which was so troublefome to him, that he could not well ride on horseback. On the 6 and 7 daies the Armies were within cannon shot one of another. Coming within half a league of Prague, vpon Sunday morning the eight day of the moneth the battell was fought; which I cannot relate in particular, being forced to vicerbreity.

The Imperialists being resolved to fight, the Duke of Bavaria tooke the right wing, and Count BVCQVOY took the left; who, sitting armed in his caroch, went from Squadron to Squadron to hartten and encourage them to carry themselves valiantly. The Baron of Tilly, who was the Leader of the left point, having passed a litle bridge and marsh ground with the Bauarian Troops, was so welcomed and entertained by the Bohemians, that he was forced to send for all the Bauarian Troops in the fore-ward to come to succour and assist him: all which being ioynd, and vnder the Bohemians, the whole Imperiall Army was constrained in the like manner to march vpon the left hand; so as they were much annoyed, and received great losse by the Bohemians Artillery; which did so beat into a Battallion of Walloons, and the whole body of the Bauarian horse, that they were routed and put to flight. The danger wherein the fore-ward of the Bauarians and the Baron of Tilly were engaged, forced Count BVCQVOY,

Xxx 2

to

The Bohemian
Army defeated
at Prague.

And you will see in the new edition of the battle

recovered them who (notwithstanding that he was wounded and weak) went to horseback to disengage the enemy who was in danger to be lost. In the end, having freed Tilly from the danger, we pushed his Battalions to march directly against the Bohemians Army; who receiving them so gallantly, that they were in some disorder and ready to disband, if Count Bvcoque had not joined all the squadrons into one body, and charged so courageously, as having overthrown 600 Hungarians which were in the foreward; and the Duke of Bavaria at the instant causing the right wing of the Imperiall Army to advance, charged the left of the Bohemians; who presently abandoned their artillery, and were put to rout: some write, there were 4000 slain upon the place, and about 2000 drowned, most of them Hungarians, which thought so passeth through the river of Molda which diuides the Towns of Prague. The Imperialists took ten cannons, 135 Ensignes, with many Cornets, having lost (as they write) not about 400 men.

Thus I finde this unfortunate battell written by some Authors: but LANDORP's maketh the losse far greater on the Bohemian side. It is an old and true Saying, Plus valet oculus astrictus quam auris decem. One eye-witness is of more weight than ten which speak by hear-say; for sense increaseth as it flies. I have therefore thought good to set down what I receiv'd from a sincere Gentleman, an Actor in that daies service, and hath delivred it on his reputation.

The two Armies having coasted one another for diuers daies together, about the end of October, the Bohemians came and lodged at Reckensan; and the Imperials encamp in a wood to neer them, that they played continually one upon another with their great and small shot; so as diuers were slain and hurt: among which, one of the Barons of Dona of the Bohemian party was lost; and Count Bvcoque on the other side wounded: but the Imperials, having resolved to march towards Prague, raised their Camp in the night; which the Bohemians perceiving, marcht away with all speed to get betwixt them and Prague; which they happily performed: for on the day of the battell (which was Sunday) having marcht 8 miles, the Army came to a place within a mile of Prague, of great advantage, called the white Hill; where they incamped, and ranged their Army, finding the Imperiall Army advanced with a resolution to fight. The Bohemians had a great advantage of the ground: for their cannon might beat into their enemies troops from the Hill; so as at their first approach they were much disordered, and lost many men: besides, the Imperials had a marshy ground and a bridge to passe; where the Bohemians had planted 3 peeces of Ordinance, with 700 musketeers to guard it: which passage if they had maintained, and kept their posture on the Hill, in the opinion of all martiall men they could not have lost the victory. But the first step to their overthrow was the indiscretion or perfidiousness of the Earl of Hohenlo or Hollos, Lieutenant Generall of the Bohemian Army, who drew away the musketeers which were set to guard the passage of the bridge; so as the Imperials, embracing this opportunity, past over their troops, and turned those 3 peeces on the Bohemians.

After this, they marched with great resolution to the charge. The young Prince of Anhalt on the right hand advanced with a great Squadron of horse to encounter them: but they were scattered; yet not so routed, but he gathered his Troops again together to give a new charge, thinking to be seconded by the Hungarians which were behinde him: where his Troops were overthrowne, for that the Hungarians neuer advanced to assist him, but stood presently without striking stroke. Whereupon, the whole Army on that side fell into a confusion, every man abandoning his rank, and running away: onely the Moravians, commanded by the young Earle of Schell, fought valiantly, and were most of them slain or taken prisoners. On the left hand the Earle of Syrum, Lieutenant Colonel to C. MANSFELD's regiment of horse, charged valiantly with 3 of his companies and some others who helpt him, on a regiment of the enemies foot, and beat them down to the bottom of the hill: but, being opprest with multitudes, and left by the Hungarians who were to second him, he was forced to get off as well as he could. The Prince of Anhalt, with Holo's Lieutenant, fled with the first to carry newes to Prague of this disaster. The old Earle of Thurn followed, but with more honour and better testimonies of his valour. The King of Bohemia (who had bin a month together with the Army, and came but the day before the battell to Prague) was now going forth after dinner to view his Army, ignorant of what had past. Being some 12 score from the Town, he saw the Hungarians fleeing so fast, that he was forced to retire speedily, or else his person had been in danger to be oppressed by the multitude that fled. Touching the losse he affirms confidently, there were not about 3000 slain; whereof most of them, fleeing into the out-works of the Town (the gates being shut) were there slain by the enemy; that there were fewe drown'd in passing the river upon floats of timber, and that the the enemies losse was no lesse than theirs. There were some companies of horse and foot which had retired themselves into Starapark, neer adjoining to their Camp; the which that night or the next day morning were either slain or taken prisoners: among which, there was the young Prince of Anhalt, Captain of the Kings guard, and other Commanders, who, sending a Drumme to Count Bvcoque, craved fair Quarter: which granted, they yielded themselves prisoners.

In this great confusion and amazement, the King with his Queen and Court left the Castle which is in petty Prague, and retired into the old Town. Theould Earle of Thurn with other Commanders perswaded the King to stay in the Town and defend it, wanting neither men, victuall, nor munition, which they might well have done: but the King, considering that his souldiers were danted with this overthrow, that the Inhabitants were light and inconstant, and would adhere to the stronger, that he was in a weak Town, and a victorious enemy at the gates; who no doubt would imploy all his forces to make his victory absolute, resolved to retire himself, and give way to necessity: so as the next day after the battell he left the Town by seven of the clock in the morning; the Queen taking her caroch with her young son but nine moneths old, who was born in Prague. Coming to the Port, they found it shut, and the Burgers in Arms; refusing to let them passe, it may be with a hope to make their peace the better with the enemy upon their retention: but by the perswasions of the Burgrave and Chancellor of Bohemia who did accompany them; they opened the gates. Presently after, the Queen took horse, they being accompanied by Sir RICH. WESTON and Sir EDWARD CONNOVAY, Ambassadors there for his Majesty, the old Prince of Anhalt, two Dukes, of Saxony, of Weymar, the Earle of Hollock, the old Earle of Thurn, the Earle of Lanall, son to the Duke of Tremouille, a French-man, the Burgrave of Prague, and the Chancellor, with many others. That night they went to Limpurg, 30 English miles from Prague: where they arrived late, and entred with much difficulty; a long journey for a Queen great with childe and vnfit to trauell, having no time to rest or refresh herself by the way. The next day they departed from Limpurg towards Silesia, and after eight daies came to Prelaw: during which, that Noble and vertuous Queen suffered hunger, cold, the extremity of bad lodging (lying some nights on straw) the apprehension of a pursuing enemy, and the losse of plate and goods which were spoiled by their own souldiers that followed them: yet the bore all these crosses and afflictions with a generous resolution, to the admiration of all.

The Duke of Bavaria and Count Bvcoque entering into Prague the next day, they sent certain troops towards Brandis fifteen miles off (a place of pleasure belonging to the Kings of Bohemia) to pursue them, thinking to finde the Queen there by reason of her disability to trauele; where hearing what course they had taken, and how far they were advanced, they left pursuing them, and spent their time in spoiling of that place and the country thereabout. His Majesties Ambassadors took their leave of the King and Queen going from Limpurg; from whence they gave the Duke of Bavaria to understand, that according to their duties they had accompanied the King their Masters daughter to Limpurg, desiring to haue a safe conduct to return to Prague, which he sent them: where finding no means to treat with a victorious enemy upon any good terms of peace, they returned towards England.

After this famous victory the two Generals marched directly to Prague. In the mean time, the Catholiques wrote to the Duke of Bavaria, that they gave God thanks that hee had giuen him victory; that they would reioice to see him come triumphing into their Towns; that they offered to him both their goods and lives, and that they freely yielded themselves, beseeching him to exempt them from pillage and spoil. His Highnes received them with all cunctise; and made a proclamation that no souldier upon pain of death should depart from his colours; and if any disbanded, their Officers should be hanged for them. The next day the souldiers began to scale the wals; but the Duke staid their insolency, and set guards at the gates of petty Prague, and upon all the approaches. The Inhabitants of the old Town dispatched a trumpet to his Highnes, beseeching him to grant them three dayes space, in which time they hoped to give such answer as should content him: yet he would not hear their demand; but sent them word, that he would not grant them so much as three houres, but would haue them presently come forth into the field; where like a Conqueror he would attend them to receiue the obedience due vnto his Imperiall Majesty, in view of all the Astray. The which they performed: and the 4000 souldiers which were there in garrison, submitted themselves, and were receiued into grace.

After dinner the next day, the Duke of Bavaria and the Earle of Buchquoy entred the town with great solemnity: and coming to the Capuchins Church, they gave God thanks for this victory and vn hoped-for conquest. The Officers, who had bin dismissed from their charges, came to do their

The Elector Palatine, King of Bohemia, places this Prague.

The Imperialis pursue the King of Bohemia.

The towns of Prague submit to the Emperor.

their duties with tears of joy. They write, that after this reduction of the three Townes of Prague, the gates were kept shut the space of six daies, to seek for the chief Authors of Ferdinand's rebellion: all that were found to be of that faction were spoiled, of what Religion soeuer. The Calvinists (who enclined most to the Elector Palatine) were entreated in the like manner, and deprived of the free exercise of their Religion: As for the Lutherans of the confession of Ausbourg, they were maintained. The wife and sonne of the Earle of Thyrne, were committed to prison, with many others. After the reduction of Prague, many Townes of Bohemia came and brought their keyes to the Generals, with all sorts of submission; there onely remained Pilsen and Tabor, where Count Mandsfeldt commaunded, with great Garrisons. The Generals, hauing restored the States to their ancient places, they caused them to write vnto the Count Mandsfeldt, and to his Captaines and Souldiers, which were in Pilsen, perswading them to yeeld vp the Towne, with other places, vnto his imperiall Maiesty, and they should receiue a certaine sum of money in hand, and the rest afterwards: Moreouer, that seeing the King was now retired out of Bohemia, it was in the power of the said States to discharge him; seeing they had entertained him into their seruice, and to them hee had taken his Oath. This offer did some-what stagger them; yet, considering that these were not the same States which had entertained them (for, they were of the Religion, and these, Catholicks) they thought it not fit to giue care vnto them: Wherefore he wrote to the King, & to the prince of Anhalt of all these proceedings, made a Truce with the enemy, entred into treaty with him, and to that end sent Ieronimo de la Porta, to Prague.

After this famous victory obtained by the Imperialists, and the reduction of Prague; the Iesuites (who had retired themselves to Vienna) returned to their Colledge; where they washed ouer their Temple and Altar with holy-water, and sanctified it with great Ceremonies: The like was done to the Church in the Castle, where the Images, the yeere before, had been beaten downe by the Protestants. And, about the same time, the States of Bohemia, to shew their obsequiousnesse to the Emperour, and their inconstancy to their new elected King (whom they had lately chosen with such eagernes) being forced, as it seemes by necessity, to submit themselves vnto the crosse, wrote a long perswasive Letter to the States of Moravia, and renounced their confederation, perswading them to doe the like, and to obey his imperiall Maiesty in all things; with this commination, that if they should not giue care to their aduice, but be the occasion of greater mischiefes, they would then prosecute them as publique Enemies: But all this preuayled little with the Moravians; at that time, who proceeded in their hostile attempts.

The Baron of Tilly being made Gouverneur of Prague with a Garrison of 6000 Soldiers, the Inhabitants were quite disarmed: and, winter coming-on, the Generals, seeing no enemy in field, separated their Armies with troupes; some going to refresh themselves, and others into Moravia. The Earle of Bucquoy had aduice giuen him to take some rest for the recovery of his health. And the Duke of Bavaria tooke his way towards Munich, there to passe the Winter.

In the moneth of January one thousand six hundred twenty one (for then they begin their computation) the Emperour sent forth a declaration of Proscription against the Elector Palatine, King of Bohemia, the Marquess of Jagerndorf, the Prince of Anhalt, the Earle of Hohenlo, and the Authors of the Bohemian revolt: where, after a repetition of what had past, hee concludes; that desiring to prevent the like enterprises in time to come, made against the lawes of the sacred Empire, by this Our present declaration of our imperial power, We haue disannulled and reuoked all priuiledges, grants, concessions, rights and graces, granted heretofore vnto the said States of Bohemia, as well by our selves, as by the deceased Emperours and Kings of Bohemia our predecessors; and likewise haue decreed against all those which shall be found to haue procured, counselled and fauoured the said revolt, and drawne our subjects to warre against vs; to be proceeded against them, according to the constitutions of the Empire, declaring them fallen from all estates, honours, and prerogatives, and unworthy for cuer of our grace and pardon. As for the Count Palatine of the Rhine, who hath vsurped vpon vs the Title of King of Bohemia, hath made himselfe head of our rebellious subjects, drawne forces from all parts, and wonne vnto him many officers and States of the Empire, whom he hath caused to enter into league to ruine our Authority, and to invade our hereditary estates; We haue, by this our declaration, condemned the said Count Palatine, and declared him fallen from all his Estates, namely, from the dignity of Elector, and other honours of the Empire which he did enioy; as also JOHN

GEORGE

GEORGE the elder Marquess of Brandebourg and Jagerndorf, Prince CHRISTIAN of Anhalt, GEORGE FREDERICK Earle of Hohenlo, and others which haue fauoured him in his designs, adhered vnto his faction, entred into league with him against vs, and assisted him with their Armes and persons in this enterprise.

Also there was another proscription in particular sent out against JOHN GEORGE the elder Marquess of Jagerndorf, CHRISTIAN prince of Anhalt, & GEORGE FREDERICK earle of Hohenlo of the same Tenure: commanding all the subjects of the Empire vpon paine of the losse of life, honour, and goods, not to assist the three banished men aboue named, or to succour them secretly or openly, not to lodge them, feede them, or furnish them with any secret retreat, or suffer them to escape; discharging them from all faith, homage, allyance, or intelligence which they might haue with any of them.

The Emperour, the Elector of Saxony, and the Duke of Bavaria, made great leauies of men in their States and countries, aswell to assaile these places in Bohemia which would not yeeld obedience to the Emperour being vnder the commande of Count Mandsfeldt, as also in Silesia and Hungary; yet they did not forbear to talke of peace and to hold assemblies in diuers places vpon that subject.

As for the continuation of the conference with Prince BETHLIN and the States of Hungary; it was laboured by the Ambassadors of France, as at length it was assigned in the towne of Hainbourg (which the Imperialists had recovered) whither BETHLIN GABOR with the States of Hungary should send their Deputies to treat with the Emperors. On the 25 of Ianuary the French Ambassadors with five Deputies from the Emperour came to Hainbourg; and the next day there arrived six Commissioners from Hungary. They write, that all the difficulty of the accord consisted on two points: first, that the Emperour would put his subjects of all nations into the forts of Hungary, and the States would haue none but natives of the country. And, Secondlie, touching the restitution of Ecclesiastical goods.

Marquess SPINOLA, notwithstanding the coldnes of the winter, took many places in the Palatinate, and drew great summes of money from the lands of the Princes of the Vnion. They say that the Countess of Hannau made a composition for 18000 Ricks dollars; and that the Eailies and other Noblemen of Veterania paid the like summe: The Protestant Princes held an assembly at Hailbrun: where they consulted of the means to make their peace with the Emperour; and to preserve the lower Palatinate from vtter ruine: necessity forced them, for that the Protestant Townes had sent them word that they would contribute no more: neither did they come to the assembly, or send any Deputies but one from Vime; seeking euery one in particular to make his peace with the Emperour: namely, those of Nuremberg and Vime, who had sent their Deputies to Vienna to that end. The Catholike States assembled also at Ausbourg in the moneth of February: whither the three Ecclesiastical Electors sent their Ambassadors, besides many Archbishops, Bishops and Prelates; but this assembly did not produce a peace nor stay the apparant ruine of Germany.

In the meane time, Count Mandsfeldt was in Bohemia alone, without any support, means or money to pay his souldiers: hauing settled his affaires there aswell as he could, he retired with his horsemen into the vpper Palatinate; where he supplied his wants as hee thought good: from thence, he went to the assembly of the Princes at Hailbrun with a small traine and some hopes to draw succours from them: but, after some stay, he returned without any thing but bare hopes, preuailing nothing with such as seemed friends to the cause, and whom the losse of that kingdom might concerne.

The enemy during the time of his absence (preuailing nothing by force) fought to supplant him by policie. Ieronimo de la Porta, lying in Prague for his maister, became a Traytor, being corrupted by their faire promises: And as formerly, in the absence of Count Mandsfeldt, he had sought to vndermine the fidelity of the Captaines by secret Letters: so now hee laboured to effect it by his ambitious practices; in which designe, Colonell FRANK (who was Gouverneur of Tabor, and had the chiefe commande vnder Count Mandsfeldt) was much engaged ygiuing free access vnto all men on the aduerser partie to enter into Pilsen with as great familiarity as could bee with friends of the same party. Hauing, after his returne from Hailbrun to Amberg, discovered these practices in Pilsen, he wrote vnto them to continue constant, assuring them he would finde means to gett them their pay and relieue their necessities. Hereupon, his Auditor, called LOMBENGER, came from Prague, who told the Lord Marshall that hee must haue a larger commission to continue the treaty.

X x x 4

Whereupon,

The Imperialists about to haue
Pilsen yielded.

The States of Bohemia renounce all confederations with the Moravians.

Great Leuies of souldiers made by the Emper-
our.

A conference proposed by the French Ambassadors.

The Protestant Princes assembled at Hailbrun.

Mandsfeldt's proceedings in Bohemia.

1621
The Emperours
Proscription against the Elector Palatine, and others.

Whereupon, was drawne, and his instructions renewed; adding vnto the former Articles, that the vpper Palatinate should be comprised in the said treaty. With this commission, he was sent to Prague, hauing charge to looke carefully to the enemies designs in regard of a speciall treaty they intended with the capitaines, and that he should perswade them to continue constant in his Maiesties seruice: he held him honest, for that he had found him faithfull in other seruices: But he had srupt the poyson of infidelity out of P O R T A his cuppe; and they both became Traitors to their master. By whose meanes, the Capitaines compounded secretly with the enemy for the yeelding vp of Pilsen, as you shall heare hereafter.

The Turke in the beginning of this warre had demanded of Prince BATHYIN the garde of the townes of Pacica and Nehusol, vpon diuers considerations, touching the warre which was made in Hungary; but he (although the Turkes vassall) fearing the Basha of Temeswar, who long since hath had a purpose to deprime him of Transilvania, and foreseeing that if the Turk should hould Palacia vpon the Danube and Nehusol which is neere the Carpatian Mountaines which deuide Poland from Hungary, hee should finde himselfe shut vp betweene the Turke and the Polander; he had alwayes borne the Turke in hand hee should haue Pacica, but neuer had any minde to effect it, because of his particular interest. But now his present weakenesse and of his confederates, after the losse of such a Battaille, made him procure the Hungarians to deliuer vp Pacica into the Turkes hands for two reasons: first, to the end the Turke (who had lately gotten a victory vpon the Polonians in Moldauia) should not attempt any thing in Transilvania and Hungary while that he was busied against the Imperialists: Secondly, to draw succours from the Turke if fortune should still fauour the Imperialists, and that they should enter into Hungary. For these considerations Pacica was deliuered vnto the Turke at his instance.

The State of Hungary was full of combustions in the end of the yeare 1620; many great personages desired to be reconciled to the Emperour, their lawfull king: but the greater number being Protestants (as BVDIANYA and the Earle of Seriu) who held themselves irreconcilable to the house of Austria, desired rather to call in the Turke and be vnder his protection, then to vnter themselves with the Christians. Meane while, the Emp. by his declaration dissanulled the Election of Prince BATHYIN to the crowne of Hungary, as vnjust, violent, seditious, and contrarie to the lawes and customes of the Realme, and therefore without force and effect, making void also whatsoeuer had bene concluded in the assemblies of Presbourg and Nehusol to the preiudice of his royall rights, the State of the Clergy, and the antient lawes and liberty of the crowne of Hungary; and withal he did reuoke the Title which he had giuen him of Prince of Hungary.

When the Emperour published this edict, BATHYIN GABOR came to Presbourg; from whence he sent many troupes to the frontiers of Hungary, Moravia, and Austria to ioyne with the Baron of Laudan a Moravian Protestant, who committed great spoiles vpon the Catholics. Many of the greatest of Bohemia which had escaped from the battaille of Prague, and fled into Moravia, ioynd with him, amongst others the Earle of Thurne, to make head against the Imperialls which pursued them after their victory. On the other side of the Danubius, Prince BATHYIN having repaired the bridge of boates at Presbourg (which TAMPIERRE had broken) he with his partisans, sent diuers troupes to spoile and burne the Countrey, euen vnto the gates of Pisna. But the Baron of Prenor who had succeeded Tampierre made head against them, slew many of their men, and forced them to retire. In the meane time BATHYIN carried the crowne of Hungary and the Royall Ornaments from Presbourg to Tirnan; and from thence to Altenso vpon the riuer of Gran neere to Nehusol, in the vpper Hungary; whereof men haue written diuersly: but most men were of opinion that he desired to keepe it in his possession, seeing that he had bene chosen king of Hungary; a dignity which he would prserue vntill death: and that his often sending to Pisna for a conference at Hainbourg (at the instance of the French Ambassadors) was not with any intent he had to make any accord with the Emperour, but by this delay to fortifie himselfe with his partizans and the Turke, and to draw downe the Tartarians; and also to attend the resolution which should be taken by the Elector Palatine and the Princes and States of Silesia and Moravia in their assembly; to whom he had sent a confident messenger to exhorte them to continue in their confederation and to make head against the Imperialls, promising them al the assistance that both he and his friends could make. Let vs see then what the Prince and States of Silesia did resolve vpon in their assembly, being requested on the one side by the Elector Palatine and BATHYIN GABOR to continue their league: and on the other by the elector of Saxony to vnter themselves vnder the obedience of his imperiall Maiesty.

We

We haue formerly made mention of the siege and taking of Bausen, by the Elector of Saxony; who, being entred the Towne, assigned a day for the renewing of the oath of Allegiance, the which was performed with great ceremonies: The Senate and Burgeses, entering, made their submission vpon their knees; then deliuering the keyes of the Towne and Castle into the Electors hands, being Desputie for the Emperour, as Marquesse of Lusatia, they were admitted to take the Oath: which done, the Elector told them that he had receiued their Oath in his Maiesties name; who would protect them in the liberty of their Religion; and maintaine their priuiledges; and as for himselfe, he would be alwayes careful of their protection.

The Elector, camping at Bausen, the Marquesse of Jagerndorfe lay with his forces at Gorlitz in Silesia, being but halfe a daies iourney off, yet they were diuided by the Riuer of Neys, betwixt whom there were daily skirmishes; but the Electors Army was greater, and he had more Cannon; yet Jagerndorfe made head against him, and stopt his entry into Silesia: for, the Inhabitants of Gorlitz having refused to receiue a Garrison from the Marquesse of Jagerndorfe, they also made answer to the Electors Letters (who perswaded them to receiue him into their Towne) that they would not suffer any one to enter to ouer-master them, being sufficiently warned by the losse of Bausen. But after the losse of the Battaille of Prague, the Palatines party, in Silesia, began to decline much, and the Elector took diuers Towns. After the taking of Gablen in view of the Marquesse; winter growing on, and being more annoyed with cold and now then with any Enemy, he returned with his Army to Bausen: from whence he wrote to the Princes and States of Silesia, assembled at Prellane, to resolve whataniwere they should giue to the Elector Palatine; and to diuers deputies, who exhorted them to continue their League: He laid before them the miseries and calamities which had befallen Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, by reason of the ciuill wars, and what paines he had taken, from the beginning, to quench that fier, both with the Emperour MATTHIAS (beseeching him to prefferre) is clemency, before the rigor of Iustice; and with the States of Bohemia; putting them in minde of the obedience they ought vnto their King: labouring also with the other Princes Electors, to procure a conference, thereby to pacifie these troubles by arbitrement, and reconcile the soueraigne Prince to his subjects; whichooke no effect: The Bohemians relecting all meanes to treat of Peace; and disauowing the Emperour FERDINAND their lawfull King, made choyce of another: whereupon the Emperour had sent him a commission to reduce them to obedience by Armes, whereof he sent them a copie, exhorting them to consider. First, how long their Countrey had been afflicted with ciuill warres; Secondly, what successe the Bohemians had had in their Arms during these Troubles; Thirdly, that God had witnesed by the memorable victory at Prague, that hee is the protector of lawfull Princes; And fourthly, that they would, with one consent, take wise counsells to preferre their deere Countrey from the ruines which threatened it; the which they might now doe by obeying his Maiesties commission, accepting his pardon, and acknowledging him Duke of Silesia, he which they had done before these miserable troubles, hauing taken the oath Allegiance vnto him, as their true and lawfull Prince.

He protested that he had no other desire but to see them in their former Estate, freed from the continuance of so many ruines, and to enioy their priuiledges by the free exercise of Religion, the which his Maiesty had confirmed vnto them at his coming vnto the souerainty of Silesia: But if they continued obstinate in their leagues and former resolutions, he could not but lament the miseries which would follow; being resolute to continue constant and faithfull to his Imperiall Maiesty, and to doe his best endeavour to maintaine the obedience due to the lawfull Magistrate, and that nothing should be attempted to the preiudice of the Empire.

These Letters of the Elector of Saxony, and the copy of this Commission being read in the Assembly of the Princes and States of Silesia, those of the imperiall Party were of aduice, that, considering the state of affaires, it was expedient to send an Ambassadors vnto the Elector of Saxony, to treat of their agreement: The others were of opinion that it was not fit to make too much haste; but, contrari-wise, to make new Leues of Souldiers in the name of the States, to make it appeare, in case they should enter into treaty with the Elector of Sax, that it was neyther for feare nor weakenesse: And to send word vnto all the Townes of Silesia and the higher Lusatia, to haue great care, and in no wise to disunite themselves; because that in all treaties and accords, the preservation of priuiledges promised in generall, is better maintained then by particular yeeldings. This later aduice was followed: So as the Elector of Sax, hauing summoned

1621
The Inhabitants of Bausen, submitted themselves to the Elector of Saxony.

Substance of the Electors Letters to the States of Silesia.

The Emperours
decalation against Prince Bathyn Gabor

Bathyn Gabor carried the crowne of Hungary from Presbourg.

moned Goritz and Sittau to yeeld obedience vnto the Emperour, lest they should fall into the misfortune of those of Bausen: he was answered, that the States of Silesia and the Deputies of the higher Lusatia were at Preslau to resolve touching the Letters which he had sent them, beseeching him in the meane time not to attempt any thing against their townes.

At the same time, Count Bucquoy, General of the Imperiall Army, marching out of Bohemia, by the frontiers of Moravia and the Lower Austria, besieged and took Iglaw and Trebnitz, frontier townes of Moravia. He forced Snaim with many other places to yeeld obedience to the Emperour: the which did so amaze the garissons and souldiers which the Baron of Landan held in many places in the lower Austria, that they abandoned them to retire themselves into Hungary; whither the said Baron himselfe in the end was forced to fly.

The States of Moravia assembled at Brin (who after the losse of the battaile of Prague could not resolve to send vnto the Emperour to make their peace; for that the Earle of Thurn newly returned out of Hungary stayed them with promises of a mighty Army which Prince Barrutius should bring to succour all the confederates) seeing the Imperiall Army upon the frontiers, they sent the Earle of Sherwin with diuers others to Piem, to let his Maiefty vnderstand, That they had long time delayed to enter into league with the Bohemians and Hungarians: which they had not done, if they had not been forced by the Earle of Thurn, who was called in by some few which were Authors of the rebellion. 2. That they humbly besought him to impart his clemencie to all his faithfull subiects, the States and inhabitants of Moravia. 3. To maintaine them in their priuiledges and the liberty of religion: And fourthly, to receive with the like clemencie and grace all the Captaines and souldiers which had been entertained by the said States; who altogether protested to be euer obedient to his Imperiall Maiefty, and to spend the last drop of their blood in his seruice. To whom the Emperour made answer, That forgetting what was past he receiued them as his other subiects in his protection, and would maintaine them in all their priuiledges and the liberty of religion: but, seeing there were some few which were the Authors of the rebellion, That the Commissarie, whom he should depute to be his Lieutenant in Moravia, should cause information to be made against them; after which the States should vnderstand his pleasure. The Deputies being returned, the Inhabitants of Brin and Oldmitz (the two chiefe townes of Moravia)ooke a new oath of fealty to the Emperour; and so did the souldiers whom they had entertained: who, being mustered and receiuing pay in the Emperours name, went and ioyned themselves with Count Bucquoy, who besieged Zradisch, which he took and thereby stopped the passage betwene Hungaria and Moravia: so as Bythling Gabor could not send the succours which he had promised to the Elector Palatine; who was much afflicted for the newes of this reunion, as you may iudge by the following Letter written to the Earle of Thurn which was intercepted.

I haue receiued Letters from Moravia with great griefe: the souldiers being in mutiny for want of pay: the States haue sent to the Emperour to make their accord; but God bethanked the affaires in Silesia are in better terms. The Princes are resolute & haue decreed to leuie new forces; blaming the Morauians for their perfidiousnesse. And for my parte, I doubt not but in short time they will receive the the due reward of their rashnesse. I did not content the Bohemians and Morauians to chuse mee for their King. I could haue liued content in mine owne Country: yet for all the paines and traualle I haue taken; these for whom I haue ventred my life and goods, and the liues and goods of my friends and subiects, leaue mee, and euen now treat about yeelding themselves vnto another. What right they haue to do this, I will leaue to the iudgement of the whole world. I may truly say, that neither couetousnesse nor ambition caused me to come into Bohemia: and I hope, God will so guide me by his grace, as the suffering of so many calamities shall neuer make mee doe any thing against my conscience or honour.

The same of the happie successe of the Imperiall Armies in Bohemia, Moravia and Lusatia, caused the Silesians (which bare affection to the house of Austria) to take hart vnto them and speak boldly in Preslau. The princes & States of Silesia being aduertised that the imperiall armie was upon their frontiers, they held it necessarie for them to prevent the ruine of their countrey, and to enter into treaty with the Elector of Saxony, vnto whom his Imperiall Maiefty had giuen such commission as is before said: whereupon they concluded, to send vnto the King of Bohemia this resolution following.

After that your Royall Maiefty (our most gracious Lord) had had many consultations with vs your faithfull Nobles & States of Silesia touching the estate of our present affaires, and the enemies proceedings to cut off the assistance which the Silesians might expect from Moravia and

and other their confederats; and hauing cause hereafter to feare the comming of so powerfull an Army into our Countrey, vnprovided of souldiers to make any resistance: It hath seemed expedient (wee should aduertise you that it is needfull for vs to treat with the Elector of Saxony his Imperiall Maiesties Commissarie: which we cannot doe vnlesse you giue way vnto the necessity of the time, retrying your selfe, for your better security, into some such place as you shall thinke fittest. We hope, your royall Maiefty will not take inill part this aduice which the Princes and States of Silesia do giue you, and who protest to continue constant and loyall subiects vnto you; but rather attribute it to the ineuitable necessity of the time. Meane while, your Maiefty may take order how to be relieved with succors from your owne subiects and friends. And whereas your Maiefty hath desired, that if we treat with the Elector of Saxony, you might be also comprehended; you may beleeue that your faithfull Nobles and States will let your Maiefty vnderstand all which shall passe in that treaty. We also beseech you to think of the confederation made with the Hungarians, and not to see vs plunged into the like miserie as the Morauians which haue been threatened by the Turks and Tartars: As for the 3 months pay which your Maiefty desires, as well for the mustering of 1000 horse of his troups, as for his foot-men, it shall be resolved on in our first Assembly, and your Maiefty acquainted with our resolution; the Princes and States desiring nothing so much, as to continue faithfull vnto you, and constant in their obedience.

On the morrow, the King sent them his answer in writing; That he had receiued their resolution by their Deputies, and perceived thereby their good intention, and the affection they bare vnto him; praying them to beleeue that his was no lesse: That hauing obserued the daily falling away of the Morauians, and that the Prouinces incorporated vnto Bohemia, in that turbulent estate whereunto things were brought, could not for the present resist the Emperours power, it was necessary he should withdraw himselfe into some place of safety, not farre from them; where he might obserue what was done, and provide sufficient forces to defend them, giuing way vnto the Embassie they should send to the Elector of Saxony.

Before the king of Bohemia made his retreat out of Silesia, he sent the Earle of Hohenlo to the Elector of Saxony, to propound a Truce vnto him for the obtaining of a Peace, with Letters to this effect:

I doubt not but you haue scene the declarations of the causes, for the which I haue accepted the Crowne of Bohemia: I haue not done it by force nor practice; but fearing the Realme should fall into the hand of strangers, and the Empire receiue prejudice. I cannot beleeue but God called me to the gouernement thereof, to the end they should not be deprived of the free exercise of Religion, and their priuiledges; but I haue accepted it chiefly for two reasons: First, that it might not be hereditary; and, to the great prejudice of the Electors, fall into the hands of the house of Spain: And Secondly, that the election of the king of Romanes, to be Emperour, might, by most voices, be in the power of the Protestants; whereby they should no more feare to be vnder the yoke of the Romane Catholiques. I was confident that all the Electors and Protestant Princes would allowe of my intention, and finde means to satisfie the aduerser parties; and that I should be maintained in the possession of the same Realme, by some good accord. I haue neuer refused to enter into treaty; but seeing my selfe frustrate of my desire, I haue been forced to take Armes to defend my selfe against the forces of Spain, and the Catholique league: But being still desirous of Peace, I haue thought good to send the Earle of Hohenlo vnto you, to treat of the means whereby the Empire might be in quiet, his hereditary Countries (which the Spaniards had invaded) restored, all grieuances taken away, free exercise of Religion maintained, with the free election of the Realme of Bohemia with the incorporated Prouinces; and to provide for the defense of Hungary and Poland; to the end the Empire might not thereby receiue any danger. To attain vnto the which, I haue giuen charge vnto the Earle of Hohenlo to propound a general Truce vnto you for a month or two, throughout the whole Empire, the Realme of Bohemia, and the incorporated Prouinces; During the which time, there might bee some course taken to treat of a general Peace.

The Elector of Saxony made answer; That he would not dispute of the causes which had made him to accept the Crowne of Bohemia; but he would tell him freely that he had neuer approved of the proceedings of the Bohemians, and had written vnto him to disswade him from it, fore-seeing that in this action some Princes would stand Newters, and others would follow the Emperour; That the Bohemians could not in Conscience proceede to a new Election;

The Elector Palatine answers to the States.

His Letter to the Elector of Saxony.

The answer.

their king whom they had crowned and anointed being alive : that hee had alwaies desired he should not haue engaged himselfe in the Bohemian affaires, nor trouble the Emperour in the Countries which he enjoyed; and that he should haue giuen credit to his counsell and to the aduice of many Princes who had alwaies desired his happinesse; but seeing he could not be diuerted from the acceptance of the crowne of Bohemia, he had left it to the will of God and time, doing his best endeavour to comfort the Emperour in his afflictions, untill the memorabile victory of Prague; whereby it appeared that God would protect the lawfull Magistrature. That he could not denie but the Empire was in great danger, and that this war of Bohemia might open a gate to let in the Turke to become master of the frontier townes in Hungary. That hee was the cause of all these miseries; the which might haue been avoided if hee had giuen way to his exhortation, and reiected that great desire to raigne: That to preuent all these dangers and ruines, he must take a good and free resolution to renounce the realme of Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces, to submit himselfe to the Emperour and to craue pardon: but if he did not take this course, it was to be feared he would draw himself and all his friends into great extremities; the Emperour being resolu'd to pursue his victory.

The King of Bohemia finding no means to moue the Elector of Saxony to procure a truce, and finding that the Princes of Silesia had depured the Duke of Munsterberg and five other men of quality, to the Elector of Saxony; he resolu'd to retire himselfe into Brandebourg, a prouince ioyning vnto Silesia; the which he did. It is written, that the Princes & States of Silesia before his departure sent the Duke of Oschatz vnto him with a present of 80000 florens, and are much commended for the good offices they did him in his aduersity.

The Deputies which were sent from the States of Silesia to the Elector of Saxony deliuered Articles vnto him. 1. That they craued pardon of his Imperiall Maiefty, and besought him to impart his grace and clemencie vnto them. 2. That they would alwaies acknowledge his Imperiall Maiefty, for their lawfull Soueraigne, and King. 3. That they would confirme it by a new oath. 4. That they would defend the Romane Catholikes and their rights. 5. That they would contribute 100000 duckets to pay the souldiers leui'd for the garde of Silesia, and renounce their new confederation.

Hereunto, the Elector made answer: 1. That by vertue of the Emperors commission, hee would take the Princes and States of Silesia into his protection. 2. That he would be a suter for their pardon and sollicite the confirmation of their priuiledges. And, 3. If the Silesians did discharge their troups, his Imperiall Maiefty would reuoke his. As for himselfe he promised them, That, if after the oath of allegiance taken and their due obedience performed to his Imperiall Maiefty, they were in any sort molested in the free exercise of their religion according to the confession of Augsbourg, he would then assist them with all ayde and support. After 5 weekes treaty at Dresda in Misnia (where the Elector keeps his court) and often sending to the Emperour, who by no means would haue the Elector Palatine, the Marquess of Jagerndorf, the Prince of Anhalt, nor the Earle of Hohenlo comprehended; In the end, the Articles of peace and reunion for the prouince of Silesia were concluded the eighth of February.

The Princes and States of the upper and lower Silesia should be pardoned for what was past during the troubles, and no man questioned or punished. 2. They should loue and honor the Emperour Ferdinand their King anointed and crowned and soueraigne Duke of Silesia, and should take a new oath of allegiance vnto him. 3. That they should within one yeare pay 300000 florens at three seuerall termes for the entertainment of the Emperours troups. 4. That they should renounce the oath which they had taken to the Elector Palatine, and should haue no farther intelligence with him. They should deliuer into the Electors hands the league made with Bohemia, Moravia, Transilvania, Hungary, and others, the which should be cancelled. 5. They should discharge their souldiers, and retaine but 1000 horse and 3000 foote for their defence vntill the troubles were ended, the which vpon no occasion should be employed against his Imperiall Maiefty or the Elector. 6. That the Elector should recall away his troups which he had then in the principality of Sagen. 7. That his highnes would intercede to his Imperiall Maiefty, That all graunts made vnto the Silesians with their liberties and priuiledges should stand in force; All grieuances repaired; The commerce allowed with the Morauians and Bohemians; All goods restored to the true owners; And the Catholikes maintained in their churches, monasteries and possessions. 8. If happily the Protestants should receiue any opposition in the liberty of their religion, then his highnes promised to undertake their protection & defence. 9. If CHRISTIAN, Duke of Lignitz as Generall of Silesia according to his promise would be comprehended in that Treaty of peace, he might do it within six weeks, else it was in his maiesties power to dispose. 10. That JOHN GEORGE of Brandebourg, Marquess of Jagerndorf, and CHRISTIAN Prince of Anhalt, who had been formerly proscribed by the Emperour, should not be comprehended in that Treaty; the which was signed by the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Munsterberg with great ceremonies.

bee

Let vs now look vpon the estate of Bohemia. The Towns of Pilsen and Tabor would not be reduced vnder the Emperors obedience: they depended vpon the will of the Gouvernours who were become Masters. Count MANSFELD was in Pilsen, as you haue heard; and Colonell FRANCK in Tabor: whom MANSFELD had placed there as his Lieutenant, making incursions into the Country, and committing great spoils, seizing on Tochan, Falkenau, and Elenbogen; which he fortified with garrilons. After this (as I haue formerly related) he went to Heilbrun; where he propounded to the protestant Princes, that, if he might haue men & money, he would reuiue the Elector Palatine's party in Bohemia, and prepare work for the enemy for five yeers: that his Imperiall Maiefty had offered him a great summe of money to leaue Bohemia, and yeeld vpon what he held there; but he had refused it, and would continue constant to death, and maintaine the faith he had giuen the Elector. They wroote that he found their intentions in this Assembly contrary to his; they aiming only at the means how to reconcile themselves to the Emperour, and preferre their estates.

The King of Bohemia, hearing what MANSFELD had done in Bohemia in his absence, wrote to him in February after this manner: I haue receiued much contentment to hear of the military exploits you haue performed since my departure from Bohemia, of your perseverance in the oath of fidelity you haue taken, and of so many Towns and Castles you haue made subiect to my obedience. I will assure you, that I will neuer yeeld vp my Realm of Bohemia which I haue gotten by so lawfull an election; but will employ all my means, and that of my friends, to recover that by Arms which they haue wrested from me by force: for the effecting whereof, I will speedily send you both men and money. I hope, with the help of God, and the powerfull succours of some Princes my friends, to do that shortly which shall be pleasing to God, terrible to my enemies, to the good of religion, and memorable to the whole world. You shall finde me a Prince who will acknowledge your seruices with honourable fauours.

THEY being left in Prague with 6000 men to preserve the Town and Country, the souldiers grew so insolent in their prosperity, that the Captains could hardly keep them in obedience: to prevent the which, and to restrain the incursions of MANSFELD's troups vpon the riuer of Egra, the Baron of Tilly sent forth part of his Troops to take some small Forts where the Mansfeldians were lodged: but being not able to recover Falkenau and Elenbogen, they were put in garrison in the neighbour Towns, to stop their courses.

The Emperour, hauing sent out his Letters of proscription against the Elector Palatine and the rest as you haue heard, appointed commissioners to proceed criminally against the Authors of the troubles of Bohemia, according to the rigor of the lawes and constitutions of the Empire. Some of them were fled into Hungary; and others were retired with the Elector Palatine: some were dead, and many had been apprehended at the taking of Prague, and committed vnto prison.

There were twelue Commissioners appointed to make their Proccesse; who, coming to Prague in February, did personally adourn all that had absented themselves after the victory of Prague, and had not taken the oath of allegiance to his Imperiall Maiefty, that within six months they should return & submit themselves to the iudgement should be giuen against them in regard of their rebellion; with this clause, that appearing or not, they would proceed to iudgement: and the heirs of those that were dead were summoned to appeare to hear the prisoners examination; and the information against their parents deceased; you shall hear their execution in June next.

The first of February, the Emperour sent forth foure executoriall Letters of Proscription against the Elector Palatine, the Marquess of Jagerndorf, the Prince of Anhalt, and the Earle of Hohenlo. The first against the Elector, for the lower Palatinate, was directed to the Arch-duke ALBERT of Austria, Prince of Flanders: the second for the upper Palatinate; to the Duke of Bavaria; that against the Marquess of Jagerndorf and the Prince of Anhalt, to the Elector of Saxony; and the fourth against the Earle of Hohenlo, to the Bishoppes of Bamberg and Wirsberg; all foure Commissions being of one tenor, onely the names changed: whereby hee commanded them to execute his Letters of Proscription against the before-named FRANCK (who, as he said, teamed himself Count Palatine) his adherents and fauourers, and to do what

Yyy

foeuert

The King of Bohemia's Letter to M^{rs} Mansfeld.

Commissioners appointed to proceed against the authors of the troubles of Bohemia.

Executoriall Letters against the Elector Palatine & others.

Propositions made by the Deputies of Silesia to the Elector of Saxony.

Articles of the Silesians returned to the Emperour.

foever, they should think fit for the settling of a publique peace in the Roman Empire, and the preserving of his Imperiall authority. Wherefore, he enioined all men to hold the said F A - N D R E C K for a condemned person, not to suffer him in their Territories and Countries; nor to to give him any succour or counsell vpon any pretext whatsoever; nor to relieue or conuerse with him, nor to suffer their subjects to do it either publickly or secretly; but to assist his Com-missionary in the execution of his Commission.

The King of Bohemia's Letter to the united princes.

After the losse of that infortunate battell of Prague, the Elector Palatine had written to all his allies and confederates, imputing the cause of that losse to the want of men and money which had been promised, and that he could neuer perswade the Protestants to ioin their forces to his,
and make them equal to the Catholiques. In his Letter to the Princes of the Vnion, he prayed God not to suffer them to be daunted nor dejected, and to give them grace to take good resolutions; that the vnited Princes had now more cause to resolute to warre and to ioin all their forces together, like to the Catholique Romane league, and to attempt with all their power to chase S P I N O L A out of the Empire and the lower Palatinate, a Country which was hereditary vnto himself and his brother L E V V S P H I L I P; that the Treaty of Vimes, although it was made in fauour of the Catholique league, could not preiudice them, but rather open a way for the good of all Protestants and the preservation of religion and liberty; that hee doubted not but the Spaniards, seeing Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces subuigated, would draw their victorious Armies into the Empire, hould Dicts by force, prescribe lawes to the Protestants, and constrain them to restore the reuenues which had belonged to the Roman Clergie, and bring vnder their yoke all the Countries of the protestant Electors: wherefore they should resolute to follow the example of the Elector M A V R I C I A, and prepare themselves to warre, to shake off this yoke rather than to admit it; reason it selfe perswading them to continue their Vnion: the Imperiall Cities should also remember what hath been done by the enemy in Bohemia and Austria, and beleue, that if their Vnion did not subsist, they should not onely be deprived of their wealth, but also forced to entertain and feed souldiers, endure cittadels, and be reduced into seruitude ten times more than during the Vnion; that if the Bohemians would have imployed towards the charges of the war, but the tenth part of that which they haue since lost, they had easily preuented the miseries which haue fallen on them: wherefore he entreated them to consider of all these things, to haue his cause and that of the reformed protestants in recommendation, and to defend his hereditary Countries: the which they should do speedily, that they might transfer the war into their countries who had been the causes of so many mi-series.

The King of great Brittain perswades the Princes to continue their vniu-

Some Authors also write, that our King's Maiesty sent to the Princes of the Vnion to giue them to vnderstand, that this losse should not cause their disunion, but rather make them resolute seriously to the continuation thereof: for his part he would neuer fail to assist them with men and money; whereto he was bound for the preservation of the Palatinate, which was the patri-mony of his grand-children.

About the end of September 1620, L E V V S of Hesse, Lantzgrau of Darmstat, had written to the Princes of the Vnion to perswade them to consider of the means whereby peace might be settled in the Empire, and they reconciled to his Imperiall Maiesty. To whom they made this answer, that the Princes of the Vnion had neuer opposed themselves to the Emperor, but had alwaies honoured him; that they had faithfully obserued the Treaty of Vimes, and had not participated any thing with the troubles of Bohemia: and yet S P I N O L A had not forbore to inuaide many places belonging to the Princes and States vnited, who neuer had any thing common with the Bohemians; where the Spaniard had vsed great exactions, which had forc'd them to take Arms: that the Lantzgrau should presse his Imperiall Maiesty, to the end that S P I N O - L A with his forces might leaue the Territories of the Empire, whereby euery man might returne to his owne house, which would be the onely means to settle a peace.

The Elector of Mentz, and the Lantzgrau of Darmstat made Commissioners to the Emperor,
The Emperor
sends to the Imperiall townes.

The Emperor, knowing that the vnion of the Princes and States which had begun in the year 1610, was to end in May following, wrote to the Imperiall Towns and Cities of this Vnion, admonishing them to leaue it, and not continue it. He sent these Letters to the Elector of Mentz, and to L E V V S Lantzgrau of Hesse of Darmstat, to see them conuaid, and to require an answer; making them his Commissioners to treat with all the Princes and States that should renounce themselves with his Imperiall Maiesty. His Letters to the Imperiall cities contaid, that he doubted not but they were well informed why L E V V S had perswaded the Princes of the Vnion to submit themselves, and to giue care to some accord, for the settling of a Peace in their Coun-

Countrey; That hitherto God had giuen him many victories, and might by the same fauour hope for greater, being assisted by his kinsfolks and friends; yet, for the loue and fatherly affection he bare to Germany their common Countrey, he was more inclined to Peace then Warre;
so as they would giue way to his admonitions; That the commendable designe of the Lantz-grau, to procure some accomodation, had been very pleasing vnto him: Wherefore he exhorted them to forbear to entertaine the Warre which was made in the Palatinate, vnder the name of the Princes of the Vnion; and withall, aduised them not to recontinue their Vnion, which as he vnderstood was to end in May following; hoping that they would giue no more aide nor counsell for the continuance of such cruel war. And therefore he offered them pardon for all that had been done against him or his predecessors; promising to receive them all into his grace and fauor, and not to suffer any one to be cald in question directly or indirectly, or receive any losse from himselfe, his cosen the king of Spain, or from any other Prince of the house of Austria: but contrariwise he would giue order that they should not be molested by garrisons or his Armies; but would defend and protect them in all necessary occasions. Moreouer, that he would confirm all their priuiledges and immunities made for the Peace of Religion; and the State, hauing giuen full power to his commissioners to treat with them, and to giue them all necessary assurances.

These Letters being sent to Nuremberg and other Imperiall townes by the said Commissioners which had accompanied them, with their owne; They of Nuremberg made answer, that during the present troubles in the Empire they could not haue receiued any thing more pleasing then his Maiesties Letter, seeing that the things promised in them, should be confirmed by such worthy Princes. That they had also vnderstood that many townes had receiued the like Letters and sent their Deputies vnto them; That for their parts they would acquiesce in the towns of Franconia their associates with his Maiesties intention, and speedily send their answer; desiring nothing more, then to continue obedient and faithfull to the Empire.

Their answer.

S P I N O L A, notwithstanding the sharpnes of the winter, had sent the Generall of his horse into the Palatinate, on the other side of the Rhine; where he had taken some places, and forced many Noblemen, Protestants, along the riuier of Main, to compound and giue him great sums of money, to auoid their apparant ruine. The Marquis of Onsbach, or Ansbach, Generall for the Princes of the Vnion (who wintred with his troops at Wormes and thereabouts) being gone to their Assembly at Heilbrun, and hauing put 300 horse & foot in garrison, into Westhof: S P I - N O L A resolu'd to take this lodging from him; for the effecting whereof, on the 15 of March, hauing drawn together 2000 horse, with 4000 foot; he marched in one night with 6 cannons to Westhof, the which he took in 8 houres: The souldiers were sent out disarmed with white wands: the Captains and officers were put to ranfome: the Inhabitants paid 16000 Florens, and they of Offshof 10000. Then he returned to Crutzenac, carrying with him 6 of the Burgers of Westhof, who were also put to ranfome. This prize being reported to the Marquisse of Ansbach, he returned speedily to Wormes, from whence he sent the Earle of Solms with certain troops to Offshof and Westhof; but, hearing that S P I N O L A was to returne and fortifie himselfe there, they burnt these 2 townes; to the great grief and lamentation of the poore inhabitants. About this time, there was an Assembly of the Protestants at Seegenberg, in Halsatia; where the king of Den- marke, and the Elector Palatine were in person; others sent their Ambassadors, as the king of Swethland, the Elector of Brandenbourg, from the Princes of the Vnion, and the States of the vnited Prouinces; from the Dukes of Brunswick, Holfatia, Lanebourg, Meclebourg and Pomerania, with other Earls & States of the Circle of the lower Saxony, which began and ended in March: They haue written diuersly of their conclusion in this Assembly: Some hold that it was resolu'd to assist the Elector Palatine with 2000 foot, and 6000 horse, to chase S P I N O L A out of the Pa-latinate; but it took no effect. Others haue written, and with more apparance of truth, that the king of Denmarke undertook to send an Ambassador to Vienna, to beseech his Imperiall Maiesty to reuoke the Proscription thundred out against the Elector Palatine, and to restore him to all his Estates and dignities; which would be the means to attaine vnto a firme Peace throughout the whole Empire: (This Ambassi was sent to Vienna, and wee shall heere what answer the Emperor made) And secondly, that the said King should write to S P I N O L A to exhort him to retire out of the Palatinate, and the Territories of the Empire, the which he did as followeth.

Westhof and Offshof taken by Spinola, & after burnt by the Prince.

An Assembly of Protestants in Halsatia.

Letters of the K. of Denmarke to Spinola.

I haue vnderstood with much grieue and affliction of minde, by Letters from many Princes of the Empire, my Cozins, Allies and Friends; that you are entred, with an Army, into the heart of the Empire, and the midst of high Germany; whereas you haue taken many townes; casles

files and forts in the Palatinate by force, and continue the like violence against the countries & territories of many other Princes, Earls, States and Towns of the Empire; yea, against those which belong to Widows and Orphans, who have no waies offended the Emperor; exacting grievous contributions: which hath made the neighbor Princes grow jealous, lest you should use the like violence against them, their countries, and territories, as they have bin threatened by you, if they would not discharge the garrisons they entertained for the safety of their places & countries, if they did not renounce their unions and leagues (which have bin always allowed by Divine and humane laws, and especially by the golden Bull of CHARLES the 4.) and did not give free passage to your Army, both by water & land, and through your towns, castles, forts & passages, according to your will and pleasure. These proceedings are not only repugnant to the imperial constitutions, the liberty of Germany, and the publique Peace; but also to the Letters-patents which his Imperial Majesty hath caused to be published for the publique safety: wherefore it was not to be suffered, that the States of the Empire, our consins, and kins-folke, having done wrong to no man, should be abandoned for want of defence, vnder the yoke of an vnjust oppression: And therefore we entreate you louingly, that we may have no cause to vndertake their iust defence to free them from the violence which they suffer; but that you would desist from all these inuasions, and abandon that which hath been taken by force from the States of the Empire, and restore it to their Princes & Lords: which done, posterity will commend you to have bin a wise and prudent Prince, and all the Princes of the Empire, and my self will thanke you.

As for the Assembly of the Catholique Princes and States held at Ansbourg, and that of the Princes of the Vnion at Heilbrunn, and their conclusions; may be seen in this Letter following, written by one of the assembly of Ansbourg.

I am returned from the Diet at Ansbourg the 19 of March, where the Princes and Catholique States of the Empire have been assembled the space of 7 weekes: We have resolved a continuance of contribution for a defensive warre, so long as the troubles shall continue; for the which there shall be an aduance of 10 moneths, for the entertainment of 12000 foot, and 3000 horse, vnder the Duke of Bavaria their Generall. I can assure you that the said Princes and Catholique States are so well resolved as they were neuer; and that if they had bin of the like minde some fewe years since, the Protestant States had been at a low Eb. They being assembled at Heilbrunn, sent an Ambassage to our Assembly; the subject was, that having no other aime nor intent but Peace, which they called the obseruation of the treaty of Vime; the Catholikes have granted them the said obseruation. They are all vpon the point of reconciling themselves vnto the Emperor & to abandon the Elector Palatine. My L. Bishop of Spire stands vpon his guard on the defensive; because he is assured the said protestant Princes crye out against his Fort of Pdenheim, hauing caused the Elctor of Mentz and D. of Bavaria to be moued to perswade him to giue ouer that new fortification; but they have giuen them answer in writing, shewing the iust occasions and rights, for the which the said Bishop had reason to seek the assurance and quiet of his country, after so many oppressions and wrongs which he had endured from his neighbours.

In the beginning of March, the Princes of the Vnion, and the Imperiall Townes of their partie, began to reconcile themselves vnto the Emperor, promising to giue no more succour vnto the Elector Palatine, and not to prolong their Vnion, nor to make any new. There were some of them which treated for their owne particular, being thereunto pressed; and the rest in generall. And thus you see, that all they which had aduised and perswaded the Elector Palatine to accept of the Crowne of Bohemia, for the generall good of Germanie, as they pretended, and so ingaged him in a most dangerous war, contrary to the will and aduice of his best friend, when as hee might have lived happie and peacefull daies in his owne Country, much honoured and respected; doe now, after some frownes of fortune, abandon him and his, basely and cowardly, to the affronts and oppression of a proud and insolent enemy, who, no doubt, in time will make them know the danger of their dis-union, and repent their rash resolutions.

MAVRICE, Lantgrave of Hesse, seeing SPINOLA's expedition in the Palatinates; and his Armie readie vpon the first occasion to enter into his country; the tediousness of the Princes in their resolution to treat with the Emperor; and that hee should be the first in danger: he was also the first which sent vnto the Emperors Commissioners, and to Marquis SPINOLA, touching his re-union. The place of treaty was at Bingen; where, after many consultations of their Deputies, in the end these Articles following were concluded.

First, that Prince MAVRICE, Lantgrave, should promise, not to attempt by himselfe or any other, any act of hostility against his Imperiall Majesty, or his Armie; and not to give any assistance assistance, directly or indirectly, of men, money, munition, victuals, or counsell to the Count Palatine; nor to the united Princes, and other Kings, Electors, Princes, and Estates which had relieved the said Palatine, and the Palatinates, the Realme of Bohemia, and other Provinces incorporated. 2. That the said Lantgrave should withdraw his Troopes and Souldiers from the Princes Armie, and from the Palatinates. 3. That by the fourteenth of May (which would be the expiration of their Vnion) he should send an Ambassadour expressly to giue notice to the other Princes, that he did renounce the said Vnion, or any other new Vnion which might be made, against his Imperiall Majesty, to succour the Palatine and Palatinates, and should keepe these present Articles inuiolable. 4. That Marquess SPINOLA should also promise, that neither he nor his Armie should commit any act of hostility, make any eruption, nor exact any contribution vpon the Lands, Principality and Segnories of the said Lantgrave MAVRICE, nor vpon his vassalles, Ministers and subiects, nor their goods, moueable or immoueable; but should keepe them from all molestations, and suffer them to lue in Peace, both for Religion and policie, according to the Imperiall constitutions: But if any of the said Lant-graues subiects should doe contrary to this transaction, they should be excepted. And lastly, that this Treaty should be signed by Marquess SPINOLA, and the Lant-graue MAVRICE, and that within three moneths the said Marquess should cause it to be signed and ratified by the Emperor, and the Arch-duke ALBERT: which he should deliuer to the Lant-graue, and in the meane time these Articles which were concluded, the 23 of March, should be obserued.

The three chiefe Imperiall protestant Cities, Strasbourg, Vime, and Nuremberg, hauing at the same time sent their priuate Deputies to the Elector of Mentz, and the Lant-graue LEVVS, treated of their reconciliation with the Emperor, and promised to renounce the Vnion of the Correspondents: which was concluded and signed the 9 of April, and proclaimed afterwards in their Cities.

They of Wormes feared a siege, for the great preparations which SPINOLA made, so as they carried what they had, most pretious, to Spire, as to a place of refuge: They would gladly have imitated Strasbourg and Vime, but the Princes of the Vnion were too neere them; who, desiring to treat in generall, had sent their Ambassadours to the Emperor: but considering that the state of their affaires required a more speedy remedy then the return of the said Ambassadours, there was a meeting appointed betwixt the Lant-graue LEVVS, and the Marquess of Obolbach, Generall of the Vnion, and JOHN FREDERICK D. of Virtemberg, at Veinheim, where, after many discourses of the means to treat an accord for the Peace of Germany, the D. of Virtemberg went alone to Wormes, to impart it to the Marquess of Baden; from whence, being returned, they went all to Mentz; whither SPINOLA also came, and the Articles following for the Peace and re-union of the Princes and States correspondents were concluded and signed the 12 of April. First, it is agreed betwixt the aboue named Princes, that they shall forbear to vse any acts of hostility one against another; that the Princes and States of the Vnion, and their Souldiers shall not offer any wrong to the Marquess SPINOLA or his Armie and troups, nor to those places which he hath made subiect to his obedience, or to any which are comprehended in this treatie, their countries and states. 2. They shall not giue any succours of money or men, to any Lord Palatin of the Rhine, be it directly or indirectly, by themselves or by others in any sort whatsoever. 3. They shall not continue the Vnion heretofore made by them, neither in favor of the Palatine, nor hatred of his Imperiall Ma: Nor shall make any new; but they shall retire their troups out of the Palatinat by the 14 of May next to come; whether they belong to priuat persons or to the general, and they shall all continue faithful to his imperiall Ma. 4. The Marquess SPINOLA doth also promise not to vse or cause to be vsed, any hostility against the Princes and vnited States Protestants, their soldiers, officers, subiects, castles, towns, and territories. 5. That in this treaty of Peace shall be comprehended, as well those mentioned in the Treaty of Vime, as all the other Electors, Princes, States and Knights of the Empire; except the country & territories of the house of Saliers. 6. Touching the Count P. FREDERICK the Mar. SPINOLA, hauing been required by the king of great Britan not to execute his commission against the countries which remained vnder the Palatins obedience, till the end of the v-nion, which should expire the 14 of May, nor against his subiects or their goods; he promised that no Act of hostility should be committed by him or any other vntill that day, conditionally, that the Princes & vnited States shall take order that the particular troups now in the Palatinat and neighbor places, shall not attempt ought against the said SPINOLA or his Armie, nor the Townes and places which hee now holdeth, or against any State of the Empire that is

Strasbourg,
Vime and Nuremberg, re-nounce the Vnion.

The Princes of the Vnion, reconciled to the Emperor.

faithfull to his Maieſty. Scuenthly, and to the end that the neighbour Princes and States and their ſubiects may not be wronged by the Souldiers of either party; the Princes aboue named promiſe, every one for themſelves, to hinder all incursions, robberies, and thefts, and to aſſure the high-ways for the free liberty of commerce. Theſe Articles being ſigned and ſealed by all the Princes; SPINOLA having promiſed to cauſe them to be ſigned and ratified by his Imperiall Maieſty, and the Arch-duke ALBERT; the Electour of Mentz made them a ſtately Feaſt: and on the morrow after, SPINOLA did the like with great magnificence.

But afterwards it was added to the ſaid treaty; that if the King of Great-Brittaine ſhould demand that the ſuſpenſion againſt the execution of the Palatinate ſhould be prolonged till the ſecond of Iune; that SPINOLA would yeeld vnto it, ſo as his Maieſty did promiſe that his ſonne in law ſhould not attempt any thing againſt thoſe places which he held, nor againſt his Army. Moreover, if the Kings Letters could not come by the foureteenth of May; that the Marqueſſe of Ohnebach, hauing giuen notice thereof to Marqueſſe SPINOLA, and if he required a longer delay of ten daies, that he would grant it: the which was again ſigned by the two Generals SPINOLA and BRANDENBOURG OLNIBACH.

After theſe treaties of Peace, MARYICA Lantz-graue of Heſſe retired his ſouldiers from the Army of the vniited Princes; and they alſo countermanded their troops which were in the Palatinate vnder the command of CNIPIVS; ſo as for the guard thereof, there remained no Germanes but OBERTRANT with his horſe, Sir HORATIO VERR with his Engliſh, and ſome Troupes of Holland, who were lodged in Heidelberg, Manheim, and Frankendale, where they fortified themſelves againſt the enemies attempts, as well as time and their meanes would giue them leaue.

Letter from Electour of ſury to the of Brunſwic.

A bruit diſperſed ouer all Germany touching a great Army which was leuiſed in Denmarke and the lower Saxony, in fauour of the Palatinate, was the ſubiect of this following Letter; written by the Electour of Mentz, to FRADERICK VERTIC Duke of Brunſwick. Being aduerted from many parts that there are great numbers of ſouldiers leuiſed in the circle of the lower Saxony to go into the Palatinate; I thought good to aduertise you of the treaty of pacification which hath been made betwixt the Marqueſſe SPINOLA on the one ſide, and the Marqueſſe of Ohnebach, with other of the confederate Princes on the other; whereby a Truce is concluded for the Palatinate, as you may ſee by the Articles I ſend you. There is no man of iudgement but foreſees, if theſe ſouldiers (leuiſed in baſe Saxony) ſhall goe into the Palatinate, that all the paines ſo many Princes haue taken to ſettle a Peace in Germany, and Truce in the Palatinate, will be vaine and without any fruit; if we returne againe to warre, and that the fire of ciuill diſſenſion be againe renewed. We coniure and intreat you ſo to deale with the Princes and States of Saxony, that nothing may be attempted which may miniſter ſubiect to breake the treaty of Peace; in which you and all the Princes and States of the Empire are comprehended: you ſhall herein doe a commendable worke for the good of the common-weale, whereof we thought good to aduertise you, &c. this 24 of April.

The Emperour wrote alſo at the ſame time to the Duke of Brunſwic, concerning the ſame ſubiect, as alſo againſt thoſe which had publiſhed in the lower Saxony, that SPINOLA's intent was to march thither to diſpoſſeſſe the Princes of that circle of the Arch-biſhopricks and Eccleſiaſticall revenues which they held: the which his Maieſty, by his Letters, did auerre to be a ſlander; aſſuring him that his Maieſty would maintaine the Peace as well in cauſes of Religion, as of State, according to the Letters of aſſurance which he had cauſed to be publiſhed at his comming to the Empire: and as for the exceſſe committed by SPINOLA's Army, againſt ſome Princes and places in Petavia, and vpon the Rhine; he had written vnto him to make ſatisfaction for the ſame, and to forbid the doing of the like hereafter: wherefore he aduiſed him not to beleue ſuch falſe reports, but rather to giue credit to the words and promiſes of his Imperiall Maieſty, to keepe himſelfe in Peace and not to enter into an vnneceſſary charge; ſeeing the intention of his Maieſty was like that of his predeceſſors, deſiring nothing more then to continue his good affection vnto the Princes and States of the Empire.

the proceedings
Bohemia.

Let vs now returne into Bohemia, and ſee what exploits were done there during the moneths of March, Aprill, May, and Iune. The Emperour had cauſed two Armies to be leuiſed, the one on this ſide of the riuier of Molda, towards Piſſen, whereof the Baron of Tilly was Generall, to beſiege ſuch places as held yet for MANDSFELD; and the other beyond the Riuier, commanded by DON BALTHAZAR, to ſet vpon Taber. MANDSFELD was returned from Heilbrunn into into the vpper Palatinate to leuiſe new Troops, and to attend others which the Duke of Weimar leuiſed vpon his Lands by order from the Electour Palatine, to ioyn with him, and ſuccour thoſe places which held yet for him in Bohemia. The enemy made profit of his abſence; and by the treachery of Colonel FRANK, IERONIMO DE PORTA, and LEMINGOR his owne inſtruments and ſeruants, TILLY entred into a particular Treaty with the Captaines for the yeelding vp of Piſſen, while that in outward ſhew he ſeem'd to deſire a Treaty with Count MANDSFELD: ſo as the Captaines, hauing already paſt the bounds of duty, beganne to ſpeak more openly. They wrote to their Commander Count MANDSFELD, that they purpoſed to expect no longer, but would either bee preſently paid or aſſured of their pay; and, if they had not a ſpeedy reſolution, would prouide for themſelues.

His Auditor LEMINGOR, after conference with Monſieur TILLY about his laſt Commiſſion, returned to the Lord Marshall without any effect; excuſing it, that hee was ſent back with threats, and denied audience; pretending, that the enemy took it ill, that, changing the Contents of his firſt Commiſſion, he had inſerted this laſt Article concerning the vpper Palatinate (as you haue heard) which had no dependency vpon Bohemia. Beeing now aſſured of the Captaines diſpoſitions, he had no will to treat with the Lord Marshall; it being onely to enter-taine time, and to ſtay him from further proceeding. LEMINGOR, aduertizing him of this ſecret Treaty, and that his Captaines inclined to the Emperors party, did what hee could to procure money to ſatiſſie theſe traitors: but, all was in vain; for, thoſe whom hee truſted moſt, be-traid him: and the Letter which he ſent to Piſſen to ſuſcite the Officers from ſo ſoule a fact, was intercepted by the enemy, and not deliuered; ſo as on the twenty ſixt of March, the treaty that had been long a-working was concluded at Ades betwixt the Baron of Tilly, Generall of the Emperors Army, and the Captaines of the Garriſon of Piſſen: where it was aſſured, that in regard of their abſolute departure from the ſaid Town, the Captaines ſhould receiue 140000 ſlorens from his Imperiall Maieſty to be diuided equally among the ſeuſen companies of the Regiment. Colonel FRANK made his treaty apart, and got a promiſe of 3000 pound ſterling for the reſtitution of Taber; that all the ſouldiers, which would retire to Count MANDSFELD, ſhould be conducted to a place of ſafety with their Enſignes, Arms and baggage; that in going forth, they ſhould not moleſt the Clergy nor Inhabitants in any ſort; and that they ſhould leaue all the cannon and munition within the Town in the ſame eſtate they were. Thus was Piſſen preſently deliuered, and theſe merchants receiued the price of their accuſed ſale; and euery one departed whither he pleaſed.

Piſſen ſould by the treachery of the Captaines.

The Lord Marshall, after the conclusion of this Treaty, wrote kinde Letters, thinking to draw them into the Palatinate: but, their guilty conſciences would not ſuffer them to appeare before him. His Auditor LEMINGOR, hauing receiued 4000 Ricks dollars (the hire of his penury) thought to conueigh it ſecretly through the Palatinate; thinking by his wit to juſtifie the reſt of his actions, that the Lord Marshall ſhould receiue good ſatisfaction: but he ſoon diſcovered his money and his villany; cauſing both the money and the man to be attached, and made him to be queſtioned at a Marshalls Court: where, being condemned to dy, he was executed according to martiall law.

Colonell FRANK grew much amazed at his impriſonment. The Lord Marshall, beeing come to Amberg, called him before the Earl of Salms, Lieutenant Gouverner of the vpper Palatinate, and the Lords of the Councell, to clear himſelf concerning the yeelding vp of Piſſen. Beeing ſummoned by the Lord Marshall, he came thither in his caroch; but was ſurpriſed with ſuch fear, that he returned preſently with all ſpeed, leauing both caroch, ſeruants and baggage behinde him. He got to Nuremberg, from thence to Regensburg, and after to Taber, where hee hoped to be receiued by the garriſon: but he was preuented by the vigilancy of the Lord Marshall, who ſent a command to the contrary. Finding himſelf thus fruſtrate of his expectation, he went and ſtaid ſome time in the enemies Camp, and then retired to Prague to make his apology. Some well-willers to Colonel FRANK, who preſume to know him and his actions well, and were imploied in thoſe warres, ſaid that theſe are ſcandalous aſperſions laid vpon him without cauſe. They confeſſe, that he gaue way to the enemies Captaines and Officers to come familiarly into Piſſen, where they had all good reception; which was only to prolong the treaty by delaies, that in the mean time they might gett ſome relief from the King of Bohemia or Count MANDSFELD: but they abſolutely deny, that hee made any compoſition for himſelf vpon the yeelding vp of the Town. They alſo confeſſe, that he retired himſelf ſecretly from Amberg: and the reaſon was, for that, ſeeing how LEMINGOR was intreated, he feared the like

Yyy 4

like although he had not deserved it. And touching his retiring to Tabor, they say he came thither during the time it was besieged, and past through the enemies Camp by night; where, coming to the Port, they would not receive him, having been formerly advertised to the contrary from Count MANSFELD; that in the morning the enemy discovered him, and took him prisoner; with whom he continued till the Town was yielded, and then was released, it being one of their conditions, because they then held him for an honest man. Thus have I written the opinions on both sides touching Colonel FRANK; the censure whereof I leave to the judicious Reader.

The enemy seeing himself freed of this thorn, being master of Pilsen which had so much annoyed them; General TILLY led his Army to join with the Troops of Saxony which were come to the river of Egra, and had forced a Town of the same name to declare it self for the Emperor, and receive a garrison: which Town is the proper inheritance of the Elector Palatine. There remained no more on that side but Falkenau and Eilenbogen. They went first to Falkenau, where Colonel GRAY commanded with certain companies of English and others: they battered and assaulted it divers times; so as the Colonel, having defended it many daies, and performed the part of a brave souldier, was forced to treat and depart with Arms and baggage. This place being yielded, there remained nothing in those Quarters but Eilenbogen, being not great, yet strongly situated by nature. There were in it three companies of good souldiers, besides the Citizens, which were much affected to the Kings party. Count HENRY of Ottensberg, a brave and generous young Noble-man, commanded in the Town by the appointment of the Lord Marshall. The siege began the second of April, and continued till the six and twentieth with as much resolution and obduracy as could be devised, employing all their forces and stratagems. The cannon plaid continually, and they shot balles of wilde-fire incessantly: yet, notwithstanding all their fury, they within the Town, encouraged by their young Earle to continue constant in his Majesties service, were not tired with any labour; but, the more the enemy pressed upon them, the more resolutely they carried themselves to repell them: so as, had they not wanted powder, without doubt they had made good the place. The Lord Marshall, during the siege, did what he could possibly to succour them; still giving advice to the Earle, that (in case he saw himself pressed before that succours came) he should treat in time; rather than be brought to extremity, and lose the hope of an honourable composition to save the Troops. About the six and twentieth of April the Lord Marshall went with his Army (which was but small) with an intent to raise the siege at what rate soever. His Foreward entering into Bohemia, they had newes that the Town was yielded upon composition, the Gouverner being forced by the forenamed want and other inconveniences. The Articles were honourable: that the garrison should depart with bag and baggage, bullets in the mouth, marches light, drums beating, colours flying, &c: but the enemy (accustomed to break his faith to those of the religion) used them as they had done others before at Tachau; for, as the souldiers came out, they spoiled them one after another: which particular losse was very sensible to the poor souldiers. Eilenbogen being lost, the Lord Marshall retired again into the upper Palatinat to go on with his Levies of souldiers, and to prepare himself for some better designe. Some write, that the Inhabitants of Eilenbogen were taxed at 1000000 florens by TILLY to redeem their Towne from spoil, and that he seized on the chief Burgeses till the summe were paid.

At the same time Don BALTHAZAR forced the garrisons of Varling and Clingenberg to yield those two places to him, upon condition that the souldiers should not thrust themselves into Tabor, but depart out of Bohemia, and should be conducted to the higher Palatinat with all safety: which was duly performed. There now remained no more in Bohemia but Tabor and Vittingaw, which fortified themselves to endure a siege wherewith Don BALTHAZAR threatened them: you shall hereafter hear what passed there. Let vs now see the executions of justice which were done at Prague both upon the Directors and the chief Authors of those combustions and troubles.

We have formerly related how that his Imperiall Majesty had appointed the Earl of Lichtenstein and other Commissioners to proceed against the Authors of the Bohemian troubles. On the three and twentieth of April, a Sentence was given against the deceased (who were then named) in the presence of their heires; whereby they were convicted of high treason, and their memory for ever condemned, and their goods confiscate to his Imperiall Majesty, as King of Bohemia: yet their condemnation should not touch their kinsfolks with any note of infamy; the which his Majesty of this speciall grace would have inserted.

On

On the 13 of May, JOHN ANDREW Earle of Schlic (one of the greatest Lords of Bohemia and chief of those combustions) being retired to certaine lands he had upon the river of Egra, and from thence into Foyland; he was encountered by the Elector of Saxony's horsemen, who carried him prisoner to Dresda: which being knowne unto the Emperour, he sent to demand him of the Elector. Whereupon, he was delivered to his Commisarie, who conducted him to Prague under sure guard: where his processe was made with the other prisoners, they being in all forty five: whereof seven were condemned to perpetual imprisonment in Prague; two to be sent in chains to Janerin; two to remaine in prison for a yeere: three were to be hanged: three to be whipt and banished for ever, and one to have his tongue nailed to a Post for an hours space, and to be banished for ever to Janerin: All the rest were to lose their heads, and many of them to have their right hands cut off, and set upon the towres of the bridge. All their lands and goods were by the same judgement confiscate to his Imperiall Majesty; only their wives dowries excepted.

The condemnation of the prisoners of Prague.

The manner of their execution I will beould to relate more particularly, because it was somewhat extraordinary. After their condemnation they were returned to prison: where every man had liberty to visit them, and confesse with them. They were all Lutherans, except one Baron (who was a Calvinist) and a Captain which was a Romish Catholike. There was a scaffold built in the accustomed place neere unto the Towne-house, four eells high, and twenty two spaces square, and bordered round about. This scaffold was afterwards covered with black cloth: upon the which, on the day of execution, there was a man set in a long black robe and his face covered, holding a Crucifix in his hand, to present it to every one of the condemned as he should come vp on the scaffold. There were two others attired in like manner to receive the condemned as they went to dy, and to spread before them a black cloth, whereon they kneeled when they were executed; and, thirdly, six men in like attire with their faces covered, appointed to take vp their bodies being dead, and to waite them in the black cloth wheron they had kneeled, to deliver them to their kinsfolk. On Sunday the 20 of June (the day before the execution) many of their wives and children cast themselves at the Prince of Lichtensteins feet, to sue for their husbands: but he made them answer, It was not in his power, but only in the Emperors, to give.

The manner of the execution of the prisoners.

At five of the clock in the morning, at the shooting off a Cannon from the Castle, all the gates of Prague were presently shut vp, and the execution began.

First of all the Earle of Schlic, attired in a gowne of black silk, houlding a booke in his hand, went vp to execution. The man, appointed to that office, presented him the Crosse: his servant unclothed him; and, after his prayers ended, the Executioner cut off his head: which done, his owne servant laid his right hand upon a block; the which, in like manner, was cut off, and layd apart with the head: the body was wrapped vp in the cloth whercon he had kneeled, and carried from the scaffold by those six men appointed to that purpose; so as the body was neuer touched by the Executioner. The like forme was observed with all the rest which were beheaded. NICHOLAS DVVIS, whose tongue was nailed for an hours space to the gallows, died with the torment within three daies after.

The Countesse of Schlic, did so much lament the losse and death of her husband, as she did not survive him many daies. As for the bodies of such as were executed by the sword, they were delivered to their kinsfolkes & friends, to be entered some in their Segniories, and others in Prague.

At the same instant, there was the like inquisition in both Austria, against the chiefe which had held the Bohemian party. The Commissioners did summon many to appeare personally before them at Linz, to iustifie themselves. Some came: other (who thought there was more safety in absence) forbore. Some, which came in, were committed: against such as stood out, they proceeded, by seizure of their goods; the which, as LYNDORPHNS writes, were restored for money, and upon other conditions. FREDERICK, Baron of Tieffembach, one of the chief actors in Moravia, had beene taken at the Bathes in the County of Tirol: being brought to Oenpome, the Emperours sent Commissioners, who made his processe, and cut off his head.

The Marquesse Jagerndorf (who had not beene comprehended in the treaty of Silefia, but proffered by the Emperour, and the execution thereof committed to the Elector of Saxony) thought, by these terrible executions at Prague, to put the Silefians in feare, and to make them returne to Arms against the Emperour. At his departure out of Lusatia, he marched with his troupes being 3000 men into the County of Glatz; resolving, that the States of Silefia (in whose name, and for whom, he had leuied these forces) should pay them what was their due. Hee required the States therefore to giue him satisfaction: but, they so delayed him, as he well perceived they desired to be ridde of him.

name,

The Countie of Glatz is a frontiere of Bohemia, Infania, Silesia, and Moravia. The riuer of Iegerne, vpon which lieth Iegerndorf (that is to say, the Bourrough of Iegerne) is betwixt Nisse, Tropau and Glatz. This Marquesse seeing all the Emperors forces employed either in Hungary or beyond the riuer of Molda, and that round about the Countie of Glatz, there were none but enemies, where his souldiers might get good booty; he resolved to surpris some such places, as they should be forced to demaunde a peace of him: all which succeeded happily. For, the Elector Palatine King of Bohemia hearing of his designe, sent him his Letters, by the which he made him Commissarie General in his Realme of Bohemia and the incorporated prouinces, with full power to gouerne those Countie according to his discretion; to make leuies of souldiers, and to doe whatsoever he thought necessary; commanding all his subiects to yeeld obedience and assistance vnto the said Marquesse his Commissarie. Hauing this Commission, he gaue liberty to his troups to commit all acts of hostility: whereby his number so encreased as he made himselfe Maister of Tropau and Nisse, and forced the inhabitants of the whole Bishoprick of Nisse to pay him 100 000 dollars, and the four receiueis of the Countie (who were his prisoners) to furnish him with 10000 Hungarian duckets within two daies. After which, going with his horse and some part of foote (being in all 1500 men) he entered into Bohemia: where he committed great spoiles, and making vse of the Peasants which were in Armes, he leied vpon diuers places. After which, he went to besiege Glatz: which being yeelded, he furnished it with 3000 good souldiers and 13 Cannons.

The States of Silesia desirous to stop the course of these suddaine incursions, and surprising of Townes, sent their Deputies to the Elector of Saxony, Commissary for his Imperiall Maiefty in Silesia. It was resolved betwixt them to leuie an Army of 1500 horse and 11000 foot to stay the said Marquess. The Elector sent them 3000 foot & 1000 horse; the States of Silesia were to furnish the rest. They had resolved to recouer Glatz: but the Marquess had taken such order, and his new enterprises vpon the territorie of Preßlau (from whence he drew 60000 dollars to retire his troups) made them in the beginning to stand vpon the defensive, and to assure their other Townes without attempting any thing against the Marquesse: who hauing retired his garrisons from Nisse and many other places, which he held not able to resist their forces; hee made the body of an Army; which he led into the principality of Tschin vpon the frontiers of Moravia: where after great spoiles committed by his troups, the inhabitants were forced to giue him certaint thousands of Hungarian duckets to leaue them & to passe on to BRITLIN GAZOR.

Before he left the Countie, hee wrote two Letters to the States of Silesia touching the execution of the prisoners at Prague. The first did intimate that it was notorious to the whole world, that the cruell and barbarous execution made at Prague of the chiefe Noblemen of Bohemia (the true pillars of the State) and of many honest and worthy persons and good countrey men, was onely in regarde of their religion and constancie to keepe their faith vnto their King, whom they had chosen: a cruell execution, which God would reuenge vpon the Authors. That he was truly aduertised that the like would shortly be done to the chiefe of Silesia, at Preßlau and in other places (if God diuerted not the designe) notwithstanding the transaction and treaty of grace and pardon made with the Elector of Saxony. That this cruell inquisition of Spain hauing no other end, but the oppression and extirpation of the Protestant religion, hee thought good to aduertise them all, and especially the inhabitants of Preßlau and Schneitz, to be wise by other mens examples; and not so much to regarde that which concerns their priuate profit, as that of the publike; to the end they might maintain the faith giuen to their King, and to the league which they had sworn; and to ioyne with him to free themselves from so many tyrannies: but, if (contrarie to his hope) they would willingly remaine in danger, let them accuse none but themselves to be the Authors of their and the Countie's ruine, and the breach of faith which they had sworne to their elected King. And, withall, he aduertised them, that if in his absence any violence were offered to any of his Counsellors, officers, ministers and subiects which were in Silesia, or to any Protestant in the Bishoprick of Nisse, or if they did put any garrisons into the Townes which did particularly belong to him, or that they recieued any wrong; that they should assure themselves, that the administrators and receiueis of the Bishoprick of Nisse (who were in his custodie) should haue the like vltage. The second Letter was to the same effect.

The

The Elector of Saxony made answer to these Letters, shewing the iustice of the Emperors proceeding in the execution at Prague: And as touching the breach of the transaction which he had made with the Silesians, he gaue them his word and Electoral faith, that it should be faithfully kept and obserued; and that there was neuer any intent, neither should they be any leach or execution vpon any colour whatsoever, so long as they contined themselves within the bounds of the said transaction.

The Emperour also made answer to those Letters: by which, he assured the Silesians that he would neuer forget the grace and pardon which he had imparted vnto them; promising, to maintaine the transaction made with the Elector of Saxony: which he did confirme by those presents, so as they continued in their fidelity and obedience. Hee also exhorted the Princes, States and all his subiects of Silesia, not to suffer themselves to be seduced by the inuention and fraude of that proscrip or any other person; but, to remaine within the termes of the transaction, and to employ all their forces to oppress that rebel and his partisans, by whom they had bene often seduced; to the end that Silesia might be restored to her former estate and enioy a full and absolute peace.

The first of Aprill the Emperour appointed a Diet of the Electors and Princes to be held at Ratisbone on Saint JOHN BAPTIST'S day following, to consult of the meanes how to settle a general peace in the Empire. The Elector Palatine King of Bohemia, aduertised hereof, sent his Letters vnto all the Electors and Princes which had bene called thither; by which hee complained that he had bene aduertised, how that some imputed vnto him (that contrarie to his Imperiall Maiesties intention, who had called a Diet of the Electors and Princes of the Empire at Ratisbone on the 24 of Iune, to resolve how peace might be settled in the Empire) he was more pleased in the actions of warre, then in treaties of peace; but contrariwise his conscience did witness vnto him, that he rather desired an honest peace then warre. That, touching the troubles then in the Empire, hee had not engaged himselfe through ambition, or to wrong any priuate person; but by the perswasion and promise of a lawfull calling and a iust defence. That he confessed truly, and ingenuously, to owe vnto his Imperiall Maiefty, obedience and honour, as to the soueraigne head of the Empire. That he was deprived (contrary to his hope and expectation) of his Electoral and hereditarie countreys, which was the cause of great inconueniences and preiudice to many States of the Empire, entangled in these warres; for the which he was much afflicted, especially for the great miseries which had befallen, the Turke preparing to enter into Germany. That he hoped, God would so direct the hearts of the Emperour, Electors and Princes which should assist at this assembly, that all their counsells and consultations would tend onely to the restoring of peace in the Empire, to banish ielousies & distrust, and to settle a new confidence. That he doubted not, but in this Diet they would treat chiefly of the meanes of his reconciliation with the Emperour, as many kings and Princes haue formerly done by their Ambassadors: to whose good counsells and aduice he would alwaies submit himselfe, so farre forth as his dignity and conscience might not bee wounded. That hee would alwaies witness, and desired the world to know, that he neuer had a thought to offend his Imperiall Maiefty, but desired to yeeld all honour due vnto him according to the constitutions of the Empire. That he hoped his Imperiall Maiefty would procure a remedy for so many mischeefes by a general Amnestie or forgetfulness; and so moderate all things, as the Princes and States of the Empire, his friends, counsellors, officers, and subiects might be freed from the insolencie of forraigne souldiers, and all things restored to their former state and liberty. This was the tenor of his Letter. Let vs now see what passed at Viena.

You haue formerly heard how that the Princes of the Vnion had sent their Ambassadors to the Emperour, touching their reconciliation; which in the meane time was concluded at Mentz, with the Elector and the Landgraeue of Hesse: so as after their arrivall at Viena, they had no other charge but to entreate his Imperiall Maiefty to confirme the treaty of reconciliation, and to command the Execution for the restitution of places taken and detained from the Earles and Noblemen of Bohemia: whereunto, according to their instructions, they added the restoring of the Elector Palatine to his countie, or to stay the execution of the Imperiall proscription. Whereunto they recieued answer the sixt of May, That his Imperiall Maiefty was very well pleased that the Protestant Princes had abstained from defence of the Elector Palatine, whom he had proscribed; and for promising not to continue the Vnion or to reuise it any more; which will be a principall point for the establishing of peace in the Empire. That his said Imperiall Maiefty desired not to spare any paines for the restoring of peace, but could not

The Elector of Saxony answered the Marquess his Letters 1621

The King of Bohemia's Letters to the Electors and Princes of the Empire.

The Marquess's Letters to the States of Silesia.

The Emperour's answer to the Ambassadors of the Vnion Princes.

not

not yet see how he might satisfie their demands of reestablishing the Palatine, or at the least to retract the execution of the Imperiall Ban denounced against him. That although it bee not lawful, by the constitutions of the Empire, to make intercession for a proscribed person; yet for so good a thing as the settling of peace in the Empire, his Imperiall Majesty would be well pleased the said Princes should endeavour that the Elector Palatine should acknowledge his fault, craue pardon of him, and (as the said constitutions require in matters of lesse importance) make offer to satisfie the charges and losse he hath procured. That hitherto it hath not bene observed that the Palatine is willing to take this good course; but, on the contrarie, he saw both within the Empire and without, in Holland and other places, that through his practices and on his behalfe, many levies of souldiers were made: which constrained his Imperiall Majesty also to make preparation to keepe the faithfull States of the Empire from the oppression of the said Elector Palatines adherents. And touching the delay of the execution which they demanded, he did not think that all the Protestant Princes consented thereto. And as for the restitution of the Townes and Castles which had bene taken from diuers Noblemen of Veterania, his Majesty had declared his pleasure by his Letters Patents, that he had no desire the innocent should suffer with the innocent; but contrariwise would repell the violence which had bene done them, by force. That if they did not giue them satisfaction accordingly, he would cause them to haue all content.

In the same month of May, Ambassadors came to Piena from the King of Denmark, with instructions from the assembly at Seneburg, demanding a disannulling of the Palatines proscription and of all the rest, and that they might bee restored to their lands and estates: without the which, there was no hope of any peace in the Empire. The Emperour, hauing sent this proposition to the Electors, and receiving their advice, made answer to the Ambassadors, that the proscription could not be made void, but rather to be executed with all speed according to the constitutions of the Empire. The Ambassadors replied, that their kings intention was not to meddle with questions of times; but only to procure a peace in the Empire, and a firme confidence between the head and the members: to which end the Emperour said, he had appointed an Assembly at Ratisbone, to resolve vpon all things concerning that question.

In the meane time, the conference at Hainburg grew to such length, and both parties so full of distrust, as the French Ambassadors were not able to reconcile them. The Emperour had resolved in counsell, vpon the seauenth of April, that he would accept of a peace vpon these conditions: That BATHLIN GABOR should be againe confirmed Prince of Hungary, and haue for his entertainment 100000 florens yearly, and 100 marckes of silver from the mountain Townes. They write, that Prince BATHLIN was content to accept of these conditions; but he demanded Cassonia and many other townes of safety, with these clauses: That his Majesty should pardon all the confederates of what province soeuer, who should be restored to their estates; and that no question should be made for what was past; whereunto the Emperour would not yeeld, so as the conference brake off: before the which, BATHLIN GABOR was retired from Presbourg to Tirnaw, and had drawne his Chancellor from the conference, vpon some pretexts. His partisans said, that the Imperialists made hew by their daily practices, to draw the Noblemen of Hungary to their partie, and by the preparations they made at Piena, and by their prosecutions against their confederates in Bohemia, Austria, and Moravia, that this conference to treat of a peace, was but a soare to entrap them, and suddenly to shut Prince BATHLIN into Presbourg. The Imperialists on the other side gaue out, that Prince BATHLIN, hauing carried away the Crowne of Hungary, desired to haue the title of King: and if he had had any good intent to make a peace, he would not haue made leaues of Transiluanians and Tartarians, which were marching into Hungary; writing his Letter vnto GALGA Prince of Tartary: which for breuity sake I must omit.

GOLOV SATCHY, one of the chiefe Noble-men of high Hungary, who had been a powerfull Partisan to BATHLIN (hauing made his peace with the Emperour) gathered together, two thousand men; and, vpon the ending of the Truce, surprised Altenfels and Vesprim, where he put all the Transiluanians which were in Garrison to the sword. It is an vsual thing when treaties end, some change their partie. The victorie of Prague, and the Earle of Bucquoy (who had wintered vpon the river of Mura a daies journey from Presbourg, making account to haue twenty thousand men) was the cause that many Noblemen of BATHLIN's partie expected but an opportunity to reconcile themselves to the Emperour. The breach of the conference and of the truce, made Count BVCQVOY aduance with his Army to inuest Presbourg. Prince Prince BATHLIN who was at Tirnaw, seeing SATCHY fallen to the Emperour and loyaled with PALEY, and to be betwixt him and Cassonia at his back (who bragged he would take him alive and present him to the Emperour, or at the least stop his returne into Transilvania; and Count BVCQVOY to come in Froth) relying vpon the Garrison which he had put into the Castle of Presbourg, he resolved in this renewing of the warre to stand vpon his defence; to furnish the places he held; and to put himselfe into Cassonia; there to assemble the body of his Army, whilest the Emperours men should coole themselves at some siege. Hauing left some men in Tirnaw, and SYRPHANTVRSO with a strong garrison of Hungarians and Transiluanians in Neuhusel, he carried the Crowne of Hungary to Cassonia.

In the meane time, FORGATSY Palatine of Hungary, with other Noble-men which were in Presbourg, seeing themselves inuested by Count BVCQVOY, desired to send Deputies to the Emperour; which was granted: Who hauing obtained from his Majesty a treaty of their reduction, by the which they were all maintained in their Dignities, Estates and Offices, with abolition; the Towne of Presbourg, was yeelded to the Emperour the second of May; into the which they put a great Garrison. The Castle only remained; in the which there were many Germanes and Hungarians, who demanded their pay and a general pardon. There were some houres of Truce to heare their demands: The which being ended, and nothing granted to the besieged, they shotte continually from the Castle; so as many of them were slaine and hurt.

They defended themselves brauely for the space of ten dayes; but, on the tenth of May, seeing a new batterie planted of seven double Cannon, they demanded a Parley; which was granted. After many contestations, they promised to yeeld the Castle, and they were suffered to depart with Armes and baggage, their marches dead, and their Ensignes folded vp, the Hungarians to be conducted to Neuhusel, and the Germanes to the Frontiers of Moravia. Count BVCQVOY hauing assured the Towne and Castle of Presbourg with new Garrisons, hee ledde the Imperiall Army (being two and twenty thousand men) towards Tirnaw: vpon the way, diuers Townes and Castles submitted themselves. The Garrison of Tirnaw, finding themselves too weake to make resistance, accepted of a composition to depart with their Armes and baggage.

Count BVCQVOY being aduertized, that there was dissension between the Soldiers and the inhabitants in Neuhusel, it was resolved in Councell to leade the Army thither; yet they which were of a contrary opinion, gaue them to vnderstand that the souldiers should finde no victual for themselves, nor forrage for their horses, for that the whole Countrey was ruined, and the Townes and Villages burnt: And in truth this siege had like to haue ruined the Emperours partie in Hungary.

In the beginning the Imperialists had some aduantage at their approaches: and the batteries being well placed, did somewhat annoy the besieged. They mustered their Souldiers; and to put courage into them, they gaue them three moneths pay. FORGATSY, Palatine of Hungary, was come vnto the Army before Neuhusel, who wrote vnto the besieged to yeeld; he entreated and threatened them; but all was in vaine: for they made him answer, that they were true Hungarians, which would fight euen vnto the last droppe of their blood, to preserve the honour of their Nation, and to free themselves from the yoke of the Turkes and Germanes.

Thus were they in Armes in two places of the vpper Hungary: that is, at the siege of Neuhusel, and towards Filee, whereas SATCHY and PALEY made head against the Partizans of Prince BATHLIN GABOR, and defeated eight hundred men; which the Prince sent to Neuhusel, conducting a conuoy of Victuals, Money, and Munition; but soon after they had their reuenge. In the lower Hungary betweene the Danow and Sutria, BYDIANI a Protestant and a Noble-man of great power, hauing made himselfe an irreconcilable Enemy vnto the house of Austria, held many places vpon the lake of Neufassler; and the Riuer of Rebnitz and of Rechimiz, which did much annoy Piena, by the incursions of the Budians: to prevent the which, the Emperour sent the Earle of Colate with eight thousand men, and some Cannon to take those places of retreat from BYDIANI, who retired towards Cassonia: from whence wee shall see him returne with Turkish succours, and fire diuers parts of Austria.

During the siege of Neuhusel, the Imperialists were but ill intreated in many salies by those that were besieged, the which had no want of any thing; for the Gate towards the Riuer of Oniar was free; and on the other side of the river lay encamped tenne thousand men com to their succours: that is to say, foure thousand sent by Prince BETHLIN from Cassovia, and and six thousand which the Earle of Thurn and others (fled out of Bohemia and Austria) had brought. During the exploits of Neuhof, where the Palatine FORGATSY died, Prince BETHLIN held an Assembly of the States at Perem, neere to Cassovia, letting them see that he had the Crowne of Hungary in his possession: to the which encouraged them to follow his party; and it was resolved, first to free Fleick, besieged by PALEY SERTSKY and others, and to hazard a battaile to raise that of Neuhof.

The Barons of Palsi, Sesky and Pojnaski, being lodged with their troupes at Minerlin a mountaine Towne, Prince BETHLIN entertained them with good words, touching a peace which hee desired to make with the Emperour, and in the meane time surpris'd them suddenly; where, after a bloody fight, PALEY, was found slaine vpon the field, with two thousand Imperials: SERTSKY and the rest escaped, but wholly defeated. After this expedition, all the mountaine Townes returned to BETHLIN's party. This was the first unfortunate crosse of the Imperials; letvs now observe the second. The siege of Neuhof continued: The Port of Carniola towards the river of Oniar was still free for the besieged, they being alwaies relieved (when they had neede) with 10000 men which lay encamped at their garr; who, when they past the river, did so stoppe the passages and approached so neere vnto the Imperiall Army, as nothing could be conueighed to them without very great forces. Count BUCQVOY was therefore often constrained, for want of forage for his horse, to send out many companies both of horse and foote. The tenth of Iuly all his foote which he had sent a foraging (except two hundred musketers) being returned with the Carls, and the horse being in number fifteene hundred, consisting of all the nations of the Army (except Walloones which they had left in Moravia for safeguard of the Countrey) being yet a Cannon shotte from their quarter, fifteene hundred Cavaliers Hungarians, divided into Troupes, left their Camp and past the river of Oniar, under the iavour of the Towne Cannon, and began to charge the Imperiall horse. Vpon this Alarme, Count BUCQVOY went to horse: and being accompanied by some officers, he came to the head of his Troupes, to encourage them by his presence, to maintaine the brunt of this important skirmish, and to auoide the disgrace of any losse. Having observed the order of the assailants, hee presently drew his men into diuers squadrons, and commanded the Earle of Torquay, Lieutenant Collonell to the Earle of Palsen's Regiment (which consisted of low Dutch and the Emperours troupes) hauing the point of the vanguard, to goe by charge: which he did resolutely, and forced into the enemies squadrons being pell mell amongst them; But, the squadron, which followed, wheeled about; and discharging their Pistols, betook themselves to flight; whereupon the low Germanes were enclosed and defeated, and Count TORQVAT and all the Captaines taken prisoners: All the rest of the squadrons, appointed to second him on both sides, fled also by their example; so as the Earle of Bucquey was left alone.

The Earle, seeing this disorder, did what hee might to stay them, riding from squadron to squadron with his sword and Pistoll in his hands, thinking to make their runnwaies to turne head againe: but, nothing could preuaile. At the same instant the Earle of Bucquey was inuested by fifteene Hungarians which were best mounted; who charged him on all sides. He defended himselfe a long space very valiantly, vntill he had received a pistoll shotte through the body, and a blow with a Lance, which ouerthrew him from his horse. Hereupon, the Marquesse of Gonzaga, followed by some of his people, came in to succour him; and pressing in to the midst of these Hungarians, he slew two of them, and gaue the Earle leasure to rise and to retire on foote some fiftie pases towards the Army. But, the Marquesse being presently forced to retire, these Hungarians ouerthrew the Earle againe with their Lances: and then discharging their Pistolls vpon him, they left this braue conductor of Armies dead, with 13 mortall wounds.

In the meane time, the said Marquesse, thinking yet to succour him once more and preserve him alive, ioynded himselfe with Mounseur CAMARGES and som of the low German troupes formerly broken, and draue them back, pearching through them euen to the place where the Earle was, but found him dead. Then did the Marquesse take time to alight, and layed the body on his owne horse, and brought it to the Camp, where was great mourning and lamentation. The cowardise of these horsemen which had thus abandoned their Generall (vnto whome their very enemies gaue the title of incomparable valour) was euen as much blamed, blamed as the courage of two hundred musketers which were with them, was highly extolled: for although they were in an open field, they defended themselves with such resolution, that the Hungarians were in the end forced to leaue them, they receiuing little losse.

The Emperour, and all Kings, Princes and Catholike Lords, much bewailed this death of Count BUCQVOY: his body was carried to Plema, where on the twentieth of Iuly, it was sumptuously interred with all militarie pomp; which was a sad and heauie day there, both for these obsequies, as for two other heauy tidings: the one of raising the siege of Neuhof (all the seventeenth of Iuly, the other the death of the Arch-duke ALBERT Duke of Brabant and Prince of Flanders, who died at Brussels, the 13 of the said moneth of Iuly. It is obserued, that in foure yeares, five great Princes of the house of Austria haue deceased; namely, PHILIP third king of Spain, The Emperors eldest son, and three brothers, The Emperour MATTHIAS the Arch-duke MAXIMILIAN; and this yeare, The Arch-duke ALBERT.

After the death of the Earle of Bucquey, The Hungarians, and Bohemians, Prince BETHLINS Partisans, were much encouraged, and the Imperialists almuch dejected. The continuall raine also at this time, contrarie to the season, seemed to augment this sorrow, and minister occasion of the losse of the Cannon which they left behinde them at the raising of the siege of Neuhof.

RODOLPHVS TIEFFENBAC, a Lord of Moravia, whose father had beene Generall in the warres of Hungary 1594, succeeded Count BUCQVOY, in his charge, and had beene himselfe Sergeant maior at the battaile of Prague. Through the diuisions which grew among many nations which were in the Army; it was resolved in Councell, that the siege should bee raised, and that they should march towards Gnita vpon the Danow three miles above Comora. Moreover, vpon advertisement that the Hungarians and Bohemians which were fled out of their countrey, being fortified with new Troupes, were resolved to pursue them in their retreat; it was resolved they should abandon 15 Cannons which they had for that siege, to the end they might march away with the more speed; being impossible for them to draw them away by reason of the abundance of raine which had fallen, and spoiled the waies.

On the 27 of Iuly the siege was raised in a tempestuous raine night, so as the Hungarians could discouern nothing before the morning. This retreat hath bene diuerly related: and thus they write on either side. At the rising of the Camp, the Hungarians (being fortified with new Troupes) were resolved to charge the Imperials, who had abandoned their Cannon, and to defeat the better part: but foure hundred musketers, Walloones, defended a passage so valiantly, as the whole Army recovered Gnita without losse: from thence they went to Presbourg and to other necessarie places for the preservation of the Emperours prouinces. GOTHARDVS saith, That the Hungarians seeing the siege raised, pursued the Imperials with great furie, who had set Captaine MARBERLIN at a passage to fauour their retreat; who after some resistance was forced and slaine with three hundred of his men and some of the Rereward. The Army came to Gnita and was very well entrenched: yet many French and Walloones fled towards Presbourg: part of the Army was sent to Comora and the rest towards Iauerin. As for the fifteene Cannons which they had abandoned at Neuhof, they were carried into the Towne in great triumph.

All these happie exploits in fauour of Prince BETHLIN made him to march speedily to Neuhof to pursue for many victories and to recover Presbourg: but he found a stoppe at Tirnaw, where there were foure companies of Imperials and fve hundred horse in garrison: hauing planted his batteries, and made a breach, at three assaults he lost seauen hundred of his best men. Afterwards the batteries being continued, the besieged obseruing that they might easily bee forced, and knowing well they had small store of victuals remaining in the Towne, they demanded composition: which was graunted, and they departed with Armes and baggage.

From Tirnaw, Prince BETHLIN went to plant his siege before Presbourg, whither all his Partisans with their troupes came to ioyne with him: The Marquesse of Sagerdorf brought his from Moravia: the 19 of August he caused incursions to be made into Austria, whereas on either side of the river of Danow, there was nothing to be scene but effusion of blood, flight of the inhabitants, spoile and fire; and of one day they might see from Vienna, on the other side of Danow, 20 villages on fire: and on this day 14, by BVDIANY.

This BVDIANY hauing drawne together 6000 Hungarians and Turkes; seeing that COLATZ had beene countermaunded by the Emperour to put himself into Presbourg; to defend

Death of the Arch-duke
Albert,

Tirnaw taken by Prince Bethlin,

Count Buc-quey slaine and with 13 wounds vpon
him,

send it, he followed him, and took from him one of the lodgings of his Rere-ward, committing to great cruelties and inhumanities, that they wrote he ruined above a thousand villages in Hungary and Austria. As for the siege of Presbourg, it was continued by BATHIN, whom the Imperials called ATILA King of Huns, for that there was some conformity, being both Hungarians born, commanding one Nation, like in humours and conditions, both scourges to Christendome, having both put all to fire and sword as they past. He pressed Presbourg to yeeld; in which there was a great garrison of horse and foot: the besieged were forced to make sallies to fetch forrage for their horses; where there were diverse encounters, with variety of success according to the hazard of the war: but on the fifteenth of September, there entering into the Town a supply of ten Cornets of horse and two companies of foot, sent from Moravia, Prince BATHIN with his Partisans was forced to raise the siege, and retire vnto Tirnau, sending to refresh their Troops in many places of high Hungary, for that they had ruined the champagne Country.

Let vs now return to Vienna, and see what good success the intercession hath had which many great Princes made for the restoring of the Palatine to his hereditary rights. Ambassadors had been with his Imperiall Maiesty from the King of Denmark and the Princes of the Vnion, and received their severall answers as you have heard, with small success. Our Kings Maiesty of great Brittain, who intermitted no care, nor charge to repair this breach of division between his Imperiall Maiesty and his sonne-in-law the Elector Palatine, and to save his hereditary Country for his posterity, which now lay in danger to be ruined, being invaded by potent enemies, vnder the Emperors Commission; he dispatched the Baron of Digbie, now Earle of Bristol, Vice-chamberlain to his Maiesty, in ambassage to the Emperor; who, arriving at Vienna in the beginning of July with an honourable train, was received with great state, and had his audience on the fifteenth of July. Some Writers relate, that the two chief points of his ambassage were, first, that the Elector Palatine, son-in-law to our Kings Maiesty, might be received into grace and favour with his Imperiall Maiesty, and restored to all his hereditary estates and titles which he had enjoyed before the troubles of Bohemia; and, secondly, that the Imperiall Proscription given out against him might be revoked, or the execution suspended. Which being performed, the Kings Maiesty of great Brittain would cause the Elector Palatine to yeeld all due obedience to his Imperiall Maiesty, and submit himself to all honest conditions of satisfaction.

To this demand he received an answer in writing, that his Imperiall Maiesty had a great desire to gratifie the King of great Brittain, and other Kings and Princes who had made the like intercession for the Elector Palatine; but the whole business consisted vpon two points: first, that he should cause the Elector Palatine to yeeld due obedience vnto his Imperiall Maiesty; and, secondly, that he should make satisfaction. His Imperiall Maiesty having also, during these troubles, used the advice and counsell of many Electors and Princes, to the end they should not think that in this important business he would do any thing which might prejudice them, he had appointed an Assembly at Ratisbone; that he would let the King understand the resolution that should be taken touching this business by the common consent of the said Electors and Princes; that in this war which had been continued with justice by his Imperiall Maiesty, there was no proportion between the parties for the continuance of hostility; that there was a difference between his Imperiall Maiesty who was feudatorie and soveraigne Judge, and the Elector Palatine who was condemned; that, according to the Kings request, his Imperiall Maiesty had granted a truce: but as soon as there was a suspension of Armes in the lower Palatinate, at the same Instant he caused warre to be renewed in the upper Palatinate; and persisting in his enterprises, he had sent his Commissions vnto MANSFELD and the Marquess of Lagerdorf, to cause new combustions in Bohemia, Silesia and Moravia; that he left it to the Ambassadors to judge whether he could doo otherwise than oppose his iust Armes against those who were raised against him: yet if FREDERICK the Elector Palatine did yeeld and consent vnto the admonitions of the King his father-in-law, all matters might well be compounded; freeing his Imperiall Maiesty and the obedient Princes of the Empire from the incalculous which they had iustly conceived. And thus much writes the French MARCVRIE touching this Treaty.

There is another author (who hath written a discourse called, Vna Demonstratio) relates, that vpon my Lord DONIUS second audience, his Maiesty made answer; That touching the suspension of Armes, which was the ground of the treaty, there seemed many difficulties:

first,

First, that he was not well acquainted with the state of the lower and upper Palatinate; whether a Truce might be made without prejudice: for that he understood, in the lower Palatinate, Sir HORATIO VERA had invaded the Bishop of Spire Countries, and broken the Truce; yet, for that he would not omit any thing which might tend to a Peace, and satisfy the Kings desire, he would presently write vnto the Duke of Bavaria for his counsel and consent touching this Truce; and Letters should be delivered vnto the Ambassador for the Arch-duchess of Brussels; who should have full power to conclude a Truce, unless there were apparent cause of danger: Whereunto his Maiesty did the more willingly incline; for that he promised, in the kings name, that as soon as a Truce were concluded, he would cause MANSFELD to observe it: Or if he should commit any hostile Act against his Imperiall Maiesty, or the Princes of the sacred Empire, during the said Truce, both the King and his sonne in Law, would declare him an enemy, and assist his Imperiall Maiesty, against him: Moreover, he would procure, that if Lagerdorf had any power and authority given him to offend or invade, that it should be presently revoked: But especially he assured, that the King his Master would dole with his sonne in Law, as that Tabor and Pinsigau, with all other places which were held by that party, should with all speed be restored to his Maiesty: Furthermore, that if his Imperiall Maiesty would passe his promise, that the execution of the foresaid Proscription, in the upper Palatinate, should be suspended during this Treaty, he would faithfully endeavour, that all *MANSFELD*s Souldiers should be discharged, and Armes laid down; with this condition, that if the said treaty of Peace should not have a desired end, his Imperiall Maiesty (before he should goe to Armes for the execution of the said Proscription) should be bound to give notice thereof, three months before to his Maiesty.

To this effect the Emperor wrote his Letters to the Infanta, and to the Duke of Bavaria, which Duke by his Letters, of the 27 of September, vnto the Lord Ambassador, seemed to have no inclination to a suspension of Armes, as appears by these words contained in the said Letter.

His Imperiall Maiesty, in the first entrance of our Army and beginning our works, hath given notice vnto vs of a motion for the suspension of Armes, and required our advice: but to returne presently and suspend the business, it was neither safe, nor possible: especially for that the suspension was chiefly referred to the Infanta of Spaine; neither have we conferred with those it doth concerne, having also MANSFELD with an Army at our doores, who might invade our Province, and so obiect other difficulties to frustrate the said suspension. The Lord Ambassador did much presse the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria by his Letters for his suspension of Armes; but he prevailed little: for the Emperor changed his minde, as it appeared by his Letters vnto the Duke of Bavaria, dated the thirtieth of September, by which he commanded him to invade the Palatinate by vertue of his Commission, and to reduce it vnto his obedience, and to take an Oath of Allegiance in his name. This Author writes much concerning this business, and of the transferring of the Electorate to the Duke of Bavaria, long before projected at Rome; to the end they might fortifie the Catholique party, and have always an Emperor at their devotion.

And, although they be Arcana imperij; yet I hope I shall incur no blame, if I lay open what I finde written by my Author. The Pope (much affecting this translation of the Electorshippe to the Duke of Bavaria) gave Commission to a Capuchin Frier called HACINTHVS, to goe and treat with the Emperour at Vienna: He had Letters of recommendation from Cardinal LODOVICO the Popes favorite; his charge was to persuade the Emperour to continue the warres, being against Heretiques, dangerous enemies to the holy mother Church of Rome; and disobedient to his Holiness; and that the Emperour should conferre the Electorall voice vpon the Duke of Bavaria, for that he was a Catholique Prince, and had well deserved it for the aide and assistance he had given him in his warres against the Palatine; whome he entertained to dispossesse of the Electorall voice, and to punish him as his rebellion and offence had deserved.

The business being resolved at Vienna, the Frier was sent into Spain, and Letters of credit sent after him, from the Emperour, writing to the King, and referring him to the Friers Commission; but especially to DON BALTHAZAR DE ZUNIGA (a great Counsellor of State, who died lately, being Vncle by the mothers side to the Earle of Olivares the kings favorite) by the which he gives him to understand, that he holds it most necessary, for the preservation and greatness of the holy Faith, and consequently of the house of Austria, to transerre the Electorship ship vpon the Duke of Bavaria; aduertising him withall that he was so much bound vnto the said Duke for his good deserts, and for the many promises he had made him aswell by word as writing, touching the translation of the Electorship, that he could not by any means retract it, without offence to God and a blemish to his honour, the which he hoped he would endeavour to preſerue. This Letter bare date from Venna the fiftenth of October 1621.

In a second Letter vnto DON BALTHAZAR of the same date, the Emperor set downe many reasons why he should not make a peace with the Elector, nor restore vnto him the Electoral dignity: in the end he concludes, that before that famous battaile at Prague, he had fully resolved, that the Palatine, being once proscribed, could not be restored to the Electoral dignity, without prejudice and danger vnto all Catholikes and to his house. That he had willingly offered it vnto the Duke of Bavaria, a stout Champion of the Catholike religion, whose aid & assistance he had employed in the recouerie of his Realmes and provinces: wherefore the very time did seeme to presse him more then the Duke himself, that he should performe his promise without any further delay; and the Electorship being conferred vpon him, the Palatine should be deprived of all hope, and they in like manner which had so earnestly desired his restitution, and his Maiesty freed from further trouble. Which business requiring the King of Spaines aide (although he knew him to be well enclined to any thing which concerned the honor of God and the safety of their house) yet would he not lose this occasion to perswade him, not to neglect so faire an opportunity for the settling of their house and religion. And in a Postscript to the same Letter he addes another motiue of no small consideration: which is, that by his translation they should haue a Catholike voice more then formerly they had; whereby they should be assured, that the Empire should be alwaies in the hands of the Catholikes, and by all reason in their house; wherein the Duke of Bavaria would willingly concur, in requall of the benefit he had receiued; to be aduanced to so great adignity, by an Emperor of their house.

The Capuein Fryer HYACINTHVS, having receiued his Commission sent him into Spain, had a Letter of aduice written with the Emperours owne hand, whereby he wished him not to speake any thing in that Court, that the Duke of Bavaria had gotten the inuestiture of the Palatinate; but should perswade them to concur with him in his opinion, and giue those aydes whereby they might effectually attaine vnto it, being so profitable and necessarie for the preservation of the holy faith, and consequent of their house; doubting that if he should say that his Maiesty had giuen away the inuestiture, it would much preiudice the cause; knowing well, that if he should be abandoned by the crowne of Spain, he should not be able with his owne forces to effect that which he had promised to the Duke of Bavaria. And he was in a manner assured (according to the daily speech of the Spanish Ambassador there resident) that this would undoubtedly follow; that he should be abandoned by the crowne of Spain, if the King should know he had giuen the inuestiture, before he had imparted it vnto that Crowne. The continuance of this warre, and the translation of the Electorship, was much pressed by the Popes Ministers and the Emperours. Cardinall LOPEZ wrote his Letters vnto the Popes Nuncio resident at Brussels, wishing him to employ all his means and credit with the Infanta, that no suspension of Armes might be granted; adding withall, that touching the Palatinate petition, being iustly deprived of the Palatinate, hee might hold it for a great fauour if hee might be admitted to humble himselfe at the Emperours feet: the which if he did, yet should not his children enjoy any parte of his patrimony, vnlesse they were bredde vpin the Catholike religion; being a capital error to restore those territories to heretiques, especially in regard of the Belgique prouinces to which they ly so neere.

The Popes Nuncio at Venna, wrote his Letters to the Nuncio at Brussels, intimating that there was no doubt of the Emperours inclination to conferre the Electorship vpon the Duke of Bavaria; but the business depended wholly vpon the Spaniard; otherwise, it had beene before this time decided. The Spaniards oppose the Elector of Saxony against the Bavarian, making that their pretence; but the truth is, said he, they are not pleased with his greatness, and desire to re-aine the lower Palatinate without any further warre. And for that they doubt that the Elector of Saxony, who desires to haue the constitutions of the Empire (which admit no strangers) to be religiously obserued, should oppose himselfe to their desires, they seeke by all means to please him, and giue him some colourable satisfaction; but in case he should be with-drawn, and become an enemy, by their cunning they seeke to perswade all the world, that this was not the true cause, that they haue retained the lower Palatinate; but, for that the Election was conferred vpon the Duke of Bavaria. To free them from this excuse, the Arch-
duke

duke CHARLES is gone to the Duke of Saxony vpon another pretext, and we shortly expect his answer. But be indifferent or heuall, and not directly contrary, then it is thought (and I will doe my best endeour) that the Emperour shall declare himselfe for the Bavarian, without any further delay; especially for that the Battle of Oppau hath declared that the king of Spain would conſent that the Electorship should be conferred vpon the Bavarian, if the Saxon did not oppose. But for that we feare the obliquity of the Count of Ogma (although the Saxon should not oppose) we haue sent rather HARTMANN secretly into Spain to oppose himselfe against the actions of OSUNA and the Baron of Dijly the English Ambassador, who is to go to that Court. It would much please the Spaniards, both to curbe the power of the Bavarian, and to haue the lower Palatinate at their command, in regard of the Belgique warres: As for our intentions, it is all one whether he or any other Catholique Prince hath them. And although it may be doubted, that this may breede some tumults in the Empire; yet matters standing as they doe, there is no cause of feare: for as for the Catholiques, BAVARIA (to doe his owne business) will easily pacifie most of them, being Clergy men. The Caluiniſts are disbanded, neither can they hope for any succors from France or Holland, being in both places in danger of their owne Estates. The Lutherans of Neutralites haue neither force nor courage: so as I think the Spaniards haue a great opportunity to attaine to their wished end: without the which, I cannot perswade my selfe, that they will euer suffer the Bavarian to obtaine any thing; notwithstanding that Marquess SPINOLA the last yeere at Munich in the presence of the Cardinall of Zalern did affirme that the Catholique King did not affect the inuestiture of the lower Palatinate, which the Earle of Ogma did seeke to procure him. But to conclude, it is thought the Spaniards (vpon whom all depends) will giue their consents vpon these foure conditions: First, that the Bavarian should restore the vpper Austria: Secondly, that in regard of his expences, he should haue the Electorshippe, with the vpper Palatinate; whose reuenues did exceede his charges. Thirdly, that the Spaniard should haue the lower Palatinate, and that the Bavarian should renounce all pretensions which he might haue to that State in regard of the Electorship. Fourthly, that there should be an offensive and defensive league made betwixt the Catholique league, his Imperiall Maiesty and the King of Spain, against any that should oppose themselves. Thus I haue set downe the contents of severall Letters touching the transferring of the Electorship to the Duke of Bavaria: for confirmation whereof the Reader may obserue the euents which haue succeded.

After the taking of Pilsen, Falkenau and Erlangen; MANSFELD, hauing no more places of retreat in Bohemia, lodged, with his Troupes, in the vpper Palatinate; where, hauing ioyned with the forces of the two Dukes of Saxony and Weymar, he made an Army of eighteen thousand men, which he led into the Bishoprick of Aichstat, and the Countrey of the Lantz-graue of Luchtenbourg. The Emperour, being aduertized hereof, gaue charge to the Baron of Tilly, to stop MANSFELD's courses: Also IAMES BAVVIA, of Offenau, General of the Bishop of Virzburg's Troupes, being ioyned with Tilly, they went to encounter MANSFELD; who was camped and entrenched at Verdun: From whence he made incursions vpon the Frontiers of Bohemia. TILLY and BAVVA, having battailed their Army right ouer against his, seized vpon a neighbouring Hill, and Wood; where they had many skirmishes together. Vpon the conjunction of TILLY's and BAVVA's Troupes, MANSFELD, as Commissarie to the Elector Palatine in Bohemia, published a declaration against the Bishop of Virzburg, and the Ducane and Chapter of Bamberg, to this effect:

Seeing it is well knowne vnto all men, that the Troupes of the Bishoppe of Verzburg were ioyned with the Duke of Bavaria's, in the warres of Bohemia; and that they doe giue vs occasion enough (as Commissaries to the King of Bohemia) to pursue the said Bishoppe and Chapter by Armes, according to the Talion Law; I thought it better to vse grace and clemency, then force, and to send them a Trumpetto aduertize them to call back their Troupes from Bohemia, and to admonish and enioyne them not to meddle with secular affaires, but containe themselves within the bounds of their Ecclesiasticall function: Which if they doe, they shall haue mee their friend; otherwise they must expect that I will bring Fire and Sword into their Countreys.

MANSFELD, hauing intelligence that the Imperialists meant to force him in his Camp, resolved to prevent them, and to charge them in their lodgings, the 14 of Iulie: He began first with Hofslodtz; where the horsemen sallied forth with a hundred and fifty Musketeers, Germans, to defend the approaches; but the Mansfeldians charged them with such furie, that they flue

many, and put the rest to flight. Some of their chiefe commanders were taken prisoners in the Towne; which they spoiled and burnt: From thence they went to their second lodging, which was at Saint CATHERINES; the entry whereof was more difficult by reason of fens and ditches which they were to passe, the bridges being also broken: In this place were five hundred Souldiers: who, seeing themselves so resolutely set upon, abandoned the same, to retire themselves into a Wood; where twelue thousand of MANDSELD's Souldiers pursued them so speedily, as, hauing no leisure to recollect themselves, they cast away their Armes and fled: in which flight, there were 300 slaine, and many taken prisoners with much cattell which they carried to their Camp.

TILLY and BAYERN, seeking to repaire this disgrace, put all their troupes in battail, on the sixteenth of Iuly, with an intent to charge him; which, MANDSELD finding, hee did the like as well as he could in those mountainous places, hauing twenty Cornets of Horse, and fifty companies of foote: This day was spent in skirmishes from eight of the clock in the morning, vntill nine at night: but MANDSELD, hauing foure field-peeces, shotte directly vpon the Imperialists, who received a farre greater losse then the Mansfeldians, and yet they came not to a generall battaille: Some write that MANDSELD lost but 100 men, and the Imperialists 1000, six Captains, and their General BAYERN who was shot in the head, being afterwards embalmed at Egra. As they conducted his body to Virsburg with a small train, they were charged by the garrison of VALDSAXEN, who took all his baggage and thirty three horse. Afterwards, his body (at the request of the Bishop of Bamberg) was deliuered, and solemnly interred at Virsburg with a military pomp. Vpon the nineteenth of Iuly, some of MANDSELD's Army took a conuoy which went to the Imperials; in which ther was a good quantity of powder and other munition, with many carts loaden with wine, and sixty horse. On the first of August the two Armies stood in battell one against another, from noon till eight of the clock at night: General TILLY did what he might to draw the Mansfeldians to a generall combat: but there was nothing but light skirmishes with many cannon shot, in which the Imperials had the better. Some write, that a bullet of five and twenty pound waight fell so neer vnto Count MANDSELD (who was with two Princes of Weimar and the Earl of Selms) that it couered his horse with dust.

The Emperour, being aduertized of the warre which MANDSELD made in the vpper Palatinate, caused a second Edict of Proscription to be published against him; containing, That it was well knowne to all the World, how that his Predecessor the Emperour MATTHIAS had Proscribed ERNST, bastard of MANDSELD for his felonies and crimes, and that the said MANDSELD, continuing his disobedience, threatened to put the Countries and Princes of the Empire (which had continued faithfull in their obedience vnto his Imperial Maiefty) to Fire and Sword. That some Princes and States, against the constitutions of the Empire, fauoured him and gaue him passage through their territories; induced therunto by the Palatinate, an apparant enemy to his Imperiall Maiefty, and by him also Proscribed: Which Palatinate, the said MANDSELD, by his last Mandats, did still tearme King of Bohemia. That his Imperiall Maiefty had well hoped that hereafter the said MANDSELD should not finde any one to fauour and protect him, fearing the punishment inflicted by the constitutions of the Empire; which had not succeeded. That to shew his naturall clemency, he thought good againe to aduertise all the Princes, States, and members of the Empire, that vpon the Penalties contained in the said constitutions, they should not giue any passage through their Territories to the said MANDSELD nor his souldiers. As for the Captaines, Officers and Souldiers, which followed the said MANDSELD, that they should abandon him vpon paine (for such as were subiects to the Empire) of the losse of all their dignities, priuiledges and immunities, and for those which were strangers, vpon losse of life.

The Town of Nuremberg hauing submitted it self to the Emperours obedience (as hath been formerly said) would not suffer any souldiers to be leuiued, nor go out of the Town, before they had taken a new oath to the Duke of BAVARIA in the name of his Imperiall Maiefty. Moreover, the Imperiall Ban against MANDSELD had been proclaimed there; whereat he was wonderfully incensed: and, to take reuenge, he went into the Territories of the City neer vnto it with 500 horse and 1000 musketiers on horseback; who, dispersing themselves round about it, and vpon all the approaches, committed infinite spoils.

The Duke of BAVARIA was intreated by the Bishops of Virsburg, Bamberg, and other States of the Empire, to free them from the oppression of MANDSELD's incursions and spoyles: where-whereupon, leaving his instruments of musick (which is his greatest delight) hee gaue the Rein-de-vous for all his troops, his cannon and munition, at Stranbin, to march into the vpper Palatinate.

MANDSELD (as we haue formerly related) being encamped with his Army in the vpper Palatinate, they were not onely much afflicted with pestilent diseases, by reason of the dead carcases both of men and cattell, but the Bauarians did also much annoy them with their ordinance and daily assaults. To repaire which losse he gaue money to certaine Captaines to leuie new souldiers, and heretook 4000 men, who hiding their matches vnder their hats, marched all night to surpriue the Bauarians in their Camp: but it hapned that being nere, a French-man by chance discharged a peece, which made the whole Camp cry To Armes; so as this attempt being made voide, he resolved to fire a wood which the Bauarians held, spreading great store of powder on the one side with pitch barrels burning: but ther suddenly fel to great a shower of raine as it took no effect.

The Duke of BAVARIA, hauing prepared all things readie to march into the vpper Palatinate; he parted from Munich or Jannich on the 13 of Iuly: and hauing past the riuer of Dannew and ioyned with TILLY his Lieutenant, he mustered his Army; in which were six and twenty thousand men. What his exploits were, and how MANDSELD left the vpper Palatinate you shall soone heare.

In the moneth of May, the souldiers which remained in the Palatinate for the Elector, fell vpon certaine Townes and villages belonging to the Bishop of Spire: as Forß, Hochdorf, Niderhich, Hamlet and others; and the twenty two of August following, Don GONZALEZ de Cordua, Generall for the Spaniard, put in execution an enterprife which hee had, vpon the Castle and Tower of Stein, a strong place, situated in a marsh ground betwixt Wormes and Germensheim; whereas fiftene Pelants which kept it were all slaine. This Castle being one of the keyes of the Palatinate on that side, the Army which was left for the guard of the Palatinate with fiftene hundred Boors, ranne presently thither to recouer it if they might: but they found that the Spaniard had fortified it well with a good garrison and munition. At their first approach they recovered a Ruelin: but most of them being forced to stand vp to the waste in water, and so to fight with the enemy, being also beaten by three cannon which the Spaniard had planted on the other side of the Rhine, they were after three daies forced to raise their siege, hauing lost 300 men, and 70 hurt. What number of Spaniards were slaine is vncertain: there were many hurt in the Castle, which they carried away with them: and since, they haue fo fortified this place, that they haue made it a receit of contribution; to the which they haue made the towns of Northeim, Warneuborn and Byblise with their territories, subiect.

The Duke of BAVARIA being entred with his Army into the vpper Palatinate, hearing that MANDSELD received most of his victual and refreshing from Amberg, meaning to deprive them of those helpes and to cut off that passage, he surpriued certaine rich monasteries vpon the way, and went to besiege Chamh, which he summoned to yeeld by his trumpet. The Governor made answer he had no commandement from them of Amberg to yeeld; whereupon he battered it with foure Cannon: whereupon the Governour mistrusting his forces began to perswade his souldiers, that it were better to departe with their liues then to endure the discomforts of a siege and preuaile nothing; so as in the end they made their composition, and departed with Armes and baggage, and ioyned themselves to MANDSELD with three companies of foote and two of horse. Hauing taken this Towne, the Duke went on and made himselfe maister of diuers others. In the meane time MANDSELD hauing intercepted a messenger with Letters, whereby the Duke aduertised the Lantzgrau of Luchtemberg that his intent was to send certaine troupes of Bauarians to cut off MANDSELD's passage; hereupon sending some forces to Sfrends, he forced the Towne and took the Lantzgrau in it, whome he brought to Amberg.

The Noblemen and States of the vpper Palatinate, seeing that they received more losse and preiudice from the Mansfeldian souldiers, who should haue defended them, then from the Bauarians, hauing received monitorial Letters from the Duke, that they should abandon MANDSELD, who would ruine their country, they resolved to leave him and to submit themselves vnto the Duke; with this Promise, that he should not alter any thing in point of religion nor policie. MANDSELD knowing the resolution with the States of the vpper Palatinate had taken, and seeing that his passage would be cut off by the Bauarians, and that he should finde little meanes to releue his Army: to auoide this danger, being pressed by a Potent aduersary and in want

1621 Mansfeld offered to submit to the Emperor.

want both of money to pay his souldiers and of other meanes to releuee them, hee made offer to submit himselfe to the Emperours obedience, promising to serue him with his Army, so as he might receiue a certaine summe of money to giue them content; whereupon, hauing receiued part, he deliuered vp his fortification at Verdunse (which hee could no longer keepe) to the Bauarians.

This treaty of MANSFELD hath bene diuersly censured. Some haue thought that he did it in policie, onely to entertaine time and to finde meanes to slip downe into the lower Palatinate. Others affirme, that he treated seriously being in great wants; That his souldiers pressed him for money and were ready to mutine, which might haue bene dangerous to his person; and that the Lord DORRY his Maiesties Ambassadour, hauing sent to the Duke of Bavaria, and finding no hope of any suspension of Arms, came by MANSFELD; with whom he had conference, putting him in minde of his oath to the Elector Palatine, chosen King of Böheim, of the honour which he had formerly gotten by Arms, the which would now be quite blemished by this act of infidelity; perswading him to be constant, and withall supplying him with a good summe of money to giue his souldiers some content: whereupon, hee forbore to conclude the Treaty, vntill he had gotten a passage with his forces into the lower Palatinate. Being freed from this danger, he brake off the Treaty, and declared himself an enemy to the Bauarian Ambassadors who had still followed his Camp. This newes did frustrate their ioy at Prague which they had conceiued for MANSFELD'S reduction to the Emperor.

The Spaniards in the lower Palatinate vnder the command of GONZALEZ de Cordua, going out of Stein, and seeing that Sir HORATIO VERR had fortified Heidelberg, Manheim and Frankendale, with strong garrisons, went and took most of the Towns towards the mountains, and then returned to Lutbra a Town not well prepared to endure a siege, nor the citizens inured to labour and danger: wherefore, the Gouverner and his garrison being let out at the vpper port, they receiued in troops of Spaniards.

The truce between the Spaniard and the States of the vnited Provinces being now ended, Marquess SPINOLA came down with a powerfull Army, and lay neer vnto Wetzell, sending Count HENRY of Pandenbergh to inuest IVLIERS a Fee of the Empire, disputed by the Marquess of Brandenburg and the Duke of Nimburg, as heirs to the Duke of Cleues; but now held by the vnited States, as Cleues is by the Spaniard. There was a strong garrison in the Town; who, seeing themselves besieged, made a great salie on the foure and twentieth of September, and tooke their nearest Trenches in despite of the Spaniard. In the meane time there grew a great Fier in the Campe, many Tents were burnt, and the besieged annoyed them much with their Cannon; and, making a new salie, they spoiled Count HENRIS quarter, carrying what they got into the Towne. The Earle following them with most of his house, the Towne-men lost a Capitaine with thirty six horse-men; which, being slaine, they had leaue the next day to burie them.

In the meane time, the Spaniards in the lower Palatinate took the strong Castle of Landstule, which hauing fortified with a great garrison and munition, they turned their forces to Frankendale, vnder GONZALEZ de Cordua's command, they being, as some write, twelue or thirteenth thousand men; They pitched their Campe on the twenty seventh of September, towards Spire and Manheim, and fortified themselves both against the besieged, or any forraigne Enemy; which done, they began to plant their Ordinance. This Towne hath bene built of late yeers by Wallons, which were fled out of the low Countries for Religion, during the time of the Duke of Alua, when as the Elector Palatine protected them with their families, and gaue them leaue to build and fortifie it, being before of no import.

Vpon the approach of the Spanish Army, the Towne being vnder the command of the English, Capitaine BYRONNES being Gouverneur; Capitaine FAIRFAX, a gallant Gentleman, who was there slaine, and buried in the bed of honour, hauing command of the out-works of the Towne, encouraged his Souldiers, telling them that the Towne was a part of the King of England's daughters iointure, and the warres they vndertook were for two reasons: first, for that being Protestants the Papists came to assault them, and to take the place; and, secondly, they were sent to defend her right, which was the place whereon they stood; and that for his part he would not lose one foot whilst he breathed, neither did he doubt but they would doo the like: whereas they all protested they would dy in her defense. The enemy, hauing made his trenches and fortifications, came late in the euening being very dark, and surprised a sentinell: who, being amazed, cast away his Arms and fledde; and, mistaking the out-work from which

1621

which he was sent, ranne to the half Moon which lay vnder the Town-walls. They within the out-works, hauing no aduertisement of the enemies approach, were for the most part slain, being sixty English and Dutch. Capitaine FAIRFAX, then Sergeant maior, hearing the alarme, came to the half Moon, takes a pike, asked what Gentlemen would go with him; and being in haste, went without his corset with his pike and sword onely, and entred the trenches, which he found strongly guarded by the enemy; where he charged and hurt diuerse: but, the night being exceeding dark, he was thrust through his buffe coat into the left side, and was caried off by one of his Followers; of which wound he was soon cured.

The enemy laid vpon the Town with his cannon: and on the thirtieth of September the besieged made a salie, ouerthrew their trenches, and had taken foure peeces of ordinance if they had been assisted by any horse: but they were forced to retire. They continued their batterie, but did not annoy the Town, shooting still ouer it: whereof being aduertised by two boies which went out to gather grapes, they planted their cannon lower, and did much annoy their houses; so as they hoped it would terrifie the Townsmen, that they would soon yeeld. The enemy, hauing taken the out-work, approached neer to the half Moon where the English lay; whither Capitaine FAIRFAX came, being somewhat recovered: where incouraging the souldiers, and offering to make a musket shot into the enemies work, he had his thigh broken with a demi-cannon; wherewith falling down, he cried, Gentlemen, I haue lost my leg: yet bee not dismayd, but fight like braue Englishmen; for, my heart shall be alwaies with you. Whereupon, he was caried away; and died that night, and was buried with an honourable funeral pomp, to the great grief of the souldiers and the Burgers of the Town: who, to shew their loue, erected a monument in remembrance of so worthy a souldier.

The enemy (seeing he could preuail nothing by force nor by his cannon) vpon the ninth of Nouember began to shoot fiery bullets into the Town: but the Besieged with their wifes and children vsed such diligence to quench the fire, that it proved fruitlesse. The same night they made an assault vpon the Port of Spire: but it took no effect, being repulsed by the Besieged. The next day there fell a great rain, which was very preiudiciall to the Spaniard: for, their trenches being made in a moist ground, and growne dry for want of water, their fortifications fell, and their trenches were full of water. In the meane time, Count MANSFELD came out of the vpper Palatinate with his forces and ten peeces of ordinance, towards Nuremberg; where hearing that the Spaniards had besieged Frankendale, hee marched on speedily with his forces to relieue it.

On the thirteenth of October the Spaniard sent a Trumpet to the Town to require them to yeeld in the Emperors name, with promise that the Burgeses should enioy their liberties with free exercise of religion; and that the souldiers should depart with their colours fleeing, their Arms and all their baggage: but they had an answer sent them from Capitaine BYRONNES the Gouverner, that the Towne was not his, but had charge from Generall VERR to keep it, and that they must bring his consent from Manheim; that he could not trust their promises, hauing seen the contrary by the example of others. The Trumpet hauing receiued this answer, with many threats he returned to the enemy, who renewed his battery against the Town. The same night the Besieged heard a great noife of horses in the wood, nothing suspecting the Spaniards rising, who had so lately summoned them to yeeld: but they being aduertised that Count MANSFELD and Generall VERR made haste to raise the siege, departed suddenly, leauing many sick and wounded, with much Arms and munition behind them. At the break of day the English which guarded the out-works went into their Camp, where they found some Italians; whom they spared for that they were not Spaniards. The Spaniards being gon towards Worms, the Besieged threw down their fortifications and trenches. The Citizens were very resolute to defend the Town, sparing neither cost nor labour. Of the Spaniards there were slain 3000, by the report of some prisoners. The Besieged lost 109 souldiers: among which were Capitaine FAIRFAX and his brother, and the brother of the Gouverner BYRONNES.

During this siege of Frankendale, Don GONZALEZ drew out some of his forces to break off the Bridge at Manheim. Sir HORATIO VERR the Generall (who was neuer daunted at the sight of any enemy) commanded his men to come into the out-work before the bridge, and there to be quiet till the enemies approach: who coming on with a great resolution, they gaue them such a volley of shot, that they were forced to retire with the losse of many; yet being not daunted heerewith, they came to a second assault, where they were entertained in the like manner, and with as great losse: so as, despairing of any successe, they retired, casting most of their

C. Mansfeld
resolved to leave Frankendale.
died.

Frankendale
rejoiced.

their slain men into the river of Rhine. Count MANDSFELD, being ignorant of the raising of the siege at Frankendale, marched over the bridge at Manheim with 108 companies of foot, 56 of horse, and foure peeces, to relieue the Besieged; with whom joined Generall VERR, MERRIVS Gouverner of Heidelberg, OBERMAYND, and others with their forces. The Citizens of Frankendale gaue to MANDSFELD 12000 florins for raising of their siege, to the end he might giue some content to his souldiers. He followed the Spaniards towards Steim: but finding them well fortified, and not able to attempt any thing without danger, he dismissed Generall VERR and the other Commanders, marching himself with his army into the Bishopp-ricke of Spire, to get what he could.

The Duke of Banaria, seeing himself circumvented by Count MANDSFELD (having taken an oath from them of Amberg, Newmark, and others) sent 47 Troops of horse and 85 companies of foot, vnder the command of Generall TILLY, to follow him into the lower Palatinate: whereof some Dutchmen ran away, others fell to robbing and spoiling without respect of friend or foe. At his first coming into the Palatinate, hee took many places towards the Mountain: and, drawing neer to Heidelberg, he sent Letters vnto them, signifying that he had commission from his Imperiall Maiefty and the Duke of Banaria, to reduce the lower Palatinate to the Emperors obedience; to the which end he had brought an Army: but before he would proceed to force, he would admonish and require them not to oppose themselves in so iust a cause, whereby they should draw ruine vpon themselves and the whole Province; that hee expected a kinde answer from them, hoping that they would willingly submit themselves to the Emperors command; whereby hee promised them all safety and good vlsage, and that they should receiue no wrong from the souldiers; but should be defended like to the subjects of the vpper Palatinate: but if they should do otherwise, and not obey the Emperors commandment, he would ioin his forces with Don CORDVA, Lieutenant Generall of the Spaniards, and subdue them by force.

The Citizens of Heidelberg made answer to these Letters, that they were much grieved to receiue them by night by a Trumpet; that it was not in their power, neither could they by their oath resigne a gouernment to another which was committed vnto them by the Magistrate: wherefore they did hope, that he would excuse them if they did not satisfie his desire; that they would speedily aduertise their Magistrate thereof, and expect his answer: in the meane time they did hope, that he would not attempt any thing by force. This answer, being giuen by the Counsellors of Heidelberg, was not pleasing to the Gouerners, who, staying it, sent another to TILLY after this manner: that they had received his Letters which were sent by night contrary to the discipline of war, and seen with admiration what he desired from the Counsellors of Heidelberg; that the gouernment was committed to them, but referred to them by Generall VERR their Commander; that they could not gratifie him, nor dispose of any thing in so difficult a businesse without his consent, especially for that the whole Electorship was committed to Generall VERR, and the City of Heidelberg to their guard: the which they resolved to defend to their last gasp; that if he or any other desired to try their valor, they could not hinder it: but he might come and see whether there were lesse worth in the souldiers, than in the garri- son of Frankendale.

The Elector of Saxony, coming to Presslaw to receiue the oath of alleageance in the Emperors name from the Princes and States in Silesia, was receiued with great pomp, and brought into the City the 22 of October by the Princes of Ligniss and Munsterberg. The next day, the Princes and States being assembled in the Castle, he caused the Emperors proposition to be read vnto them; whereby he let them vnderstand, that his Maiefty was glad the Princes and States of Silesia had so willingly come to that prouinciall assembly; neither could any thing haue bin more pleasing to him than to haue been present there himself: but being diuerred by many affairs of importance, he had committed that businesse to the Elector of Saxony to represent his person; the which, for his obedience towards his Maiefty, and his loue to the Princes and States of Silesia, he would not refuse. He wished them as much happinesse as they had ioyned in the time of his Predecessors: and seeing the Provinces were now settled in peace by the grace of God and his great care, he hoped they would continue constant, and giue him aid to repell his barbarous enemies: to which end he desired a speedy contribution of 500000 dollars, for that many other poorer Provinces, and which had been much exhausted, had dealt bountifully; that they knew how much it concerned them to haue the bounds of Hungary preserved. To the which end both their Ancestors and the States of Bohemia had spent much: and now the danger was very great: for defense whereof, the Emperor required 100000 dollars yearly for 6 yeeres. As for the tribute or excise of beer for the maintenance of the Court, hee desired they would continue it as they formerly had done, his treasure being exhausted by reason of ciuill warres. And for the removing of all occasions of war in that Province, he desired them not to entertain any more souldiers than were fit to defend their Frontiers, and to send the rest against the Turk with a yearly contribution. The next day the Elector coming to the Castle, the Princes, States and Citizens, took a new oath to the Emperor.

was

During this Assembly, the Marquess of Jagendorf sent two Trumpets vnto them, with Letters to perswade them not to take an oath to the Emperor, but to continue constant in the league and faith which they had once sworn to FREDERICK their King, and not to hasten the ruine of their Country by an vnecessary defection: they could not be ignorant how grievous it would be to them who knew his good disposition, having defended Silesia from hostile inuasions. And being bound to satisfie God and the league they had sworn, hee perswaded them to send their Deputies to BERTLIN GABOR, and to himself as Commissary to the King of Bohemia, within 14 daies with a declaration of their intents. But if any thing hapned to the contrary, he should be very much grieved for the ruine of the Country, but the cause should be imputed to them who had been the motives of these combustions by their ambition and couetize.

Notwithstanding these threatening Letters, the Princes and States of Silesia made answer to the Emperors proposition, that they were ready to pay 400000 Imperials or dollars at certain daies; that they would contribute 700000 dollars yearly during the space of six yeeres for the defense of the Frontiers of Hungary: for the excise of beer they were content to supply his Maiesty for ten yeeres, and for their auxilliary forces: according to the present estate of the Countrey. This answer being pleasing to the Elector Palatine, a generall peace was proclaimed in Silesia.

CHRISTIAN, Duke of Branswick, and Bishop of Halberstad, cosin-germane to the Queen of Bohemia, having a desire to relieue the Palatinate, gathered what forces he could together in the Lowe-countries, and on the 18 of October departed from Emerick with his Army. Having sent 2600 foot and 300 horse before into the territories of Alinden, Hilsenheim and Branswick, they committed great spoils: and being commanded from the Bishop of Halberstad's brother, the Duke of Lunenburg, and the Administrator of Magedburg, to remove their Camp, they would not obey; so as they were suddenly set vpon by the souldiers of the Country, and most of them slain, losing their Arms and Ensignes. The Duke was not daunted for this misfortune, but continued his resolution to go into the Palatinate with thirteen companies of foot and five hundred horse.

MAVRICE, Lantzgrau of Hesse, at this time invaded the iurisdiction of the Earles of Waldeck, for that they had demanded their fees from the Emperor, and not from him; as also for the ancient contentions for the City of Corbac. Hee took the Castle of Eisingen, drave away the Gouerner, and manned it with a good garri- son, leaving all to the spoile of the souldiers, who were in peeces all their Registres, Letters, Seals and Documents which did concern Mentz, Cullen, Paterborn and Hesse, which had been kept there for many yeeres in an originall form. From thence he went to other Castles, Cities and Towns, making them subiect to him. Hee called together the Knights and other States of Corbac; letting them vnderstand, that the Earls of Waldeck had lost their fee by their owne fault: wherefore they should not assist them against the iurisdiccions of Corbac and Hesse, but ioin with his Officers. The Earles in the meane time fledde to some places of safety; one of them posting to the Emperor to acquaint him with the whole businesse.

In the Palatinate, TILLY with his Banarian Army made hauock in the mountaine-Countries, spoiling all places; so as the Inhabitants were forced to flee away for extreme want and penury. MANDSFELD committed no lesse spoile on this side of the river of Rhine in the Bishoppes of Spire's Country, causing the Towne of Brugel to redeeme it selfe for a great summe of money. TILLY and CORDOVA with their ioynt forces might easily haue releued it: but there was some distast between them; so as he had good meanes to escape them: and on the thirteenth of Nouember, passing the bridge at Manheim, he besieged Diedesheim, and took it, finding in it a great booy: committing the guard thereof vnto the Duke of Lauenbourg of Saxony: after which he tooke the Towne and Castle of Kerchwil; where the Captaine and garri- son followed his colours. Afterwards he seized vpon Lauterbourg, which was very rich; because those which inhabited the Country had brought their wealth into it; all which hee

Aaaa

gaue

Tilly's success in the lower Palatinate.

The Marquess of Jagendorf diffusing from the oath.

Resolution of the States of Silesia.

Branswick goes into the Palatinate.

The Elector of Saxony comes to Presslaw to receive the oath of the Silesians.

gaue to the souldiers for spoil. Planting his Camp there, he caused 6000 foot and 16 companies of horse to be leui'd.

The Spaniards and the Bauarians on the 21 of Nouember, being 18000 men, marched towards Lauenbourg to recouer that Town: to relieue which, MANSFELD posted thither with foure peeces of ordinance, but seeing the Spaniards lodged vpon aduantage, he retired: after which the Town yielded. After Count MANSFELD's departure out of the vpper Palatinate, the garrison of Tabor could hope for no relief, yet they refused to yeeld vnto DON BALTIZAR; protesting that they would defend it to the last gasp. Having planted his cannon, he fought by all means to make a breach. The thirteenth of October, the Besieged endured an assault the space of three houres: they repul't the Imperials with great losse, there being three Captains and many souldiers slain, and 200 fore wounded. They had resolved to defend it till S. MARTIN'S day, and to expect succours if happily any might come; as appeared by their Letters intercepted to Count MANSFELD. The day aforesaid being comm, and no succours appearing, the garrison being in great want both of wood and salt, and the Gouverner a little before dead, they did capitulate, and left the Town on the 18 of Nouember, going out with their colours fleeing, Arms and baggage: which the Imperials mand with a strong garrison, the Citizens redeeming themselves from spoil for a summe of money: but yet they were not suffred to go out of the Town. The Noble-men of Bohemia which had fled thither, and continued there during the siege, were apprehended and put in prison.

CHRISTIAN the younger, Prince of Anhalt, who had been hitherto kept prisoner at Newstad, after many intercessions was brought to Piemma the 26 of Nouember with a conuoy of fifty horse. He was lodged in an Inne, and had free liberty to walk vp and down the City. The 12 of December he was admitted to the Emperors presence, and humbly craved pardon for his offense, the which he obtained after some repetition made by the Vice-chancellor.

Some months before, CHRISTIAN the elder, Prince of Anhalt, fled to the Emperor for pardon, writing Letters to this sence:

The mercy which his Maiesty had shewed to offenders against him in this Bohemian warre, had made him (plunged in great miseries) to flee to his Imperiall Maiesty, hoping that the gate of grace should not be shut against him; especially for that he had this more peculiar than the rest, having been neither the author nor beginner of these combussions, but was lately drawn in to them: neither was he absolutely subiect to his Maiesty as a great number of others, but mediately as a Prince of the Empire; neither was he at that time tied to him by oath; that he could truly affirm, he came not to those warres with any bad intent to his Maiesty, being his supreme Magistrate: but the care and loue to religion which the Bohemians so much complaind would be oppressed, and the faith which he had vowed for many yeers to the Elector Palatine, had ingaged him in these miseries; neither had he euer any wil to oppose himself against CÆSAR, but onely to preuent the falling of those countries into any strangers hands, and to see the combussions pacified by some honest Treaty: to which end he had vsed many graue admonitions. But, all hope of composition being taken away, he could do no lesse than became the Generall of an Army; preuenting as much as in him lay all vnneccessary deuastations and spoils, and preferring the recovery of peace and publike safety before the discomforts of war. In the end finding that God had not onely giuen CÆSAR victory, but made it knowne to the world that he would not haue religion alwaies defended by the sword, he had speedily laid down Armes, and perswaded the Palatine to make his composition, although in shew he had great means to renew the war. Hee would not deny, but the loue of the reformed religion and of the Elector Palatine had drawne him into this error: yet it was true, no man liued without fault and neuer erre; God onely was free from sinne, it was not giuen to men. It was common for all men to erre: if he in like manner had failed, he humbly besought his Imperiall Maiesty to couer his error with the cloke of his mercy and clemency, and to pardon all his offenses, to receiue him and his again into fauour, and restore his captiue sonne to liberty and his former dignity; which should be an honour to his Maiesty, and binde him for so great a fauour to doo him perpetuall seruice.

The 21 of Nouemb. the Spaniards (who lay claim to any thing lying fit for them) attempted the strong Castle of Reinsfeld in the Earldom of Casembogen; which was out of the Palatinate, nor depended thereon, meaning to surprize it by night, sending certain companies of men with a guide who knew all the passages, & brought them by night to their fortifications on the other side of the Castle: which hauing surprized, and discharged some peeces, they required them in the the Emperors and the King of Spain's name to yeeld: the Garrison, being moued at this sudden surprize and importunate demand, fell to Armes, and so played the Spaniard with shot and wilde fire, as they forced them to abandon the place which they had taken, and to retire. The Spaniard sought to excuse the fact, vpon a pretence of the Duke of Brunswick's comming, desiring only to hold this Castle for a time, to the end they might stop his passage through Hassia.

CHRISTIAN, Duke of Brunswick, Bishop of Halbarstad, passed on the eighteenth of Nouember through Hassia, into the Elector of Mentz's Countrie; where he tooke Amenbourg by a stratagem. Whilst that the Captaine treated with some Officers for the lodging of his Troupes, certaine souldiers going before with a guide, who knew the place, crept vp a Hill, and got into the Castle by an old Priuie which was ruined: Being in possession thereof and giuing a signe to some horse-men which were neerer, they left their horses and went vp with their peeces. The Townsmen, hereupon, went to the walles to defend themselves; but BRYNSVICK'S forces, slaying out of the Castle, took the Towne; whereupon they fled, leauing a great booty vnto the Enemy. After which they took Newstad, with all that tract, with some Townes belonging to the Lantz graue of Darmstadt, and other Noble-mens Castles in the valley of Baier, spoiling the Countrie thereabout.

In the meane time LAVVSES of Hassia, Lantz-graue of Darmstadt, sent his Deputies to the Duke of Brunswick; signifying, that whereas he and the Elector of Mentz, had receiued great spoiles by the passage of Souldiers, his Imperiall Maiesty had expressly forbidden, that no souldier should be suffered to passe, vpon the penalties prescribed by the Imperiall constitutions; perswading him to forbear to appoint them any lodgings; and that he should returne the same way he came.

The Duke of Brunswick made answer, that he would willingly (as much as in him lay) forbear his Countrie; yet he was aduertised that he took Armes to oppress his Souldiers: which he could not beleue, hauing not deserued it; but if hereafter any wrong should be done vnto them, he would reuenge it by what means he couer.

Hereunto the Lantz-graue made answer, that he was glad he would neither doe wrong to him nor his; yet he vnderstood, by faithfull relation, that his souldiers had entred into diuers places of his iurisdiction, laine his subiects, and spoiled them of their goods: which fact hee also vnderstood he had detested, and therefore hee entreated him to seeke out the Authors, and punish them for examples sake. Touching his resolution and end, he would speake nothing: As for his passage, so it was, that the Generall of the Burgundian Army, in the Palatinate, hearing that the Baron Dona was marching vp with some troups against the Emperour, had entreated him and other Princes to be carefull that no Army, opposite to the Emperour, should passe by the Riuers of Main and Rhine; whereby it may be easily gathered, that he makes himselfe a partaker of the warres which should giue passage to strange Souldiers, and therefore he did aduise DONA, that he should not molest him in his passage, the which he easily obtained. The like cause he had now for this admonition, neither did he hope that he would willingly offer any violence to his Countrey: And whereas he had with the neighbour Electors and Princes, leui'd some Souldiers to preuent the imminent dangers which might ensue, he hoped hee should be blamed no more then the Saxon Princes, who had denied passage to many. That the Spaniards and Bauarians prepared themselves to meete him and stop his passage with all their forces, whereby his Countries might receiue much spoile; the which he might easily preuent, if he would retire and leaue those vpper parts of the Rhine: Wherefore he entreated him that he would take the safest and most excusable way, and desist from his enterprise; That before he vnderstood of his expedition, he had entred into treaty with the neighbor Electors and Princes, not to giue passage to any Souldiers, wherefore he should not take this his declaration in ill part; wishing well to him and his whole family.

That he meddled not with the affaires of the Palatinate, but sought only to stop the passage of Souldiers, which would be a preiudice to his Countrey. That he might turne his forces against the Enemy of Christendome, where he should reape more honour; for in these places he should but afflict his friends and innocent subiects. He entreated him therefore to change his minde and to returne into the Lowe-countreys, and to free his territories from danger, not doubting but he would giue more care to his fatherly admonition (which honour hee had once vouchsafed him) then to the perswasions of others which were not so well affected vnto him.

The young Duke of Brunswick expected another answer: but being moued therewith he wrote vnto him like a souldier; that whereas he vnderstood (beyond his expectation) that hee with his subiects and other souldiers intended to stop his passage, he feared them not, nor the Spanish forces; but resolved to proceed in his resolution by the grace of God, notwithstanding any opposition: wherefore he should rest resolved, that if he or his souldiers should receive any wrong, both he and his posterity should reuend it.

1621

Before the receipt of these Letters, the Lantzgrau had written vnto MAVRICE, Lantzgrau of Hesse, informing him how that he had aduised the Duke of Brunswick to abandon those vpper parts of the Rhine, and not to molest his subiects; which he seemed not to regard: it being therefore to be feared, that if he should continue in his resolution, and try the doubtfull event of warre, the seat of the warre would be drawne into Hesse, and their Countries afflicted with all discommodities, he could not but intreat him to deal with the Duke of Brunswick, and to perswade him to depart; the which if he would effect, hee would doo his best endeavour to stay the Emperors Troops, being ready to march into those parts against him: it being also necessary in these dangerous times that some agreement should be made between neighbor Princes, how passage should be allowed or denied, it agreeing both with the law of nature and of nations; and therefore he did hope, and likewise intreated him, if he should be any way pressed by the Bishop of Halberstat, or in danger, that he for their old contracts would come to succour him, as he would do for him in the like case.

The Lantzgrau MAVRICE made answer to these Letters, that whereas he intreated him to cause the Bishop of Halberstat to retire with his Army, thinking it to be in his power, hee did not doubt, but he vnderstood well by his former Letters, that those Troops were not onely leuiued in the King of Bohemia's name, but by the States of the vnitied Prouinces, and sent to those parts: wherefore to set vpon those souldiers, and thereby to offend such potent Princes, was not safe; that he was aduertised, the Bishop was passing to another Territory; that he was vnacquainted with his counsels, neither had he aduertised him of his course; that it was not in his power to prescribe or command any thing to the Bishop of Halberstat in this action; that both they and all Hesse were bound by the duty of their feie vnto the Palatine, of which fee the said Lantzgrau LOVDVICK was in possession: wherefore, as he desired not to meddle in the affairs of Bohemia against the Emperor, so he could not forget the oath he had taken to the Palatine. And whereas he required his aid against any force which should be offered him, according to the ancient contracts of neighbourhood and consanguinity, the like he expected from him to whom his innocency was well knowne, assuring himself, that if by the league of the Catholick Princes against the Protestants he should be invaded, he would not fail to assist him according to the said Treaties: yet he could not forget, that of late hee had been wronged by the Spaniards, who had attempted to surprize the Castle of Reimsfeld, and summoned them to yield in the Emperor and King of Spain's name, from the which they were forced to retire; for which attempt they had no colour, hauing neuer been wronged by him. He therefore intreated him to employ his credit with the Spanish souldiers touching this business, for that delays were dangerous; and that they would appoint a meeting for their Deputies.

Many Letters past betwix them touching this action of the Duke of Brunswick, the which I must for breuities sake omit. In the mean time, the Duke of Brunswick, hearing that the Baron of Anhalt approached with forces to stop his passage into the Palatinate, and to driue him out of those parts, being fortified with some Troops from the Bishops of Mentz, Treuer, and the Lantzgrau of Darmstadt, and hearing that ANHALT approach neer the vallie of Buec, hee attended him there in open field (the weather being exceeding cold, about the end of December) meaning to fight with him: but, finding his forces too weak, he retired, spoiled Neubourg, and burnt Newstadt, and then march with his Troops towards Westphalia, as you shall hear.

The Preachers and Ministers of Gods word in Prague being taxed, that during the Bohemian combustions they had exceeded the bounds of modesty, and incensed the people by their admonitions & preachings, and so made themselves partakers in these broils, were now banished the Kingdome of Bohemia, by an Edict made by the Prince of Lichtenstein, as followeth.

For that the Ministers and Preachers of Bohemia had been the first fowers of sedition in the Kingdome, and published scandalous books both against the Emp. MATTHIAS then liuing, and since against FERD. now Emperor, as also against his Lieutenants, Officers and Counsellors, and drawn the people into actual rebellion, and approved the election of a new King, laboring by all persuasions to haue him crownd: for these & other causes specifid at large, it was ordaind, those seditious men (as they said) chiefly those who made the edict an. 1618, or approved the Coronation should be banished for euer out of Bohemia, the incorporated Prouinces, and all the iurisdiccions of the house of Austria, hauing deserued a far greater punishment; whereby they were commanded to depart out of Prague the day after the proclamation made, and within 8 daies out of the Kingdome of Bohemia, the incorporated Prouinces, and all the iurisdiccions of the house of Austria, and neuer to return during their liues yet they did them this fauour, To suffer them to carry away their moucables; and, if they had any lands, they were suffered to sell them by their Deputies within three moneths. This clause was annexed, that If after the time prefixed any one was found in Prague or any place about-mentioned, and convicted of these crimes, he should without all exception lose his head. The like punishment was inflicted vpon all those who should entertain them, lodge them, or conceal them after the time prefixed. This Edict being proclaimed, there were fifty Ministers of the Hussites (whereof some were exceeding old) forced to abandon their Country.

Co-

COUNT MANSFELD, hearing that DON GONZALEZ de Cordua (after the recouerie of Tidheim) had put his Troops into garrison, march with his Army towards Haguenaw; where he forced from the Catholique Inhabitants and Iews a contribution of about 100000 dollars: the which they were willing to pay, hoping to auoid any further oppression. But returning in 14 daies with greater forces, he got entrance into the Town, the Citizens being vnable to endure a siege; the which he fortified with a good garrison. Hauing got this Town without any losse of men, and thinking that others in Alsatia would follow their example, he sent a Trumpet to Elzasabern, summoning them to yeeld: which they denying, hee drew great store of munition from Haguenaw, and march thither with his Army; which he battered with such fury, that hee thought they would haue yeilded the first day: but, finding the Gouverneur resolute to defend it, he continued his battery 12 daies, hauing made a breach, but not fit for an assault. The Besieged defended themselves resolutely, and due 300 of his men who had entred the suburbs, and in a false took some prisoners, carrying som into the town, hanging others ouer the walls.

The weather growing so exceeding cold that they were not able to endure it, hauing lost many braue men, there was a truce made for ten daies at the intercession of the Duke of Lorraine; but with this condition, that they should chuse whether they would pay him 100000 PHILIPPS dollars, or endure the extremitie of a siege. The besieged accepted of this condition; but hauing in the mean time receiued a supply of 2000 shot, they sent an answer vnto Count MANSFELD (who was gone to Haguenaw) that they had bought powder and bullets with their money; and that he might return if he desired to smell of them. After which, they burned their suburbs, sent their wiues and children into Lorraine, mured vp all their Ports but one; and prepared themselves for a siege.

COUNT MANSFELD, seeing the Town thus fortified, and that the continuance of a siege in so vnseasonable and sharpe time of winter would be the ruine of his Army, lodged some of his Troops in those parts, and past with the rest into the further Alsatia and the hereditary Countreies of the house of Austria: where he put all to fire and sword, and where he struck such terror into the Inhabitants, that they thought of nothing but flight, leauing much cattell in their stals and stables: whereof some died for hunger, and others were carried away by the souldiers; which bred a great death of victuall through all the Country. Colonell OBERNBERG on the other side being in Brisgo, made an incursion to Brisac and Ensfelheim, where he spoiled the Country, and put all the garrisons to the sword.

Mean while, the Emperor sent out another proscription against Count MANSFELD to this sence: that whereas ERNEST of Mansfeld had some years before been proscribed by the Emperor MATTHIAS his Predecessor, for that he had presumed to take Arms, and been a chief actor in the Bohemian rebellion, hoping he would haue acknowledged his fault, and yielded him due obedience as the supreme head of the Empire, to which dignity he had been aduanced by the ioint consent of all the Electors: yet it was knowne to all men how that MANSFELD had persisted still in his resolution, vied all means to entertain the rebellion, giuing all aid and assistance to the head thereof who was also a banished man, and after that memorable victory of Prague had not forborn to leuie new souldiers, and to annoy those who were faithful to him and the States of the Empire, especially vpon the Rhine, with murders, spoils, burnings and grievous exactions; whereby it was easie to be coniectured, that he would neuer cease (although he had nothing of his owne) to trouble the Empire during his life. Wherefore to preserve his authority, to maintain peace in the Empire, and to free his faithful States from this his tyranny, hee did admonish all Electors, Princes, and Common-wealths, to obserue him

Aaaa 3

care-

carefully, and wherefoever they should take him to keepe him safely, and not deliuer him at any mans intercession without his commande. He also commanded them not to lodge him, feede him, or releue him, and to call presently back their vassalles and subiects which serued vnder him, by publicke proclamation, vpon paine of the losse of all their goods, priuiledges and dignities and the banishment of their wiues and children.

BETHLIN GABOR, in the meane time, hauing miserably spoiled Moravia, there being nothing left to relieue his souldiers, hee retired into Hungary, where there was a treaty of peace propounded betweene the Emperours Deputies, BETHLIN's, and the Hungarians at Nicholasburg, vpon these Articles following. That the Emperour should graunt a generall pardon to all the Hungarians. That BETHLIN should forbear to vse the title of King. That he should restore the Crowne of Hungary to the Emperour, restore the frontier forts, yeeld vp the kingdome, and attempt nothing against the Emperour nor the house of Austria. On the other side, he should haue from the Emperour the title of a Prince of the Empire with seauen iurisdiccions and the towne of Cassovia during his life: he should also haue the Principallities of Opell and Radiborne in Silesia; with the forts of Moncaus, Tocay, Sagmary and Eschet for a certaine summe of money, and 50 thousand florens yearly for the entertainment of his souldiers; but vpon condition they should aswell be bound by oath to the Emperour as to BETHLIN. That the Crowne of Hungary should be left in the Caste of Trinichin vntill the assembly of States. To the which, the composition for grieuances and the admitting of Germanes vnto publicke offices should be referred. That matters concerning Religion should remaine in the same estate, they were in, when the Emperour came vnto the Crowne. That the Iesuites should be againe receiued, but should enioy no lands &c.

The Marquesse of Iagerndorf, being absent from his Camp during this winter season, the States of Silesia began to treat with his souldiers, perswading them to dissolue their Camp and be gone for a certaine summe of money; but they requiring too great a summe persisted in their resolution. In the meane time there was so great a want of victuals among the Imperialists in Silesia, as they should be enforced to abandon their lodging or endure all extremities: wherevpon the commanders resolved rather to dy valiantly then to retire shamefully; so as on the sixteenth of January they marched away in an extreme colde night, with 30 companies of horse and foote, and fower Cannon (besides six companies vnder Collonell BODENVS) and came early in the morning to Wagissad where hauing seized vpon all the approaches, they summoned the Towne to yeeld: but the Gouernour making answer, the Towne was giuen him to defend & not to yeeld, they beganne to batter it, the besieged answering them in the like manner. During which, they had newes that two miles off, there lay certaine of the Marquesse his souldiers: whom they suddenly surpris'd, disarmed, and bound them by oath, that for six moneths they should not carrie Armes against the Emperour, the Elector of Saxony, the Prince of Bavaria, nor the States of Silesia, and so dismissed them. The next day the garrison of Wagissad yeelded and took the like oath. After this they marched towards Odera, whereas there lay seauen of the Marquesse his troupes: but before their coming to the place, they had newes by a trumpet, that if they might obtaine the same conditions they would depart. The report hereof being brought to the Earle of Ortenbourg who lay at Tetschin with six companies of horse and foote, abandoning the place he departed. Other Captaines and souldiers followed this example, so as in fiew daies 40 companies of horse and foote were disarmed, and all those places except the Caste of Glau reduced vnder the Emperours obedience.

There had beene a marriage treated of betweene the Emperour and ELIZABETH the Duke of Mantua Sister, by JOHN VLRICK Baron of Egenberg. When as they had agreed vpon the conditions and dowry, the Duke of Mantua conducted her with 300 Noblemen and Gentlemen & a great band of souldiers from the monasterie of Saint Vrsula to the Cathedral Church: where first receiuing the keys of the City from the Bishop, as the Emperours future wife, and the ceremonies being ended, on the 26 of January shee beganne her journey with a great traine, and passing through the Venetian territories came to Oranipant; whither also the Emperour came with a great Troupe of Princes, Earles, Barons, and Noblemen: where finding his spouse the fourth of February, the marriage was afterwards solemnly celebrated with great Pompe.

The King of Bohemia, remaining in the Low Countries, had resolved to returne into the Palatinate, and to attempt if he might by force recouer his inheritance & free his poore afflicted subiects from the cruelty of his insulting enemies. But before he undertook his journey, he wrote wrote Letters vnto the Electours, to the Princes, and to the Protestant States, after this manner.

Hee did not doubt (said hee) but they all remembered what practices had beene for many yeeres against the Protestant Electours, Princes and States, and how faithfully his house had alwaies opposed it selfe, and euer endeouored to maintaine the liberty of Religion in all assemblies of the Empire, his Father, Grandfather and great Grand-father, hauing nothing but the glory of God; and the publique good, before their eyes; as did well appeare by the Acts of the Empire. That he had followed their commendable example; and as soone as he came to the Electorshippe, had directed all his counsels and actions to the same end; without respect of persons or priuate profit: Whereby he grew into great hatred of the aduersie party; and so continued; vntill at last, the troubles falling out in Bohemia, and the alteration of that Crowne, the States desiring and pressing it, he had accepted of that Kingdome, being conferred vpon him with all their consents, comming into a void possession, not with any desire to raigne; but moued with a friendly care to releue so many Christians, and to free the Empire from greater daungers; and the rather, for that he was giuen to vnderstand from many Protestant States, that these persecutions in Bohemia were for the common cause of Religion. And although there had been many things published in Print, whereby he had beene taxed that he had not onely engaged the Turke in these troubles of Bohemia; but also sought to expose the Romane Empire, in prey, vnto him; yet he hoped no man should euer proue, nor would giue credit vnto those scandales. And so refusing those surmises, he said he would not then make any Apologie of his innocency, but deferre it vnto another time; only he would make knowne vnto the World, that as he neuer was ashamed of his actions; so after the taking of the Crowne of Bohemia, he had alwaies offered to submit himselfe to iustice and right, and to yeeld due obedience vnto the Emperour: yea, the Electors and Princes of the Empire, with other forsaigne Kings, for the settling of a good Peace in the Empire, had undertaken that he should accept of, and doe any thing which he might with his dignity and Conscience; so as those places (which had been taken and spoiled in his Electorall Countrey) might be faithfully restored vnto him. That it was neuer heard of, yea it was contrary to Law, and all the constitutions of the Empire, that without any citation or knowledge of the fact, any man should be proscribed, and the judgement begin by the Execution, inuading his Countreies, and oppressing his miserable subiects with hostile fury; hauing neuer imparted it to the Electors, and other States of the Empire, who haue receiued much prejudice thereby. Seeing then the proceeding hath not beene lawfull; neither can the execution be iust, nor restitution of the charges be demanded. Touching this execution, the capitulations were made with some few, who were partakers and aduancers of these combustions for their owne priuate profit; when farre lighter businesse were referred to Diets and Assemblies of the Electors: Neither should they make such haste to the execution, whereby the neighbor and innocent States might receiue great losse, and many poore innocent creatures be ruined and slaine.

They to whom this execution was committed, might well haue excused themselves; neither did he doubt but they would haue done so, if they had not regarded their owne profit and aduancement, contrary to the treaty which they themselves had made; in the which the Palatinate was comprehended. To diuert all these miseries, and to preserve the Empire from ruine, many Kings and Princes had interposed their Authoritie; but haue not preuailed any thing; so as vpon the treaty propounded by the Lord DORR although that the Emperour had yeelded to a suspension of Armes in the vpper and lower Palatinate, and MANDSFELD withdrawn his Army out of the confines of Bohemia; yet did the Duke of Bavaria inuade and take the vpper Palatinate, as may well appeare by the Lord DIGBIS Letters of complaint to the Emperour. At the same time CORDOVA, Lieutenant generall of the Spanish Army (neglecting the Truce) tooke many places in the lower Palatinate, besieged Frankendall (his wiues Dowrie in case she suruiued him) and sought to force it.

To excuse these attempts, nothing could be objected against him; but that in these grieuous persecutions, he thought himselfe bound in Conscience to haue a care of his afflicted Subiects, and had sought some helpe for them from other Princes, his Allies, the which being allowable by all diuine and humane lawes, could not be denied vnto him; if there had been any exccesse committed by his men (whereof he was ignorant) they should haue admonished him, and known if it had beene done with his will and command. They sought a pretext, for that before these times, he had giuen Commission to the Marquesse of Iagerndorf, and the Count

MANDS PUBL. to doe all things during his absence, in Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, which they should thinke fit for his seruice; but no man that is impartiall will misconstrue thereof.

It is conformable to reason and equity, that a man should hold that which he thinks is his owne, if he see that taken from him in another place, which is his without any controuersie; vntill that haue recovered it, all suits might be ended by some honest agreement. The vanity of those things which were objected against him might very well appeare, for that they which labored to persecute him, vnder a colour of settling Peace in the Empire, did so waste and spoile it in many places by warre, as it would hardly be able to recouer strength to make head against forraigne Enemies. The affaires of Bohemia standing vpon those termes, as there was no necessity to trouble the Peace of all Germany, it being only for a priuate pretention of the house of Austria, and might well haue been determined in Bohemia: Touching those things which concerne the Empire, they might haue been compounded in a publique Assembly of all the Electors and States with full knowledge of the cause. This hath not been done, but priuate treaties and leagues made and confirmed with hostile violence, and the fire of Bohemia dispersed ouer the noblest Prouinces of the Empire; which were exposed to the ruines and deuastations of Spanish Souldiers.

The Warre being continued (to the end there might become colour of justice) there followed a declaration of Proscription against him. He did not finde, that since the making of the golden Bull, and the wholesome constitutions, as fundamentall lawes of the Empire, euer the like violent course was taken against the meanest State of the Empire, much lesse against an Elector, who had alwaies submitted himselfe, and doth still, vnto reason and equity. And it was worthy obseruation, that neglecting all the Emperours promises, not to question any State of the Empire, which had not bene an actor in the combutions of Bohemia; yet many Princes, Earls, and Noble-men, had been much oppressed and wronged, not sparing Widows and Ecclesiastical Pupils; among others, they dispossessed his brother of his inheritance, and lately forced his Towne of Luthra, who had neuer meddled with the affaires of Bohemia, but had bene declared innocent by the Emperour himselfe, notwithstanding the treaties of Praha and Mentz, and the consent of SPINO LA himselfe, at the laying downe of Armes: whereby it appeares plainly that they seeke to draw the first Electorall voice from the Protestants, and to transference it vpon a Romane Catholicke.

That the D. of Bavaria had planted the Masse in diuers places of the vpper Palatinat, nor was ther doubt but hereafter they would plant Popery by force, according to the resolution of the Councell of Trent. That there was no liberty for the Protestant Religion, there being no respect of the Imperiall constitutions; especially for that there was no regard had of the Emperours promises by forraigne souldiers, who hated the liberty of the Germanes, and alwaies pretended some colour of warre. And matters were brought to that passe, that it was no more in the Emperours power to make a Peace or Truce without the consent of his confederats, as might appeare by his treaty with the Lord DIOBY; all which he left to their consideration: For his part he thought it most necessary, that to prevent the ruine of the Empire, the Protestant States should ioyne their forces, and oppose them against this eminent daunger. He entreated them that they would not only consult carefully of this businesse, but impart it to others, and especially to the Elector of Saxony; to the end they may oppose themselves to the pernicious practices of the aduerser party, and so deale, that he being restored, that cruell warre might be ended, and a desired Peace settled: But if all means of composition and reconciliation were denied him, and the gates of justice and grace shut against him; he intreated them to assist him with their counsell and ayde; and likewise, that they would endeavour to diuert the daunger from themselves, and to preserve the liberty of Religion, which had bene gotten with so much labor and cost.

He wrote another Letter vnto them, whereby he did intimate that the Duke of Bavaria had sent a great part of his forces into the lower Palatinat; that his Generall TILLY had summoned Heidelberg, the chiefe seat of the Electorshippe, to yeeld; that he had ioynd his forces with the Spanish Army, and had drawne so neere vnto the City, as they expected newes daily of the siege; That by the copies of Letters, sent by the Emperour to the Lord DIOBY, and the Infanta of Spain, it plainly appeared what the intentions of the aduerser party were, and vnder what pretext they sought to peruert all. That he had receiued many Letters signed by the Emperours owne hand, the which he sent vnto them, that they might see with admiration, what strange Councils Councils were treated of in the Empire, for the reall translation of his Electorship vpon the Duke of Bavaria. Yet he did hope, that God, who had so miraculously discovered it, would not suffer them to bring it to effect. In the meane time hee entreated them to consider of the common cause, giue away to his former admonitions, and assist him in his necessarie defence.

The young Duke of Brunswick, being fallen out of Hessia, and these vpper partes of Germany, into Westphalia, he took in a manner all the Townes of the Diocese of Paderborne with the Citie it selfe; He suffered the souldiers to spoile the Iewes which dwelt there, and exacted a great summe of money from the Clergie, and found great treasure in the Cathedral Church; besides the patron of the Church called Saint Ziborius which was made of pure gould. To stay his courses, the Elector of Cullen sent for part of the Bauarian forces out of the Palatinat and Peterautia, vnder the commande of the Baron of Anhalt: who passing through the County of Nassau and Dillenbourg marched towards the Elector of Cullen; whose forces hearing of Anhalts approach, passed the Rhine, on the 21 of February, and ioynd with him, with 3000 foote and 600 horse.

Having formerly made mention the last yeare of the siege of Iuliers (it being a see belonging to the Empire though held by the vnited States) I thought it fit to speake something of the yeelding of it. It hauing bene long blockt vp by Count HERRY VANDENBERG and the Spanish Army, and distressed for want of victuals, he summoned them to yeeld, threatening them that if they forced him to vse extremity he would not spare any. PYTHANVS the Gouernour answered, that he was but a seruant and could not yeeld without the resolution of the vnited States, but they consenting he would vse no delay. After this answer they fell to their Cannon on both sides: and being againe pressed to yeeld, he said, they should expect it at Easter; yet he began to treat with the Spaniards on the 17 of Ianuary, sending three Captaines out of the Towne to that end. Having conferred with them, the Earle acquainted SPINO LA therewith, and in the end these conditions were concluded. 1. That there should be no alteration in religion. 2. That the Captaines and souldiers should depart with their Armes, colours flying, drums beating, and their wiues, children and goods. 3. That the Ordinance and munition should remaine in the City. 4. That the Gunners, Armorers, Smiths, Carpenters, and others might depart with their souldiers. 5. That the Gouernour and Captaine should haue horse and waggons to carry their goods to Nymegen. 6. That the sicke and wounded might stay in the Towne vntill they were recovered, and then haue waggons to carry them to Nymegen. 7. That the Captaines and souldiers should haue a whole yeares liberty to sell their lands if they had any. 8. That the souldiers which were in any other Townes or Castles should haue leaue to come thither and bring their wiues and children. 9. That all Armes and commodities belonging to the Towne and Castle should bee left behinde. 10. That records and ancient writings in the Towne and Castle should remaine there still. 11. That the souldiers should not be arrested for debt. 12. That the bedds which the souldiers had brought into the Towne should be restored to their owners, and they bound to receiue them. 13. That the Elector of Brandenburghs officers and ministers should execute their offices for the space of one whole yeare. 14. That the Citizens might depart the City and dispose of their goods within one yeare. 15. That there should be two hostages giuen on either side vntill the Articles were performed: all which being signed and sealed by the Gouernour, he should send one to the Prince of Orange, and bee bound to yeeld the place if they were not releued within 12 daies, with at the least 300 waggons: which time being expired and no releefe coming from the Prince, the Earle of Vandenberg sent 600 waggons to carrie away their baggage, wishing the Gouernour to hasten his departure: who, sending the keys of the Castle vnto the Earle, departed with all his souldiers and goods, leauing two within the City vntill the waggons were returned. PYTHANVS the Gouernour coming to the Hague, he was committed and called in question for deliuering vp the Towne.

The Emperour hauing consummated his marriage with the Duke of Mantua sister at Osnipont (as we formerly related) he returned to Vient with his new Emperesse. Coming to the Towne, all the ordinance was shot off, and a guard set on either side from the Port vnto the Castle. First, there entered six troupes of horse, with many Towns-men: then followed the Emperours seruants and young Noble-men with the Emperours horses, his officers, Senators and Counsellors in great numbers. Before the Emperour went five Heralds. LORENSTEIN Lord Marshall carried the sword, and with him went LEOPOLD ERNES Brunswick includes the diocese of Paderborn.

Iuliers yielded to the Spaniards.

King of Bohemia friend was the Spaniards.

The Emperour enters Vient with his Emperesse.

TVS, his Maiesties eldest son. The Sindiques and Senators carried the Canopy. The Emperresse was in a rich Chariot, accompanied by CHARLES WILLIAM the Emperours youngest son, and two of his daughters; being enuironed by twenty foure Noblemens children and many fouldiers: after which, followed DETHESTRIN with some troupes of horse.

As this action was ioyfull at Vienna, so was the funeral of the Arch-duke ALBERT of Austria, mournfull at Brussels: the which was performed with so great pompe, as those of the Emperour CHARLES the Fifth were not comparable, as some write; whereof I must make some little mention. Omitting the ordinary ceremonies, I will onely make relation of those things which were extraordinary. Before the Hele there were 32 horses couered with black, hauing euery one a Gentleman going before them, carrying the Armes of so many prouinces. Euery horse had two Gentlemen to leade them, with diuers Heralds. After which the Archiducall Diademe, his scepter, the goulden fleece, with two swords (whereof the one with a cup of great price was giuen him by Pope CLEMENT the Eighth) were carried by Noblemen. Betwixt these, and the body went a triumphant Chariot of Liberality, in remembrance of his great bounty, for that after the death of the Emperour MATTHIAS he had freely giuen to the Emperour FERDINAND eleuen Kingdomes: namely, Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Sclauonia, Bosnia, Serbia, Halisia, Lodomicia, Camania, and Bulgaria, with the Arch-duchy of Austria, the Duchie of Silisia, the Marquiesates of Moravia, Lusitania, and Burgau, the Earledomes of Habsburg, Tiroll and Ferret, the Principalltie of Spennia, the Marquiesate of Alsacia, with other territories which descended vnto him by hereditarie right. In this Chariot sat Liberty (a beautifull Nymph) and before her an altar whereon were diuers Scepters and Crownes with this inscription, Hic spectis obijt. About this Chariot were the Armes of 27 Kingdomes and prouinces, which in his life time he had so bountifullly bestowed vpon the Emperour FERDINAND. This triumphant Chariot was drawne by six horses, representing six vertues, namely, Nobility, Mildnesse, Wildome, Loue, Reason and Prouidence; whereon sat six boyes, representing Nymphs. After the body followed the Popes Nuntio, the Spanish Ambassadour, Marqueses, Earles, and Knights of the Goulden fleece, with the rest of the traine, as is vsuall in such funeral pompes.

The Duke of Brunswick, hauing taken many Townes in Westphalia (as was said) ERVVS (a Commander of the Elector of Cullens forces) came by night with a thousand horse and some companies of foote, on the 8 of March, to Gifse: which he took, with some other Townes, by the secret practices of the Inhabitants; where they slew 900 of Brunswicks fouldiers, and took some few prisoners. The Duke (to reuenge this losse and disgrace) hearing that 8 troupes of horse and foure companies of foot, lay not far from Suse, he presently posted from Lippe thither, with his Horse. The commanders of the Cullen forces, seeing his furious approach, abandoned their foot and baggage, and fled. The foot retired into a Church-yard: whereof 200 were slaine, and 748 with their officers taken prisoners. There were also 36 horsemen taken and foure ensignes, which were sent vnto the Elector Palatine. After which, the Duke recovered some places which they had taken, and punished some which had bene authors of the Treason.

The Towne of Wittengau in Bohemia held yet against the Emperour: the garrison being without all hope of succours, pressed with hunger, and seeing all the passages stopped, they entred into treaty, and compounded to yeeld vp the Towne and Castle, and to depart with bagge & baggage whither they pleased. But the Garrison of Clingenberg, although they saw all passages stop, would by no means consent to yeeld.

About the end of March, the Earle of Swartsenbourg, Ambassadour for his Imperial Maiesty, arrived in England: where he was honourably receiued, lodged in Denmark house, and defrayed with his whole traine at his Maiesties charge, during his abode in London. He had his Audience in the upper house of Parliament: where, after the ordinary complements, he made an expression of the Emperours loue and zeale in particular to his Maiesty. That hee desired to enter into conditions of an euerlasting peace, and to hold an indissoluble contract of perfect friendship with him; That it had pleased his Maiesty to giue him assurance of his sincere loue & affection by many stately Embassies endeavoring still to settle the peace of Christendome. And, whereas some ill affected had sought to trouble the quiet state of Europe with combinations, none but his Maiesty had endeavored to reconcile them, and like a rising sun to dispel those cloudy vapours of dissension, to the great honor of his royal name for so worthy a work: intreating his Maiesty, in the Emperours name, to continue still in the same course; that the Princes of Europe might not onely enjoy peace by his means, but that he himself might haue the fruition of his desire, and immortal fame.

Europe

And, to let him vnderstand how highly his Imperial Maiesty did esteeme of his loue and affection, and his endeour to gratifie him, as farre as honourable correspondence might extend; he had sent him, as his Ambassadour, to acquaint his Maiesty with his gracious intent, and to assure him that he did affect the common good of Christendom, and especially the welfare of his Maiesties house. Although there had bene some cause of discontent: yet it was part of his care, that the decayed peace (which had bene interrupted by some turbulent spirits) might be restored; acknowledging, that those violent courses had bene distastfull vnto his Maiesty; who out of his regall piety had alwaies endeavored to preuent those mischiefs, as well for the generall good of Christendome, as for the settling of a peace in Germany, which had bene dismembred by dissension. And whereas his Imperial Maiesty had taken Armes for his owne defence and the maintaining of his honor and dignity; so he said he would be as easily entreated to lay them down againe, and desist from all hostility, if others without any iust cause did not shew themselves refractarie: to the which, he was the more tractable, for that his Maiesty could so nobly act his part in defending the dignity of kings, and the prerogative of monarchs. His conclusion was, that his Imperial Maiesty had a worthy intent to treat sincerely; really and without fraude, with him about those affaires, that all might bee firmly ratified and performed, whereunto the king of Spaine was also willing; and that they were both ready to harken to his Imperial Maiesties propositions, when his Maiesty should think fit to treat about the same: neither did they doubt, but that the work being generally good, charitable and profitable for all the Prouinces of Europe, it would haue a happie successe; there being nothing intended but truth, sincerity, and the hope of an indissoluble friendship.

His Maiesty was well pleased with this proposition, and willingly embraced the offer of a Treaty appointed at Brussels: whereupon, after an honourable dismissal of the said Ambassadour, his Maiesty made choice of Sir RICHARD WESTON, Chancellor of his Exchequer, and Counsellor of State, to be employed in this Action: whome he sent presently after him, to treat of a peace for the Elector, and restitution to his hereditarie lands and dignities; and during the treaty to procure a cessation of Armes. And to the end all obstacles might be taken away, his Maiesty soone after sent the Lord CHICHESTER, Baron of Belface, into the Palatinate, to acquaint his sonne in law the Elector with this treaty, that he might conforme himself accordingly; whereby no exception might be taken: but there followed no such fruite of this treaty, as all good men did wish. For, there was neither any suspension of Armes, nor any peace concluded; but after six moneths treaty, his Maiesties Ambassadour returned home without any satisfaction, as the world did coniecture.

In this moneth the Duke of Bauaria sent an Ambassadour to the Duke of Wirtemberg, requiring him, to send him those fouldiers which he had leuied (hauing no neede of them) to be employed against Count MANSFELD. To whom the Duke answered, that he had no quarrell against the Palatinate, in the defence whereof MANSFELD was to be employed; and, besides, it was contrary to the treaty of Vime, by the which it was decreed that nothing should be attempted against the Palatinate. Moreover, the fouldiers being leuied by the States for the defence of the countrey, they could not be drawne away to any other place, without their consents. Count MANSFELD, hauing spoiled Wanzenau, and fortified Haguenaw with two Bullwarks, 20 Companies of foote and 4 troupes of horse, he returned with his Army into the Bishoprick of Spire; where he demanded a great quantity of corn, wine, and money from the Clergy: but, preuailing nothing, hee caused the Castle of Meidebourg (into the which the inhabitants of the Countrey had carried great store of goods) to bee besieged by the Earle of Loquenstein: the which was yeilded the fourth of Aprill.

After this, TILLY cut downe all the trees about Ladebourg, and overthrew the walles and ditches, and ruined Saint MARTINS Church without the Towne: and that he might haue the better means to besiege Heidelberg, he took one Towne after another: and on the fifth day of Aprill (as GOTHARDS writes) falling vpon 20 troupes of Count MANSFELD's horse and three thousand foote at Wingart, he overthrew them, took a hundred and fiftie waggons with six hundred horses, and a great prey; the rest sauing themselves by flight.

To prepare his way (as I laie) to Heidelberg, on the fourth day of Aprill he laide siege, to the Towne of Neucargemond being a mile from the same: and for that the garrison resolved

to

Sir Richard Weston sent to Brussels.

The Duke of Wirtemberg re-sused to send his souldiers to the Banerick.

Count Mandseld takes the Castle of Meidebourg.

Tilly makes his way to Heidelberg.

1622

The King of Bohemia goes up to the Palatine

to yeeld vpon the first summons, the next day he forced them, and put them all to the Sword, with most of the inhabitants, their Wiues, and Children, as he had done some daies before at Obernibibae. The same day he sent to Dilsberg to summon the Castle in the Emperours name: the Gouvernour refusing to yeeld, TILLY marched thither on the 6 of April, with all his forces, and battered it the next day for the space of five houres; but the Gouvernour of the Castle (whose name was BARTHOLOMEVVS SMID, borne at Sedan) defended it so valiantly, as hauing endured foure fierce assaults, they were forced to retire with great losse, leaving great store of Armes and Ladders behinde them. After this a Truce was made for the burying of their dead, and retyring of their wounded; TILLY sending a messenger to Heidelberg, with a promise that he had no intent to annoy their Towne, but only to force that Castle: whereupon they returned to Armes, on the tenth of April; where, continuing his battery from ten of the clock in the morning till six at night, he had made some breaches in the walles, the which the Garrison did resolutely defend; and the enemy ceasing to giue any further assault, they were summoned againe to yeeld: which the Garrison refused, requiring three daies respite to consult; which being granted, they sent a Messenger to Manheim & Heidelberg for ayde; who returned on the 14 of April with these comfortable newes: That they should not onely haue ayde, but that the Elector Palatine himselfe was coming into those parts. Being againe pressed by Generall TILLY to yeelde, the Gouvernour answered that he was yet ready to defend it 3 dayes longer, and then he would come to a treaty. In the meane time, they being aduertised in the Camp that succors were coming, and that the Elector Palatine was arrived in his country, the Bavarian retired speedily, burned his Camp, and left much Munition, Corne, Wine and Meale behinde him.

The King of Bohemia goes up to the Palatine

The Elector Palatine king of Bohemia, having resolved to see his Countrey, and Subjects, which were ruined by the enemy, having no safe passage if hee should be discovered, being to goe through the enemies countrey: hee tooke a generous resolution, rather to hazard his life then to abandon his afflicted subjects; wherefore in March hee departed from the Hague, embarked himselfe and arrived at Callis with a small company, hee being disguised and attendant to one of them. He passed through part of France, went by Sedan and Lorraine: at Bisjfi hee (coming into an Inne) fell amongst some of the Archduke LEOPOLD's souldiers; where, being at the table, he heard them raile freely at the Palatine, the which hee swallowed up quietly. He past from thence in the night, and never discovered himselfe untill hee came to Landaw, to GEORGE LIVES Earle of Lansfein, who presently gaue notice thereof to the Earle of MANSFELD, who lay then at Germusheim, and was in treaty with an Ambassador sent from Brussels from the Infanta; who propounded many faire conditions vnto him, as GOTTHARDVS writes; namely that he should hold the Towne and Province of Hagenauw in fee for him and his heires; That hee should be a Prince of the Empire: that hee should enjoy the lands of the Prince of Orange, during the confiscation; and, if a peace were made, then he should have the like ycerely pension; or, if it might be redeemed from the Prince, hee should enjoy it for ever in fee: that hee should receive a great sum of money for the entertainment of his souldiers: that hee should be Marshall to the Infanta, with a pension of 1200 crownes a month, and should be subiect to no mans command but Marquesse SPINOLA's. But receiving newes of the King of Bohemia's arrivall, hee brake off the treatie with the Ambassador, who prepared to depart: but Count MANSFELD would not suffer him. The King of Bohemia arriving soone after, invited him to dinner; and told him, that he laboured in vaine in seeking to withdraw a faithfull servant from him: that hee had need of his help: that hee was come to asist & defend his poore subjects, miserably afflicted; and, if hee had any further charge hee might freely deliver it.

The King of Bohemia goes up to the Palatine

The Infanta's Ambassadour being dismissed, the King of Bohemia and Count MANSFELD, with the whole Army, spoyling the Bishop of Spire Countrey, past the Rhine, with an intent to charge the Bavarians, who were lodged neer to Wilsloch in a little wood; having fortified themselves upon an eminent place of good advantage, where they had planted six peeces of Ordinance, but did not much annoy the Kings Army, which went and lodged neer unto Mingelshen which was not above halfe a mile from the enemies Camp. On the seventeenth of April Count MANSFELD marshalled his Army, and marched against the Enemy, but they, having advantage by reason of the countrey's situation, after a hot skirmish, valiantly maintained on both sides, the Mansfeldians were forced to retyre, with the losse of some few men. TILLY grew proud with this successe, perswading himselfe upon this retreat, that he had already gotten the victovictory: whereupon hee removed his Campe to pursue them, trying out in great bravery; March on; they are all ours. The weather was exceeding foule; yet TILLY used such diligence, as hee planted two peeces of Ordinance, which shot into the Kings Army, but did not much annoy it, for that hee could not well discover it. The Generall MANSFELD drew his Army out of Mingelshen, and put it in order of Battaille behind the Village. TILLY, finding that the Kings forces had left the Village, imagined that they were fled for feare, the which hee beleaved the more confidently, for that Count MANSFELD had caused the Village to be set on fire, onely to blinde the enemies sight, and to cover his army with the smoke; untill it were put in battail. TILLY presently seized on the Village, and drew all his forces over at a narrow Bridge to pursue the King of Bohemia's Army: which he imagined to be fled, for that hee could not well discover it.

The King of Bohemia goes up to the Palatine

829

1622

The King's Army being in battaille, he, and his Generall MANSFELD encouraged the Souldiers to shew some testimonies of their valour, whereof the King himselfe would be a witness, resolving to fight in person: whereupon the Vanguard marched on and charged valiantly; yet seeming a little to retyre, the enemy pushed them, and were so entertained by Count MANSFELD's forces, as they were forced to retyre in confusion, hoping to save themselves by flight, but the passage of the bridge was so narrow, as within lesse then halfe an hower they were quite overthrowne, and above 2000 men slaine vpon the place; where the Enemy lost many Cornets and Ensignes, with foure peeces of Ordinance, and many prisoners taken. After this overthrowe, the Bavarians which were left in Garrison in Wilsloch, Snitzen, Hilspach, and some other places, abandoned them and fledde; of which there were 150 slayne by the Marquesse of Baden's Souldiers, and three hundred taken prisoners.

Ludowick had seized and taken by Mansfeld

On the 26 of April, Generall MANSFELD went to besiege Ludowick, which, having battered with 7 peeces of Ordinance, he summoned to yeeld by his Trumpet: The Gouvernour, whose name was BERNER, gaue him thanks that he thought him worthy to be visited: by such an Army; yet he did not hold it fit to giue vp the Towne so easily: That he was tyed by oath to the King of Spain, that he should defend it to the uttermost of his power. MANSFELD, having received his answer, renewed his battery, sending for 4 peeces more from Manheim, wherewith after 3 daies battery he made a reasonable breach. He then sent againe to the Gouvernour, giuing him to understand that vnles he yielded, hee would not spare the children in the mothers wombs: whereunto he answered, that he had no womb, yet he would not refuse an honest treaty, so as the Cannon might cease, that he might take counsell with the souldiers, promising to yeeld if it were not relieved within 4 daies, vpon the same conditions that were granted to the Earle of Fersenburg at Dielsheim, or else that he should send Commissioners to treat, and he would do the like: the which was performed accordingly. In the meane time the Gouvernour encouraged the souldies to haue a care of their guard, and that the townsmen with their wiues and children should carry wood, stone & other provisions to mend the breaches. During the treaty MANSFELD's souldiers prest the garrison to come vnto them, if they would save their liues, wherefore seeing 7 Regiments ready to giue an assault, the souldiers neglecting their captains command, for the most part went to them. BARNBACH, who was sent from the Gouvernour, returning from MANSFELD, told him they would treat with him in person, who, going out of the Port, and receiving the conditions, told them he would acquaint the captains therewith but in the meane time seeing MANSFELD's souldiers make a violent assault at the breach, he protested against it, desiring they would stay a little till he were retired into the town. WALDMANNS, who was Commissioner for MANSFELD, did his best to stay this furious assault, but in vaine: for being entered in troops, they slue all that bare Arms against them: the spoile was great; having taken 8 Ensigns, store of Armes, and 10000 Ricks dollars from the Spanish Commissary, and then ruined the town. CHRISTIAN D. of Brunswick & Bishop of Halberstad, greatly annoyed the Bishopsricks of Patterborne & Munster, his forces encamping daily: from the citizens of Munster (where he burnt S. MARYES Church, and other places without the town) he exacted 10000 Ricks-dollars: At St. As he had 100000 dollars, besides a great quantity of Hungarian gold, left there by a certain Bishop whose name was THEODORIC of Furtemberg. At Frank he intercepted 80000 dollars, belonging to the Abbesse of Hersens; but hearing that the Earle of Vandenberg was coming with great forces to relieve them of Gise, he was forced to raise the siege, having lost many men. Of the money which he had gotten at Patterborne and in other places, he caused new dollars to be coyned: on the one side there was an Army coming out of a cloude with a sword in the hand, and his name, on the other side an inscription, whereby hee

Burbwick had seized great sums of money on Wilsloch

B b b b

professed professed himselfe a friend to God, and an Enemy to all Papists.

Before his departure from Wessphalia, he wrote vnto the Bishop of Wurzburg and Bamberg after this manner: That he had long obserued (not without admiration) how that during the retron. bles in the Empire, against his faith giuen for Neutrality, by the instig. of Sackian and the I. suited his adherents, since that cloud in the Bohemian State, hee durst not only send his Army, remaining in his Diocess, into Bohemia, and to ioyne with the Prince of Bavaria, but had endeavored by all means to ruine the Protestants; which was done to no other end, but to establish the Spanish Monarchy; decreed many yeeres before, to oppress the liberty of the country and the Protestant States; and to bring in the Councell of Trent, with the tyranny of the Inquisition. These counsellors to the oppression of the Germane liberty, were not to be suffered; wherefore he could not but aduise him to desist from those practices, and to call back his Army out of the lower Palatinat; where they had committed many outrages vpon wiues & virgins: and withall that he should remember, being a Scholer, that such tyrannies were hateful to the Heathen; and that it was his duty as a Pastor, to reclaim his flayed sheepe, rather by milde means and faire speeches, then by fire and Sword: That this his passage into the lower Palatinat was not only contrary to equity, but to the treaty of Wime, confirmed by all the Princes of the Empire; That his onely end was to expell the lawfull Electoral heir, and conferre the dignity on some which were removed by many degrees; whereby they might haue more voices in the Electorall Colledge for the Bavarian party, and the Protestant States with the liberty of Germany be the more oppressed: That he had alwaies disliked the Elector Palatines meddling with the affairs of Bohemia, seeking to take the Crown from the Emperor; neither should hee now allow, that the Electorship should be taken from the Palatine, much lesse to cast oil into the fire with such violence; aduising him to call back his army, with this protestation, that he would do him all good offices if he gave credit to his words; if other wise he should suffer any one to bee deprived of his possessions, he would vse all means of defense for the glory of God and the liberty of Germany; calling God and posterity to witness, that whatsoeuer he had done or should do, was for the peace of their common Country.

The Bavarians, after the above-mentioned defeat at Mingelsheim, had their reuenge of the Marquesse of Durlach, who lay apart with his Army between Wimpfen and Heilbrun. Tilly, having sent to discover his Camp joining with CORDOVA's forces, on the 25 of April he seized on a wood, and hid himselfe with great advantage. Next day morning their cannon began to play on either side about, DURLACH's forces, lying in open field, were much annoyed. Their Troops encountered and maintained the fight valiantly with equall losse, the Bavarians still refreshing their men in the wood; which the Marquesse his souldiers could not do. After noon, sending some troops of horse to charge them, they were repulst with such fury, that they were routed and put to flight: whereupon, TILLY and CORDOVA marcht against the Marquesse his forces with 6 regiments of foot and 800 horse; who attended them so resolutely, that they were forced to retire again to the wood: but returning again with greater fury, they putte his horsemen to flight, the footmen still fighting valiantly: during which conflict, certain carts laden with powder were by chance set on fire which greatly spoiled the Marquesse his men, and was the losse of that daies battell. There was a Commander called HILMSTADT, who maintained the fight to the very end, and (as they write) had got the victory if he had been well seconded by the horse. This battell continued from Sun-rising till eight of the clock at night; there being slain on both sides, as the report went, 5000 men, and 800 of the Marquesse his men taken prisoners. The Spaniards opinion was of this and of some former actions, that if they had been entertained in the beginning with such encounters, they should neuer haue been able to enter so far into Germany.

During these exploits in the Palatinate, the Town and Fort of Glus seized on all the passages, repaired their Bulwarks, and fortified themselves with men and Arms against any enemies invasion. The Elector of Saxony aduised them lovingly to submit themselves to the Emperors mercy; promising them by his Letters, to obtain them a free pardon for all that was past: but the young Duke of Thuringia returned him this answer, that they could not giue any credit vnto his promises; and therefore they were resolved to defend themselves to the last gasp. After which, the Townes-men took downe the roofes of their houses, and covered them with earth, to prevent the danger of fire. And being supplied with new Troops which came vnto them after the yeelding of Wimpfen, they made a sallie, and spoiled the Country foure or five miles round about, carrying away all the cattell and victualles into their Fort: and by night they surprised

prised Beunath, where there was a good garrison; whom they slew and set fire on the Town.

At such time as Count MANSFELD was busied at the siege of Ladembourg vpon the Ruer of Neccar, the Arch-duke LEOPOLD taking advantage of the time, thinking the other busied, marcht with an Army of 7 or 8000 foot, 3000 horse, and six or seven peeces of ordinance, and set himselfe down before Hagenau, a Town belonging to the Bishop of Spire, lying very fit for his passage into the Palatinate. Having made his viual summons to yeeld, and the garrison refusing to parley, he fell to his battery, seeking to geit before they should be relieved: and for the speedier effecting thereof, he wrote his Letters to them of Strasbourg, requiring them to send him aid to force the Town. The Citizens (being very wary) forbore to answer him presently: yet they sent him some viuals and munition. Count MANSFELD had left within Hagenau 4000 foot & 500 horse, who defended it valiantly til they might aduertise their Generall of the danger, who vpon the first aduertisement posted out of the Palatinate with the king of Bohemia and almost 20000 men to relieue the siege. His coming was very seasonable: for the enemy had gotten into the Town-ditches; so as it was feared they could not haue held it about two daies longer. LEOPOLD, having intercepted a Letter of aduice which Generall MANSFELD had sent to the Besieged, and finding by his scouts that his Army was on foot the 16 of May, and seeing no possibility to take the Town suddenly, fearing to be hemd-in betwixt the Kings Army, the ruer Rhine, and the town-garrison, he sent 1000 Croatian horse with some foot-companies to encounter him about Wisenberg, that by this stay he might save the rest of his Army; with which he rose so tumultuously, that the garrison salying forth, slew 5 or 600 of his men in the trenches and rereward. They likewise who were sent against Count MANSFELD were overthrowne, and most of them slain or taken prisoners. The Arch-duke LEOPOLD fled ouer the Rhine: many of his souldiers were slain in the flight: six companies of horse retired into a wood; where, after 3 daies hunger, they yielded themselves to Colonel OBERRAVER, and serued the King. Some companies fled into Lichtenau which they fortified, bringing with them six peeces of ordinance from before Hagenau; but they were in great feare of the Marquesse of Durlach; who although he had receiued an overthrow, and lost his baggage and cannon, yet he drew together again his dispersed regiments, and swore the companies hee had cashiered before to the king of Bohemia; so as he had again an Army in field of 6000 foot & 1500 horse.

After the relief of Hagenau, and the overthrow of the Arch-duke LEOPOLD's Army, Count MANSFELD retired with his Army to Germensheim, Frankendale and Manheim; where putting the souldiers in hope that he would bring them to good pastures, and leaue all to their spoil, so as they would abstain from firing and murder; vpon the two and twentieth of May hee with the King of Bohemia went with 16000 horse and foot to Darmstat, a Town belonging vnto LODOVIC, Lantzgrau of Hesse; and hauing encircled the Town by night, early in the morning they summoned it to yeeld. The Inhabitants, being amazed at this sudden access, opened their gates. The King's and MANSFELD's guards being within the wals, the one went to the Court, and the Kings to the Castle: the rest of the souldiers, gaping for prey, spoiled the Town, Villages and the whole Country, driving away their cattell, some to Hannou, and some to Frankfort; where the Burgers were furred to buy them on this condition, that they should restore them to their owners, paying the same price. The misery and lamentation of the Inhabitants was great, the souldiers sparing no man. Having continued 7 daies in DARMSTADT's Country, MANSFELD, hearing that TILLY, who had bin supplied with 6000 men from the Duke of Bavaria, came to encounter him with an Army of 20000 strong, he thought it not fit to make any longer stay there, but retired the same way they came, carrying the Lantzgrau LODOVIC with them, who had sought to escape: but being knowne; hee was brought back again, and conducted to Manheim. This Prince had been alwaies a professed enemy to the King of Bohemia, and was the chief instrument to make the accord between the Princes of the Vnion and Marquesse SINOLA. He had alwaies giuen passage and assistance to the Spanish forces, and dissuaded the Marquesse of Durlach and other Princes from taking Armes vnder a colour of desire of peace, and had perswaded the Inhabitants of Heidelberg from their obedience and duty to their lawfull Prince: for the which reasons, the King took him prisoner, and carried him to Manheim, suffering his country (which was very rich and plentifull) to be spoiled with the poore and hungry souldiers; who were well relieved and the needy garrisons supplied with store of Bees, and sheep, and other necessaries.

CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunswick, making preparation to march towards the Palatinate, the brute thereof was dispersed over the whole country; which strooke such a terror into the poore inhabitants, as they carried whatsoever they had, good and pretious, into Frankfort: To stop whose course, the Baron of Anhalt, marching speedily through the Country of Waldes and Hesse, came to Schaffenburg, where he joyned with the Bavarian and Spanish forces; who spoiled both friend and foe. BRUNSVICK, leaving Westphalia on the 6 of May, marched to the Riuer of Weser, over which Colonel KNIGHTS had built a bridge; where he passed with 82 Cornets of Horse, and 15000 foot, leading captives with him some Jesuites, and a certain President. He was followed by the Bishop of Cullen, the Duke of Neubourges, and the Spanish forces; but having no means to overtake him, for that all the bridges were broken down; they returned, and in their way recovered Susat, Alten, and other places in Westphalia. Approaching neerer vnto the Elector of Saxony's country, the Duke came with good troops of souldiers to Langesfeld vpon the Frontiers, to prevent all danger, and to preserve his subiects from oppression. The Duke of Brandwick, having received victuals, past quietly by the iurisdiction of Coburg towards the Abby of Fuldum, where he exacted from the Chapter 400000 dollars. The Elector of Saxony, having freed his Frontiers from feare, entered into Lipsick in great Pompe, with his royal Standard before him, bringing with him Capitaine FISCHER prisoner, for that hee had exceeded his Commission contrary to the Edict, and had spoiled certain villages about Byfeld, belonging to the Elector of Mentz. This Captain had many good friends which did intercede for him, especially FREDERICK a Duke of Saxony, who loved him much; yet he could not so palliate the offence, but 3 of his chiefe officers were hanged.

His Maiefty of great Brittain, having (as I said before) resolved to send the Lord CHICHESTER, Baron of Belface, into the Palatinate, to the Elector Palatine his son in Law, to dispose him to embrace this treaty of Peace now in hand at Brussels, and to remove all lets & obstacles that might hinder it, or a suspension of Arms, which his Maiefty so much desired; about the end of May he arrived safely at Manheim, wherest the king of Bohemia was much satisfied, & the poore souldiers greatly reioyced, hoping that the presence of such a person should supply all their wants; where, after great welcome and entertainment, the king and his General MANSFELD, returned to the Army; which, about the end of May, marched to Achenburg, a town of the Bishop of Mentz lying about Frankfort, to meet with BRUNSVICK who as they heard was marching into Francia: But ere he could get to the riuer of Main, which of force they must pass, TILLY having a very strong Army (being newly fortified with 6000 men from the Duke of Bavaria, and supplied with the Infanta's horse-troops from GONZALES) had got before him; so as he must of necessity fight or retire: for, BRUNSVICK was not yet come to the riuer, neither had any notice of the Kings being so neer. Finally, it was not held convenient to fight vpon such disadvantages: for, the Country was very poore, and not able to feed them; and the enemy was strong and very well provided, which might endanger their Army: wherefore it was thought fit to retire, which was done in so good order, that the King himself was much commended. Notwithstanding all their diligence, yet the enemy followed them so fast, that he overtook them; and their horse made such way through and about the woods, that they were forced to skirmish, the King going from place to place to make head against the enemy. This continued about two daies, the 30 and 31 of May. During these encounters of the horse, the horse retired to Manheim, having lost not about 100 on either side: the horse skirmished still, wherein the King demeaned himself so brauely, as he drew on others by his example to noble performances; where many Gentlemen were much praised for their valor: among which Colonel OBERTAVANT (Commander of the Palatines horse) and Sir JOHN MANSVOOD of Kent (a Captain of a Troop of MANSFELD's horse) were specially noted. The report was, there were not about 200 slain, besides the wounded and prisoners; so as TILLY had little cause to boast of his attempt, wherethey lost so few men, and no baggage, in a retreat of 30 or 40 miles, albeit the enemy made great matters off; giuing out, that MANSFELD lost about 2000, as both GORDAYS and LONDORVS write; and that this encounter was at their retreat from Darmstat: but it seems, ignorance or passion abused them.

In the beginning of May, the Emperor had caused his Letters to be set up in the 3 Townes of Prague, commanding all men to acknowledge honor and respect to the Prince of Lichtenstein, as his Lieutenant and Vice-gerent in the kingdom of Bohemia, and that they should faithfully obey him, as if his Majesty were there in person; and on the other side, the Prince should Minister Iustice to all men indifferently, and take them into his protection. On the next day a generall pardon was proclaimed throughout all Prague; but with this condition exprest, that no men.

mention should be hereafter made of any former offences or transgressions; neither should death be inflicted vpon any man, yet such as during that time of Rebellion had assisted the directors of Bohemia and the Count Palatine, or at the least had been partakers in the Bohemian combusions, should within 3 weeks bring in their names to certain Counsellors appointed for that business, and attend their resolution; and then (matters being duly considered) should pay a fine: yet such were expresse excluded out of the pardon, who had bin particularly condemned before, and whose names had been affixed vpon the place of Iustice.

The Emperor this moneth made preparation for his journey to the States of Hungary, having resolved to leaue a garrison of 18 companies in Vienna. The citizens which dwelt in the high market place, refusing to receiue this garrison into their houses, and thereby shewing their small deuotion to the Emperor, the souldiers entered the lodgings which were appointed for them, by force; with the consent and approbation of the Magistrate. Hereupon the Provinciall States of Austria came speedily to Vienna, and, amongst other things, most humbly besought his Maiefty that they might hereafter live in Peace vnder the shelter of the Eagles wings: wherupon there was a new treaty propounded for the leuying of money; but by reason of his journey into Hungary, it was deferred. On the 18 of May, he began his Iourney with 2 regiments of foot, and 12 cornets of horse, having sent some Noble-men and Counsellors of Hungary before, to conferre with the States, with this expresse resolution; that if the Hungarians would not be forgetfull of the Oath they had taken, he would then shew them all grace and fauor: if otherwise, then for the loue of Iustice, he would shew them the Sword wherewith God had girt him.

About the 11 of May, certain Commissioners which had been sent to Prince BATHLIN returned to Vienna; who aduertized his Maiefty that BATHLIN shewed himself not only a good and deuout Imperialist, but also faithfully perswaded his Maiefty not to disarm himself of those warlike preparations, lest the Turkish Emperor should take an advantage of this treaty of Peace, and invade the one or other party: wherunto the Emperors Commissioners replied; That although his Maiefty had greater and more difficult war, yet he was resolved to conclude a firme and constant Peace with all his enemies, the which he had often fought of many but in vaine: Which declaration did so please BATHLIN, as he concluded; that now was the wished time that all his Maiesties subiects and rebels, for loue of their country, should ioyn with the sacred Roman Empire, and thereby breake and ruin all the Turkish forces. The Emperor parting from Vienna, the 18 of May after the new stile, on the 26 he came to Edenbourg with his Emperre and children, having a guard of 5000 horse & foot, where he was received & brought into the town by the Hungarians: two daies after, he made his propositions in Latin vnto the States. 1. His Imperial Maiefty did perswade them to forget all hostility, and to resolve on a generall Peace, for the loue of their country; to which end he came to them in person. 2. That the Crown might be presently brought back againe to Freibourg, & there safely kept, to which end his Maiefty would appoint certain Commissioners. 3. That a Peace should be maintained with the Turk and other neighbor Princes; which his Maiefty would endeavor to see effected, and that such as should break the league might be duly punished. 4. That a law might be made against such as should treat with the Turk or any other Enemy to the prejudice of the kingdom. 5. If any hostile inuasion should be made, then the States should take care for defence. 6. That EMERICK LEPTAGVS, STEPHANVS DOTRVS, and IAMIS RIMAVS, should giue an account of their Embassie to the Turkish Emperour, to the intent the Peace might be the better kept. 7. All goods taken away during the time of the Rebellion, should bee presently restored to their owners. 8. That the Germanes (necessity so requiring) should bee lodged againe vpon the Frontiers, according to the provinciall constitutions; the which hereafter should be observed with more strict discipline. 9. That they should consider by what means, the Dominions, which had beene deliuered to BATHLIN Prince of Transilvania, should be reduced to the Crowne of Hungary. 10. That their late Letters of confederacie with their Provinciall orders, should bee deliuered vnto his Imperial Maiefty. 11. That the houses should bee numbered, and that every one should be bound to pay six Hungarian florens, vntill the next Assembly of the States. 12. That Trees and Timber should bee fetcht out of the neereft Woods, for the re-edifying and repaying of the decayed Forts. 13. That Corne should bee sent vnto the Frontier Forts, during these turbulent times. 14. That the Articles formerly made should be renewed and duly observed against those which did ill intreate souldiers. 15. That whereas there was a generall forgetfulness of all that was past; the States; to shew their loue vnto their lawfull King of Hungary, should make 1622 great feare of the down

Bbbb 3

the L. Chichester arrives at Manheim.

The Emperor
prepares to goe
into Hungary.

The Emperor
enters into Edenbourg; and his propositions to the States of
Hungary.

make a Law against such as should attempt any thing to the prejudice of the Country. 16. That a Law should be made for the restitution of such places as were fit for the keeping of powder for his Majesties necessity. 17. And whereas, during the Peace, Vaccia had been delivered; therefore the States should have a care of the safety of the Common-wealth, left by this avulsion, the confusions of the Provinces might be endangered. 18. That the fortification near to Cassida might be provided for; to which end, his Majesty promised to treat with the other Provinces. 19. That the passage of the River of Immerin might be cleansed, and the new Mills demolished, which otherwise would be a hindrance unto the defence of the Fort. 20. That such Officers might be appointed for the administering of Justice as should remaine in a certaine place.

During this assembly, BETHLIN Prince of Transilvania sent his Deputies, who presented unto the Emperour a goodly horse, with other rich presents; he himselfe then remaining at Cassida, for that his wife CAROLA was newly dead: Some write, that during the consultation touching the Emperours propositions, among other things it was debated, that the Iesuits should be no more admitted into Hungary, at least enjoy no Lands: And secondly that they would not only have a generall pardon, but a particular for the Ambassie they had sent to Constantinople; and in the meane time the Emperour appointed a Commissioner to fetch the Crowne from Transilvania.

Let vs now returne againe to the Palatinate, and obserue what successe BAVARIAN hath in his march thitherwards. It seeming by all circumstances that his Army approached neere unto the limits of the City of Branswick, there was great store of treasure brought from the neighbour villages and townes, the which might serue the owners to good purpose, many of them being fled to the City. On the fourth of Iune his Army drew neere to Wessell, a Towne belonging to the Arch-bishoppe of Mentz; the Gouernour whereof (who was busie about the fortification of the Town) holding his greatest safety to be in flight, abandoned it, to the spoile of the Souldiers: After which, Colonell KNECHTS marched with one thousand five hundred shotte, foure troupes of horse, two peeces of Ordinance, and some Petards to Huesl, a town seated vpon the Maine, a mile from Branswick, where he meant to make a bridge to ioyne with *MANSFELD*s forces. Having inuested the Towne by night, in the morning the Garrison fell to Armes, shooting continually at them, so as the Colonell was hurt in the left arme, where-with, being nothing amazed, he summoned them to yeeld: but seeing them resolute, having lost aboue a hundred men, he sent presently to the Duke of Branswick for more forces; the which the Townes-men seeing approach, they grew amazed and fled presently to the water-gate, where they all (with their wiues and children, and the best of their substance) past the Maine, some going to Mentz, some to Branswick: whereupon they entred the Towne and Castle. The next day the Army came thither: In the meane time TILLY and CORDOVA, lying at Alsbach with an Army of thirty thousand men at the least, they sent two hundred foot, and two troupes of horse, by night, to relieue Huesl, but they were met withall and defeated by *BAVARIAN*s Troupes.

On the seventh of Iune they passed the Maine towards Branswick: The Duke of Branswick, hearing of the Enemies march, sent Count MANSFELD, to tell him vnderstand in what posture he stood, resolving that he would continue so still, vntill he might march vnto him: for whose passage or his owne retreat (if he were forced) he prepared a bridge ouer the Maine. Count MANSFELD received these newes as he was marching with a designe to breake the bridge at Oppenheim; or (that failing) to make some other diuersion, thereby to draw *GONZALEZ*s homewards; commaunding threecore Cornets of horse to march presently towards the Duke, meaning himselfe to follow after the rest of his Army: but he was stayed by contrary newes of his overthrow, as you shall heare.

On Whitfunday, the souldiers having burned many villages thereabouts, the Bauarians marched with 15 Regiments of foote, 140 Cornets of horse and 18 peeces of Ordinance: In the meane time, the Duke of Branswick encamped himselfe, and sent some of his carriages ouer the bridge. The enemy approaching his Camp, the fight beganne presently, and continued six houres: the Bauarians had 18 peeces of Ordinance fitly placed, which did much annoy his horse: BAVARIAN had but three, whereof one was broken in the beginning, and another was made vnersueable by the enemies Cannon, so as they could not make the fight good, notwithstanding that his foote-men fought valiantly. The Duke, by the aduice of his commanders, retired himselfe: whereupon, the whole Army fell into confusion, and fled presently towards the bridge: where, by reason of the narrowesse thereof, many were turned into the river, and drowned. The Bauarians durst not pursue them which fled, fearing some stratagem. The Duke of Branswick waded through the river with five troupes of horse: they lost most of their baggage, and many of the souldiers in their flight threw away their Armes: which was a very great losse. The number of the dead was vncertaine, for that many both of horse and foote were drowned in the passage of the river: But the losse had bene farre greater, if the Bauarians had had any horse to pursue them on the other side of the river. They had no great cause to brag of this victory, there being three strong Armies ioynd against one, and hauing six times as much Ordinance. The Duke came to Mainburg, and gathering together his scattered troupes after this losse, mustered 5000 horse and 8000 foot. TILLY, retiring after this defeat towards Frankfurt, caused a bridge to be built by Steinheim, to pass his army ouer the river of Maine: which being finished, they diuided their Armies. TILLY went to Schiff, a fort which he had taken vpon the river of Nectar: and DON CORDOVA encamped at Ladenburg, where making a bridge, Heidelberg was in a manner blockt vp; without any hostile attempt.

ly

Whilst the Emperour continued at Edenbourg (during the assembly of the States of Hungary) there arrived an Ambassadour from the King of Denmark, to intercede againe for the restitution of the Elector Palatine to his hereditarie Countries and dignities; intreating his Majesty, that (for his fatherly affection to the Common-wealth and his innocent subjects) hee would change his minde (preferring clemencie before rigour) and suffer the Elector Palatine to be reconciled vnto him. That he had often shewed himselfe ready, both to him and the States of the Empire, to renounce the crowne of Bohemia both for himselfe and his heires; and to yeeld all due obedience vnto his Imperiall Majesty; so as he might enjoy his hereditarie possessions with the Electorall dignity, and recouer that which had bene taken from him. But if his Majesty thought that his offences were such as they could not so easily be pardoned, and that he had cause sufficient to prosecute the execution of the proscription; yet he could not but let him vnderstand, that in these extremities whereas the publike safety was in danger, it was not needfull to proceede according to the rigour of the law; but, remember that worthy saying of an Antient, It is not necessary I should doe all things according to mine owne will. Wherefore he could not but intreat his Majesty againe (seeing that the Elector Palatine was ready vpon the former conditions to make his renunciation, submission, and satisfaction) that he would in the end vanquish himselfe, and forget his conceiued displeasure against him, for the good of the Common-wealth; whereby he should free many thousands from death and despair, hee should make an end of warre and the desolation of countries, settle peace and the publike quiet, and restore the Common-wealth to life; being now in the very agonie of death; and as it were breathing out his soule: And, to conclude, he should so bind all his Noblemen and subjects, yea and his very enemies vnto him, as they would not only be ready to employ their liues and fortunes in all causes of necessity, but would also poure forth their vovues and prayers for his health and safety.

The Emperour, in his answer to this Danish Ambassadour, made an ample relation of all the proceedings of the Bohemians, and of the combustions which had hapned there since the yeere 1618, as he had formerly done to others: That, notwithstanding the great victory which hee had got at Prague, he had not changed his minde, which was alwaies enclined to peace: That he had appointed diuers assemblies of the Electors and Princes, meaning to assist there in person for the settling of a general peace: the which had been disappointed by Count MANSFELD, who, leauing new forces in the vpper Palatinate, had entred into the confines of Bohemia, meaning to infect it againe, if he had not opposed the Duke of Bavaria against him: That both hee and CHRISTIAN Duke of Branswick had committed many outrages in Alsacia and Westphalia: That the Elector Palatine could not excuse himselfe of these proceedings, which were no signes of repentance, but of obstinate malice: yet he had sent the Earle of Swarzenberg to the King of great Brittaine, to acquaint him with the conditions whereby a suspension of Armes might bee obtained, the which he had referred to the Infanta of Spaine remaining at Brussels. Yea, he had bene content, that the Electors and Princes should meet touching this business: Yet, in the meane time, before he could receiue their conclusions, FREDERICK Elector Palatine, neglecting the Treaty (which his father in law had so often desired) came againe into the Empire, and ioynd with MANSFELD and others, to the end they might inuade the Territories of the Electors and Princes which had bene faithfull vnto him. Whereby the King of Denmark might well perceiue, with what patience hee had endured these affronts: finally,

B b b b 4

An Ambassadour from the King of Denmark to the Emperour.

The Emperour answereth vnto the Danish Ambassadour.

ly, when he should receiue aduice from his Ambassador at Brussels what was fit to be done touching this desired treaty, he would so resolute, that the King should finde that his intercession was not in vain.

The Ambassador, seeming not well satisfied with the Emperors answer, vpon a second audience gaue him to vnderstand, that his Maesty would not make any question to the troubles of Bohemia, nor the punishing of such as were the mooues: but seeing that his Imperiall Maiefty had now recouered this his Kingdome with the incorporated Prouinces, part by force, part by treaty, his King did aim at nothing more than to see an end of this warre and misery, that peace and tranquillity might be restored with due obedience to his Maiefty, all offenses forgotten, and perfect loue and trust confirmed among the States; that there was nothing wanting in the Elector Palatine, who was ready to make his renunciation and an honest satisfaction, desiring nothing but his owne hereditarie Countreies and Electorall dignity, as he enioyned them before the troubles; that it was apparant to all the world, that the Duke of Bavaria alone laboured to expell him by force from his hereditary right, contrary to the treaty of Vienna. If the Palatine according to the law of nature had vsed any defense, or fought means to preferre his subjects liues, and those poor possessions which yet remained, from cruell subuersion, such as that of Metzgergemund (where they vsed barbarous cruelty against innocent women and children) he was not to be blamed; neither was it to be reputed a new crime of obstinacy and rebellion against his Maiefty, if in his defense there had been some wrong done (as souldiers can hardly contemne themselves within their bounds) to them of Strasbourg, it was that whereof the King of Denmark complained, that the sparks of this fire did flee into the neighbour Prouinces; and if it were not speedily quenched, all Germany would be on flame, and in a manner reduced to ashes. Hee did not doubt but those Prouinces, which had suffred some losse, had giuen counsell and assistance against the Palatine; that Spinola, General for the King of Spain, had been a great cause thereof, who had done great wrongs to Mavrica Lantgraue of Hesse, to the Countesse of Hannouer, to an innocent pupill, the Count Palatine Lodouick the Electors brother, and to diuerse Imperiall Towns; that he would not be troublesome to his Maiefty with a commemo- ration of those calamities, but would only intreat him not to blame the Palatine if he had sought to protect his subjects, nor to think he had done any thing contrary to the promise of the King of great Brittain; being ready to accommodate himself to any friendly Treaty, so as he might not be forced to submit himself to the Duke of Bavaria and the Catholick League, to the ruine of his Country, and blemish of his dignity. Wherefore the King of Denmark did hope, that the Emperor would giue way to so many intercessions; that hee would forget what had past in the troubles of Bohemia; that he would not tax the Palatine with any new crime, nor spoil him of his Country and Electorall dignity: whereby the Protestants mindes might be much dis- tempered, if, seeing all other men pardoned which had been partakers in those troubles, and that Bavaria (who had marched in the same steps with the Palatine, if not worse) had been admitted to a friendly composition without any intercession, and diuerse Principalities and Earldoms granted to him during his life; but to the Palatine all fauour was denied, and a cruell reuenge exercis'd against him: this might easily breed iea- lousie in the Protestants, as if there were some other matter intended to their preiudice by his oppression; and the rather, for that it was commonly spoken, that the Electorall dignity was conferred vpon the Duke of Bavaria, which might be the cause of new combustions; that his Maiefty should not giue credit to such turbulent men who regarded only their owne priuate profit, nor think that by the defeat at Wimpfen the Palatines forces were so weakened, as he should not be able to finde means to defend himself; that Mansfeld could not bee drawne to leaue his Maiefty by the rigor of Proscriptions, but had made head against the forces of the Bavarians with a good Army, and had beaten them at Ysack; that no enemy whatsoeuer was to be contemned; that if all hope of reconciliation were taken away, and (the tide of rebels continued) they were brought to despair, his Maiefty might well conceiue what calamities were to be feared, seeing that the warre (increasing since the Treaty of Vienna) seemed to threaten all estates. Wherefore he besought the Emperor, that seeing the Palatine shewed himself willing to renounce the Kingdome of Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, he would shew him grace at the request of the King his Maiefty and the Elector of Saxony, who did likewise intercede for him: whereby there might be hope of his restoring to his former dignity and inheritance; that the King would willingly send an Ambassador to this Treaty, with instructions whereby it should plainly appear, that whatsoeuer he had done was out of a sincere loue to settle peace, and to maintain the dignity of his Imperiall maie- sty.

ty. Touching CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunswick, the king his Maiefty had vnderstood by vulgar relations, that he had made an irruption into Westphalia, and had taken diuers places; but he had not hard of his Tyrannie. That what he had done was out of his meere loue and pity to the Palatine, his wife and children, being to necesse allied vnto him in blood, and dispossessed of all their States: wherefore, he intreated the Emperour not to take any seuerer counsell against this Duke; but rather to vse lenity and mildnesse in respect of his youth and other circumstances, whereby he might draw him to better counsells, and make triall of his fidelity and valour, either against the sworne enemy of Christendome, or in some other good occasion.

The Emperour hereunto made this answer; That whatsoeuer had bene attempted by force in the Palatinate, was done by his commandement, and by the verue of his Commission. That the Army which was then in the Palatinate was to be accounted the Emperours: so as whatsoeuer was attempted against it by the Palatine or his commanders, was to be held done against his person. That he persisted constant in his first resolution, touching a treaty of peace wherein he hoped all long dispartations should bee auoided, according vnto the desire of the King of Denmark, promising withall that hee would haue a respect vnto his intercession.

During this Embassie, The Elector of Saxony wrote Letters vnto the Emperour, whereby he gaue him to vnderstand, that he had bene requested by the King of Denmark, to be a suter vnto his Maiefty, for the reconciliation of FREDERICK Elector Palatine, who seemed ready to renounce the Kingdome of Bohemia for him and his heires; to make his submission and giue satisfaction. Having therefore found by diuers Letters and Embassies sent vnto him, that his Maiefty was wholly enclined to settle a wished peace, and had referred the whole busines to the Infanta of Spain, lying at Brussels, whereby all Acts of hostility might cease, or at least a cessation of Armes be concluded, that they might proceede in their treaty, and the faithfull States be freed from further danger; and seeing the King of Denmarks loue and affection to his Imperiall Maiefty, and the publicke peace, he thought it his duty to employ his best indouor for the pacifying of all troubles and combustions in the Empire, neither could he forbear to assist this his commendable designe by his Letters. That he held it very necessarie and high time that a peace were settled in the Empire, which could by no means be effected, vntill the Spring of all troubles were stopt and the fier quenched. Wherefore he entreated his Maiefty not to suffer this intercession of the King of Denmark to be without fruit, but that he would vantage himself, and as the Palatine seemed ready to make a renuntiation and submission, so in like manner he would suffer him to be reconciled vnto him: whereby he should preferre the loue and affection of the King of Denmark, make an end of all those miseries, settle a peace in the Empire, and purchase immortall thanks and glory with all the States of the Empire and posterity.

About this time, those of Glatz surpris'd the Towne of Wunselburg: in the which, were five companies of foot belonging to the Prince of Liechtenstein, whereof they slew the greatest part; some few flying to Brunn. In like manner, they of Clingenberg, being besieged by the Imperialists, made a false and slew many of their souldiers. About the same time 5000 Cossacks came and offered their seruice to the Emperor; they fate downe within two miles of Glatz, bringing great spoiles with them: of which, they of Glatz took a great part from them; CHARLES Bishop of Nisse, the Emperors brother, sending them word he had no neede of their seruice: yet they continued their course, and marched towards the Duke of Bavaria, spoiling the Towne of Glatz in Bohemia as they passed.

The vnited States hearing that the Countreies of Tullers and Mounts (which are a part of the circle of Westphalia, and subiect to the Empire) had giuen great assistance to the Spaniards, they sent an Ambassadour to Dusseldorff with these demandes following: That they should pay them one hundred thousand dollars within three weekes, or expect the like that had bene done in Brabant; That they should make yeerely paiement vnto the States of halfe their profits. That they should receiue no Spanish garrisons into their townes as they had done the last winter. That they vnderstood, they had maintained the king of Spaines forces without any charge to him; the which if they should do againe this winter, they would burne all their Townes and villages: And lastly that they should giue them as greata quantity of oates as they had done to SPINOLA.

TILLY hauing taken the Castle of Ladebourg without any great toyle, vpon the 21. of Iune he marched toward Heidelberg; and finding that the Towne and Castle might be annoyed from a neer place which they call the holy Hill, he presently fortified vpon it, and soon after tooke a fortification, the Ambassador are reply to the Emperour.

The Emperour
answere to the Ambassadour.

The Elector of Saxony intercedes for the Palatine.

Demands made by the vnited States to the countreies of Tullers and Mounts.

Heidelberg be-sieg'd by Tilly

fortification, which for some considerations had been abandoned, and in a manner cast downe by them of Heidelberg: from whence they began to shoot against the Towne: and coming downe the Hill, they began to fortifie against the bridge which went over the Nessar, and to take in if they could, and withall to disturb the besieged if they should attempt to recover the Port upon the Hill, but they were forced to desist from their attempt, by their continuall shooting from the Castle. There were divers salies and Military exploits for some daies together, with losse to either side: they within having a Capitaine with thirtie seven footmen and two horsemen slaine, besides such as were wounded. The Bavarian lost some hundreds of his souldiers with one Capitaine, there being about 100 of them carried prisoners into the Towne. In the meane time two of *MANSELD*s Capitaines, being shut into the Towne, and having no meanes to returne vnto their Armie, had drawne together a troupe of 300 foote, and eightie horse of the Mansfeldians and others, who lying sicke there had recovered their healths: these menialled forth daily, and neuer returned without some prey. TILLY, finding hee should doe little good beyond the River of Nessar, on the 28 of June raised his campe, and returned to Landsberg with his Armie: where passing the River, he marched to the other side of the Towne, and put his Armie in battaile, shewing himselfe readie to fight, but to no effect: only he made the Towne Gardes, sometime retire, as they did his, his souldiers spending the time in gathering up the corne, and spoiling and burning the neighbour Villages.

In the meane time, LODOVICK of Darmstadt Landgrave of Hesse was released from his imprisonment before the coming of two Ambassadors from the Elector of Saxony, and from MAVRICE, Landgrave of Hesse: the conditions of his dismission were, That he should labour to procure the peace of Germany; That he should doe his best endeavour for the restitution of the Palatinate, and other iurisdiccions belonging vnto the Elector FREDERICK: That he should attempt nothing in hostile manner against the Elector or his subiects during these troubles; and that he should not seeke any revenge for that which had been formerly done. Having accepted and allowed of these conditions (so as they might not prejudice the hereditarie contracts which he had with other Electors and Princes) he presently returned to Darmstadt the first of July. At the same time the Marquess of Durlach gaue over Armes and resigned his troups to the Baron of Helmslat.

Count MANSELD and the Duke of Brunswick, having ioyned their forces together, left the Palatinate (being wholly wasted and not able to feede their Armies) and marching into Alsacia, they passed by Straubourg, and in the way took diuers Townes belonging to the Bishops iurisdiction, wherof they spoiled and burnt some and ransomed others, from whom they exacted great summes of money besides other supplies of corne, wine and other victuals for the reliefe of their Army.

The Lord CHICHESTER Baron of Belface, being sent by his Maiesty of great Britanie (as you formerly heard) to his sonne in law the Elector Palatine, to dispose him to retire out of the Palatinate, and to lay downe Armes in regarde of the present treaty of peace, being also pressed by Letters from the King of Denmark, who had much laboured his reconciliation with the Emperour, and had consulted with some States of the Empire, he thought good to advise him to desist from Armes and dismisse his forces, setting downe certaine conditions, whereby they hoped this difficult busines might be compounded.

The Elector (by the advice and counsell of the King his father in law, and the persuasions of the King of Denmark) not only raised the siege from ELSAZ ABARIN, but also freed the Army from their oath; as may appeare by this attestation which was made in the Camp, the 13 of July: He could not but confesse (said he) That his worthy Generall and Lieutenant generall, the Earle of Mansfeld, with his Kinsman CHRISTIAN Duke of Brunswick, with all their Colonels, Capitaines and Officers, together with the whole Army of horse and foote, had hitherto faithfully discharged their duties: but, being now destitute of all meanes to entertaine them any longer, so as they should not be able hereafter to continue in their fidelities and duty, He would not therefore blame them for that they had required an honest dismission; but did willingly graunt it, and declared them freed from their oath, and that they might now freely take what course they in their discretion should thinke fittest for their good and safety.

GOTHARDE writes, that Count MANSELD (having received this attestation from the Elector) wrote vnto TILLY, sending him a copie thereof, letting him vnderstand that both he, the Duke of Brunswick, and the whole Army were discharged from the Elector: so as being now their owne men & at liberty, moued out of loue and affection vnto the Emperour they were ready to serue him, if they might be sure of the remainder of their pay: or if his Maiesty had no need of his seruice, the proscription being taken away and a pardon granted for his former offences, he would speedily depart out of the lymits of the Empire: yet I dare not warrant the truth hereof. The Assembly of the Prouinciall States in Hungary continued still: in the which, they shewed themselves very willing to giue the Emperour content; and among others, they concluded these Articles following. That all persons aswell Ecclesiasticall as Secular, should be restored to their goods, which had bene taken away during the time of the rebellion. That ayde should bee giuen vnto his Imperiall Maiesty against his enemies. That the Germanes should be receiued into garrison, for the defence of the frontier townes; and that the Emperesse should be crowned Queene of Hungary; to which end the Emperours Commissioners should be presently sent to fetch the Crowne to Edinbourg, whereby the Assembly might be concluded. In the meane time, Clingenberg, with the Towne and Castle, was yeilded to the Emperours deuotion, vpon certaine conditions: which done, the Garrison departed with their baggage, and other troups entred for the Emperour: and at the same time the Earle of Holsch was reconciled to the Emperour; and the Electorall Diet, appointed at Ratisbone or Raimbourg, was deferred vntill the first of October.

his

The States of Hungary, to shew their deuotion to the Emperour, resolved to haue his Emperesse crowned Queene of Hungary vpon the 26 of July; for the which, there was great preparation made. The Hungarian Crowne had bene carried by BETHLIN GABOR from Freiburg to Trentschin (as you haue formerly heard) the which was now brought back with a troupe of 1000 Germanes and Hungarians horse and foote: it was carried with great solemnity in a Carroch, hauing many Noblemen both of the Emperours Court and Hungarians going before and after it, with trumpets in front. Being come to the house where the Crowne was to be kept, presently the Archbishop of Salern, the Lord Palatine TYSO, with many other Noblemen Hungarians, receiued it with great honour, from certaine Haydukes, and carried it into the house. Before they came vnto the said place, the citizens stood on the one side in Armes, and the Haydukes (being Armed after their manner) on the other. The next day the Crowne was brought forth into the Court and publicly shewed, being found whole and vntouched.

On the day appointed for this ceremonie, the Emperour went with great pomp vnto the Franciscan Church; before him marched the Gentlemen and Noblemen of the Court, with some Knights of the Goulde fleece: then followed fower Bishops in their Episcopall habits, and six other in their ordinarie attire: then came there fure Heralds: and then followed the Emperour with his Kingly Diadem, on his head; the Earle of Solms carrying the regall Ball, BAYNO Earle of Mansfeld the scepter, and the Baron of Löwenstein the sword. Next to the Emperour followed STAMESLAYS TYSO, the Palatine of Hungary, who carried the Hungarian Diademe, SETSCHIVS the regall Ball and ESTERHASIVS the scepter: and last of all came the Emperesse with her traine and the Emperours guard. Coming into the Church, the Archbishop of Salern was appointed to performe the ceremonie: who, after the ending of Masse, anoynted her vpon the right Arme, betweene the elbow and the hand, and likewise vpon the face: which done, she was conducted by the Earle of Dürichstein and the Countesse of Pavia into the Vestrie; where she was attired with rich robes: and then coming forth, the fore said Noblemen went before her with the Crown, Scepter and Ball. Coming to the Altar, and falling vpon hir knees, the Archbishop anoynted her againe. Then came there another Bishop and set her owne Crowne vpon her head, and so departed: after which, the Archbishop returned; and taking the scepter, he put it into her right hand, the regall Ball into her left; and the Crowne of Hungary he set vpon hir right shoulder: which as it seemes, in their manner when they crowne a Queene: the which, after some small pause, was taken off and sett vpon the Altar.

The ceremonie being ended, the Queene taking her owne crowne, and carrying the scepter & Ball in her hands, went to hir appointed seate: after which they returned with great ioy & pompe in the same maner they came, the Palatine often shewing the Hungarian Crowne to the people.

Count MANSELD, and the D. of Brunswick, having retired their forces out of the Palatinate, and being discharged from the Elector Palatine king of Bohemia's seruice as you haue heard, TILLY and CARDOVA remaining still there with great forces, hauing no enemy able to make head against them, they had a faire opportunity to attempt any thing they pleased. General VALE hauing worke enough, to man, fortifie and munition the Townes of Strickberg, Mannheim and Frankendale with some few others which remained yet vtaken, and were commanded by him vnder our Kings Maiesties protection. He therefore neglected not any thing that might either

Lodovick of Hesse first came to his Country.

Count Mans-feld and Brunswick go into Alsacia.

The Elector directs the Army from their oath.

Count Mans-feld offers his service to the Emperour.

The Emperesse, crowned Queene of Hungary.

either hinder the enemy in his designs, or avail himself in his defense; and therefore commanded the Gouverneur of Gemersheim to seize on all the boats he could upon the river Rhine, and burn them, lest the enemy should make use of them for bridges or some other designe: and those Troops which the Marquess of Durlach had cashiered when he retired himself, the Generall entertained.

The Elector Palatine, King of Bohemia, having discharged his Army (as wee have formerly related) retired himself to Sedan to the Duke of Bavillon, his vncle. Count MANSELD and the Duke of Brunswick in the mean time left Alsacia and the Territories of Strasbourg, sending to the Duke of Lorraine to demand passage through his Country: the which was granted either for love or fear; yet it struck a great terror into the poor inhabitants, who fled with their goods into the walled Towns, fearing the insolency of disordered souldiers, which can neuer be kept in discipline where there wants pay: and therefore their Commanders are often forced to give way to their spoils and violences. This Army passing through Lorraine and the Bishoprick of Metz, they entred vpon the edge of Champagne in France, sitting down by Mouzon a small Town belonging to the French King vpon the river of Meuse, having put all the Countreies round about in alarm, and caused them to stand vpon their guard; whom wee will at this time leaue for a while.

The Marquess of Durlach, soon after his giuing ouer Arms, had a great disaster fallen vpon him: for, certain Troops of Croats and Cossacks, coming from the Baurian, entred his Country, spoiled where they came, and put all to fire and sword. They not onely wasted and consumed the corn in their Barns, but also that which stood vpon the ground, the husbandmen being fled, and not daring appear to reap it: they also did beat out the heads of their wine-vessels, pouring it on the ground; after which insolencies they made an incursion toward the duke of Virtemberg's Country: where, as many as they took of the country-people, they barbarously mangled and slue, not sparing the very infants.

The Hungarians having had many treaties in the provincially Assembly, there were these heads following offered to the Emperor by the Noble-men to be confirmed: that there should be free exercise of religion vnder both kinds, by what name soever it should be called, and that the Palatine of Hungary should have authority to punish the Bishops if they should attempt any thing to the contrary; secondly, that the Emperor should have power to put Germans in garrison into the frontier Towns and Forts, giuing order for their sufficient pay, and where they should receive it, lest they should be incited to fall to spoil, and thereby waste the Country; if otherwise, they would then place Hungarians vpon the Frontiers, yet vnder the Emperours command: thirdly, that the coin should be reduced to the antient value; whereby the Hungarians might traffick more commodiously with the Turks, and the subjects should not be so oppressed by the Magistrates: fourthly, that all grievances (whereof they had often complained) might be taken away and redressed.

To these foure heads the Emperor made answer, first, that they should haue free exercise of religion, were it Calenian, Lutheran, or any other: but hee had no power over the clergie in spiritual matters, that they should try if they could obtain that power from the Pope, to whom would he write touching that busines: secondly, that he could not excuse the drawing away of the Germans from the Frontiers by the Princes and States of the Empire, who supplied the charges for the defense of the Frontiers against the incursions of the Turk: yet it would be dangerous, that they being drawn away would be forsaken if the Turk should make any sudden irruption; but they should haue two Noble-men, Hungarians, resident in his Court and of his Council, who should haue a care that the contributions of the Empire should not be impleided to any other use than the defense of the Frontiers of Hungary: thirdly, that touching the reduction of monies to their old values, his revenues had been so miserably wasted in the charges of the Court, that they were not able to entertain the souldiers; but there should be a care taken for the restitution and reforming thereof, as soon as the troubles of the Empire were pacified: fourthly, touching the grievances of the Empire (whereof they complained) they had not been taken away; compounded nor redrest by any former King; yet if his Imperiall Maiesty should finde, that they were such as concerned that Kingdome onely, and no other Prouinces, hee would be pleased that twelve of the Nobility of Hungary should be chosen, who, conferring with the Palatine, all grievances (according to the constitutions of the Kingdome) should be examined by them, abrogated and compounded; promising, that he would not contradict their answers, but allow of their resolutions.

After

After MANSELD's departure out of the limits of the Empire; the Baurians being now Masters in a manner of the whole Palatinate, and having no enemy to cross: their designs, took Brisselsheim, Winsig, Neuslad and some other places, without any great opposition. The Bishop of Spire in like manner recovered some Townes belonging to his iurisdiction: and the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, being aduerted of his departure, came with his Army out of the vpper Alsacia, and recovered Hagenau, from whence he went to Spire: where the Bishop entring on the 9 of August on horseback with two companies of foot & one of horse, within few hours after he arrived with great troups; to whom the Magistrates of the City presented wine as they had done to TILLY.

After which, the Senate, submitting themselves to the deuotion of the Emperour, did put in anew garrison and discharged the olde, causing the citizens to bring all their Armes into the Court. Presently after, they went to besiege Germersheim: which they battered with their cannon, and the Besieged in the beginning defended themselves valiantly; yet, finding no hope of any releefe, they offered to treat: but in the mean time, the Croats, on the 14 of August, getting ouer the walls, made a cruell slaughter of men, women and children; meaning to leaue none living if the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had not restrained their fury by a severe Edict. And, not long after, Wormes, which had supplied the souldiers of the Baurian and Spanish Armies with great store of victuals, was also surprised by the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, to the great losse of the Citizens; where the old garrison was discharged and a new brought in.

All things tending to ruine and desolation in the Palatinate, about the same time an Edict was made in Bohemia, and proclaimed by CHARLES, Duke of Silezia, concerning the goods of such as had been proscribed and banished: That whereas, in the year 1620, commandement had bin made in the Emperours name, to all the subjects of Bohemia, of what estate or dignitie soever, that were any way indebted to those Rebels and turbulent persons, by whose fault the kingdom had received an incomparable losse, and was brought in a manner to utter ruine, or that had in their possession any gold, plate, or other moueables, by way of trust, borrowing, or other title, or did know were in the hands of any other, should presently without any delay deliver in their names and discover them: and whereas many offending against this expresse Edict of his Imperiall Maiestie (not carrying themselves like faithfull subjects, but rather fraudulently consenting with those pernicious Rebels and enemies) had not bene conformable nor satisfied the contents thereof, but neglected the payment of those debts, according to the Tenor of that and other Edicts; hee had therefore good and sufficient cause to proceede to the execution of all their goods moueable or immoueable: yet, to the end no man should haue cause to complaine of wrong, he would out of mere fauour and grace forbear the execution thereof; giuing a strict command in the Emperours name, to all the Subjects of Bohemia, that if they had discovered any debts or goods belonging to those Rebels, and had not brought them into the Treasurie, or had dissembled them, and not discovered them to himselfe or some others who had that businesse in charge; that now, within one month after the publication of the said Edict, they should bring, or cause to be brought, the said debts or goods committed to their charge, into the Emperours Exchequer: If any one, neglecting this fauour, should continue obstinate, or presume in any sort to alienate the goods of these Rebels thus condemned, or hereafter to be condemned, hee should presently be censured to pay a Fine, thrice as much as the value.

On the fifteenth of August, the Emperour with his Emperesse returned from the States of Hungary, to Vienna, with great content: where, soone after, a cause depending betwixt the eldest sonne of EDWARD Marquess of Baden, against the Marquess of Durlach and Baden, was heard before his Maiesty; whereas the said sonne of EDWARD, demanded to haue the vpper Marquissate graunted vnto him in Fee. This cause had been long in question, and the parties were now coming to appeare in Court: where the Emperour sitting in his Imperiall Throne, the Vice Chanceller of Vines made a speech, shewing that his Maiesty was ready to discharge his duty, and to administer Iustice to all men; especially to widowes and Pupills. And whereas the cause had bene long debated before three Emperours, and the Tutors of the disposessed Pupills of the Marquess of Baden had bene humble suiters to haue the cause decided (diuers Kings, Electors, and Princes, hauing bene also intercessors vnto his Maiesty in that behalfe) hee would no longer deferre it; and the rather, for that the Defendant sought many delays; and would haue more time spent to informe his

C c c c

Maiesty

Maiesties better. He had therefore caused all the Acts to be viewed by his Councill: which done, the sentence, which was to be pronounced by the Secretarie, was concluded by all their consents. His speech being ended, the Imperiall Secretarie read the sentence publicly; which contained, That the Marquesse of Durlach the defendant should not onely yeeld and restore the vpper Marquisat, with all the fruits receiued & to receiue, to the heir of EDWARD, but also pay him all the charges of the sute, & a heauy sentence for this poore Prince after the ruine of his Countrie and so great losses: but, I doubt not but his willingness to assist the Elector Palatine in his iust defence of the Palatinate, did make the Emperour so willing to proceede vnto iudgement, whereby hee hath now in a manner ruined another Protestant Prince.

Let vs now return to Count MANSELD, who had incamped some weeks neer vnto Mousson. The world expecting what course he would take, euery man spake of him according to his fanisie. Some said he was a souldier of fortune; that he had more ambition in him then Religion: That he would serue him that should offer him the fairest conditions, and that he had offered himselfe to the State of Venice, to the Duke of Sauoy, to the Duke of Bouillon, and them of the Religion in France, to the French King and to the vniited States. It was generally giuen out, that he should serue the French King vpon very noble conditions; with which supposition, he sought to satisfie his discontented Souldiers who were ready to mutine, telling them that he expected a messenger from the King; whereof there was some likely-hood, hauing treated with some of his Ministers. This did somewhat pacifie his Souldiers; yet there were many which would not enter into the kings pay. And to make the Inhabitants of Mousson the more confident, he put his Ordinance into their Towne, desiring them to assist him with some victuals for his Army, for that he was to follow the King. Whereupon the Townesmen, giuing credit to his words, sent him out presently Corne to refresh his Troup; but in the meane time he contracted secretly with the States of Holland, and entered into their pay.

The Earle being come to Mousson, the Infanta of Spaine (doubting that he would come down to assist the vniited States) called home Don GONZALEZ de Cordona, with all his Army (being foureteen thousand horse and foot well Armed) who marched with great speede through Luxembourg and the countrey of Liege vpon the River of Menfe, to stoppe MANSELD in his passage; and as LONDORPVS writes, the Baron of Anhalt was sent after him with another Army into Lorraine to preuent his return into Germany.

The Earle, hauing receiued resolution from the States, soone after demanded his Ordinance from the Townesmen of Mousson, pretending that he would march directly to the King. And to the end they should the more credit him, he deliuered money to certain Captaines, for the leuying of Souldiers within their Towne: after which he beganne to march, discouering his intent to all his Army, shewing them his Letters-patents which he had receiued from the States, and withall telling them that they must resolve to fight more then once. Seeing himselfe out of daunger, his and the Dukes Army past Ausnes; and on the twenty seuenth of August attempted Mouberg: but, being fortified with a good garrison, they only burnt the suburbs, and so past the River of Sambre with their whole Army. There he and the Duke of Brunswick burnt most of their Carts, mounting their foote-men on the horses, getting also many other in the Countrey; whereby he might aduance with the more speede in the march. They were held to haue 14000 men in their Army, horse and foote: but it is confidently reported, his horse-men were very ill Armed, hauing for the most part no Armes at all but their Swords and Pistols. They were now in an Enemies countrey, where there was nothing to relieue them but what the Trees would afford; all the Boores being in Arms watching some opportunity to set vpon them, if Don CORDOVA should put them to rout. The Earle comming to Jambours which lyeth betwene Haynault and Flamures, his Souldiers being weary and tyred with long marches and want of victuals, he caused them to rest and refresh themselves. Don CORDOVA was encamped, neere vnto Plenry, in a strait whereas Count MANSELD and the Duke of Brunswick must of necessity passe, hauing a very good Army of Souldiers with an infinite number of Boores. Some write that MANSELD, comming neere vnto *CORDOVA*s Campe, he sent a Trumpet vnto him, to know whether he would giue him passage or fight: who answering that he had charge to stop his passage and to fight. The Earle presently prepared to charge (knowing there was daunger in delays) the which his men performed so resolutely, as they put *CORDOVA*s men to route and surprisid his Ordinance from the Boores, the which they kept for the space of two houres, but afterwards they recovered it againe;

Where-

Whereupon the fight grew very cruell: the Duke of Brunswick (behauing himselfe most valiantly) was shot in the left Arme neere vnto the wrist; yet, notwithstanding, he would not leaue the field, but continued still fighting, so as with the losse of blood, and heate, his wound so enflamed, as afterwards hee was enforced to haue this arme cut off about the Elbow. To conclude, after a long fight, Count MANSELD hauing slaine many, especially of the Boores; Don CORDOVA was forced to found a retreat: whereupon Count MANSELD and the Duke of Brunswick, being Masters of the field, marched directly towards Breda, hauing taken much of the Enemies baggage and some of his Ordinance. What men were lost in this battle is not certaine: but at their comming to Breda they mustered, as it is written, 10000 men; besides many sick and weary, which came daily vnto them.

I cannot relate the particular circumstances of this battaile, being so diuersly reported by such as haue written thereof, nor what their particular losses were; neither doth it concerne this History, being out of the limits of the Empire: But thus much I dare boldly affirme, that it was one of the most resolute (if not desperate) exploits that hath been performed in our Age, to see a weake Army (the horse-men hauing no Armes but their Swords and Pistols) stirred with long marches in an enemies countrey, where they had nothing to friend but the Heauens which couered them; to encounter a powerfull Army, fortified with the best men, from the neighbour garrisons, and seconded with at least 20000 Boores Armed; to charge them in their own strength, to force through them, to make them retire after great losse, and then (being masters of the field) to march almost 30 or 40 miles through the enemies countrey, there being 10 or 12 strong Towns with great garrisons in their way; who no doubt, would haue cut them in peeces if they had been routed. The Prince of Orange (being aduertised of their march) sent them bread and other prouision to refresh their hungry Souldiers before their comming to Breda. At brussels they proclaimed a Triumph before the victory, and made bonfires with a confident assurance they were quite ouerthrown, for that certaine Ensignes of the Duke of Brunswick's and Count MANSELD's were brought thither; but afterwards their mirth was turned to heauinesse, when they had intelligence of the truth, how that Don CORDOVA had been forced to retire with great losse; that they were Masters of the field, and had burnt the corn and countrey as they past, and were safely arrived at Breda, where they were receiued with great ioy by the Prince of Orange, the vniited States and the whole Army.

Towards the end of Iuly, Count MANSELD and the Duke of Brunswick being retired out of the Palatinate with their forces, and no man left there able to make head against the Enemy; The Baron of TILLY, Generall for the Emperour, returned againe to Heidelberg with an Army of 15000 men, and laid a straight siege to the Towne and Castle. Presently after his sitting downe, he seized vpon a Fort, which had been built by JOHN Earle of Nassaw; but first abandoned by the besieged, lying too farre off to be well kept. From this Fort which lay behinde the Castle, he sought to annoy the Towne: and with the rest of his Army, he blockt vp Manheim and Frankendale to keepe all reliefe from them. Hauing fortified his Trenches, and planted certaine Ordinance, he played vpon the Towne, but did it no great harme; perswading himselfe that they would soone yeeld, being giuen to vnderstand that they wanted Salt and all kinde of victuall but Bread and Wine. With this perswasion hee spent about two Moneths before the Towne, and neuer tooke any of their out-workes or place of any importance, but summoned them often, and perswaded them to yeeld obedience to the Emperour; but finding that his perswasions preailed nothing, and that his long stay there had not yet driuen them to any extremity of hunger; he resolved to attempt some thing by force. The Towne was commanded by a Dutch-man, whose name was MARVIN, vnder whom were good Troupes of Souldiers of diuers Nations besides the Inhabitants.

The Castle was vnder the charge of Sir GARRET HARRERT with 2 Companies of English, his owne and Sir JOHN WENTWORTH's, being not about two hundred strong, whereof there were not about one hundred and forty English, the rest were of other Nations. On the fift and sixt daies of September, Generall TILLY plaid with his Ordinance vpon their out-workes, resolving to giue a generall assault.

Those out-workes without Spire Port were defended by the Dutch, and might well haue bene kept against any daring Enemy whatsoever, if they had had any courage or valour in them: But presently after their approach, and before they came to the foote of their Rampart; a Dutch Captaine whose name was GRAEY, and had the command of the first out-work, most cowardly abandoned it, and in this amazement all the rest of the troupe cast away their Armes and fled towards the towne, or yeelded themselves to the enemy; where wee will leaue them a while and turne towards the Castle, where the enemy had sent to assault an outwork called the Pheasant garden by 2000 men; which Sir GARRAT HARRATT defended valiantly with one hundred of his men: They came often to the Calado, and were valiantly repulsed by the defendants, where as the Gouvernor brake three pikes, having his page attending him with 6 more: but to the losse of this braue Captaine, and as we may coniecture to the losse of the place, he was shot in the head, having no head-peece, and was the first man which was slaine vpon the work: His Lieutenant was also shot in the shoulder and retired, yet the souldiers defended it valiantly, the space of two houres after, vntill that the enemy had left shooting. The Dutch being fled from the defense of the outworks and comm into the Suburbs, the Gouvernor shut the Towne gates against them, so that many of them were either slaine or taken prisoners.

The enemy comming to Spire Port commanded Petards to be brought to force it: but in the meane time certaine Crabats (which are aduenturing Boote-halers of Croatia like vnto the Colliques and liue vpon spoile) got by the riuer to the water Port, and entred; where they beganne to fier the houses and to spoile. During the which, TILLY forced the Port: and in this confusion the Gouvernor, Captaine, with many souldiers, Burgers, and women fled to the Castle; and in the meane time, the insolent souldiers fell to slaughter and spoile in the Towne. Notwithstanding all this disaster, the English still maintained their worke vntill that the gouvernour had perswaded them to retire: they also fearing that the enemy might come vpon their backs from the Towne; yet they shewed no amazement in their retreat; for they drew away their ordinance and munition, and brought off the bodies of such as had beene slaine being but 13 in all. TILLY being Master of the Towne, and having abandoned it to the spoile of the souldier, he summoned the Castle to yeeld: where the Gouvernour MERVIN, having propounded large conditions for himselfe and his troups, in the end it was concluded, 1. That he should yeeld vp to Generall TILLY, the Castle, with the Cannon, munition and all other instruments of warre, to the behoofe of his Imperiall Maiesty, with all other goods, Jewels, writings or any other thing belonging to the Count Palatine and the Princeesse his wife; onely that excepted which the General out of his grace should suffer to passe. 2. That the Gouvernor, Colonels, Captaine, and souldiers with all other belonging to them, might depart with their drums beating and full Armes, and with all their baggage, so that it were their owne and not belonging to the Castle or Towne. 3. That they should haue a safe conduct giuen them to Frankfort or any other place whither they would go, except Manheim and Frankendall. 4. That they should haue earriages allowed them by the Generall. 5. That all low Dutch, French, English and other strangers which were prisoners, should be set at liberty without any ranfome: As also on the other side, all prisoners should be restored vnto the Generall vpon the same termes. 6. All sick and wounded souldiers should be put into some conuenient place, and there maintained with necessaries reliefe, where having recouered their health, they should haue such passeports giuen them as they should desire: That none should be molested in body or goods for debt or any other occasion. This was the Capitulation concluded vpon the 9 of September: and the next day he gaue them a safe conduct; entreating all the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, of what dignity or quality soeuer, to giue free passage vnto Monsieur MERVIN sometimes Gouvernor of Heidelberg, with his companies and baggage, through all their Principalities and Segniories, giuing them all assistance for the aduancement of their looney. The next day MERVIN went out of Heidelberg with seauen hundred men of all nations, but the capitulation was ill obserued: for as they marched through the streete and ouer the bridge, the enemies souldiers standing in garde on either side, stript all they could lay hand on to their verie shirts: which bred a great tumulte in the Towne. Whereof Generall TILLY being aduertised, hee came forth of his lodging to stay the souldiers furie, and conducted them three or foure miles out of towne with a troupe of 200 horse, fearing the souldiers should haue followed them to haue cut their throates. I cannot forget one inhumane act of Generall TILLY's, who would not suffer the body of that braue and valiant Knight Sir GARRAT HARRATT to be buried like a Christian in the Towne Church, but they were forced to lay him in the greene Court in the Castle; there being nothing in the Towne to embalne his bodie, which they meant to haue brought into England, his worth deseruing a moment of better note.

The Gouvernour with the souldiers, being (as some affirme that were present) 700 men, came safely to Frankfort, whereas my Lord CHICHESTER then remained attending directions from his Maiesty, either to go to the Diet appointed at Reinsberg, or to returne home into England; by whose means the English received money to conduct them into the Low Countries or home, by the hands of Master BOYLBLOCK, who was appointed Paymaster in those parts to the English and other souldiers that were entertained in his Maiesties name for the defence of the Palatinate.

Thus the cheefe place of residence for the Elector Palatine was by the base cowardize of the Dutch lost, and with it one of the goodliest Libraries in the world; a Jewell which cannot well be valued, for the many rare Manuscripts which had beene there gathered together by his predecessors. The Duke of Banaria did highly esteeme this prize, and committed the guard thereof to his Iesuits. The souldiers being gone, the Inhabitants were miserable spoiled by the enemy; who strip both men & women, so as they neither had clothes to couer them, nor meat to releue them; but what they got from Heilbrim or Frankfort: and yet their cruelty was such as they forced the poore inhabitants to ranfome themselves, and to pay the souldiers which were left there in garrison.

The losse of this Towne did adde much to the king of Bohemia other afflictions: Hee was then at Sedan vnder the protection of the Duke of Bouillon, his Vncle; desiring much to be at the Hague with that Noble and generous Princeesse his wife: but the difficulty was to passe. To goe through the Low Countries was not possible; all was subiect to the enemy: and to passe disguised through France as he had formerly done, there was little hope, he was too well knowne; but he was soone freed of these apprehensions: for the French king, either by the intercession of some others, or out of his owne princely and generous disposition commiserating the distressed state of this Prince (whose house had alwaies beene firmly allied to the Crowne of France, and had assisted it in the greatest extremity of their affaires) sent him a safe conduct to passe freely through his kingdom to what Port he pleased, commanding all his subiects to giue him that assistance and respect which was fit for the greatnesse of his person. Whereupon hee took leaue of the Duke of Bouillon, who gaue him a conuoy of 100 horse to conduct him to Callis: where the Gouvernor received him with much honour, and the people obserued him with much reuerence and respect. There he embarked in some of the States Ships, and so came safely to the Hague, where he was ioyfully received by the Queene his wife and the whole Court.

Let vs turne head a litle towards Bohemia and the incorporated provinces, whereas the Emperour was now absolutely obeyed, Glax only excepted; which had beene long besieged: yet the subiects were in no great security. For they were both questioned for their liues and states, and were in danger to lose the free exercise of religion, the which had beene promised them at the reduction of those provinces. The Emperour sent his Commissioners both into Bohemia & Moravia, to call diuers Lords and men of account in question, touching the late combustions. 1. All those were to be questioned which were present when some of the Councell were cast out of the windowes in Prague. 2. Those which had consented to the League against the Emperour and the house of Austria. 3. Those which had beene at the Emperours reiection, and such as had beene present at the Count Palatines election to the Crowne of Bohemia. And lastly all such as had marched in Armes against Piena.

In Moravia many Noblemen and others of note; absenting themselves, were proclaimed Traitors, their names fixed on the common gallows, degraded of their honours, and their Lands & goods forfeited, which were presently seized on to the Emperours vse; nor did they spare the dead: for the Emperours Commissioners began to examine the causes of the deceased rebels (as they termed them) meaning to brand them with infamie after their deaths; and reduce their heirs to miserie, by the confiscation of their estates, for that is alwaies the conclusion; being a great means to raise money to pay the Colliques and other souldiers. It was also giuen out, that the Commissioners in Bohemia would proceede criminally against all those that had borne Armes vnder the Prince of Anhalt, Count Holloer, Count Manderslo, or any other; his Maiesties enemies: which Article had so large an extent, and would comprehend so many of all degrees, that if they should proceed with rigour against them, the Emperour should be faine to bring in new Colonies to repeople those Provinces; but it seems they took a milder course: for diuers Lords and Knights with other Citizens being condemned at Brin in Moravia to lose their heads, their corporall punishments were turned into imprisonment; some for their liues, some for yeers; but there was no grace for their goods; they were still forfeited. And thus haue they proceeded touching the examination of some Lords and others, whom they termed rebels, in Bohemia and Moravia.

1622
the Protestant Churches, shut
in Prague.

Touching matters of religion, it seemd the Emperor had an intent to root out the Protestants in Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces: for, the Prince or Lantgrauve of Lichtenstein, Lieutenant of Bohemia for the Emperor, had commission from him to shut vp the two Dutch Protestant Churches in Prague, and to presse the City and Countrey to reformation in religion; the which was put in execution: so as they were likely to lose the comfort of the Gospell by the preaching of their Ministers, and the grounds of religion which the youth learned by the instruction of their Teachers: for, both the Ministers and Preachers were commanded to be presently gon; which did much afflict the Protestants: and the Colledges where their youth was instructed, were shut vp. There was also commandement giuen by publike proclamation to all book-sellers and Stationers, to bring-in a catalogue of all their Lutheran & Caluinian books to the Secretary of State, within foureteen daies, vpon great penalties.

The Duke of Saxony writes to the Prince of Lichtenstein.

The Duke of Saxony, hauing notice giuen him of this alteration in Bohemia touching the shutting vp of the Protestant Churches, was much discontented, both in regard of his owne particular, being of that religion, and might in time be subject to the like calamity with the rest of the protestant Princes of Germany; as also houlding his honour to be blemished, for that, at the reduction of those Countreies to the Emperors obedience, hee had promised them by warrant from the Emperor, that the Churches should not be molested, nor they deprived of the free exercise of their religion, hauing also taken them into his protection; and therefore the Duke objected these proceedings to the Emperors Ambassador as a wrong done to him: and beeing still importuned by the petitions of the Preachers which had been driven out of their Countreies; he wrote to the Prince of Lichtenstein to this effect; that forasmuch as hee could not but take notice by sundry aduertisements from Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, as also by the complaints of diuerse Preachers lately banished out of those Countreies, of the restraint of the publike profession of the reformed religion, and of the shutting vp their Churches, and the putting down of their schools: yet for that men in miserie do commonly seek to moue pity by the report of their estates, and for that he had been alwaies better conceited of his Maiesties word, who had promised him, that if those Countreies could be reduced to obedience by his forces, he should by his Maiesties direction passe his word to the subjects of those Prouinces, that those of the reformed religion should still enjoy their freedom of conscience: Wherefore, relying vpon the Emperors word, he would not rashly giue credit to those informations till he might hear the certainty both of the authority of his commission, and in what manner it had been executed: wherefore he could do no lesse in fauour of the cause, and for the honour of his owne word (whereon the inhabitants of those Prouinces had much relied) than to entreat him earnestly to aduertise him of the truth of the businesse; the which if he found conformable to the Petitioners complaints, he could not but hold his own honor engaged to take care for a timely remedy, and withall imploy his credit and power with his Imperiall Maiesty for the staying of all future proceedings. Some think, these alterations in Bohemia staied the Duke of Saxony's journey to the Diet at Regensburg; who, continuing his discontents, gaue the Emperor to vnderstand by his Letters, that he was much grieved for the shutting vp of the protestant Churches at Prague, the which did not belong to the Bohemians, but to the Electors and Princes of Germany, professing the gospell; who had built and maintained them at their owne charges, and procured them great priuiledges and immunities: wherefore his Maiesty had not to do with the Protestants of Bohemia, but with the Electors and Princes of the Empire, which should not suffer them of their owne religion (contrary to his Imperiall promise and the priuiledges of the Empire) to be persecuted and oppressed: This may breed some new combustion and trouble, vlesse it shall please the Emperour to restore those Churches to their former estate and condition.

The continuance of the siege of Glatz.

The siege of Glatz continued still: which being resolutely attempted by the Imperialists, it was as obstinately defended by the besieged. The young Earle of Thurne, making many sallies vpon the Enemy, cloyed some of their Cannons and returned with good spoiles and much honour: but in September there was an accident which did much impair the state of the town; for they setting fire of their suburbs, to the end the Imperialists should not lodge in them, some sparks of it fell by chance into their powder; whereby part of the Town, and much of their provision was burnt, and likewise a part of the wall, with two peeces of Ordinance falling downe, through the violence of the fire, the Imperialists aduanced to a scallado, but they were valiantly repulsd by the Garrison.

About the middest of October, the Imperialists assaulted the Towne with great fury: and they

they within, suffering them to approach to their very walles, they hauing discharged their Ordinance, they presently set open their Ports and sallied forth with one thousand horse and foot; where they slue six hundred of the Enemy, and then retired with no great losse. During these factions of warre before Glatz, there was a parley between the young Earle of Thurne, Gouvernour of the Towne; the Earle of Torquato, Generall of the Emperours Army; and the Prince of Lichtenstein, Gouvernour of Bohemia; where there were many propositions made vnto the young Earle with promises of pardon and great rewards, both for himselfe and his Souldiers, in the Emperors name, if he would yeeld vp the Towne. The young Earle of Thurne made them this answer:

That if they could procure the King of Bohemia to free him from his double Oath (one as he was his subject, and the other as his Soldier) that then he would not only yeeld vp the towne and castle, but would also forsake the quarrell and lay down Armes: But, seeing they could not dispense him of his Oath, that both he and his companie were resolute to make it good against the Imperialists; and although they might haply, with great losse and charge, take the Towne, yet they had a Castle to retreat into, the which they would defend to the last man; and so the treaty brake off, every man returning to his quarter: Presently after which, they made a great salie, which was very bloody and many were slaine on either side; among the which, there were thirteen Captains of the Imperialists.

They so annoyed the Campe with their Ordinance, as the Emperour commanded all his forces in Bohemia to march towards Glatz to re-enforce the siege, and they sent for powder, bullets and munition from all parts. The siege had continued almost two yeers, and had put the Emperour to wonderfull great charges, the which could hardly be supplied; and therefore they vied a policy to make the besieged pay for their own ruine: for, by a publike proclamation in Silesia, they enioyned all men vpon paine of death, which ought any money, or had any goods in their hands belonging to them of Glatz, to bring it presently into the Towne-house at Prague: Whereupon, much money and goods was brought thither, which extremity hath beene often, and is still, vied against the Nobility and Gentry of those Countreies which had beene executed; yea, euen against such as were dead before they had beene called in question.

This Proclamation did nothing amaze them of Glatz, who held their Armes to be their greatest wealth, the which could not be violently taken from them, without the losse of their liues; and then their cares were past, and their scores paid: But, to auoide tediousnesse, I will omit the daily skirmishes which were before that Towne, and come to the yeelding of it. After a long and obstinate siege resolutely defended by the young Earle of Thurne, they were driven to some extremities, by reason of some casualties by fier, in the which their salt, powder, and meale was consumed, and their water cut off by the Imperialists: which daunted the Souldiers much, and made them mutine; so as the Gouvernour (although he were one thousand five hundred strong) was glad to come to a parley, and to yeeld vp the Towne vpon honourable termes on the twenty sixt day of October. The Articles were, First, that they should haue free exercise of the reformed Religion, and their Church remaine as it was, vntill the Emperour shall otherwise dispose: And if any Protestant were desirous to leaue the Towne, they should haue free liberty to sell their goods within six moneths, and goe where they pleased. Secondly, that the Gouvernour, Captains, Commanders and Souldiers, both of Horse and Foote, should freely and safely depart with baggage and baggage, Drums beating, Colours flying, and their full Armes: conditionally, that all the companies should be cast and dismiss about Swatowitz, and there leaue their Commanders; and their Cornets and Ensignes to be borne from their staves, and all sworn not to beare Armes against the Emperour for six moneths following. Thirdly, that the Gouvernour, Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, should haue a generall pardon for all offences and rebellions committed against the Emperour; and suffered to depart where they pleased. Fourthly, that all Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, which had serued his Maiesty, and now borne Armes against him in this quarrell, should haue Passports giuen them to passe freely through the Dominions of the Empire, into their own Countreies, or whither they pleased. Fifthly, the sick and hurt should remaine still in the Towne of Glatz, and there haue all due attendance and provision from the Citizens, for their cure and recovery; after which they shall haue free leaue to depart, and passports giuen them to goe where they pleased. Sixthly, that the Earle of Thurne should leaue two Captaines with the Imperialists as Hostages vntill he had dismiss his Troups about Swatowitz, according to the capitulation.

the yeelding of Glatz.

These Articles, being very honourable for the Earle of Thurne and the besieged, were very duely observed by the Imperialists, who gave them a good convey to Swinitz, which is five German miles from Glauz. It was thought that they were very rich when they left the Town, having a hundred waggons heavy laden with baggage, beside lighter carriages: of which there were fifty belonging to the young Earle of Thurne, which were conducted to his wife in the Marquess of Brandenburg's Country by 500 light horse of his owne, and a convey of 2000 Imperialists. Thus at last the Emperor hath reduced all Bohemia with the incorporated Provinces to his obedience; and his brother, the Arch-duke Charles Bishop of Nis or Kisse, liking well the ayre of the Country and the strength of the place, hath gotten the government of the country of Glauz, from the Emperor.

Heidelberg being lost, General Tilly marched presently with his Army to Manheim, where General Varr attended him, it being the place of most importance and best fortified in all the Palatinate, standing neer the point of a land where the Neckar which passeth by Heidelberg falleth into the Rhine, so as it commands both the Rivers, and receives the Toll of all boats which passe. The Enemy being set downe on the one side of the Towne, General Varr, considering that the guard thereof and of the out-works was very great, and that he was not sufficiently provided with men, having but seven companies of English, and nine of Dutch (all which were very weak in numbers, and many sick) he sent to Frankendale, to have Captain Byronovs to send him three companies more of English and as many Dutch: which he performed accordingly.

The Enemy, as soone as the opportunity of the swelling Rivers would give him leaue, intrenched his Camp, and planted severall batteries. During his approaches, General Varr made divers brave sallies, especially one which was generall; in all which he slew many of the Enemy with little losse of his own: yet considering that in continuance he should waste his men, he having not in all full two thousand of all Nations, sick and whole, which would hardly be able to man his out-works, which were very great, and that after the losse of Manheim, Frankendale could not subsist; He sent a Commissary againe to Captain Byronovs, willing him to abandon the Towne and repaire vnto him with all his Troops: which the inhabitants vnderstanding, began to murmur, fell to Arms, and due to the Ports; giuing the Governour to vnderstand, that as he had defended them valiantly the last yeere, so they would now live and die with him, and not leaue him vnlesse he would passe by force over their bellies, desiring rather to be slaine by him then by the Enemy: Whereupon the Governour advertised the General in what state he stood; who returned him an answer presently, that he should doe as he thought good, referring it to his discretion; whereupon he stayed in Frankendale.

General Varr, having no hope of any more supplies of men, was forced to abandon his out-works, suffering the Enemy to approach neere to the Wall. After some dayes, the Town being not defensible, he set it on fire, and retired with those few troupes he had into the Castle, from whence he so annoyed the Enemy, as he could hardly lodge within the Town. Tilly often summoned him to yield upon honourable conditions; but he found an Enemy who preferred his honour before his life, and would give care to no parley, as long as he had any means to keepe it: Wherefore Tilly being loth to assault a Fort defended by such resolute men, resolved to get it by Mine or Sappe. His Pioners being come to the very brim of the Moate, having with other Trenches drained away the Water, which at first was some hindrance vnto them; he then resolved to give an assault; for the which he had prepared great store of bauns to fill up the Dike: yet considering that to force this Castle would cost him much blood, and although they could not keepe the place long, yet he should hardly get it without great losse: He held it the safest course to summon them againe, and to get it by composition.

General Varr, on the other side, finding that he had neither men sufficient to man it long, and that he had not powder for three daies service; considering withall, that although they should lose themselves they could not keepe the Fort long, and knowing withall that dead men could doe their Prince and Country no service; he resolved to make a vertue of necessity, and not to lose so many brave men with obstinacy, whom he might bring off with honour: Whereupon, after summons made by the Enemies Drumme, General Varr accepted of a parley; in which, after much debating, there were six Articles concluded betwixt Mounseur Tilly, General for the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria on the one side; and Sir Horatio Varr, General of his Majesties forces of great Brittain in the Palatinate, on the other:

ther: The Articles were, that the Governour, Captaines, Officers and Souldiers, should have leaue to depart freely with bag and baggage, drums beating, colours flying, marches light, and bullets in their mouthes: secondly, that they might take with them two falconets or small field-pieces, with munition and instruments belonging to the same: to the which, Mounseur Tilly (after some contestation) yielded, to do honour to Sir Horatio Varr, because he was a General; thirdly, that they might carry away with them thirty pipes of wine, with two hundred sacks of meal, and prouant for three daies onely; the which was to go with them by land, and the rest to be transported by water: fourthly, that they should have a convey of one thousand horse to Frankfort, and there to stay fourteen daies till the English Ambassadour or his Commisarie might come to conueigh them downwards: fifthly, that all goods and moveables, which had been brought into the Castle for safety, should be free, and the owners have liberty to transport themselves and their goods whither they pleased: sixthly, all Ministers and Church-men should have free liberty either to stay in Manheim, and exercise their function, or depart safely whither they pleased.

Vpon these honourable conditions the Castle of Manheim was deliuered up to the enemy on the five and twentieth of October, stil veteri. And so General Varr retired out of Manheim with ten companies of English, and twelue of Dutch vnder the command of Colonel Waldbanhus. He marched to Frankfort with a good convey of one thousand horse. The General with his Captains was lodged in the City; and his Troops, in the villages thereabouts. After their departure from Frankfort, the Dutch left them, and would go no further, notwithstanding they had promised to march with them into the Lowe-countries: and after some stay, the General with the English, being five or six hundred men, were conducted by a Commissary of the enemies, through the Lantzgrau of Hesse his Country; where they past down a riuer to Breme, there to be embarked for England.

After the surrendering of Manheim, General Tilly marched with his Army to Frankendale (it being the onely place now remaining in the Palatinate for the Elector) with an intent, by the taking of this place, to make himself absolute Master of the whole Palatinate: but he found the same Governour Captain Byronovs, who had so valiantly defended it the yeer before against Don Gonzales de Cordova; and the same resolution, having vowed to lose his life rather than any lot of that honour which he had gotten at the former siege: neither was he idle during the siege of Heidelberg and Manheim, but furnished and fortified it by all the means hee could, having drowned the land about it on the weaker part of the Towne; so as the enemy could neither make trenches on that side to lodge his men in, nor approach his cannon to plant his batteries: yet it seemd still he was resolved to force it, drawing souldiers from all places thither with the hope of spoil, having promised them the sack of that Town: but he was deceived of his present expectation; because the approaches were so difficult by reason of the drowned land, and the wayes so slippery and deep with the continuall rain, that he forbore to attempt anything by force, and imploied his best eloquence to perswade the Inhabitants to yeeld. Hee assured them, that they should not be molested in their religion, nor oppressed with any great garrison; that the commerce should be open and free, and that the Emperor would keepe no garrisons in the Palatinate, but in some important places. To these good words General Tilly added some threats, that if they continued obstinate, they must expect nothing but the rigor of warre, and the ruines which are incident to Towns besieged; whereas by their voluntary yielding they should purchase the Emperors favour, preserve themselves, their wives and children, and have fair Quarter kept with them, and be protected by his Imperial Majesty with the rest of the Palatinate. All this could not move the resolute Inhabitants; who had vowed to take the fortune of the warre, and to defend the Town with the Governour and souldiers: and therefore they gave no answer to his propositions.

The General, after all his practices to draw them to a composition, finding little means to advance any thing by force in regard of the vnseasonableness of the weather, and the continuall rain which made the waies exceeding deep, he resolved to retire his camp for a time, marching towards Stannov and the Lantzgrau of Hesse his Country, with an intent to winter his Troops thereabouts, leaving some companies of horse about Frankendale, to keepe them from excursions and from all relief. Thus this poor Town, the onely remainder of all the Palatinate, hath some time of rest and breaching, till that the season of the yeer will give the enemy leaue to return; who is well assured, that they haue no means to be relieved, being enuironed by their enemies garrisons which ly in the Towns round about them; and that time will waste their provisions, and a protestant written that in Prague.

1622

Touching matters of religion, it seemd the Emperor had an intent to root out the Protestants in Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces: for, the Prince or Lantgrau of Lichtenheim, Lieutenant of Bohemia for the Emperor, had commission from him to shut vp the two Dutch Protestant Churches in Prague, and to presse the City and Countrey to reformation in religion; the which was put in execution: so as they were likely to lose the comfort of the Gospell by the preaching of their Ministers, and the grounds of religion which the youth learned by the instruction of their Teachers: for, both the Ministers and Preachers were commanded to be presently gon; which did much afflict the Protestants: and the Colledges where their youth was instructed, were shut vp. There was also commandement giuen by publique proclamation to all book-sellers and Stationers, to bring-in a catalogue of all their Lutheran & Caluinian books to the Secretary of State, within foureteen daies, vpon great penalties.

The Duke of Saxony, hauing notice giuen him of this alteration in Bohemia touching the shutting vp of the Protestant Churches, was much discontented, both in regard of his owne particular, being of that religion, and might in time be subiect to the like calamity with the rest of the protestant Princes of Germany; as also houlding his honour to be blemished, for that, at the reduction of those Countreies to the Emperors obedience, hee had promised them by warrant from the Emperor, that the Churches should not be molested, nor they deprived of the free exercise of their religion, hauing also taken them into his protection; and therefore the Duke objected these proceedings to the Emperors Ambassador as a wrong done to him: and beeing still importuned by the petitions of the Preachers which had been driuen out of their Countreies; he wrote to the Prince of Lichtenstein to this effect; that forasmuch as hee could not but take notice by sundry aduertisements from Bohemia and the incorporated Prouinces, as also by the complaints of diuerse Preachers lately banished out of those Countreies, of the restraint of the publike profession of the reformed religion, and of the shutting vp their Churches, and the putting down of their schools: yet for that men in miserie do commonly seek to moue pity by the report of their estates, and for that he had been alwaies better conceited of his Maiesties word, who had promised him, that if those Countreies could be reduced to obedience by his forces, he should by his Maiesties direction passe his word to the subiects of those Prouinces, that those of the reformed religion should still enioy their freedom of conscience: Wherefore, relying vpon the Emperors word, he would not rashly giue credit to those informations till he might hear the certainty both of the authority of his commission, and in what manner it had been executed: wherefore he could do no lesse in fauour of the cause, and for the honour of his owne word (whereon the inhabitants of those Prouinces had much relied) than to entreat him earnestly to aduertise him of the truth of the businesse; the which if he found conformable to the Petitioners complaints, he could not but hold his own honor engaged to take care for a timely remedy, and withall employ his credit and power with his Imperial Maiesty for the staying of all future proceedings. Some think, these alterations in Bohemia staied the Duke of Saxony's journey to the Diet at Regensbourg; who, continuing his discontents, gaue the Emperor to vnderstand by his Letters, that he was much grieved for the shutting vp of the protestant Churches at Prague, the which did not belong to the Bohemians, but to the Electors and Princes of Germany, professing the gospell; who had built and maintained them at their owne charges, and procured them great priuiledges and immunities: wherefore his Maiesty had not to do with the Protestants of Bohemia, but with the Electors and Princes of the Empire, which should not suffer them of their owne religion (contrary to his Imperial promise and the priuiledges of the Empire) to be persecuted and oppressed: This may breed some new combustion and trouble, vnlesse it shall please the Emperour to restore those Churches to their former estate and condition.

the continuance of the siege of Glaz.

The siege of Glaz continued still: which being resolutely attempted by the Imperialists, it was so obstinately defended by the besieged. The young Earle of Thurne, making many sallies vpon the Enemy, cloyed some of their Cannons and returned with good spoiles and much honour: but in September there was an accident which did much impair the state of the town; for they setting fire of their suburbs, to the end the Imperialists should not lodge in them, some sparks of it fell by chance into their powder, whereby part of the Town, and much of their provision was burnt and likewise a part of the wall, with two peeces of Ordinance falling downe, through the violence of the fire, the Imperialists aduanced to a scallado, but they were valiantly repulled by the Garrison.

About the middelt of October, the Imperialists assaulted the Towne with great fury: and they

1622

they within, suffering them to approach to their very walles, they hauing discharged their Ordinance, they presently set open their Ports and salied forth with one thousand horse and foot, where they slue six hundred of the Enemy, and then retired with no great losse. During these factions of warre before Glaz, there was a parley between the young Earle of Thurne, Gouernour of the Towne; the Earle of Torquato, Generall of the Emperours Army; and the Prince of Lichtenstein, Gouernour of Bohemia; where there were many propositions made vnto the young Earle with promises of pardon and great rewards, both for himselfe and his Souldiers, in the Emperors name, if he would yeeld vp the Towne. The young Earle of Thurne made them this answer:

That if they could procure the King of Bohemia to free him from his double Oath (one as he was his subiect, and the other as his Soldiery) that then he would not only yeeld vp the town and castle, but would also forsake the quarrell and lay down Armes: But, seeing they could not dispense him of his Oath, that both he and his companie were resolute to make it good against the Imperialists; and although they might haply, with great losse and charge, take the Towne, yet they had a Castle to retreat into, the which they would defend to the last man; and so the treaty brake off, euery man returning to his quarter: Presently after which, they made a great sallie, which was very bloody and many were slaine on either side; among the which, there were thirteen Captains of the Imperialists.

They so annoyed the Campe with their Ordinance, as the Emperour commanded all his forces in Bohemia to march towards Glaz to re-enforce the siege, and they sent for powder, bullets and munition from all parts. The siege had continued almost two yeers, and had put the Emperour to wonderfull great charges, the which could hardly be supplied; and therefore they vsed a policy to make the besieged pay for their own ruine: for, by a publique proclamation in Silesia, they enioyned all men vpon paine of death, which ought any money, or had any goods in their hands belonging to them of Glaz, to bring it presently into the Towne-house at Prague: Whereupon, much money and goods was brought thither; which extremity hath bene often, and is still, vsed against the Nobility and Gentry of those Countreies which had bene executed; yea, euen against such as were dead before they had bene called in question.

This Proclamation did nothing amaze them of Glaz, who held their Armes to be their greatest wealth, the which could not be violently taken from them, without the losse of their liues; and then their cares were past, and their scores paid: But, to auoide tediousnesse, I will omit the daily skirmishes which were before that Towne, and come to the yeelding of it. After a long and obstinate siege resolutely defended by the young Earle of Thurne, they were driuen to some extremities, by reason of some calamities by fier, in the which their salt, powder, and meale was consumed, and their water cut off by the Imperialists: which daunted the Souldiers much, and made them mutine; so as the Gouernour (although he were one thousand five hundred strong) was glad to come to a parley, and to yeeld vp the Towne vpon honourable termes on the twenty sixth day of October. The Articles were, First, that they should haue free exercise of the reformed Religion, and their Church remaine as it was, until the Emperour shall otherwise dispose: And if any Protestant were desirous to leaue the Towne, they should haue free liberty to sell their goods within six moneths, and goe where they pleased. Secondly, that the Gouernour, Captains, Commanders and Souldiers, both of Horse and Foote, should freely and safely depart with baggage and baggage, Drums beating, Colours flying, and their full Armes; conditionally, that all the companies should be cast and dismist about Swatnitz, and there leaue their Commanders, and their Cornets and Ensignes to be tome from their stauces, and all sworn not to beare Armes against the Emperour for six moneths following. Thirdly, that the Gouernour, Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, should haue a general pardon for all offences and rebellions committed against the Emperour, and suffered to depart where they pleased. Fourthly, that all Commanders, Officers and Souldiers, which had serued his Maiesty, and now born Armes against him in this quaiell, should haue Passports giuen them to passe freely through the Dominions of the Empire, into their own Countreies, or whither they pleased. Fifthly, the sick and hurt should remaine still in the Towne of Glaz, and there haue all due attendance and prouision from the Citizens, for their cure and recovery; after which they shall haue free leaue to depart, and passports giuen them to goe where they pleased. Sixthly, that the Earle of Thurne should leaue two Captains with the Imperialists as Hostages until he had dismist his Troups about Swatnitz, according to the capitulation.

the yeelding of
of Glaz.

These Articles, being very honourable for the Earle of Thurne and the besieged, were very duly observed by the Imperialists, who gave them a good convey to Swinitz, which is five German miles from Glaz. It was thought that they were very rich when they left the Town, having a hundred waggons heavy laden with baggage, beside lighter carriages of which there were fifty belonging to the young Earle of Thurne, which were conducted to his wife in the Marquess of Brandenburg's Country by 500 light horse of his owne, and a convey of 2000 Imperialists. Thus at last the Emperor hath reduced all Bohemia with the incorporated Provinces to his obedience, and his brother, the Arch-duke Charles Bishop of Ratis or Risse, taking well the ayre of the Country and the strength of the place, hath gotten the government of the country of Glaz, from the Emperor.

Heidelberg being lost, Generall Tilly marched presently with his Army to Manheim, where Generall V arr attended him; it being the place of most importance and best fortified in all the Palatinate, standing near the point of a land where the Neccar which passeth by Heidelberg falleth into the Rhine, so as it commands both the Rivers, and receives the Toll of all boats which passe. The Enemy being set downe on the one side of the Towne, Generall V arr, considering that the guard thereof and of the out-works was very great, and that he was not sufficiently provided with men, having but seven companies of English, and nine of Dutch (all which were very weake in numbers, and many sick) he sent to Frankendale, to have Captain B vrovv send him three companies more of English and as many Dutch: which he performed accordingly.

The Enemy, as soone as the opportunity of the swelling Rivers would give him leave, entrenched his Camp, and planted severall batteries. During his approaches, Generall V arr made divers brave Salles, especially one which was generall, in all which he slew many of the Enemy with little losse of his own: yet considering that in continuance he should waste his men, he having not in all full two thousand of all Nations, sick and whole, which would hardly be able to man his out-works, which were very great, and that after the losse of Manheim, Frankendale could not subsist, he sent a Commissary againe to Capitaine B vrovv, wishing him to abandon the Towne and repaire unto him with all his Troups: which the inhabitants understanding, began to mutine, fell to Arms, and flew to the Ports; giving the Gouverneur to understand, that as he had defended them valiantly the last yeere, so they would now live and die with him, and not leave him unless he would passe by force over their bellies, desiring rather to be slaine by him then by the Enemy: Whereupon the Gouverneur advertised the Generall in what state he stood; who returned him an answer presently, that he should doe as he thought good, referring it to his discretion: whereupon he stayed in Frankendale.

Generall V arr, having no hope of any more supplies of men, was forced to abandon his out-works, suffering the Enemy to approach neere to the Wall. After some dayes, the Town being not defensible, he set it on fire, and retired with those few troupes he had into the Castle, from whence he so annoyed the Enemy, as he could hardly lodge within the Town. Tilly often summoned him to yield upon honourable conditions; but he found an Enemy who preferred his honour before his life, and would give care to no parley, as long as he had any means to keepe it: Wherefore Tilly being loth to assault a Fort defended by such resolute men, resolved to get it by Mine or Sappe. His Pioners being come to the very brim of the Moate, having with other Trenches drained away the Water, which at first was some hindrance unto them, he then resolved to give an assault, for the which he had prepared great store of bauins to fill up the Dike: yet considering that to force this Castle would cost him much blood, and although they could not keepe the place long, yet he should hardly get it without great losse: He held it the safest course to summon them againe, and to get it by composition.

Generall V arr, on the other side, finding that he had neither men sufficient to man it long, and that he had not powder for three daies service, considering withall, that although they should lose themselves they could not keepe the Fort long, and knowing withall that dead men could doe their Prince and Country no service, he resolved to make a virtue of necessity, and not to lose so many brave men with obstinacy, whom he might bring off with honour: Whereupon, after summons made by the Enemies Drumme, Generall V arr accepted of a parley, in which, after much debating, there were six Articles concluded betwixt Mounseigneur Tilly, Generall for the Emperour and the Duke of Bavaria on the one side; and Sir H oratio V arr, Generall of his Majesties forces of great Brittain in the Palatinate, on the other:

ther: The Articles were, that the Gouverneur, Captaines, Officers and Souldiers, should have leave to depart freely with bag and baggage, drums beating, colours flying, matches light, and bullets in their mouthes: secondly, that they might take with them two falconets or small field-pieces, with munition and instruments belonging to the same: to the which, Monsieur Tilly (after some contestation) yielded, to do honour to Sir H oratio V arr, because he was a General; thirdly, that they might carry away with them thirty pipes of wine, with two hundred sacks of meal, and prouant for three daies only; the which was to go with them by land, and the rest to be transported by water: fourthly, that they should have a convey of one thousand horse to Frankfort, and there to stay foureteen daies till the English Ambassadour or his Commissarie might come to conueigh them downwards: fifthly, that all goods and moveables, which had been brought into the Castle for safety, should be free, and the owners have liberty to transport themselves and their goods whither they pleased: sixthly, all Ministers and Church-men should have free liberty either to stay in Manheim, and exercise their function, or depart safely whither they pleased.

Upon these honourable conditions the Castle of Manheim was delivered up to the enemy on the five and twentieth of October, filu veteri. And so Generall V arr retired out of Manheim with ten companies of English, and twelve of Dutch under the command of Colonel Waldranhus. He marched to Frankfort with a good convey of one thousand horse. The Generall with his Captains was lodged in the City; and his Troops, in the villages thereabouts. After their departure from Frankfort, the Dutch left them, and would go no further, notwithstanding they had promised to march with them into the Lowe-countries; and after some stay, the Generall with the English, being five or six hundred men, were conducted by a Commissary of the enemies, through the Lantzgrau of Hesse his Country; where they past down a river to Breme, there to be embarked for England.

After the surrendering of Manheim, Generall Tilly marched with his Army to Frankendale (it being the onely place now remaining in the Palatinate for the Elector) with an intent, by the taking of this place, to make himself absolute Master of the whole Palatinate: but he found the same Gouverneur Capitaine B vrovv, who had so valiantly defended it the yeere before against Don Gonzales de Cordona; and the same resolution, having vowed to lose his life rather than any jot of that honour which he had gotten at the former siege: neither was he idle during the siege of Heidelberg and Manheim, but furnished and fortified it by all the means hee could, having drowned the land about it on the weaker part of the Towne, so as the enemy could neither make trenches on that side to lodge his men in, nor approach his cannon to plant his batteries: yet it seemd still he was resolved to force it, drawing souldiers from all places thither with the hope of spoil, having promised them the sack of that Town: but he was deceived of his present expectation; because the approaches were so difficult by reason of the drowned land, and the wayes so slippery and deep with the continual rain, that hee forbore to attempt any thing by force, and imploied his best eloquence to perswade the Inhabitants to yeeld. Hee assured them, that they should not be molested in their religion, nor oppressed with any great garrison; that the commerce should be open and free, and that the Emperour would keepe no garrisons in the Palatinate, but in some important places. To these good words Generall Tilly added some threats, that if they continued obstinate, they must expect nothing but the rigor of warre, and the ruines which are incident to Towns besieged; whereas by their voluntary yielding they should purchase the Emperours favour, proserue themselves, their wives and children, and have fair Quarter kept with them, and be protected by his Imperial Majesty with the rest of the Palatinate. All this could not move the resolute Inhabitants; who had vowed to take the fortune of the warre, and to defend the Town with the Gouverneur and souldiers: and therefore they gave no answer to his propositions.

The Generall, after all his practices to draw them to a composition, finding little means to advance any thing by force in regard of the unseasonableness of the weather, and the continual rain which made the waies exceeding deep, he resolved to retire his camp for a time, marching towards Hannow and the Lantzgrau of Hesse his Country, with an intent to winter his Troops thereabouts, leaving some companies of horse about Frankendale, to keepe them from excursions and from all relief. Thus this poor Town, the onely remainder of all the Palatinate, hath some time of rest and breathing, till that the season of the yeer will give the enemy leave to return; who is well assured, that they have no means to be feared, being enuironed by their enemies garrisons which ly in the Towns round about them; and that time will waste their provisions, and and necessity force the slowest courages to yield. TILLY retiring his Army, the governor of the Towne sallied forth, and slew diuerse of the enemies Rereward, and brought in good spoile. After which, he made incursions with two companies of horse, as farre as Wormes & Spire, bringing in what the poore wasted Country could afford. But, all this will not serue to maintain the Towne, for any long time.

The Prince of Orange, with the vniited States had (as you haue heard) in the yeere 1620 built a fort in the riuer of Rhine betwixt Cullen and Bona, which was agreed cyfcore vnto them, and did keepe the passage of the riuer, and the neighbour Prouinces in awe: whereupon this Summer, the Duke of Newburg one of the pretendents to the inheritance of the Duchies of Cleue, Iuliers and Berck, sent some forces vnder a commander of his to besiege it, being assisted by the Archduchesse Infanta, who sent the Prince of Cheine with men, cannon and munition. These forces built fortes vpon either side of the riuer and planted their batteries, hauing received some cannon from Iuliers or Gulich: they also maintained two ships of war in the Rhine, whereby all boates which came vp or downe with any merchandise were forced to discharge and carrie it ouer land by cart, lest the besieged should receiue any reliefe. They haue spent a long time at this siege without any great militarie exploits: onely they haue not spared their powder and shot, but yet made no great breach which might encourage them to offer an assault, for the which they haue made great preparation of Rhine boates, Puntis, and such like, as if they intended to force it; but the garison seemed resolute: Yet since, in the end of December, the garrison being growne very weak, they haue beene forced to yield.

COUNT MANDSLED, after his retreat out of the Palatinate, entred into the States pay for three monthes: those being ended, and the siege of Berghen raised, he marched vp with his and the Duke of Brunswick forces towards Westphalia, and the Archbishop of Cullen countie, which is within the limits of the Empire; and there took some Townes and Castles, spoiling and ransoming the Countrey to reuenge the wrong which the Archbishop of Cullen had done vnto the Elector Palatine in sending the Baron of Anhalt his Generall with forces thither: from thence he went into East Friesland and the Countie of Emden, the Earle whereof had maintained a Regiment of foote with the Spaniard against the vniited States. Being in those parts he blocked vp Lingen a faire off (which Towne had beene taken by SPINOLA before the truce, and did belong by inheritance to the Prince of Orange) and he forced the said Earle to abandon his Countrey and to leaue his poore subjects to the furie of insolent souldiers; so as the Bishoprick of Munster and the Territorie of Emden were in a manner ruined and left waste. SPINOLA sent Count HENRY VANDENBERG, the Baron of Anhalt, with some other commanders, with forces to follow him into those parts: but MANDSLED, hauing seized vpon Nippel, Reenen, and some other Townes about Lingen, kept all victuall from them, whereby the souldiers are in some distresse: He fortifies himselfe daily with new troupes which are leuiued in those Countreies for the Duke of Brunswick and builds sconses vpon the passages by the which the enemy might come vnto him: so as there is no apparance of any great exploits to be done by those Armies, this winter (the way in those parts being so deepe as an Army can hardly make any faire march) but that they will passe this winter & feede their troupes vpon the poore mans pulse vntill the Spring drawe them againe into action.

The Emperour had long since appointed a Diet at Regensburg, for the settling of a firme peace in the Empire, to reforme abuses, and to redresse all greouances whereof there had been many complaints vnto his Maiesty, and they still referred for their answer, to the Diet; the which had beene often adiourned and put off vpon some important considerations: but now it was fully resolved, the Emperour hauing summoned all the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire, to appeare there in November, and to that end both his Maiesty and all the Princes sent their officers thither to provide their lodgings. But before the Emperours parting from Vienna towards Regensburg, there arriued two Ambassadors, one from the King of Persia; the other from the Ottoman Emperour. The Persian desired confirmation of the League which his father had formerly had with the Emperour, and to intreate him to employ his forces against the Turk, who seemed to threaten his countrey this yeere with a powerfull inuasion. The Turk sent a Basha with astatefull Embassie and great Presents (an vnusall thing in them who are accustomed to receiue from all Princes which send vnto them, and not to giue to any) but it seemed, his new State was not so well settled as hee would trust the Christians, during his expedition against Persia; entreating the Emperour to continue the truce, or to confirme peace, fearing least something might be attempted against him vpon the frontiers of Hungary during during his absence: to whom the Emperour gave no present answer, but told him that he might return if he pleased, and leaue a Chaux behinde him to receiue his answer after the ending of the Diet.

In the beginning of Nouember, the Emperour and the Empreffe parted from Vienna towards Regensburg, with a great train of Ladies and Noble-men. Hee made his entry on the five and twentieth of Nouember in great state; the particularities whereof I omit. There was yet a small appearance of Princes: for, there were onely comen three ecclesiasticall Electors, with the Bishops of Salzburg and Virtzburg. The Dukes of Banaria and Newburg were expected dayly; but the Protestant Princes made some stay, and it was doubtfull of their coming: namely, the Duke of Saxony, the Marquesse of Brandenburg, the Dukes of Brunswick, Virtemberg and Pomerania, the Lantzgrane of Hesse, the Marquesse of Durlach of the houle of Baden, with many others of their religion. The Emperour desired much to haue the Duke of Saxony present at the Diet, and had prest him much by his Letters: but his coming was doubtfull; being, as they write, discontented for the breach which had been made touching religion, with the Bohemians and the incorporated Prouinces; wherein he said his honour was engaged. Some which presume to knowe the Secrets of Princes Cabinets, haue giuen out, that one of the chief reasons for the calling of this Diet, is, To settle the Electorship of the Palatinate vpon the Duke of Banaria; with the consent of the whole State of Germany; the which the Emperour hath much desired, the Duke ambitiously affected, and the Pope with all his Clergie instantly prest: but, as I haue heard of no propositions, so I will not diuine of their conclusions; onely I will pray to God so to direct their counsels, that they may preferre the publike peace and tranquillity of Germanie before their private interests, and not cast oil into the fire of their diuisions, which may draw a great part of the Christian world into troubles and combustions.

Thus, with the end of the yeer and the losse of the Palatinate (one poor Town excepted) I end this work: wherein we haue seen a great Prince, the first secular Elector of Germany, spoiled and dispossessed of his hereditary estate, and forced to abandon his Countrey and subjects to the fury and oppression of an insulting enemy. But God I hope (who is the God of battailes) will in his due time dissolue these pinching frosts of affliction by his almighty power, and restore him, with the vertuous Princeesse his wife, to their former estate; and make those Princely Imps (sprung from so Royall a Stem) flourish like oliue-branches, to the great ioy and comfort of all which honour and respect them: for the which I will daily pour forth my vovs and prayers to almighty God; and let all good men say Amen.

A brief Discourse of the ciuill warres in the Valtolin.

Had not meant to write of the ciuill broils in the Valtolin and the Grisons Country, holding it impertinent to this History which treats onely of the Emperors lues, and of those things which haue past in their dominions: but, finding that the house of Austria doth make a challenge to some of those Communalities, and haue by their Arms brought the Grisons Country in a manner into subiection & seruitude, and possessed themselves of the passage of the Valtolin, I haue thought it fit for the Readers better satisfaction to make a summary relation of these combussions, and to shew the motives and the euents: for the true vnderstanding whereof, I must rip it vp from the first beginning, which was in the year 1603.

The Valtolin is a Valley which depends vpon the Cantons of the Grisons; the which extends it self in length somethrty French leagues from the Lake of Como in Italy to the County of *Tiro*l which is in Germany. It is watered by the riuer of Ada, and is shut vp on either side by inaccessible mountains. In the Grisons Country their gouernment is Democraticall. The Generall assembly of the Communalitie hath all soveraign power. Many Boroughs and Villages make a Communality; and many Communalities, a Canton or League: and of three Cantons the Common-weal of the Grisons consisteth. This Assembly hath absolute power by plurality of voices to make and abolish lawes, to treat of alliances with Princes and forren States, to dispose of war and peace, and of all things belonging to Souerainty. But, to come to the first beginning of these factions, you must vnderstand, that in the year 1602, HENRY the Fourth, the French King, had renewed the antient alliance of France with the Swissers and Grisons, vpon the same articles and conditions as had been concluded with other Kings his Predecessors; against the aduice of some, who had propounded to make a new league with the Venecians, which might concern the passage of the Alps: but the Grisons which embraced the alliance of France would not yeeld to it.

In the year 1603 there was a new league concluded at Coire or Chur betwixt the Grisons and the Venecians, notwithstanding the opposition of the French Ambassador. Of 26 Communalities of the Grisons, two parts of them are Protestants Caluenists, contrary to the Romanists. The Protestants, which fauoured this league, gaue the common people to vnderstand, first, that the most Christian King was well pleased with it, being a matter of State, and the onely means to frustrate the Spaniard of all alliance with the Grisons: secondly, touching religion, that they should not doubt but by means of this league which allowed them liberty of conscience in Venice without exercise, the Gospell would take root in Venice, and from thence disperse it selfe throughout all Italy; and, thirdly, the yeerly pension and the Arms they should receive from the Venecians, with the particular pensions for their captains: for, the Grisons do naturally loue money.

The Earl of Fuertes, who was at that time Gouerner of Milan, grew iecalous of this league between the Venecians and the Grisons, and could by no means endure it, by reason of the importance of the passage of souldiers which they allowed the Venecians through the Alps: whereupon, he forbade all commerce with the Grisons, and presently built the Fort of Fuertes at the entry of the passage of the Valtolin. The Grisons, who could not liue without the commerce of Milan and Lombardy by reason of the barrenness of their Country, fell into faction. Some prime men and Captains, with the protestant Commons, would haue gon to Armes: and the Bishop of Coire and many of his partisans (fauouring the Spaniards) practised in such sort, that Deputies were sent to Milan, to treat vpon the old alliances between the Milanois and the Grisons, to the end that the Fort of Fuertes might be rased: where, they concluded vpon certain Articles, which were reicided in the Assembly of the Grisons; who in the mean time waivered between the doubtfull euents of war and the discommodities of peace.

The Deputies or Ambassadors, who were sent to Milan, were much taxed by all the Grisons, to haue received Presents and chaines of gold from the Earle of Fuertes: with the which hee fought to fetter their liberty; they hauing accorded, first, that the Spaniard might leuie souldiers in the Grisons Country when he pleased; secondly, that the passage should be open for him at all times to transport his Armies through their Country, and that they should not suffer any other souldiers to passe through their Territories without the aduice of the Gouerner of Milan, to the end that he should consider whether that passage might any way preiudice the Duchie of Milan, Articles which they held hurtfull to their antient alliance with France, and to make their new league with Venice vnprofitable. The Grisons hauing rejected these Articles in an Assembly at Jilant, the Earle of Fuertes presently caused his Fort to bee immured, and the Grisons descent into Italy to be stopt: whereupon, the Grisons resolved to chuse the hazard of Armes, to maintain their liberty.

Hauing demanded succours of men and money from the Ambassadors of France and Venice, they both took time to aduertise their Masters. The like they did to the Swissers beeing then assembled at Bade; letting them vnderstand, that the Earle of Fuertes had taken from them the commerce which was betwixt them and the Duchy of Milan; requiring their counsell and aid, for that the iniurie was common to them: but they returned ill satisfied, for that the Ambassador of Spain had prevailed much in that Assembly.

In the year 1605, the French Ambassador, receiuing the King his Masters pleasure, gaue the Grisons to vnderstand, that his Maiesty did aduise them to end their differences by an accord; especially that they should not come to Armes: and although the businesse did nothing concern himself, yet he would willingly imploy himself in regard of their alliance, to the end that the oppression they receiued from the Fort of Fuertes might be taken away. On the other side, the Ambassador of Venice told them, that the proposition to make a Fort vpon the Frontier of the Valtolin, to the end they might keep a passage open, and free from the Grisons Territories vnto those of the Venecians, was good; and that the Segniory of Venice would delay the cost and charges of the building of a new Fort, and would entertain a garrison of one hundred and fifty men.

After this, the Grisons grew diuided into three factions. The Bishop of Chur or Coire, with many Romanists, supported the Spaniard; who cast much of his Indian dust among them, and blinded the eyes of their vnderstandings. The Protestants and others fauoured the Venecians; and the antient friends to France blamed both these factions, and the league made with the Venecians; as the onely cause of the confusion which took root in all the members of their Common-wealth. These men knew well, that the counsell the King gaue them, Not to come to Armes, was for the good of their Common-wealth; and that, if they opposed a Fort to that of Fuertes, it would prouoke the Spaniard to war.

The motions and alterations between the Pope and the Venecians (which ended in the year one thousand, six hundred and seuen) much augmented these diuisions; the Venecians seeking to draw succours from the Grisons, and the partisans of Spain labouring to hinder it. Then the corruption which the Spanish gold had bred in the Catholique Communalities, was overruled by the Captains, who had receiued twice as much money from the Venecians to make Leuies of souldiers in the Grisons Country; and such as drew pensions from France, desiring to settle an order in the Grisons liberty, in the which the basest amongst the multitude would take knowledge of the State, and discomfite thereof in tauerne and stouges (which is not the right course to manage the affairs of a Common-wealth, for that there Secrets were as soon vented as propounded) caused a secret Councell to be erected of fifteen Deputies chosen out of all the Communalities, with a certain limited power: but this was presently crost by the two other factions, who required to haue this Councell dissolved.

There was a combustion at Coire this yeere: in May; whither the Communalities which supported the Venecians came with their Ensignes displayed, and required to haue that which had been promised by the Venecian League, effected: but presently there comming a greater number of other Communalities, by the Spaniards practice, they demanded the contrary; as may appear by these following Articles. 1. That hereafter no stranger should bee suffered to passe souldiers through the Alps. 2. That they should enquire who was the Author of the putting a garrison into the Valtolin, and who should pay it. 3. That the Communalities had not granted vnto the Venecians any passage for strange souldiers. 4. That the said Communalities had not made any alliance with the Dolphin of France, nor promised to giue passage to the French King's friends. 5. That the secret Councell newly erected should be wholly abrogated.

D d d d

6. That

1622
The Bishop of Coire treats an alliance with Spain.

1606

A new league between the Protestants and Grisons.

The Earl of Fuertes built, and garrisoned, the Fort of Fuertes at the entry of the passage into the Valley of Tolentino.

1604

6. That they should renew the ancient Alliances with Milan. 7. That the French Captains which were in the Valtolin, should be discharged. 8. That hereafter no man should receive any pension from a foraine Prince: and that those which were received by private persons should be distributed amongst the communalities. 9. That Church-men and Ministers should not meddle with the ciuill government, nor should be admitted to the assemblies of the communalities. 10. That the soldiers leuied by the Venetians might not goe out of the Countrey. 11. That the Criminal chamber should proceede against such as should be found traitors to their countrey. 12. That the Deputies of assemblies should hereafter bring the aduice of the communalities in writing and signed by them. Finally, the combustion was so great, that the Spanish faction seized on the Castle of Coire.

The subtilty of the Spanish Agents was well obserued in these Articles; who seeking to deprive the Ambassador of France of all liberty to giue his accustomed pensions openly to priuate Grisons, would thereby diuert them from the amitie of France, whilst he practised all he could by gifts to bandie against them which supported the Venetians, who had also (as was written) dispersit among their partisans about 80 thousand crowns, to maintain that they had a free passage through the Alpes. In the end of the yeere, the Iudges of the Criminal chamber (who were taxed to be pensioners to the Spaniard) were changed, upon complaint of their great couetousnesse and iniustice: but they which succeeded them in their places exceeded them in arrogance, corruption, and cruelty, which they practised against all those which they found partisans to Spain, as Traitors to their liberty.

The French Ambassador, who had discovered the intention of the Spanish faction, demanded Audience in a general Assembly of the communalities, where he let them see by the reading of the alliance which they had with France, the Imposture of those which had published, That the king his Maiesty had no free passage either for himselfe or for his friends through the Alpes: and that the Dolphin of France was not comprehended in the said Alliance. After the reading whereof and an exhortation made to continue constant in the League, with a promise of bounty, the whole assembly with one voice lifting their hands to heauen, cried out God saue the king, God preferre France and the Dolphin. Which done, the French Ambassador demanded of them a declaration of their confirmation of the Alliance, desiring to send it vnto the king: the which they all jointly promised, and afterwards euery communalitie signed. The Venetian Ambassador, to haue the like declaration vpon their new treaty of Alliance, made offer by his partisans to giue 3000 crownes to the three Grison Cantons: but his proceeding and offer was reiected; and the Garrison of 150 Grighs which was in the Valtolin paid by the king, was discharged: which seemed to be the subiect of some bad intelligence, which hapned afterwards betwene the Ambassadors of France and Venice, resident in those parts, the particularities whereof I must for breuitie sake omit.

In the yeere 1608 and 1609, the Grisons State was vnder the power of their Criminal chamber, whereas the Bishop of Coire was condemned to a pecuniary Fine; and if he would not signe certain Articles which should be imparted to him, he should be banished. Thus the Protestants held the chief places in the government: and the Valtolin Catholiques were much discontented to bee vnder the yoke and government of Podeslate Grisons of a contrary religion; so as it seemed by some actions, that the Earl of *Fuente*s would willingly haue given them aid to haue taken Arms.

In the yeere 1610, the French King hauing been traiterously murdered, the Magistrate of Coire repaired to his Ambassador; where, after many signs of great sorrow for so lamentable a death, hee protested in the name of all the Grisons, to continue constant in the Alliance which they had with the Crown of France: and the same yeere, the Earl of *Fuente*s, Gouverneur of Milan, died also. About this time the Venetians pursued a continuation of their Alliance for ten yeers with the Grisons: but they were let vnderstand, that they had sufficiently made trial of the good & harme which this Alliance had brought them; so as they desired no more: for there were many Articles obserued in that treaty which were directly contrary to the Alliance of France, the which I omit being very long.

In the yeere one thousand and eleuen, V. B. A. S. C. O. Constable of Castile, being newly made Gouverneur of Milan, hee sought to continue the designs of the deceased Earle of *Fuente*s, not by Armes but by Treatie. Hee promised at first to raise the fort of *Fuente*s: But the Ambassador of France gaue the Magistrate of Coire to vnderstand, that it was but a cunning practice, thinking thereby to reuine the Treaty of Milan. Hereupon the Agents for Spain, layde aspersions vpon the said Ambassadour (to make him odious to the Catholiques) in a counterfeited Letter written in the Germane tongue, and directed to the Bishop of Coire; by the which they gaue him to vnderstand, That the reason why the Protestant Ministers of the Grisons were so affected to the French King and his Ambassadour, was for that they had seene in the Register of their accounts, that he gaue vnto them yearly many thousands of crownes by way of pension. And on the other side, the said Ambassadour hauing laboured by the Kings commandement, that the alliance with the Venetians should not bee contynued, their partisans called him Iesuit, and they gaue it out that hee had giuen money to P. L. A. N. T. A. and others of the Spanish faction to breake the Alliance with Venice.

In the yeere 1613, the Grisons hauing againe concluded that the Alliance with Venice should not bee continued, the next yeere they commaunded their Ambassadour to depart the Countrey. After this in the yeere 1616 and 1617 the Spanish faction got the mastery, and beganne to dispose absolutely of the government of the State; so as by their practices, there was a Treaty appointed at Coire, this yeere on the 9 of March to reuine the ancient Alliance with Milan, for the King of Spain. There came A. L. E. O. N. S. O. C. A. S. A. T. his Ambassadour, in the name of Don P. D. R. O. D. O. de Toledo Gouverneur of the Duchie of Milan, where there were certaine Articles concluded. Firstly, They promised that betwixt his Maiesty as Duke of Milan with the subiects of the said Duchie, and the three Cantons, with their subiects of the Countrey of the Valtolin, Wormes, and the Countie of Chyauene shall be true, sincere and perpetuall friendship: so as they shall not attempt aught to the preiudice one of another, nor suffer any practice to be made openly or secretly in their provinces, nor consent to any passage, nor giue counsell or ayd directly or indirectly, but should oppose themselves with all their force & power. And if the one partie should know or discouer any secret practices, attempts or counsells to the preiudice of the other, the said partie should be bound to reueale it presently, and seeke to diuert it with all fidelity. Secondly, And for that his excellencie vnderstood that the three Cantons desired much that the fort of *Fuente*s which had beene built in the yeere 1603 vpon the frontiers of the Valtolin might be demolished, to the end they might thereby bee assured to be restored to his Maiesties good grace and fauour, his excellencie promised to treat with his Maiesty with all sincere affection in fauour of the said three Cantons; and that after the Articles of this present capitulation shall be accepted, sealed, and sworne by his Maiesty and the said three Cantons, that with out all delay, the demolition of the said forts shall take effect; And that his Maiesty shall not suffer them to be built vp againe, so long as the three Cantons shall for their parts faithfully obserue the contents of the said Capitulation, and that hereafter no such cause of ialousie be giuen vnto his Maiesty as was in the yeere 1603. And for as much as the three Cantons knew well that the distrust which ministred occasion for the building of the aforesaid forte of *Fuente*s, did proceede from the Alliance and passage which they had graunted vnto the Seigniorie of Venice: they promised by this present capitulation for them and their successors not to renew it hereafter, nor to suffer the said Alliance and passage in any sort, so long as this present capitulation shall be in force. Thirdly, That both parties shall haue free commerce and trafique from one countrey to another, aswell for themselves as their subiects, without any exception of persons: with this reseruation, that touching matters of religion they should giue no scandall, nor carry with them any forbidden bookes. And touching the role of cattell and other commerce which they should bring into the Duchie of Milan, or transpore from thence, the three Cantons should enioy all the priuiledges the which are granted vnto the Swissers, allies vnto his Maiesty. Fourthly, If it hapned his Maiesty should haue neede of any troupes of souldiers of this nation for the defence of the Duchy of Milan, it shall be lawfull for him to make a leaue in the Territories of the three Cantons, not exceeding the number of 3000 souldiers Voluntaries: and the election of the Colonell and Captains shall be made by his Maiesties Ambassador, who shall agree with them for their Armes & pay: And in case his Maiesty would for the preseruation of his countreies & Seigniories cause som troupes of strange souldiers to passe through the Grisons countrie into the Duchie of Milan, it shall be allowed to his Maiesty & his commanders: so as euery troupe exceed not the number of 200 persons and a daies iourney one from another: Euery troupe also shall haue his captain or conductor to keep them in good discipline, and with them a Commissaire of the Cantons at the kings charge to preuent all inconueniencies: & to the end also that the souldiers may pay for their victuals & passages and carrie themselves honestly, they shall not carrie any other Armes but their

D d d d

f words

Complaints of the French Ambassador against the Partisans of Spain.

Bad intelligence betwene the Ambassadors of France and Venice.

1622
Practises of the Spanish and Venetian politicians.

A new treaty of Alliance betwene the Grisons and the Grisons.

The Grisons promise not to renew their Alliance with the Venetians.

Liberty of Commerce.

Leaues of Gr. soldiers allowed the Spaniard.

Passage of soldiers allowed them.

1622
side promised to the Grisons.

swords and daggers, and the horsemen their Pistols: And in case it shall be sufficiently proved, that the souldiers have committed any harme and spoile in the Grisons country and their subiects, his Maiesty shall be bound to make restitution. 5. If it shall happen that the three Cantons shall be hostily invaded by any Prince, Potentate, or free State, his Maiesty shall be bound whensoever they require him, to assist the Cantons at his owne charge with 1000 foote and 200 horse, so long as the warre shall continue: and if the three cantons shall have neede of greater assistance, his Maiesty shall send it without delay. But, if the three Cantons shall thinke it more commodious to have money then men; his Maiesty in that case as long as the warre shall continue, shall effectually pay vnto them 10000 crownes a moneth; and withall shall lend them 6 fied peeces with their due munition, vpon condition that they shall be restored when the warre is ended. 6. His Maiesty as Duke of Milan, out of his royall bounty and in testimonie of his loue and affection vnto the three Cantons, doth promise to pay to every Canton yearly, at the Feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, the summe of 3000 florens, euery one being 15 Batzes of the money of Coire; the first payment to beginne on the said first Feast day, after the accord shall be sworn. Seuenthy, That this present capitulation shall no way preiudice the antient League and alliance which the three Cantons haue with the Crowne of France, the which shall remaine in full force and vigor. And lastly, that this capitulation shall be perpetuall and hereditarie.

*The Grisons
 proceedings in
 the yere 1618.*

This accord bred a great combustion among the Grisons (whereof two third parts are Protestant Calvinists) and was the cheefe and onely cause which made them to proceede criminally against many Catholique persons and of quality: that is to say, against the Bishop of Coire, the Arch-Priest of Sanderis, Rodolph, and Pompeius Planta brethren, Iohn Baptista Preuost, with an infinite number of others. And, for the iustificacion of their proceedings, they published a Protestation to the world, giuing all men to vnderstand, that certaine priuate persons had sought to vlturpe the gouernment of their State, and to appropriate vnto themselves those Soueraignties & powers which did properly belong to all the Communalities in general: the which they attempted by their great wealth and power, by corruption and presents, and by the alliances of their kindred: And this was not done at one instant; but, sometimes in one Community, and sometimes in another, as occasion was offered, to reduce them vnder their particular power. Which subtil practises had succeeded so well, as not onely the free Allies with their subiects, but also if Princes and forraigne States desired to obtaine any thing from their State, they were forced to receiue it from these priuate persons, who practised all kindes of treason, infidelities, falsehood, deceits, tyrannies and violences; whereby they brought their Estate into great contempt with all Princes and forraigne Potentates, who, by their Treacherie and rafhness, haue bene promised those things which they could not effect. These lamentable courses being observed by some men of iudgement, yea and by the common people (desiring to prevent the danger by some lawfull means) they complained in the last Assembly held at Davos in the yeere 1617, before the three Cantons, being their superiors, of these intolerable proceedings: and there, after an ample declaration of the miseries reigning in the State, had seriously insisted for anecessarie reformation, by the most convenient means. Which business, in regard of the great importance and for other vrgent causes, was sent by the Magistrate before the reuerend Iudges and all the Communalities, being the supreme power of their estate: whose intention they followed. And whereas after, in a Synode held in April in the yeere 1618, it had bene resolved that a writing of the said tenor should be published to all Counsellors and Communalities of euery parish, with instant prayers and exhortations to provide by all lawfull means without any commotion, for the restoring of the liberty of their country, freeing themselves from the fraudulent Treaties of some of their subiects with Princes and forraigne estates, to the end they might not bee brought into iust contempt; but rather to carrie themselves in such sort towards them, as their Ancestors had done; and so, their fidelity and integrity should be esteemed:

All which notwithstanding, those Authors of sedition had sought to abuse the common people, and to maintain their violent commande by their ordinary practises. Wherevpon the reformed Preachers in all the parishes had earnestly insisted for a necessary reformation of the whole State; and required, that some good men might be chosen out of the Commons (which were no way tyed or engaged to any Princes or forraigne States) to whome they might reueale certaine treacheries of some tyrannous commanders, who were no longer

to 1622

The Grisons of simple requiring a reformation of the State.

to be suffered, and whose reicction might be the restoring of the estate. But the people being out of hope, that in so small a number of Deputies they should euer obtaine any good successe, and finding in like manner that these tyrants could not be vanquished but by multitudes: not for any fear of their forces, but onely for plurality of voices, and to prevent all kinde of corruptions and false persuasions. In the end of Iune the year 1618, the five Communalities of Engaden and Valbajna the lower, together with those of Mustertal, assembled themselves, having sent Letters and Embassies to the other Communalities of the three Cantons, requiring them to do the like and by vertue of the Vnion to assist them as being most oppressed, for that their power and authority was taken from them, and vsurped by some priuate persons; their lawes falsified, their statutes changed, and their goods and means wrested from them, vnder pretext of publike authority; to the end these new lawes might be abolished, and the antient liberty of their ancestors restored, that also the treasures of Princes and forraigne States might no more bee wasted by priuate persons without the priuity and consent of the whole State, and that they might not be so treacherously deceived by the vain promises of such men.

At their earnest entreaties, there came to their succours in the beginning good numbers of men from some other Communalities; who willingly agreed for the restoring of the common estate, and the election of indifferent Iudges to punish criminal offenders.

In the mean time, the chief Author of these alterations, and Attempter vpon the soueraigne authority, called Rodolphus Planta, hauing as it seemed a guilty conscience, retired himself to his Castle of Pilsdenbourg in Zernus, the which he fortified and furnished with victuals and all things necessary, hauing drawne vnto him six hundred men to defend it, and seized vpon the passages, broken the bridges, and committed all acts of hostility against the neighbours and Allies. But, seeing the Troops of the Communalities approach, hee fled into Tiroll with some of his most confident friends. During these proceedings, the other Communalities of the three Cantons sent an Embassie to Engaden, offering to assist them to repaire the common estate, to restore the lawes, and to settle iustice, so as they would cause their Troops and Engages to retire; to the end that, all violences ceasing, Iustice might be administered indifferently to all men. But, answer being made vnto them, that the power of the seditious delinquents and of their adherents was so great, that without the aid and assistance of many men, their enterprise would be in vaine; therefore they prest the other Communalities to assist them with such Troops as they themselves should thinke good vpon so iust a business: which thing was granted.

Vpon this resolution, euery Community of the whole State assembled, some with their engines, some without, at Coire, and from thence to Thusis in the vpper Rhetia; where, with a general consent, for the restoring of their estate and policy, they renewed certain antient lawes, and made some new, touching the late transgressions: whereunto also their Allies which were absent, consented, with some little moderation. The tenor whereof consisted in these Articles: first, that the free exercise of both religions, reformed and Catholick, should bee allowed in all their lands and iurisdicktions, and euery man maintained and defended by the generality in his profession; secondly, that in all their Territories, euery league, Community, iustice, and particular persons, noble or ignoble, should be maintained and protected in their priuiledges, customs, dignities, goods and antient possessions; and that in all differences they should bee bound to submit themselves to the decision of a neutrall iudgement: thirdly, that their subiects should be gouerned in equity, and bee no more exposed to tyrants, as happily some had been: fourthly, that the treasure of the common estate should bee better gouerned, and that they should not suffer the common reuenues to be any more wasted and consumed by priuate persons: fifthly, that no particular man should presume to treat with any Prince and forraigne Estate without expresse commandement, vpon pain of death; but, those alliances which should be orderly made, and by a common consent, they meant to maintain with all loyalty towards all estates their neighbours, shewing them faithfull and good neighbourhood, with other circumstances, &c.

In this Assembly there was appointed a criminal chamber to proceed against certain pernicious persons; whereof some were prisoners, and others fled. To the which Court of Iustice euery Canton deputed two and twenty Iudges, nine Examiners, two Treasurers, one Secretary, and two Vthers: and finding, that by the authority of the reformed Preachers and Ministers, the people had hitherto been maintained in better order, it was also thought good, that nine of them should be admitted in this business, but not at definitiue sentences: all these were bound

Dddd 3

Erection of a criminal Court at Thusis.

Assemblies at Coire & Thusis.

New articles made at Thusis.

Rodolphus Planta prepares to resist the Grisons.

bound to sweare to discover all such as had done any thing against law and equity : That they should not respect rewards, friendship, hatred, factions or any other thing which might draw them from the rule of Justice, but rather attend the honor of God, the free and prosperous estate of their country, and sacred Justice.

Among the prisoners (whose processess they were to make) the chief was JOHN BAPTISTA Prevost called ZAMBER, lying at Vaspram, in the vpper Pregeil: who (by the confession of certain persons executed some years before, the deposition of witnesses, and by Letters written with his own hand) was convicted that he and his consorts had given aide and counsell to build the fort of Buenos vpon the frontiers of the Grisons country : To haue received presents in money from Millan, and to haue been gratified with the free transportation of Corne and Wine, paying little for the custome ; and to haue taken rewardes to mediate the treaties made in former time with the State of Millan ; and, on the other side, to haue received money and a great pension from the Ambassador of a forraigne Prince, to disswade the Grison Communalities from that alliance : the which being testified by the witness of men of reputation, in the end he confessed it with all the circumstances, and moreover said that RODOLPHUS PLANTA, with some others which were dead, had resolved the designe of the said Fort of Buenos at Danot, in the year 1603, during the Assembly of the league there, to the end that they might thereby force the people to their deuotion, and create a league with Millan at their pleasure, the which PLANTA had much affected. For which crimes he was condemned (as a Traytor to his country to be quartered, his goods to be confiscate to the benefit of the Cantons, yet without prejudice to his wives portion and his creditors : His house to be rased, and two pillars set vp in the place for a perpetuall infamy, but at the intersection of his friends and kinsfol, he being 74 years old, and having 9 children, they shewed him some fauor by losing only his head, and the demolishing of his house, was referred to the disposition of the Cantons.

NICHOLAS RUSCA, Arch-Prest of Sanders, being a prisoner, was accused of the like crimes, both by the deposition of witnesses, and the confession of some which had been executed, and also by Letters which were found about him : All which he constantly denying, or seeking to auoid by subtle deuices, he was condemned to the rack ; the which he endured the first day, being without any waight : but, being tied vnto it again after the same manner, he grew so weak as they were forced to vnbind him, so as he presently after died, nor without suspicion of poison by some manifest signes appearing in his body. They proceeded in like manner, by way of contumacy, against such as had absented themselves. JOHN Bishop of Cair was accused for that 17 years before he had bin banished by the iudgement of certain indifferent Iudges, consisting of both Religions, chosen out of the 3 Cantons, for many perfidious actions, and obstinate disobedience against his country ; That he had taken and given money to crosse the Swissers their trusty Allies, That he had put his Bishoprick into the protection of their enemies : And, finding himself guilty, he laboured to haue the title of Legat in Germany ; That afterwards he had fauored their perfidious inhabitants, who had vsurped the Sate gouernment, and had returned into his Bishoprick at Cair, whither he was conducted by RODOLPH PLANTA the chief Author of the treason, and continuing in his old train, he had assited at all consultations which had been made against the liberty of the country. For these and diuers other crimes objected against him, and verified by his own Letters, and the deposition of witnesses, they confirmed his banishment for ever, and confiscated his goods, without prejudice to the Bishoprick ; They degraded him of his Episcopall dignity, commanding the Chapter to choose another, forbidding all men to lodge him in their Territories, and if he were taken, to be executed by the Sword.

This criminal Court proceeded in like manner against diuers others which absented themselves, but especially against the 2 brethren RODOLPH & POMPEY PLANTA, who had bin the ring-leaders of all these alterations. RODOLPH, who had been Captain generall of all the Valtellin, Iudge criminal of Zernets &c. of the neighbor Communalities, and Captain of a company of Grisons for the French kings seruice, was accused of many hainous crimes, wheron I must of force insitt some what the longer, for that he was the chief actor and procurer of all these combustions. The Arch-duke of Austria of Inspruck, hath certain rights and priuiledges to be criminal Iudge in the lower Engaden on S. G. GOROS day, with the approbation and consent of the Commons : Some years before the said PLANTA had bin chosen to that charge for the Arch-duke, wherein he had continued & neuer demanded any renewing or confirmation, contrary to all customs, hauing audaciously vsurped this authority, as if he had obtained it by purchase or inheritance, bringing in criminal Iudges at his pleasure to be at his deuotion. By which meanes he

he drew to himself the Sovereignty of all that iurisdiction, without any opposition ; that he had reinstalled the Bishop of Cair (who for his treason towards his Country had been banished by a general Sentence) into his Bishoprick & Castle before he had obtained pardon ; that by this means he might haue him at his deuotion, for that the Bishop hath power to create certain Magistrates, and especially those which haue the gouernment of the reuenues of the Church, Hauing good intelligence with the Ambassadors of France, not onely they to whom they gaue pensions were most commonly forced to attain to them by the intercession of PLANTA ; but also by his practices he had obtained from the said Ambassadors great summes of money, new pensions and increase of the old for his adherents ; that he vsually entertained spies in their Countries and Iurisdiccions, who reuealed to him what soeuer was said or done against his person, persecuting such as any way opposed him. Moreover, to encrease his authority, hee had changed the Statutes and lawes in his Iurisdiction, railed the amercements and fines, and for 35 years together had disposed of all things at his owne pleasure. By these and such like practices hee had growne so powerful, that for many years he had the direction of the most important affairs, and through great corruptions and presents had at his pleasure swaled their Communalities and free Countries, disposed (with his adherents) of many offices, presumed to make and break leagues, and to stir vp seditions against good men. His iurisdiction was miserably tyrannized by him, the priuiledges of the Communalities broken ; depriving them of the free election of their Magistrates, and entertaining them with vain hopes, that so all might depend on his fauour.

When the estate of the reformed Clergy opposed it self, in the year 1617, against the dangerous league practised between the state of Millan and the three Cantons, murmuring openly against it, he persecuted them, and threatened to deprive them of their ministeries, imprisoning them, and to vte them worse. His practices against his Country were such, that he thought to deprive them of their liberties by fraudulent and preiudiciall articles of confederacy with the duchy of Millan. After hee had obtained and procured by corruption the renunciation of the league between Venice and the Grisons, he deuised new Articles : which was called the league of Zutze ; by which some Communalities, lying vpon the passage, bound themselves not to suffer any one to passe through their Territories, to hinder all succours from the Venecians. But when, in the year 1617, the league and passage was solicited for the Duchy of Millan, he was one of the first to yeeld to a perpetuall passage for the Spaniard against the former accord ; that hee had forced the Venetian Ambassador to depart their Countries, had leuiued Troops, and made certain barbarous Articles, the which they would force the Inhabitants to obserue ; especially, that no Minister of the reformed religion should presume to reueal his intention to the Commons, nor giue his voice in any matter concerning the Country : which was allowed to the poorest man of their freestate, and that they had erected a chamber of iustice, whose principall director had treated with all affairs by the direction of the said RODOLPH PLANTA and his brother, as had been discovered by the Iudges themselves ; that they had bound themselves by a particular oath to the Bishop of Cair against the sworn customs of the country ; that they had tyrannized ouer the Ministers of the reformed religion, commanding them strictly not to meddle with the affairs of Spain, imprisoning some, and threatening them with death.

But in this year 1618, when as some Communalities did rise to preuent this mischief, he presently forced the Magistrates of his iurisdiction to bind themselves to him by oath, and demanded succours from others, to the end he might raise a ciuill and intestine war, and the common people kill one another ; whereby he might make himself Soueraign of the Country. When he saw his enterprises were frustrate, and that he might be called in question for his actions, he absented himself, and did not appear. Wherefore, seeing he had drawne vnto him the greatest treasures of the liberty of their Country ; that is, To make and disannull lawes, to treat and break leagues, to create and depose Magistrates, to dispose of warre and peace, and in this authority to vte all kinde of treacherie, force, tyranny and treason, he was condemned to perpetuall banishment : and who soeuer should bring him alive, to haue one thousand crowns ; and he that should bring his head, five hundred. Being taken alive, his body was to bee broken vpon the wheel, and quartered ; his goods confiscate to the Communalities without prejudice to the iust pretensions of his wife and creditors ; his house to be rased, and Pillars of infamy to be there erected. The Community which did relieue or lodge him, should pay 1000 crowns for a Fine : and if any private person did entertain him, he should lose his honour, and bee condemned in the like fine, and if hee had not meanes to satisfie it, his body should suffer for it. Whosoever should presume to treat of his liberty, write Letters, conuerse with him, or receive Letters which he sent to them. After divers military exploits, the Spaniards not only subdued the whole Valtellin, but also fortified themselves in such sort in the Mountains and their vallies, as no man could safely pass. Therefore, to prevent this mischief (for that it concerned all Switzerland, if the Spaniard should give free passage by the Valtellin into Germany) they appointed a general Assembly at Bade; But, for that the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had formerly taken some places there which had belonged to the Jurisdiction of Austria, and forced the Inhabitants to do him homage before the ancient rights had been settled in the former State, and to that end had levied great forces in Alsacia, therefore the assembly at Bade proceeded very slowly.

The Grisons being duly informed of the Spaniards attempts, who (under a color to restore such as had been banished, and to plant the Catholike Religion) sought to make themselves Masters of their Country, they appointed an assembly at Luzerne, calling the Protestants thither, with whose contents they made this decree: That whereas it was apparant to all the world, what tumults had been in their Country, and what seditions had been raised by turbulent persons to oppress their liberties; for the preventing of these miseries and dangers, they had decreed by oath, lawfully to defend their liberties with the hazard of their lives and fortunes; to leave religion free to every man, to maintain peace, and to live lovingly and quietly together; so as no other Religion should be admitted but the Catholike Romish and the reformed, the exercise whereof should be free unto them. That all vows and oaths taken or made against the liberty of religion in these two points (That is to say, the hearing of the word of God, and the Sacraments of Baptisme and the Lords Supper) should be abrogated & held voyde, neither should any man be bound to stand unto them. If any one in contempt of either religion should forbear to come to church, to hear Sermons, or to receive the Communion, the Church where he dwells shall have power to punish him. And to the end that both these religions may be truly and really exercised, it shall be lawful for every man and Church to cherish and advance his religion, to bestow costs and to give stipends by himselfe or by others for the maintenance thereof: To erect Schooles and Seminaries, and to institute ministers and Doctors in Churches and Schooles, without any distinction or difference betwixt Monks and Iesuits and Doctors of the reformed Religion, so as neither partie offend the other: That honest men and of integrity be chosen, and that they forbear to tax or slander one another: That Ecclesiasticall persons of what Religion be never shall treat one of spirituall things, and not meddle, with political affairs, upon paine of being remoued from their charges, and the losse of life & goods, being lawfully every Magistrate to punish them in whose jurisdiction they shall be found; and if he shall not doe his duty, the whole Community may question them: or if they shall neglect it, every private man may punish them and enjoy their goods, unless they shall first fly to the Bishoprick of Caire or to the house of Trisacum, where they shall have Sanctuary: All judgments given at Thufis, Ciseret, and Damos, and all decrees made there in the yeeres 1618, 1619, and 1620; with all conclusions made to the prejudice of the French King, shall be abrogated and every one shall have liberty to prosecute those which have any way vniufully wronged them in these iudgements: That the Authors of sedition by reason of the Venetians practices should be punished: That the hereditarie confederations and Leagues made with the house of Austria, the French King, and other States and provinces, should remain firme: That the French Ambassadour (so as the King would stand to his promise) should be restored to his place: That hereafter there should be no seditions raised; upon paine of the losse of life & goods for such as should be the Authors; and any States, which should attempt the like, should be excluded out of the League, subdud at their common charge, and reduced into seruitude. That no City nor villiage man should pretend any thing against the Iudges of the confederates, nor commence any Action against them, without the knowledge and consent of the Senators of most of the confederates, upon the like penalties: That all secret practices should be remoued, and iustice equally administered to all men; and offices distributed without respect of persons: That all care should be taken for recovery of the Valtellin, Wormes and other places, and reducing them to the League craving ayde from the French, the Milanois & others; and that no man should attempt to aggrauate this transaction & decree, upon paine of infamy & the losse of life & goods. This yeere 1622 the French King began to labour for the restitution of the Valtellin, sending Mounseur de Lucerne his Ambassadour to the Swislers, to prevent the danger whereunto the Realme of France was subiect, if the Spaniard should enjoy that Country and stopp the passage. The Governour of Milan, to disturb this Treaty, propounded certaine Articles to the confederate Grisons; That there should be a perpetuall peace betwixt them them and the Milanois; that the Valtellin should be left to the Grisons, with all priuiledges and immunities; but upon the conditions, that there should no religion be vsed there but the Romish; that the ecclesiasticall jurisdiction should belong to the Bishop Como; that they should vse the decrees of the Councell of Trent and the new Calendar; that the Protestants, who had been driven away for religion, should enjoy their goods, and return twice in the yeer if they pleased, but might not stay about two months at a time, neither might they seek any occasion to dwell there with their wiues and children; that they should giue no offense vnto the Catholicks; that such as should break the ecclesiasticall constitutions, should be punished by the Spaniards, and that they should suffer the Valkolins and Grisons to enjoy their lawes and customs; that the Spaniards should hold the Fort at Riva for five yeers: which being ended, it with the Fort of Passin should be raised; that they should have garriisons in the Valtellin for eight yeers; that the ordinance should be taken out of the Castle of Sonders, and that the keys of Tirano and Marbegno should be kept by the confederates; that the Spaniards should haue only a defensue passage through the Grisons Country, going unarmed, and through the Valtellin armed; that the garriisons should forbear to meddle with any ciuill or criminal actions: that Rebels should be pardoned for their rebellion; the King of Spain on the other side should pay yearly vnto the Grisons 1500 duckets; that, desiring to haue any Leues from the Grisons, they should not be bound to send above foure and twenty companies, and not lesse than twelue; that the Spaniards should defend the confederate Grisons against all forraign inuasion; that the restitution of the Valtellin should be made onely to the chief of the Grisons, and to such as should imbrace these Articles: the rest that should not within one month allow of that treaty, nor haue another, should be held for open enemies.

This Treaty did not satisfie the Grisons: for, they of Engaden, going vp to the white hil with some troops, desired to know of the Inhabitants whether they would take their parts, renounce the Spanish capitulation, and defend religion, giuing them foure and twenty houres to resolve: who yielding to their desires, they presently ioyned their forces together, and charged the Roman confederates at the passage of a bridge, where they slue many, and put the rest to flight: who, retiring towards Flants, were pursued by the Engadins; but, finding themselves too weak, they slue their owne horses and fled, cloying two peeces of ordinance, leauing their arms and all their victuals and baggage behinde them, notwithstanding that 2000 Spanish foot and 300 horse came to relieue them; who, seeing the flight of their companions, and being much troubled with snowe, returned to Milan. There were many other military exploits performed with good successe by the Grisons, whereof I cannot insitt, lest I should be too tedious. The Spaniards had attempted Clene in vain, being repulsed by the valour of the Besieged. The Romanists craued more aid from the Gouverner of Milan against their enemies; who sent them a supply of 1000 foot and 300 horse, with good store of money and warlike preparations, vntill they should be further assisted with 6000 Germans & 4000 Neapolitans, with 40000 crowns which was promised from Spain.

The warre continuing still in the Valtellin, and no party willing to yield to the other and to lay down Arms, in the end there was an Assembly appointed at Caire to end the controuersie, whether the French King sent his Ambassadour, who propounded these following Articles to the Cantons: first, that all souldiers should be dismist out of the Valtellin; secondly, that there should be pardon for all offenses; thirdly, there should be free exercise of religion in all the Valtellin, and the Territories of Cleues and Vormes; fourthly, that the league with the Swislers and the Lords of Saint Gal should be inuolubly obserued; fifthly, that Ambassadors should meet at Luzerne for France, Spain, and the Duchy of Clene, to confirm this hereditary league vnder their hands and seals. Moreover, the confederate Cantons were required, that hauing forgotten all which was past, they should suffer those which were fled, to return into their possessions: but they, fearing some new treason, made answer, they would take some further deliberation; and when they of Zurich were admonished to call back their souldiers, they promised to do it willingly when the Arch-duke LEOPOLD had withdrawn his forces from the Frontiers, and the King of Spain restored the Valtellin. But all these Treaties could not settle a good peace, the Spaniard and the Austrian being loth to leaue what they had gotten. They fortified some Frontiers, made new Forts, and repaired Sonein and Bormes; so as the restitution was deferred. On the other side, the Swislers fortified themselves strongly against the attempts & hostile inuasions of the Spaniards, in building new Forts, raising souldiers, and preparing cannon: and although the Spaniard had defeated in the Valtellin.

The Romanists

A Treaty at Caire.

New combatti-ons in Swis-land.

had attempted to surpris a Fort neere vnto Cluse by treachery, yet the Swissers repulled them with losse.

This yeer in October, the Gouernour of Millan, hauing seized vpon the countie of Cluse, he left the Earl of Serbellone there for Gouernour, sending his Wallons and Neapolitanes towards Chianone; who not only took the place, but seized vpon the whole valley. Soon after the Neapolitanes passing into the valley of Borchiene, they slue all they met without mercy: and although that a Captain of the Grifons attended the enemy with some troups, with an intent to fight, yet finding himself too weake, he yeelded with all his Souldiers to the victorie; and for that the women in the lower Engaden had prepared to defend themselves with stones, spits, and other like womanish weapons, and had cruelly slaine about 80 Austrians; therefore the other Souldiers fell vpon them, and put very many of them to the Sword. To end all these miseries, the Grifons sent a Commissioner to the Gouernour of Millan, to moue him to a treaty of Peace, and a suspension of Armes.

A little before, the Arch-duke LEOPOLD of Austria, without any effusion of blood had subdued Pretigau, Meinfels, both the Engadens, Misferthal, Coire, and all the inhabitants of the 3 Cantons; all which (although in former times they had been held inuincible) crauing the victors pardon, yeelded themselves; their Captains, commanders, with their Protestant Ministers and some of their Troupes, flying into Swisser-land, and Germany: After which he placed Garrisons in all parts of the Country. Soon after in the beginning of the yeer 1622, the Grifon State growing desperate, and their country in a manner wholly possessed by the Spaniard and the Arch-duke LEOPOLD, they were glad to sue for Peace; the which, after some difficulty, was confirmed with these Articles: 1. That the Romish Religion should remain firm and immutable. 2. That Cluse should be restored, and only the Romish Religion allowed. 3. That the places in Engaden and Pretigau, should remain to the provinciall Prince, the which heretofore did belong to the house of Austria. 4. That the king of Spain and the house of Austria should haue a perpetuall passage. 5. That there should be 30000 Florens of yearly pension paid vnto the Grifons. 6. That it should be lawfull for the Spaniard to leaue 3000 Grifons when he pleased. 7. That hereafter the Vallois should be a Common-weale, and the king of Spain haue the title of Protector, allowing no other Religion but the Catholick Roman. 8. That all Leagues should be made voide.

All these treaties gaue no contentment to the poore Grifons, which grew Jealous of their liberty and Religion: for they were given to vnderstand that the Articles of Millan had made them subiect to the yoke of Spain, and diuided them from the other confederats; that their Country had lost her liberties, was reduced into seruitude, and spoiled of her wealth; and which was most of all to be lamented, they were deprived of the food of their soules: whereupon the poore people grew desperate, resolving rather to die then to suffer that bondage. Wherefore, on the fourteenth day of April they (being formerly disarmed) went into the Wood, vnder colour of gathering Greene boughes, where they armed themselves with Bars and Stauies, and set vpon the Spaniards and the Archduke LEOPOLD's Souldiers with great fury, nothing regarding their shotte; so as they slue 500 of them in severall places. BALDERON had a Garrison of a hundred in the Towne of Schisens, of which they slue fifty with their Clubs; the rest, flying into a steeple, were smothered and burnt: The rest of the Souldiers in many places retired themselves from the fury of these Clubs, vnto Cassel, Mynefeld, Coire, and other places.

They that came to Castell, being besieged by the Prettigauers, tooke an Oath to goe out of the Province, and neuer to beare Armes against the three Cantons; but, comming to Guttenberg, they forgot their Oath, and were againe entertained by RITNAVARR. After this these Commons went to Mynefeld, where they fortified themselves after their tumultuous manner. In the meantime Ambassadors came from the Swissers vnto RITNAVARR, entreating him to abstaine from Armes, and giue care to some honest composition, wherein they would doe all good offices. But hee, neglecting their requests, made haste to Steiga to fight with the Confederats, setting a village on fire, thinking they would runne to quench it; but the Prettigauers, regarding not the fire, marched against RITNAVARR; whose Souldiers seeing them, cryed out, Come ye Cow-sluckers (for so they called them in contempt) Wee will this day giue you a new God: To whom they answered, Wee are well pleased with that onely GOD which created vs, redeemed vs by CHRIST, and hath preferred serued vs till this time in the vniity of Faith, by the power of his holy Spirit. For his glory wee fight; and then, like madde men, they set vpon them and slue foure hundred, forcing about two hundred of them into the Riuer of Rhyne, RITNAVARR himself hardly escaping. After which, they cut off a Mill neere vnto Mynefeld, forcing the towne Garrison to retire with losse.

In the meantime there came about one thousand Neapolitane Souldiers to Coire; who making an irruption into the valley of Schance, carried away their Cartell, burnt the Towne of Mallader, and ragged most cruelly ouer those poore wretches which were vnarmed and vnacquainted with Warre: Which the Confederats hearing, they fortified themselves at Sizera, against the Spaniards; and about Seize about nine hundred Grifons charging them, they forced them to abandon their Campe and retire to Coire, hauing slayne many of them and taken two peeces of Ordinance with great store of Armes and much Cartell: After which exploit they returned safely vnto their Campe. Soone after they seized vpon diues important passages, and prest Mynefeld with such violence and eagerneffe, that the Towne and Castle were forced to yeeld, vpon composition that they might depart with their Armes and baggage, on the twenty third of May.

After this they tooke a strong passage, which was held by six hundred Spaniards: the Garrison whereof was fortified with their Clubs, as they compounded to depart with their Armes and baggage. This done they went to Coire, where they seized vpon a Fort before the Towne, which was very commodious for them; from whence they so annoyed the Townsmen, that no body durst walke in the streets, hauing casie meanes to burne the Towne, for that they had cut away their Conduits: The Spanish Garrison, being driuen to great Streights, compounded to depart on the sixth day of Iune, vpon these conditions; That they should the next day goe away with their Ensignes, Armes and baggage; That foure Captaines, who were prisoners with the Colonel RYNAL, should be dismissed and let goe, putting in caution to the Bishoppe and Chapter, that none of the Confederats should be wronged in their going away; leauing three Captaines for Hostages. The Confederats, on the other side, should defend the liberties of the Bishoppe and Chapter, and protect them from all Iniurie; That the Souldiers should haue meate and drinke for their money in their going away, and release two Captaines whom they had taken prisoners. These conditions being accepted, Colonel BALDERON went along with the Italians towards Cluse, and the Germanes (which were in number nine hundred and fifty) marched another way, hauing all of them taken a solemne Oath, neuer to carry Armes eyther against these Confederats, or against the Protestant Cities.

After this happy successe, the Confederats, hauing giuen thanks to God, wrote Letters vnto all the States, Common-weales, and free Cities of Germany, to whom the recovery of their liberty, and safety of the Church was pleasing. The tenor of their Letters was this, that whereas they been vniuersally oppressed by the Austrian and Spanish souldiers, contrary to their liberties and priuiledges enioyed for many Ages, lost all their passages, and with them the exercise of religion, and forced with threats to imbrace another; they could do no lesse than, despairing of all reliefe, secke to recover by the sword their lost liberty both of body and conscience; that God had fauoured their endeauours with good successe, who no doubt would still assist them if they did craue it with humble hearts. And whereas those mountaine places had bene disarmed and deprived of all munition for the warre by those barbarous souldiers, so as they were not able of themselves to beare the charges of the warre, they were informed humbly to enreat all Common-wealthe and Cities which loued liberty and religion, to assist them with some money in this commendable designe; hoping, that they would take this their petition in good part, and consider carefully how much their preservation concerned all reformed Common-wealthe, and to haue these passages free and without danger; the which, the house of Austria had much affected, and now (hating the liberty of Germany) had brought in a manner vnder their power; that with the assistance of God they had recovered some of the chiefe, and doubted not (if so they might haue any helpe) to recover the rest: for the which they would be thankfull to their Benefactors, and pray to God to increase the spirit of wisdom, courage, and Christian charity in all Common-wealthe and free States, and protect them from all their enemies.

After the taking and fortifying of Coire, the Grifons, reuiuing their former vniion, put some prime

The Arch-D.
Leopold (suc-
cesse in the Gri-fons Country.

A pacification with the Grifons

The Grifons
rise against the Spaniards and Austrians.

Mynefeld taken by the confede-rats Grifons.

Coire taken by the Grifons.

The confederats
Letters to all free States.

prime men to death, without any forme of Iustice, for that they had set their hands to the treaty of Millan: and they wrote Letters to the Swissers of Lucerne, and the other foure Catholique Cantons, entreating them to retire their forces which they had upon the Frontiers: The Abbat of Diserinen promised to ioyne with them, to lay open the passage, and likewise to assist them with 20000 Florens towards the warre.

The Arch duke
pretends again in the Valtellin.

The poore Grisons seemed now to be in good hope to recouer their lost liberty, and the passages which had been vsurped by their Enemies: but they were ill assisted by the French, Lorraine, and German, whom these passages did much import; so as they, being destitute of helpe, the Enemy encreased his forces: for the Arch- duke L E O P O L D had good meanes by the retreat of Count M A N S F E L D, to prosecute the warres in the Valtellin: whether he sent new supplies, and Colonel B A L D E R O N had drawne the forces of Millan also into the Valtellin, towards Chianenna; with whom the Earle of Sulz ioyning, they spoiled the Countrey of Pretigaw, and put all to the sword. There was an Assembly appointed at Lindaw; where the Arch- duke L E O P O L D would yeeld to no peace without the restitution of Coire and other places. After which, that City with the vpper and lower Engaden, the Commonalties of Danov, Pretigaw, and the Lordship of Maynsfeld, were taken by force; and many Grisons with their assistants, sent from the Swissers, slaine at Saint M A R T I N S bridge neere the lower Engaden, where B A L D E R O N forced his passage.

Articles agreed upon at the Diet of Lindaw.

The Arch- duke was now Master of the field; wherupon the Grisons sent vnto him to treat for their liues though they had lost their liberties: and therefore they were forced to accept of such miserable conditions as it pleased him to propound vnto them; which were, That one of the Cantons should be diuided from the other two, and after that day belong vnto the house of Austria, as hereditary subiects. Secondly, that the house of Austria should not suffer the Inhabitants to vie any other then Catholique Religion. Thirdly, that all Leagues and Alliances should be made void except those which they made with France; which Article included onely the subiects of the house of Austria: but the two other Cantons should haue leaue to keepe their old leagues. Fourthly, the Garrisons of Spain shall be continued for six yeers in Coire, Mainfeld, and vpon the Frontiers, as necessity shall require; but no new fortification to be made in those parts, except in Pretigaw, and those places which did belong to L E O P O L D. Fifthly, all Rebels to haue a generall pardon. Sixtly, that free passage should be granted to soldiers through their countrey according to the Capitulation made at Millan, Anno 1617; and that all passages should be presently opened, in regard of commerce. The Grisons murmured much against these Articles, pretending that the first made them subiect to a familie, being free States: and that in the Capitulation of Millan in the year 1617, they treated as free States; wherein there was no mention made of any subiection to the house of Austria, and that Spain was to giue three thousand Florens yeerly during the League. The second, they said, restrained their Consciences. Against the third, they objected that it diuided them amongst themselves, and would breed a ciuill warre and make them subiect to any potent Prince that should come to assist either party. The fourth they held very dangerous, pretending that by allowing of Garrisons, they should be still kept in fetters, hauing found by the sort of Fuertes what ruins the building of Forts had brought them vnto: Moreouer it had been concluded at the treaty of Millan in the year 1617, that the Fort of Fuertes should be rased, and no more built againe. They also feared that six yeers being expired, the Spaniard would be as loath to leaue the Countrey as at that present; and although their pardon was promised; yet no man of resolution would sue for it: for that whosoever fought for his countrey, would be ashamed to confesse himselfe a Rebelle to the vanquisher, whose subiect he doth not yet acknowledge himselfe. And vnto the sixt they affirmed, that to giue a strange soldier free passage through their countrey, were to lee- in an Enemy; and so to be subiect to the insolency of souldiers, how kind and louing foucer the Prince which sends them be vnto them. Thus the poore Grisons were ouer-mastered at this Diet at Lindaw, and forced to submit to the house of Austria, and to acknowledge part of their countrey to be the inheritance of that family; so as Arch- duke L E O P O L D resolved to put a Governor into the countrey vnder him. Vpon the ratification of these Articles, there was a surcease of Armes, and the Spanish and Imperiall forces were to depart the Countrey, all but such as should be left in Garrison. But it seemed neither party was contented with this Capitulation: for neither did the souldiers retire as they should haue done; but continued still in the Countrey, and committed great insolencies, contrary to the agreement at Lindaw: Neither were the Objections to the Articles.

the Grisons in shew well pleased, finding little ease by this accord, being also prest by the Confederate Swissers, and by the French kings Ambassadors, to demanda better conditions: touching the which they had a conference at Coire, where the French Ambassadors told them, that if they accepted those Articles, and subiected themselves to the house of Austria, the King their Master would hold them for Enemies; seeing that whereas he had entred into League with them as free States, they now acknowledged themselves subiects to that house. Wherefore to free themselves from the feare of this bondage, they must be forced to sic for ayde vnto such Princes as the passage of the Valtellin doth most concern; namely the French King, the Duke of Saoy, the State of Venice, Lorraine, Germany, the Swissers and others, who it is thought will assist them for their own interest: for if they enioy the Valtellin quietly, the Emperor and Spain shall haue easy passage for their Armies to ioyne together and assist one another; there being no obstacle, they hauing got these Vallies, wherby they will be fearefull to all the neighbour Princes of Christendom:

But you must attend the euents of these Combuitions, vntill the next yeere.

(* *)

Wants escaped, correct thou.

Folio 571: line 18: they, they, 774: 55: & 54, 579: 55: Plus 1, Plus 2. & 56: who, hoe. 582: 41: Plus 1, Plus 2. 584: 22: scarcely, scarcely. 613: 36: Piccolomini, Piccolomini. 640: 141: getting, going. 641: 11: Florisco, Florisco. 642: 3: Olorio, Olorio. 642: 14: Meados, Baidos. and line 25: Grinaices, Grinaices. 644: 41: yet, it. 645: 6: Bonquet, Bonquet. 645: 40: change charge. 646: 24: in, into. 651: 11: Laudiano, Landiano. 652: 46: being in, being received: and line 49: godly, goodly. 660, 67: souldiers, Souldiers. 670: 53: bataille, batteries. 751: 22: doubted, doubled. 766: 11: Emperour, Cardnall. 767: 33: direct, diuert. 771: 33: employ, undertake: and line 71: Bauria, Bohemia. 782: 41: referue, preserve. 784: 4: Capitane, Capitane. 786: 9: your, their. 801: 8: 21, 1035, 106: 33: go by, go to the, 107: 10: Philip third, Philip the third. 809: 31: obiect, obiects: and line 33: his, this. 812: 6: 12000, 1200: and line 34: Princes, Princes. 813: 35: with, which. 814: 31: houle, houle. 817: 23: Palatine, of Saxony. 826: 23: cup, cap. 828: 1: to yeeld, not to yeeld. 834: 46: the rest, with the rest. 841: 42: the march, his march. 850: 11: Cheine, Chime. and 35: Neppel, Meppel. 165, 38: they been, they had been.

And 220000

In the 33

02170

The names recorded by

Q. You can see the time will not allow you can say he happened without a second word

THE IMPERIAL HISTORIE:

OR

THE LIVES OF THE EMPEROVS, FROM IULIVS CESAR, THE FIRST FOVN-DER OF THE ROMAN MONARCHY, VNTO THIS PRESENT
YEERE:

Containing their Liues and Actions, with the Rising and Declining of that Empire; the Originall, and Successe, of all those barbarous Nations that haue inuaded it, and ruined it by peece-meale : With an ample Relation of all the memorable Accidents that haue happened during these last Combuſtions.

First written in Spanish by PEDRO MEXIA : And ſince continued by ſome others, to the death of MAXIMILIAN the Second; Translated into English by W. T. : And now Corrected, amplified and continued to theſe times by EDWARD GRIMSTON Sergeant at Armes.

LONDON,
Printed by H. L. for MATHEVV LOVNES, dwelling at the ſigne of the Biſhoppes head in PAULES Churchyard. 1623.

TO
THE RIGHT HONORABLE, LIONEL LORD
CRANFIELD, EARLE OF MIDDLESEX,
 Lord High Treafurer of England, and Master of his Maiesties Court of Wardes and Liueries.

THE treasures of Emperors themselves in their stil-preserved Actions, Counsailes and Lines (transcending farre their transitory treasures)
 In all Humility I present to your Lordshippes preservation and protection; as proper, and peculiarly due to the Honors of your Office and Title, for the most apt correspondency of your Iudiciall habilities, to husband and dispose as well the Treasures of Counsailes and Actions, as of Offices and Reuenues. Of all these Imperiall Lines (my truely honoured Lord) most of the first Edition I have only weeded, ordered, and amplified: The last six are the fruits of mine owne Labours. Three of the first I haue cast into new Mouldes: And the later I haue faithfully collected according to the most Authentick and Impartiall-reputed Authours now extant, together with the confident relations of such as haue been eye-witnesses of some of the late Accidents, here offered as a Sacrifice to Immortall Memory. Notwithstanding which sufficient acquittall (and discharge from blame) of my well-intended Industries, I can no more assure nor promise their Approbations, then all other ingenuous and laborious Treasurers of example and vertue; though therein they cannot but be commended for cordiall restorations, to redouble Lives, if not to eternize them. But, in these moderne times, Endeours that profit not, receiue acceptances that please not. Yet such was the Bounty and Nobility of all our ancient Presidents of Times, that whoeuer committed, to the Monuments of writings;
 eyther the prayes of Cities or singular Men, were euer adorned with Crowns, or Honours.

But in these degenerate yeers of ours; As many other excellent and ornamentall Merits: so these, especially, are left utterly prayselesse and exolette. For since men cease to doe praise-worthy deeds: To be praysed, likewise they thinke thriftlesse and idle. Notwithstanding, what Presents more precious can possibly bee giuen to Men, then Prayse, Glorie, and Eternitie? All which I intentionally and effectually present and ascribe, with all Worthinesse to your Lordshippe, in entitling them to you, in these supremest Personages. For, Whosoever protects and maintaines Vertue and Nobilitie, must necessarily be himselfe both Vertuous and Noble. To the Protection therefore of all the Vertue and Nobility herein made sacred to Eternitie, I only select and inuoke your Honour, in these my humble Dedications; Abiding ever

Your good Lordshippes most humbly vowed, in all true Duty and Seruice,

Ed. GRAYSTON.

A Table of the Names of all the ROMAN EMPERORS.

A

 drian.	113
Albert the First.	349
Albert the Second.	602
Adulph.	546
Alexander Seuerus.	161
Antoninus Pius.	121
Anastatius the First.	302
Anastatius the Second.	363
Arcadius and Honorius.	261
Arnolphus.	405
Aurelianus.	199
Augustus Octavianus Caesar.	20

B

Bassianus Caracalla.	147
C
Caligula.	48
Carus, Carinus and Numerianus.	213
Charles the Great.	383
Charles the Second.	399
Charles the Third.	403
Charles the Fourth.	571
Charles the Fifth.	634
Claudius the First.	53
Claudius the Second.	195
Clodius Balbinus, and Maximus Pupienus.	173
Commodus Antonius.	129
Constantius Clorus.	222
Constantine the Great.	225
Constantinus, Constantius and Constance, the sons of Constantine the Great.	235
Constantine the Third.	346
Constance the Second.	347
Constantine the Fourth.	351
Constantine the Fifth.	369
Constantine the Sixth.	377
Conrade the First.	411
Con-

THE TABLE.

Conrade the Second.	439
Conrade the Third.	472
Conrade the Fourth.	532
D
Decius.	180
Didius Iulianus.	137
Domitianus.	100
Dioctetian.	216
E
Emilianus.	183
F
Ferdinand the First.	660
Ferdinand the Second.	755
Florianus.	206
Frederick Barbarossa.	479
Frederick the Second.	516
Frederick the Third.	605
G
GAlba.	76
Gallus.	182
Galienus.	187
Gordianus.	175
Gratianus.	252
H
HEliogabalus.	156
Henry the First.	414
Henry the Second.	435
Henry the Third.	441
Henry the Fourth.	443
Henry the Fifth.	461
Henry the Sixth.	500
Henry the Seventh.	553
Heraclius.	339
I
IVilius Caesar.	9
Iulianus Apostata.	241
Iouianus.	245
Iustinus the First.	395
Iustinus the Second.	322
Iustinian the First.	308
Iustinian the Second.	355
L
LEo the First.	292
Leo the Second.	297
Leo the Third.	366
Leo the Fourth.	376
Lewes

THE TABLE.

Lewes the First, called Ludouicus Pius.	387
Lewes the Second.	397
Lewes the Third.	401
Lewes the Fourth.	408
Lewes the Fifth.	559
Lotharius the First.	393
Lotharius the Second.	498
M
MAcrinus.	151
Marcus Aurelius.	125
Martianus.	290
Mathias.	737
Mauritius.	323
Maximinus.	167
Maximilian the First.	620
Maximilian the Second.	686
N
NEro.	62
Nerua.	105
O
OTho the First.	81
Otho the Second.	419
Otho the Third.	428
Otho the Fourth.	431
Otho the Fifth.	511
P
PErtinax.	133
Philip the First.	178
Philip the Second.	505
Philippicus.	362
Phocas.	336
Probus.	207
Q
QVintilius.	198
R
RObert.	588
Rodulph the First.	540
Rodulph the Second.	696
S
SEuerus.	141
Sigismund.	590
T
TAcitus.	205
Theodosius the First.	256
Theodosius the Second.	274
Theodosius the Third.	365
Tibe

THE TABLE.

Tiberius the First.	39
Tiberius the Second.	326
Titus.	97
Traianus.	108
V
Valentinianus the First.	247
Valentinianus the Second.	283
Valerianus.	185
Vespasianus.	91
Vitellius.	85
W
Wenceslavs.	576
Z
Zeno.	297

THE

THE LIFE OF IVLIVS CAESAR. FOVNDER OF THE EMPIRE AND MONARCHIE OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

Ivlivs Caesar was of a Noble Family, and, returning to Rome from the Pretorship in Spain with great renown, entred into friendship with Marcus Crassus & Gneius Pompey, who were the mightiest Citizens in Rome: and, pacifying the contrariety between them, he obtained the Consulship: which he executed with such gravity and reputation, that his fellow-Consul would not endure to be with him, but retired. Afterwards, giving his daughter Iulia in marriage to Pompey, he went into France; which he subdued, and overcame the Germans. He went afterwards also into Britannie, and by force subdued it to the Roman Empire. Iulia afterwards dying, and Marcus Crassus being slain by the Parthians, mortal discord grew between Caesar and Pompey: the occasion whereof was, for that the second five years of Caesars government of France being expired, it was propounded by Pompeyes faction, that a successor should be sent him: and Caesar desired, that his command in the French Wars might be prolonged, and that in his absence he might demand the Consulship: which being denied him, he made another proposition, that he would give over his army in France, upon condition that Pompey should do the like by his in Spain. Which being also denied, and being enioyned to leave his army, he passed the River Rubicon (limits assigned him which he was not to passe) and, taking the city of Ariminum, he went with such fiery directly to Rome, as Pompey abandoned Italie; and he, following him, in the end overthrew him in Pharsalia. Whereupon Pompey, for refuge repairing to Ptolomey King of Egypt, was in a small Barke, by that Kings direction, slain by the hands of Septimius and Achilla: whose head being (by Ptolomeys command) presented to Caesar, he wept. Afterwards, bending his force against Ptolomey, and overcoming him, he passed into Egypt, and tamed the pride of the Egyptians. Thence he went into Africa, pursuing the remainder of Pompeyes faction; all which he overcame: and Cato being in Utica, unwilling to fall into Caesars hands, slue himself. Caesar, returning to Rome, triumphed: and afterwards going into Spain (after a most cruell battell, wherein he was in danger to have been lost) he overthrew Sextus Pompeius, eldest son of the great Pompey: and, returning to Rome, he took upon him the Dictatorship. Where, finally, Decius, Marcus Brutus, Gaius Cassius, Gaius Calpa, Attilius Cimber, Quintus Ligarius, Marcus Spurius, Cornelius Cinna, with many other principall Romans, conspiring against him, he was slain in the Senat, being of the age of 56 years, upon the fifteenth day of March, with 23 wounds; many prodigious signes of his death appearing both before and afterwards: which hindered his passage against the Parthians, and many other high designs, which he refused to have undertaken.

Being to write the liues of the Roman Emperours, which held the Monarchie of the world; or, to speak more properly, to reduce them into a brief Compendium (a work in truth of waight and troublesome, requiring an active spirit, and a more eloquent pen than mine) I should it no small difficulty to begin with IVLIVS CAESAR, of whom I am first to treat. Who although he were but Dictator, and not stiled Emperour, in that sense of Lord and Sovereign, as his Successors afterwards held it, yet he was the fore-runner, and made the way to this Monarchie: and all succeeding Emperours have held it a glory to be called CAESARS after his name. His exploits were such and so many, and Historics are so fraught with them, that I should it as great a difficulty to relate them briefly, as to write them confusedly. Wherefore, out of so large and copious a field, I will only collect that which I shall hold sooke the first name of Caesar.

All Emperours

fitst for the Subject of this Work; yet handling it with convenient brevity: notwithstanding (he being the basis and foundation of this stately Building) it will be needfull I should extend my self much more in this, than in the rest which shall follow. As for his other braue achievements, I will refer the Reader to those many books which make honourable mention of CÆSAR, and to the content which is generally conceiv'd of his virtues and worthy endeavours.

Among all the glorious actions of IVLIVS CÆSAR, the greatest in my opinion, and which breeds most admiration, is, how he durst project, then put it in practice, and lastly bring it to effect, to make himself Lord of the Roman State (the which was Lady and Mistress of the greatest and most habitable part of the world) and of all that shee had subdued during the space of 700 years: for, so long it was from the first foundation of Rome, vntill that IVLIVS CÆSAR seized vpon the government of the Common-weal: whereof there were 240 yeeres vnder the absolute command of Kings, and the rest vnder the government of Consuls, who were chosen by the people, except some fewe yeeres, in which the Tribunes and Decemviri bare the sway. Doubtlesse, a short time to raise and get so great an Empire as the Romans had obtained, whereas CÆSAR, of a free State, made it subject to the command of One, whose Empire without doubt exceeded all others both for continuance, extent and power: the which is confirmed by many approved Writers. Wherefore, omitting all other Kingdoms and Common-weals, we are not to bee paralleld with this, I will make mention onely of the greatest and most famous which at the first were called Monarchies; namely, the Assyrians, Persians and Macedonians: all which the Roman Empire did far exceed. As for the Assyrians and Babylonians, which is the most antient of all Monarchies, during the space of 1240 yeeres (for, so long it continued, according to the computation of Saint AVOSTINE) it never extended it self out of the bounds of Asia, nor had any footing in Affrick or Europe. Neither were the Medes more powerful: of which Kingdome ARBATES was the first Founder; by the ruine and death of SARDANAPALVS King of the Assyrians, overthrowing the first Monarchie. Then the Persians extinguished the Medes by the powerful hand of CYRVS; and this shall bee accounted the second Monarchie: who although they made some irruption into Europe (as that of XERXES and others) and in Asia grew more powerful than those which had gone before, yet it continued not above 200 and odd yeeres; and they were ruined, with DARIVS their King, by ALEXANDER, the Great, King of Macedon. We cannot deny, but that his Empire was of a greater extent than any of the above-named: for, he had vnder his obedience a great part of Europe, and hee subdued in a manner all Asia: and this is held for the third Monarchie; but it was like a flash of lightning, burning all it encounters, and is soon extinct: for, with the death of ALEXANDER, his power decayed. Then grew factions, and diuerse Kingdoms were erected; so as it is apparant, that the Roman Empire exceeded them all both in time, greatness and power. In time, being not much lesse than 2300 yeeres since Rome was built, and yet the name of the Roman Empire continueth vnto this day. For the space of 1300 yeeres it still increased, and hath neuer since been held the most predominant power of all others. In extent of dominions & power; for, it is most certain, that, vnting whatsoever the others held, it will scarce equal the one half of the Roman Empire. For, laying aside whatsoever the Emperours did adde vnto it, before that IVLIVS CÆSAR did seize vpon the State, they had subdued the best part of the world. In Europe they were Masters of all Italie, and Gallia Cisalpina or Lombardie, Austria and Illyricum, now called Sclavania; and they extended themselves as farre as the river of Danubius: they had subdued all Greece (some yeelding voluntarily; others, by force) the States of Athens, Lacedæmon, Thebes, Corinth, and all Peloponessus, now called Morea, with their Territories; the Kingdoms of Macedon, & Epirus now Albania, and in like manner Thracia. They held the Ilands of Sicilie, Sardynia, Crete or Cande, Cyprus, Rhodes, Eubæa, now Negropont, with many other Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea. They also subdued Spain (but with more difficulty and opposition than any of the rest) and in like manner all France, with that part of Germanie which lies on this side the Rhine, called the Lower, or Gallia Belgica, which was the work of CÆSAR himself; and in like manner that of Britannie, vnder which are comprehended England and Scotland. They were Masters of all Affrick (which is the third part of the world) that is to say, of the fruitfulllest and most habitable parts, having ruined proud Carthage. In Asia they had subdued the greatest and best Prouinces, and made them their Subjects and Tributaries: among the which were Syria called Soria, Phœnicia, Palestina, Iudea, Phrygia, Caria, Cilicia, and Bithinia by the last will and testament of King NICOEDRUS. The Kings of Egypt and Cappadocia were their friends and confederates; and they had a commanding power in Armenia, Colchos, and other Prouinces. Albania, Iberia, Iberia, and some other Countries, did them homage, and paid them tribute: which Countries had been vanquished by them, and many Kings and valliant Captains slain. Finally, they were Lords of so many Cities and Prouinces, as it were an endlesse labour to set them down in particular; and their power was so great, as no forces but their owne were able to annoy them. But afterwards, discord and ambition creeping into this State which was so free and powerful, what forren force could not effect, they wrought with their owne Arms, and triumphed ouer themselves. The cause of all this grew through the discord between POMPEY and IVLIVS CÆSAR, which two were at that time the most eminent and powerful men in Rome; and yet at the same Instant there were other Citizens of great esteem. But, the root of this hatred grew from a further cause, that is, from the factions and ciuill war between SCILLA and MARIVS: in which, MARIVS being slain, SCILLA made himself Dictator, and seized vpon Rome; yet before his death hee gaue it ouer, and left the City at liberty. POMPEY had followed SCILLA's faction, and done braue exploits for him: but CÆSAR had sided with MARIVS, being his kinsman, and at that time very young. This was the seed from whence sprung the ciuill war between them. But, it shall be needfull to relate some former matters, for the better vnderstanding of the occasions which went before, and the success which followed; the which wee will describe briefly after this manner: The warr and power of SCILLA being ended, GNEIUS POMPEIUS and MARCVS CRASSVS (who had also followed that partie) remaining in great reputation, the one sought to supplant the other, so as there grew some jars between them, which began during the life of SCILLA. CRASSVS grew very powerful: for, besides his Wisdom, Nobility and Eloquence, he was very rich beyond all the other Citizens of his time. POMPEY also became famous and much esteemed, besides the succession he had by SCILLA, for his great victories and valliant exploits in Arms performed in SCILLA's time and since, both by sea and land, in Affrick, Spain and Asia, the which are so many and so great, as I dare not relate them. The deeds of these two eminent Persons being growne to this height, and their quarrels increasing daily as the heads of factions (and yet at the same time there were others of great note within the City, as CATO, CICERO, LENTVLVS, and others) during these alterations, IVLIVS CÆSAR returned to Rome from his Pretorship in Spain with great reputation; yet his ambitious thoughts aimed at greater matters, both in regard of the greatness of his house (for, by the fathers side, hee was of a Noble and very antient Family; and by the mother hee descended from the Kings of Rome, who were extracted from Æneas of Troy), and for his many allies and friends, being also very witty and eloquent. He had also purchased great credit and authority in the managing of those charges which had been committed vnto him. He had bin Questor in Spain, Tribune of the souldiers, Edile, high-priest and Pretor; having gotten victories in Spain against the Inhabitants of Galitia and Portugal; adding to all this, his merits and vertues, being bountifull, wise and learned in all good Arts, most active in the managing of Arms both on foot and horse-back; very valliant and strong, whereof he made great proofs before he had any command in the wars of Asia, vnder the Pretor MARCVS TERMO, and SERVLIVS the Proconsul; where hee obtained a Ciuitall Crowne. He was, moreover, of a good constitution of body, tall of stature, fair, strong of his members, and very patient of labour. For all which considerations and many others, hee was in great esteem; but neither by his authority nor placeable to equal MARCVS CRASSVS or POMPEY, for that the roots of their greatness had been of long continuance.

CÆSAR being come to Rome, with a secret intent to make himself greater than either of them; CRASSVS and POMPEY affected his friendship, by whose help they might supplant one another. But CÆSAR, being discreet and wise, would not follow any party, nor tie himself to defend their actions; but, carrying himself indifferently, he laboured to reconcile them, having a conceit, that, if he carried himself as a Neuter, they would both yeeld vnto his will: and this his cunning practice (as PLUTARCH reports) was onely discovered by M. CATO. In the end, by his endeavours a peace was concluded between them, being both bound vnto him: yet, being still jealous one of another, and fearing to lose CÆSAR, they both sought to gratifie him: and in this sort he made himself equal to either of them; and that power which two had formerly sluped, was now diuided between three; and in the end wee shall see who got the sole command. This league and attornment being made, CÆSAR demanded the Consulship, which is the greatest ordinary dignity. He carried himself in this charge with such reputation, as his fellow Consul BIVLVS neuer accompani'd him, but kept himself retired during his Consulship. CÆSAR, the better to maintain the credit and authority which he had got, and

and to attain to the greatnes whereunto he aspired, he himself took to wife CALPHURNIA, the daughter of L V E I V S P I S O, who was to succeed him in the Consulare; and hee gave I V L I A his daughter in marriage to P O M P E Y, rejecting her former spouse S E R V I L I V S C E P T I O, by whose help he had a little before crost his Colleague B I B V L I V S C Æ S A R S consullship being ended, these three Confederates being equally greedy of honour, they easily made a match to invade the Common-weal. C Æ S A R made choise of Gaul or France for his Province; C R A S S V S, of Asia; and P O M P E Y, of Spain: whicher they went with three puissant Armies. And thus the whole world was to be held by three Princes in partnership. The exploits of C Æ S A R in his Province, what battels he fought, what victories he won, what cities and people he subdued, what stratagems, policy and valour he used (this warre continuing little lesse than ten years) I cannot relate, my meaning being to observe brevity. He left excellent Commentaries of his owne deeds, and full of truth; the which were approved by his very enemies, and much commended by C I C E R O. Yet A S I N I V S P O L L I O (envying C Æ S A R S vertues) doth in some things tax him. They are also written by P L V T A R C H, S V E T O N I V S, A P P I A N V S, A L E X A N D R I N V S, L V C A N, P A V L V S O R O S I V S, L V C I V S F L O R V S, E V T R O P I V S, and many other: to whom I refer the Reader. C Æ S A R got such reputation in this war, as he was held the greatest Captain of his time, yea, or of those that were in former Ages. He subdued all France, from the Pyrene Mountains vnto the Alps, and all the remainder vnto the river of Rhine. Hee first vanquished the Swissers and Tigorins, who (as P L V T A R C H affirms) were 300000 men, wherof 190000 were well trained vp in Arms. He conquered the Germaines, with A R I O V I S T V S their Leader, who had invaded France, from whence he expelled them. He subdued the Belgii, the Ambiani and Neruii, with other warlike people of France, and he spilt more blood than euer was in any wars in the world. Then, passing the Rhine vpon a bridge of wood which he built, he subdued the Germaines to the Roman Empire; and, finding no more opposition there, hee past with his Army into Brittanie, which was inhabited by a fierce Nation, not till that time knowne by any traffick or commerce: these hee forced to subiect themselves to the Roman State. During the continuance of these warres, in which C Æ S A R got great spoils and wealth, he neuer left to purchase to himself friends, both in Rome and in all other places, both by letters and gifts, and in like manner with the Kings and Cities of Asia, Greece, and other Countries; sending them aids of men, without any leaue or authority from the Senate: the which he might safely do, as long as the league continued betwixt him, P O M P E Y and C R A S S V S. He won men vnto him, and was much beloued of his souldiers, giving them double pay, and bestowing honours vpon others: by which means (P O M P E Y not foreseeing it) he grew to such power and reputation, as he began to fear him when hee was not able to suppress him. But now that strict league of friendship, which had been betwixt these two, began to dissolue, for that the pawn which maintained it was taken away; so as there grew a mutual fear & jealousy betwixt them; first, by the death of I V L I A, C Æ S A R S daughter, who marrying to P O M P E Y entertained concord between the son and the father-in-law, by the league of nuptiall loue; secondly, by the death of M A R C V S C R A S S V S, the third man in this company, who was slain by the Parthians in Asia, whither he went to make war (as some write) more to heape vp riches, than to win honour; whose reputation notwithstanding was a support to their good agreement. So as the chief causes, wherupon their friendship was grounded, being taken away, their emulation presently brake forth. P O M P E Y was jealous of C Æ S A R S greatnes; and C Æ S A R hardly endured P O M P E Y S supereminency; the one brookt no equal; the other, no superior. Whereupon they fell to warre, which was the greatest and most generall that euer was: for, in it there were engaged the Senate, all the Roman Legions, all their friends and subjects, Kings and Cities, for the one or the other partie. On the one side were eleuen Legions, on the other eighteen; all Roman and Italian souldiers, with all the forces of Rome, besides the aids of their confederates. This war was managed in Italie, France, Spain, Epirus, Thessalie, Egypt, Asia and Africk; by themselves or their Lieutenants; and in the end, after five yeers, it died in Spain. Some Authors set down the causes of this ciuill war, although they vary in some points: but the truth is, the chief reasons were enuy, ambition, and desire of command, wherewith they were both infected: and the one jealous of the others greatnes (as if the Roman Empire had not been sufficient for them two) the one sought to ruine the other. That P O M P E Y had any intent to vsurp the State, and become a Tyrant, it doth not appear: but it is apparant, he would not haue C Æ S A R attain to that dignity whciin he was. Of C Æ S A R some write, that being forced through fear he came to Arms, lest he should see himself called in question, and condemned: for, C A T O had threatned to accuse him whensoever hee should giue-ouer his Province. Others object, that he had alwaies a desire to vsurp the State, and therefore, balancing his power with P O M P E Y S, he thought it behoouefull to entertain friendship and contract an alliance with him. C I C E R O saith, that he had alwaies in his mouth that verse of E V R I P I D E S, that If it were lawfull to infringe the lawes, it was for a Kingdom; and that C Æ S A R, being greedy of command, could not endure to be without an Army: but, in my opinion, the reasons were such as haue been related; and these, the occasions.

This being the last of the second five yeers of C Æ S A R S gouernment in France, L E N T V L V S and M A R C E L L V S being Consuls, and of P O M P E Y S faction; it was propounded in the Senate, to send a Successor to C Æ S A R, and that hee should giue-ouer his gouernment and the Army; and if he would (as he had written) demand the Consulship, he should com to Rome in person. C Æ S A R demanded, that his command in the war might be prolonged, and the gouernment which he had, and that he might demand the Consulship being absent, before he gaue-ouer his Armie, which honoret Tribunes had formerly granted him, with P O M P E Y S good liking. But now P O M P E Y would not yeeld vnto it, as being against the lawes, which did not allow any man to demand the Consulship but present; forgetting, that he had been made Consul before he came to lawfull age, and had attained to other dignities, contrary to the ordinarie course of law. But it is the common condition of men, To blame that in another which they allow in themselves.

This being denied to C Æ S A R, he made another proposition; that hee would leaue his Army, and come to Rome as a priuate man, so as P O M P E Y would giue-ouer his which he held in Spain. This was put to the question, and did cause a great distraction in the Senate. C I C E R O interposed himself, labouring to reconcile them, and to conclude their jars with peace. P O M P E Y would haue been tractable, had not those of his faction, being of the prime men of Rome, stood proudly vpon teams; who (notwithstanding any iust and reasonable conditions propounded by C Æ S A R) were inflexible. It was therefore decreed in Senate, that C Æ S A R, by a certain time prefixed, should leaue his Army, and that hee should not passe it ouer the river of Rubicon, which did bound in his Province; declaring him an enemy to the Roman State if he did otherwise. L V C I V S A N T O N I V S and Q V I N T V S C V R I O, Tribunes of the people, fauouring C Æ S A R, opposed themselves to this decree: but they were disgraced, ill-treated, and thrust out of the Senate. Whereupon, they fled out of Rome, and went to C Æ S A R: the which was a great help to him to win the hearts of his souldiers, for that the office of the Tribunes was held sacred and inuiolable.

C Æ S A R hearing how matters had past, seeing himself deprived of all future hope of peace; he marcht speedily from Ranenna, onely with 5000 foot, and 300 horse, commanding his Legions to follow presently after, and to ioyn with him. Coming afterwards to Rubicon (which if he should passe, there would be no hope of peace remaining) some say that he staid there a good space; considering with himself, of what importance this passage was, and what miseries would ensue. P L V T A R C H writes, that he discoursed thereof with A S I N I V S P O L L I O, and other his friends which did accompany him. A P P I A N V S A L E X A N D R I N V S reports, that hee used these words, Doublelesse, if I forbear to passe this river, it will be the beginning of my ruine; if I passe it, the ruine will be generall. And S V E T O N I V S writes, that turning towards the river, he said, It is yet in our power to turn back; but, passing the river, wee must make our way with our weapons. He writes, moreover, that C Æ S A R standing thus doubtfull and irresolute, he was animated by the apparition of a man of an extraordinary stature & shape, fitting neer vnto his Army, piping vpon a reed. Besides the shepheards and herdsmen, many souldiers left their guards, and went down to hear him, and with them some Trumpeters; so as hee caught hold of one of their trumpets, and leapt forth to the river, beginning with a mighty blast to sound the battell, and so went on his pafte to the bank on the other side. Then, with a furious resolution, C Æ S A R cried out, Let vs go whither the gods, and the injurious dealings of our enemies, do call vs: The dice are cast. I haue set vp my Rest, come what will of it. After which words, he set spurs to his horse, and past the river, the whole Army following him. In this manner he resolved: which was the beginning of the ciuill war, and of Romes seruitude, and the first step to a Monarchy and the foueraigne command of one, as I will briefly set it down.

Whoso desires to haue a full view of this History, let him read A P P I A N V S A L E X A N D R I N V S, S V E T O N I V S, P L V T A R C H in the liues of C Æ S A R, C A T O, and C I C E R O; Saint A V G V S T I N A lib. 3. de ciuit. Dei, I V L I V S C Æ S A R himself in his Commentaries, L V C I V S

FLORVS, hijf. 4. TITVS LIVIVS his Abbreviats, PAVLVS OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, 6. hijf. LVCAN, PLINIE de viris illuſtribus, VALERIVS MAXIMVS, with diuerſe others.

CÆSAR having paſt the river, and drawn his whole Army together, where (as SVETO- NIVS writes) the Tribunes of the Commons came vnto him, in baſe and diſhonourable garments, with the which they had fledde from Rome; there hee made an excellent Oration to his ſouldiers, ſhedding ſome tears, and tearing his garment down the breaſt, laying before them the equiry of his cauſe, and craving their helps and aſſiſtance. To whom hauing with a generall applauſe and conſent made anſwer, that they were ready to obey his will, he parted preſently, and the next day came to Ariminum, whereon he ſeized: the like hee did to all the Towns and Caſtles where he paſt. DOMITIVS, who in a ſaſcious tumult had been nominated his Succeſſour in Gaul, held Corfinium with a gariſon of 30 Cohorts: which being taken, he pardoned the ſouldiers and inhabitants, and intreated DOMITIVS kindly, giuing him leaue to depart (who went preſently to POMPEY) which was an act of a Noble and generous minde: the which, CÆSAR obſerued in all his victories during the ciuill war; by which clemency he purchaſed to himſelf as great honour, as by his victories.

CÆSARS reſolution being knowne at Rome, it troubled POMPEY, amazed the Senat, and terrified the common people; and it would be tedious to relate what pious ſions they made. POMPEY was much deceiued, for that hee could not beleue that CÆSAR would thruſt himſelf into ſo great a danger, or that hee ſhould be able to raiſe ſufficient forces to reſiſt him: but the ſucceſs proved otherwiſe. For, notwithstanding that he had authority from the Conſuls and Senate to leaue ſouldiers, to call home the legions, and to ſend Captains for the deſenſe of diuerſe cities of Italie whereas CÆSAR ſhould paſſe, yet all this was not ſufficient to reſiſt CÆSARS fury, and the power he brought with him. The fame of his coming increaſing daily, POMPEY with the whole Senat abandoned Rome, going to Capua, and from thence to Brundifium, a ſea-town vpon the confines of Italie, ſeated at the mouth of the gulf of Venice; where he gaue order, the Conſuls ſhould paſſe to Durrachium, now called Durrazzo, a ſea-town of Macedonie (whereof a great part is now called Albania) to vntie all their forces; being out of hope to be able to reſiſt CÆSAR in Italie, who had already taken Corfinium, as I haue formerly ſaid: where, hauing drawn DOMITIVS Cohorts to ſerue him, hee marcht on; and, hearing that POMPEY and the Conſuls were together at Brundifium, he went towards them with his Legions with all the ſpeed hee could. But POMPEY had fortified himſelf ſufficiently to make deſenſe; yet vpon CÆSARS approach, beginning to inueſt the Town, he imbarke himſelf in the night time, and ſo paſt ouer to Durrachium, where the Conſuls attended him. And thus CÆSAR remained in Italie without reſiſtance; being very doubtfull what to reſolve: for, although he would gladly haue followed POMPEY, yet he had no prouiſion of ſhips: and, by reaſon that it was winter, ſhipping could not come ſo ſoon as was requiſite; and conſidering withall, how much it imported, not to leaue any enemy behinde him, which might cauſe any alteration in France or Italie by his abſence, he reſolued to deſerre the purſuit of POMPEY, and to take his way towards Spain, which held for POMPEY: where he had his beſt legions, and two captains, PETREIVS and AFRANIVS. SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS ſaith, that when hee had thus reſolued, he ſaid to his friends, Let vs firſt go againſt an Army which is without a Captain; and afterwards let vs return againſt the Captain that hath neuer an Army: for, the ſouldiers that POMPEY had in Spain were valiant, and had been long trained vp in Arms; but their Commanders, PETREIVS and AFRANIVS, were not held for politick or expert in the wars. And, on the contrary, POMPEY was moſt wiſe, and a very valiant Captain: but the ſouldiers which he had with him were newly leuied, and of ſmall experience.

Returning from Brundifium, in ſixty daies, without blouſhed or battell, CÆSAR became Lord of all Italie; and coming to Rome, they were in very great fear, remembering the cruelties committed in the time of SYLLA: But CÆSAR, vſing his accuſtomed clemency, did hurt no man of any degree, high or low; but called to the Senate thoſe Senators which remained, and which came with him, comforting euery one with milde and good words, and laying the whole fault vpon POMPEY, in accuſing him of all things which had hapned, and of this diſcord. He ſought by all means to juſtifie his owne cauſe, and declared how much hee did then and euer had deſired peace, and therewith requeſted that Embaſſadors might be ſent to POMPEY to procure the ſame; and, cauſing himſelf to be preſently choſen Conſul, he opened the Roman Treafury, notwithstanding that METELLVS, one of the Tribunes of the people, was deſirous and went about to hinder the ſame. The treafure which hee took from thence he diuided among his ſouldiers: which, as PLINIE in his three and thirtieth Book reports, was very great; the which LVCAN alſo affirmeth. Theſe things being ended, and CÆSAR deſirous to go from Rome into Spain (like a wife and diſcreet Captain) firſt took order aſwell for the ciuill government, as for the wars; and, making choiſe of the legions which were to go with him, hee left part of his troops in Brundifium and Oſtiano, and in other ſtrong places vpon the Sea ſide, to keepe POMPEY from landing if he ſought to return into Italie. He alſo nominated HORTENſIVS and DOLABELLA for his Captains, to make prouiſion of ſhipping to be brought to the port of Brundifium, there to bee in a readineſſe againſt his return from his journey. QVINTVS VALERIVS hee ſent with a legion to Sardinia againſt MARCVS COTTA, which held the ſame for POMPEY. To Sicilia he ſent CVRIVS againſt MARCVS CATO, with direction, that hauing taken the ſame, hee ſhould paſſe ouer into Africa. LEPIDVS hee left in Rome, as Prefect of the city; and MARCVS ANTONIVS, for Gouernor of all Italie: and, determining to leaue LICINIVS CRASSVS in France, with his accuſtomed celerity he went on his journey, and found no reſiſtance, neither in Italie, nor in France, but onely at Marſelles, which held for POMPEY: who (in my opinion) more like bould and aduenturous friends, than wife men, would not receiue nor lodge him in their city, but put themſelues in Arms againſt him for their deſenſe. CÆSAR coming thither beſieged the City; and, to avoid loſſe of time, left DECIVS BRVTVS and CAIVS TREBONIVS with ſufficient forces, who continued the ſiege, and endured much: he himſelf followed his way into Spain, where his coming was already knowne; and AFRANIVS and PETREIVS attended him, with the aid of their friends, and foure Roman legions; between which and CÆSAR the warres continued many daies, and chiefly neer the city of Lerida. In the beginning, CÆSAR was in great danger and much diſtreſſed, aſwell through want of victuals, as by reaſon of the winter being com, which annoyed him with the ſwelling of rivers: before and after which, there paſſed many great ſkirmiſhes and conflicts between the two Armies, and other accidents and adventures too long to bee recounted. Finally, CÆSAR knew how to make war in ſuch ſort, as, without giuing them opportunity to come to a battell, he brought his aduerſaries to ſuch extremity and diſtreſſe, as periſhing with hunger they came to a compoſition; which was, that to the legions (who now were able neither to offend nor defend) ſhould be granted liberty to depart & to go whither they would: which was performed accordingly; and PETREIVS and AFRANIVS went to POMPEY; and part of the legions, which would not abide with CÆSAR, had leaue to do as they liſted; CÆSAR ſtill perfeuering in his clemency and mildneſſe.
his

This war being ended, and the ſpring come (not to leaue any thing in Spain to be ſubdued) he paſſed forwards, and came into the prouiſe of Beſica, now called Andaluſia, with part of his forces, leauing commandement with the Armie to march whither hee had appointed, and there to ſtay for him, becauſe that MARCVS VARRO, being POMPEY'S Lieutenant in that prouiſe, held it for him, with one legion of good ſouldiers: but not daring to oppoſe himſelf againſt CÆSAR, he peaceably yeelded vp vnto him both the country and the legion; and ſo all was pacified, and at his command. Thence hee went to Cordona, where hee called a parliament, and an aſſembly of all the eſtates of that prouiſe: wherein, among other things which there were treated of, hee highly commending the Cordouneſe and Seullians which had taken his part (as himſelf writeth) marched forwards, and viſiting the prouiſe hee came to the Iſle and city of Cales; and, prouiſing there certain neceſſaries, hee took the ſhippes and gallies which MARCVS VARRO had there in a readineſſe, and ſuch other as hee could get, and imbarke himſelf. And, leauing QVINTVS CASSIVS with foure legions in that prouiſe, hee took his paſſage by ſea to Tarazona, lending commandement by land to his legions to march thither: where hauing in few daies taken order for that prouiſe, hee departed with his Army towards Narbona, and from thence to Marſelles: which yeelded vnto him, hauing in the ſiege and assaults endured many calamities. CÆSAR, nothing reſpecting the ſmall regard and ingratitude of that city, but the antiquity and fame thereof, would not permit any violence to be offered to the citizens & inhabitants; but, leauing a ſufficient gariſon to guard the ſame, hee commanded his legions by appointed journeys to march towards Italie: himſelf, with a neceſſary guard for his perſon, and others in his company, took paſſage for Rome; all things ſucceeding proſperouſly with him, although that ſome of his Captains had ill ſucceſſe. For CAIVS ANTONIVS, whom (we ſaid) he left with DOLABELLA for Captain of his Nauie, was ouerthrowne and taken priſoner in the gulf of Venice by OCTAVIVS, POMPEY'S Lieutenant. At this overthrow there was an Act don worthy to be recommended with honour to poſterity. ANTHO-

Cæſar going into Spain againſt Petreus and Afranius.

Cæſar ſubdued all Spain.

The taking of Marſelles, and Cæſar's return to Rome.

NIE was constrained to ship his souldiers in long boats for want of feruiceable ships; the which were taken by a stragem as in a toyl, by the Pompeians, who tied ropes vnder the water. One of them, which carried almost a thousand Opitergins, young men and valiant, was intangled in this snare, and was assaulted by the power of the whole Armie, they making resistance from morning vntill night: but, in the end being opprest by the multitudes of their enemies, and seeing no means to escape by their valour, by the encouragement of VVLTVS their Colonel they flue one another. And DOLABELLA was likewise overcome neer to the Ile of Cœyra, now called Corfu; and CVRIVS, who (according to CÆSARS commandement) went into Africa with two legions, hauing in the beginning good successe, was afterwards ouerthrowne, and the most part of his people slain by POMPEY'S friend, IVBA King of Mauritania, which is now the Kingdom of Fez: hee might haue fled away, but shame perswaded him to dy with that Armie which his rashnes had cast away.

CÆSAR being comen to Rome, and made Dictator (as PLVTARCH and APPIANVS testifie) new Consuls were chosen; and he, being one of them, deposed himself from his Dictatorship, and so, changing and prouiding Pretors for the prouinces at his pleasure, sending MARCVS LEPIDVS into Spain, and AVLVVS ALBINVS into Sicilia, SEXTVS PEDVCEIVS into Sardinia, and DECIVS BRVTVS into France, and taking such further order as he thought good, he departed from Rome in the month of December towards Brundisium: whether hee commanded all his Forces to march, there to take passage for Macedonia, the greatest part whereof (as I said) is now called Albania; where he knew that POMPEY staid with his Armie. Who, all one whole yeer, which CÆSAR spent in his journey into Spain, busied himself in prouiding a Naue to return into Italie, and in gathering treasure, and in leuying souldiers for that purpose, and had made ready a wonderful great prouision of all things. For, there came vnto him ships, mony and men, from many kingdoms, prouinces and cities of Asia and Grecia, from Syria, Pontus, Bithynia, Cilicia, Phœnicia, Cappadocia, Pamphilia, Armenia the lesse, Egypt, Grecia, Thessalia, Boëtia, Achaia, Epire, Athens, Lacedæmonia, and the Iles of Creta, Rhodes, and many other parts and countries: there came also to his aid, in person, the Kings, DEJOTARVS and ARIOPARZANES. Of which people, and of those which he brought with him from Italie, POMPEY had drawne together a great Armie by land, and an exceeding great number of ships and gallies by sea; which I do not set down, by reason of the diuersity of opinions between Authours touching the number of his souldiers and of CÆSARS: for certain, they were very mighty Armies, but the greatest number were of POMPEY'S side. Who imagining (because that it was in the hart of winter) that CÆSAR should not be able, nor haue time, commodiously to passe the seas; and hauing (as indeed he had) aduertisement that CÆSAR was in Rome, he diuided and lodged his people in Macedonia and Thessalia, retiring himself from the sea, commanding and charging his Captains by sea (of which, MARCVS BRVTVS was chiefe) that they should guard and defend the coast. But CÆSAR knowing, that in the speedy execution consisted the principall point of his victory, and that occasion once let slip is seldom recovered; being departed from Rome, and arriued at Brundisium (as we haue before said) notwithstanding that all his legions were not yet come, yet he embarked aboard those ships which hee had there in readinesse, so many as they could contain, which were seuen legions of his choise men (as he himself recordeth) and sent commandement to those which were comiing, to make haste, to the end they should join with the rest which there remained, whom he would speedily send for. And so hee departed from Brundisium, now called Brindes, in the beginning of Ianuare: and, crossing the seas with prosperous weather, the third day after, he arriued vpon the coast of Macedonia, before that POMPEY had any intelligence of his embarking; and, letting his people on shore in the despite of POMPEY'S Captains, hee commanded the ships and gallies presently to returne to Brundisium to fetch the rest of his Armie which hee had there left and commanded to come. And the wars beginning, hee presently seized vpon the cities of Apollonia, which is now called Bellona, and Erico, diuising from thence LVCIVS TORQVATVS and LVCIVS STRABERIVS, which held the same for POMPEY: who as soon as he was aduertised of CÆSARS landing, with the greatest speed possible sending for his troops (such as were neere at hand) hee marched towards Dyrachium, where lay all his victuall, munition, and prouision for the warres, doubting that CÆSAR would come to surpris the same, as in truth he did; but in vain: for, the situation thereof made it inexpugnable.

POMPEY being come, their Camps were lodged within few forlongs one of the other, a river running between them: there passed many aduentures, skirmishes, and also some treaties of peace, peace which CÆSAR offred; the which were not accepted by POMPEY, so much he assured himself of his power: and CÆSAR daily expecting the coming of his other legions, who staid longer than he thought they ought to haue done, without the which hee thought it no wisdom to come to a battell, being much grieved, and very careful for the same, hee resolved in person, with three confident seruants onely, secretly to embark himself in a Brigandine, and to passe that freight of the sea to fetch them, thinking to be able to perform the same without the knowledge of any. And, putting it in execution accordingly, hee passed down the river to the sea, which hee found so troubled and tempestuous, as the Master of the Brigandine (not knowing whom hee carried) nor daring to passe any further, would haue returned. Then CÆSAR, discouraging his face, as it is reported, said, Be not afraid, Friend: for, thou carriest with thee CÆSAR and all his fortune. The Master, heere with encouraged, strived to hold on his voyage: but, at length, the force of the tempest was so great, and the winde so contrary, that (notwithstanding CÆSARS courageous words) they were constrained to return, vnable to passe anie further forwards. Which being vnderstood in his Armie, they much wondred, grieved, and murmured thereat; praising him more for a valiant Knight, than a wise Captain: and so VALERIVS MAXIMVS recounts it for a rash aduenture; which, in my opinion, was the occasion why IVLIVS CÆSAR records it not in his Commentaries.

This being past, within fewe daies after, ANTONIVS arriued with foure of those legions which were left behinde in Italie, presently returning the ships back again for the rest: and (after some aduentures which hapned) joyning with CÆSARS Armie, and all things set in good order (and the like being done on POMPEY'S side) there passed some things between them, which for breuitie I omit, vntill that neer to the city of Dyrachium (whither CÆSAR went, with a determination to haue surpris the same, and POMPEY to relieue it) the two Armies lodged themselves the one so neer the other, as there were daily skirmishes and slaughters of men of either partie; and that one day the skirmish waxing hot, and rescues coming from either Armie, it came to a battell: wherein the successe was such, that CÆSARS troops began to flee, and could not be made to stand by any intreaties or threats, till they came to their camp which they had fortified; and yet some abandoned the same, and durst not defend it. But POMPEY, either for that (as some thinke) hee imagined their flight to be feined, and that there was some deceit or ambush, or that he supposed there was no more to be done, and that CÆSAR had bene ouerthrowne with small toill, so as he should bee no more able to recover himself, did not prosecute the victorie, neither followed the charge, but rather caused a retreat to bee founded, without assailing his enemies camp. Whither when CÆSAR came, he took such order as was most convenient, being no lesse courageous and polittick in time of aduersity, than of prosperity: and it is reported that he said to his friends, Truly, this day had ended our warres, if our enemies had had a Captain which had knowne how to haue ouercome. This day, IVLIVS CÆSAR lost a great number of his souldiers, amongst which were foure hundred Romane Knights, ten Tribunes, and two and thirty Centurions; and his enemies took from him two and thirty Ensignes. This battell ended, POMPEY sent the newes thereof to diuerse parts of the world, houlding himself for absolutely victorious: And IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing blamed some of his Captains and Ensigne-bearers (notwithstanding that his whole Armie grieved, and were ashamed of their late loss) again desired the battell; yet he would not then fight, his Armie being timorous, against those which were in heart & victorious, but rather took a new course: and, sending his sick and hurt men to the city of Apollonia, hee departed by night, with the greatest resistance that could be, from the place where he was, and took his way towards Thessalia, with intent to refresh and encourage his Armie, and to draw his enemy further from the sea-coast, where his chief force lay, and where his camp was fortified and victualled; or, at the least, to go to meet and ouerthrowe SCIPIO, who (as hee was aduertised) came to join with POMPEY.

POMPEY, seeing CÆSARS departure, after that hee had followed him some fewe daies, took counsell, and (as APPIANVS testifieth) was determined (leaving so sufficient a Naue at sea, as CÆSAR should not be able to make any benefit thereof) to passe into Italie, and to recover the same, with France and Spain, and then afterwards to return against CÆSAR: but, being importuned and ouer-ruled by the Roman Lords which came with him, he altered his determination, and presently departed to pursue CÆSAR, who made a stay in the fields of Pharsalia, which are in Thessalia (making his retreat with such discretion and in so good order, as in all occasions that were offered hee had euer the better) vntill that at length, seeing his men full of resolution, force and courage, hee resolved no longer to forbear the fight; and therefore cared not any more to refuse the battell, but rather daily presented the same to POMPEY. Who knowing (as indeed it was true) that CAESAR began to want victuals, and that his Armie began to weaken and diminish, he deferred the same, and would not fight; and, as a wife and well-experienced Captain, would have prolonged the war, defeating his enemy without putting his own Armie in hazard: and although that POMPEY had thus resolved; yet the opinions, murmurings, and importunity of those which were with him prevailed so much (as LVCAN, PLVTARCH, and CAESAR himself, report) that they made him yeeld to give battell, euen contrary to his owne opinion and will: wherein joined, of the one side and the other, all the flower and force of Rome. And although that CAESAR'S Forces were fewer in number (for, all Writers affirm, that POMPEY'S Armie was twice as great) yet his men were more active, and better trained. How many there were of the one side and the other, I cannot certifie; the Authors doo so much differ among themselves therein. APPIANVS setteth down the diuerse opinions which are held thereof. Some raise the number to three hundred thousand men, whereof LVCIUS FLORVS was one; others, to three score and ten thousand: and some set down somewhat lesse, among which is PLVTARCH; who saith, that POMPEY brought to this battell 45,000 men, whereof 7,000 were on horseback, and I V L I V S C A E S A R, two & twenty thousand Foot, and of horse fewe more than one thousand. But APPIANVS vnderstandeth, that this lesser number of these Armies was to be vnderstood of Romans onely, who were the force and hope of both these Generals: for, it is not likely, that of all nations there should be so small a number in a war so long preped, and of such importance: and, in my opinion, this is most likely to be true. But, howeouer it was, this battell was between the best captains and best fouldiers, aswell for experience, as for force and valour, that euer were in the world; and yet being so, it was not much fought, neither did it long continue. So strange and variable are the adventures which happen in wars and battels: for, where there seemeth to be the greatest force and assurance, oftentimes is found the greatest weaknes; and that which is least feared, doth sometimes annoy most. Before the battell there were many signes of an eminent downfall: The running away of beaſts appointed for the sacrifice, swarms of Bees, the sky darkened in the day time, POMPEY'S fearful dream ouer night of mourning in his Theatre at Rome; and in the morning early he was seen in the head of his main battell in a black Robe.

Either of these two great Commanders, hauing resolved to giue battell, ordered his battalions and squadrons as to him seemed most expedient, making speeches and orations to animate their fouldiers; and, the accustomed signe being giuen, the battell presently beganne on either side: In the beginning whereof, POMPEY'S horse-men (wherein he reposed his greatest hope) who were all of the Roman Nobility, and of the Order of Knighthood, and who alwaies had the better; began to come where CAESAR'S Caualery was, and forced them to forsake the Field. Which, CAESAR perceiuing (losing nothing by ouersight) he made a signe to a battalion, which for that purpose he had left a-part from the other squadrons, to charge POMPEY'S Caualery: who charged them with such fury, wounding them (according to CAESAR'S direction) no where but in the face, that POMPEY'S horse-men either vnable or vnwilling to endure it, began to retire, in such sort, as from that part whence POMPEY thought to haue obtained the victory, from thence sprang the beginning of his ouerthrowe. For, notwithstanding that they had broken the first squadron, and were entred into the second, and the other battalions continued still fighting, and that they maintained the same with great resolution; yet, seeing that POMPEY'S Caualery fled, and that CAESAR'S came to charge them afresh; they all did the like; in such manner, as in short space the victory plainly appeared for CAESAR: and POMPEY, hauing lost all hope to preuaile, fled to his camp, leauing the field and victory to his enemy. Happy had POMPEY been in this misery, if he had runne the same fortune with his slaughtered Armie: but he out-liued his owne glory, that with dishonour he might flee for life through Thessalia, be chased from Larissa, and vpon a forlorn rock of Cilicia studie whether to flee; to Parthia, Affrick, or Egypt: Finally, that vpon the Pelusian thoe, by the command of a most vnworthie treacherous King, by the counsell of gelded men, he should be murdered by the sword of SEPTIMIUS his Fugitive, in the view of his sorrowfull wife and children. CAESAR, letting slip no occasion, seeing that hee found no resistance in the field, assembled his Forces to assaile POMPEY'S camp, which with small difficulty hee entered: which POMPEY perceiuing, leauing his ensignes and robes of Generall, and putting on other apparall, vpon the first horse that he could get, with foure on horse-back onely that accompanied him, which (as VELLIVS PATERCVLVVS saith) were his son SEXTVS POMPEIUS, and the two LENTYLII, and

FA-

FAVONIUS of the Pretorian order: he fled so fast as he could, as you haue heard, and neuer Pompey's staid vnill he came to the citie of Larissa; where ioyning with some thirtie other horse, which he had fled, without any stay he continued his flight, vnill he came vnto the shore-side of the Egean sea; where, finding a certaine Merchants ship of Rome, he embarked himselfe therein, and sailed to the Ile of Lesbos, which is in that sea which now is called Archipelago, to the citie of Mytilene in that Iland: For, in that citie were his wife and familie, which he tooke with him: and, gathering together such ships and men as he was able, he departed from thence very doubtfull, and notable to resolve whither to go. Some counsell'd him to sail into Africa, for that King Iuba was his friend, and very mighty. Others were of opinion, that hee should retire himself to the Parthians. Finally, he resolved to go into Egypt, for the friendship which hee held with King PTOLOMY, father of that PTOLOMY then reigning, and did so. Hauing first touched in the prouince of Cilicia in Asia, and in the Ile of Cyprus, sailing into Egypt, and arriuing at the city of Alexandria, he had such an end as we will presently declare.

I V L I V S C A E S A R hauing obtained so great a victory, as is aforesaid, vsed therein his accustomed clemency, not suffering any Romane to be either slaine or hurt after the battaile was ended, and pardoning all those which were taken therein, or found in the Campe; among which was MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO. And although that in the battaile were slaine of POMPEIUS side fifteen thousand men, and of the Conquerors lesse then two thousand, as CAESAR himselfe writeth: yet vnderstanding which way POMPEY fled, to the end to giue him no place or meane to returne and repaire himselfe; without losing any time, he pursued him with the lightest and swiftest of his Army. And coming to the Sea side, bringing to his obedience in his way all the Cities whereby he passed, and gathering together such Ships and Gallies as hee then could, together with those which CASSIVS had, who was at this time receiued to his grace and seruice, he therein shipped such troups as he was able, and passed into Asia the lesse, where being aduertised that POMPEY had been in Cyprus, he presumed that he tooke his way towards Egypt. For which cause he tooke the same course, taking with him two whole legions of old fouldiers onely; and arriuing in safety at Alexandria in Egypt (where we said that POMPEY had lately taken port) he vnderstood that POMPEY was arriued there: who presuming of the benefites and good entertainment which this King PTOLOMIES father had receiued in his house, he sent to request PTOLOMY to harbour and assist him. But as with men which are fallen from a high fortune, few men hold faith and friendship; and in their aduercities, the benefites and good turnes receiued are commonly forgotten: so this King sent him his promise to perform what he required: and coming vpon safe conduct, in a small boat towards the shore, hee was murdered before he came to land by the Kings commandement, by the hands of one called SEPTIMIUS, and another ACHILLA; thinking by meanes hereof to winne CAESAR'S friendship. This was done by the perswasion and counsell of POTOIUS an Eunuch, who was of great authority in the Court, and by whom the King was much ruled. He vnderstood also that CORNELIA, POMPEIUS wife, and his sonne SEXTVS POMPEIUS were fled from that port in the same ship, wherein they came. CAESAR being landed and receiued into the City, they presently brought him for a present, the great POMPEIUS head; which hee would not see: and his ring and scale of Armes being presented vnto him, he wept for pity, considering the end and successe of the great adventures and prosperities of POMPEY, who with such honour and fame had three times triumphed, and bin so many times Consul in Rome, and had gouerned the same, and had been the most eminent man there for so many yeers, and had in like sort obtained many victories and dignities.

When I V L I V S C A E S A R landed in Egypt, he found the countrey infested with ciuill wars, and great discord between yong King PTOLOMY and his sister, the fair CLEOPATRA, about the diuision and inheritance of that Kingdome: wherein I V L I V S C A E S A R (as a Roman Consul) took vpon him to intermeddle. For which cause (as CAESAR himselfe writeth) or because that their guilty conscience, for the treacherous murder of POMPEY, made them to fear, as PLVTARCH affirmes; the before-named POTOIUS which had been the practicer of this murder, and ACHILLA who had been the actor thereof (both which were in great authority in Court and with the King) imagining that CAESAR inclined to fauour CLEOPATRA'S faction, sent for the Armie which the King had neere the city, consisting of 20,000 good men, purposing to do by I V L I V S C A E S A R as they had done by POMPEY: and so within few daies there beganne between CAESAR and the small forces which he brought with him, both within the city and in the harbour, between the ships and gallies, the most cruell war and incounters that he euer had; which I cannot distinctly set down, for the many adventures that passed. But let this suffice, that IULIVS CÆSAR fought therein many times in his owne person, both within the city (whereof his enemies held the greatest part) and also in the harbour with his ships; and was sometimes in such perill and danger, as he was driven to leap out of the boat wherein hee was, into the water, and by swimming to flee into one of his galleies: and, as SVETONIVS writes, he carried his Commentaries in the one hand out of the water, lest they should be wet; and his Robe in his teeth, to the end it should not fall into his enemies hands. But at length his forces and aid being comm from Asia and other parts, he at the end of nine moneths (for, so long lasted these wars) remained victorious, as in all others hee had been; and the yong King PTOLOMEY was slain in Fight. In this warre CÆSAR did such exploits, and shewed such valour and wisdom, that for the same onely hee did well deserue the fame and renown of a most excellent Captain.

CÆSAR hauing taken the pride of the Egyptians, and put to death the murderers of POMPEY, and established CLEOPATRA for Queen and Gouernesse in that Kingdome, whom during his staie there he entertained for his friend, and she conceived and had a sonne by him, called CÆSARIO; all things being quietly settled, he departed from Egypt towards Asia, traueiling through Syria, now Seria, by reason that he was giuen to vnderstand, that while hee was busied in the warres of Egypt, King PHARNACES, some of the mighty King MITHRIDATES, thought it now a fit time (seeing the ciuill discord between the Romans) to recover that which his father had lost: and hauing ouerthrowne DOMITIUS, whom CÆSAR had sent to gouern those parts, and also hauing taken by force of Arms the provinces of Bithymia and Cappadocia, expelling thence King ARIOBARZANES, a friend and subiect to Rome, and beginning to doe the like in Armenia the lesse, which King DROTARYS had made subiect to the Romans: IULIVS CÆSAR coming with his Armie sooner than King PHARNACES imagined, although hee had expected him, and had intelligence of his approach; within fewe daies they came to a battell: in which (without any great resistance) the King was ouerthrowne and put to flight, with great slaughter of his people, from which hee escaped by flight. Great was the joy CÆSAR conceived of this victory, for the desire hee had to return to Rome, where he knew that many scandalls and insolencies were committed, by reason of his absence: he knew also, that POMPEY'S eldest son had seized on a great part of Spain, and had raised great forces of those which M. VARRO had there left, and of his fathers troops. Hee also vnderstood, that in Africa many principall Romans, which had escaped from the battell at Pharsalia, were gathered together, wherof M. CATO (called VTICENSIS, because that in Vtica hee flue himself) was the chief, and SCIPIO, POMPEY'S father-in-law; and that these went thither with a great part of the galleies and ships of POMPEY'S Nauie, and with the greatest power they were able to leuie; joyning with IVEA King of Auritanian, which hee had subdued all that countrey, and had a great Armie in readinesse against CÆSAR, hauing chosen SCIPIO for their Generall, because that CATO would not take that charge vpon him, and for that the name of SCIPIO was very fortunate in Africa. CÆSAR, hauing intelligence of all these things, within fewe daies, with great celerity and diligence, recovered all that which PHARNACES had vnderput: and, chasing him out of Pontus, he recovered all those countreies: and leauing CÆLIUS METIVS for Generall, with two legions to guard that province, pacifying the contentions and controuersies in the rest, rewarding the Kings & Tetrarchs which had continued firm in league and amity with Rome, without any longer abroad he departed from Asia, and in short space passing into Italie, came to Rome: within little more than a yeer after that he departed thence; a short time in truth, for the performance of so great matters and so long a journey.

Within fewe daies after his coming to Rome, he made himselfe to be chosen the third time Consul, and reforming (the best that he could in so short a time) all disorders in Rome, being grieved and not able to endure that his enemies should possesse Africa, with great expedition he prepared all things necessary, and from Rome tooke his way thitherward, commanding his forces to follow him. First he went into Stetia, and there shipped himselfe, and thence passed into Africa: and notwithstanding that neither his Nauie nor Armie arrived with him: trusting in the valour and goodnesse of his souldiers, and his owne good fortune, he tooke land with those small forces which he brought with him, neere vnto the cite of Aduentum in Africa; and from thence marched to another cite called Leptis, where hee was receiued: and after those conflicts which passed, his legions being come, and certaine troopes both on foote and horseback; he began the warre, which lasted foure moneths, viz. from the beginning of Iannarie till till the end of Aprill, beginning first against PETREIUS and LABIENVS: afterwards it was continued against SCIPIO and King IVEA, which stilled the contrary faction with 8000. men, the one halfe whereof were horsemen, whereof the province of Africa did then, and to this day doth abound; among all which were leuied against CÆSAR eight legions of foote-men and 20000. horse: In this warre were many encounters, skirmishes and batailles, which HYRTICUS in his Commentaries, PLVTARCH, LVCAN, LVCIVS FLORVS & others write of at large, in which CÆSAR was in great danger: but at the last with his force and good fortune, hee overcame them all in a great battaile; wherein, of the enemies, were slaine 10000. men, and CÆSAR remained master of the field, and in fewe daies after of all the Countrey. SCIPIO and all the principall Captaines which were his aduersaries, died sundrie deaths within fewe daies; and king IVEA by flight escaping from the battaile, and finding no place of refuge, in despair, hee and AFRANIVS determined to die fighting, the one against the other, till they were both slaine, in which combat King IVEA being of greater strength then AFRANIVS, slew him; and afterwards commanded a flane of his own, to kill himselfe, and so hee died desperately.

The good MARCVS CATO who was in the cite of Vtica, knowing that CÆSAR marched thitherwards, and although hee knew that he would not put him to death, but had rather a desire to pardon him, and to doe him honor; yet to the end that hee would receiue neither life nor honor from his enimie, he flue himselfe: in whose death passed many notable accidents recorded by many authors both christian and heathen. CICERO did write in commendation of the death of CATO, against the which CÆSAR did write another discourse: both which are lost. And FLORVS writes his death after this manner: Hearing of the decease of his partners, hee dallyed not at all, but (as it became a wife man) did ioyfully hasten his owne death: for after hee had embraced his sonne and friends and bidden them good night; he rested a while vpon his bed, hauing perused PLATO'S booke of the immortallitie of the Soule; then about the first relieving of the watch, he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe into the bodie: After which the Physicians sought to wrong this resolute man, by applying some salues, the which hee endured vntill they were out of the roomes; but then hee pulled them away: and, the blood following abundantly, hee left his dying hand in the very wound. SCIPIO, who had been Generall in this warre, escaped from the battaile by flight, and shipping himselfe in certaine galleyes, wherein hee fled, was met withall by CÆSAR'S nauie, who, to the end hee would not be taken, giuing himselfe some wounds, cast himselfe into the sea, and so was drowned. CÆSAR, hauing obtained so great and absolute victory, spending some fewe daies in ordering the provinces of Africa, reducing the kingdome of king IVEA into a province, hee came to the cite of Vtica, where hee embarked himselfe the third of Iune, and came to the Ile of Sardinia, wherein hee stayed some fewe daies, and arrived at Rome the sixe and twentieth day of Iuly. At this coming (as SVETONIVS, APPIANVS, and PLVTARCH record) there were granted vnto him foure triumphs. The first triumph was for his conquest and victories in France, where were the portraictures of the riuers of Redanus and the Rhine, wrought in gold: and in the second triumph of Egypt, and of King PTOLOMEY, were set the riuers of Nilus and the Pharus of Alexandria burning. The third triumph was of the province of Pontus and of King PHARNACES, wherein for the speede wherewith hee prosecuted the victorie, was placed a bricfe writing which signified as much; which was, veni, vidi, vici, which is to say, I came, I saw, I overcame. The fourth triumph was of the province of Africa, wherein was placed King IVEA his sonne, as a captiue: and in this triumph (as SVETONIVS writeth) were giuen iewels and armes to OCTAVIUS, CÆSAR'S Nephew, who afterwards was Emperor, as we will declare, notwithstanding that he was not present in those warres by reason of his yong age: for he was not then fully sixteen yeares old. As for the battaile which CÆSAR wanne against POMPEY, he would not triumph for it, because it was against Citizens of Rome.

These triumphs being ended, giuing great rewards to his souldiers, and entertayning the Roman people, with feasts, gifts and other great bountie, hee caused himselfe to be chosen the fourth time Consul, and to the end that there should be no place in the world wherein hee would not be obeyed, hee resolved to goe into Spaine, where hee vnderstood that GENVS POMPEIUS (POMPEIUS sonne) with the remainder of the armie which had escaped out of Africa, was gone to ioyne with his brother SEXTVS POMPEIUS, who already was there, as I have said, and was in possession of a great part of Spaine, with the cities of Senil and Cordoua, and many others in that coast, and many Spaniards were come to their ayde. CÆSAR, departing, carried with him his most experienced and chosen souldiers, and made to good speede, as within fewe

Hyrticus lib. 2.
Appian lib. 5.
Lucan lib. 5.
Lucius Florus lib. 4.
Tus Livius lib. 114.
Plutarch in his lives.

Cato Vticensis
flew himselfe.
S. Aug. in his booke de ciuit.
dei. 1.
Scipio flew and drowned himselfe.
Lactantius Christianus.
Aulus Gellius
in his twelfth booke.

Cicero in the 3.
epist. ad Brutum.
Valerius Max.
xi. 1. 1.
Cæsar in his triumph.

Veni, vidi, vici.

Cæsar would not triumph for his victory against Pompey.

dayes he arriued in Spaine, and in this iourney (as SVETONIVS and VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS recorde) his Nephew OCTAVIVS followed him.

CÆSAR, being entred Spaine, came into the province of Betica, which is Andalusia, where SEXTVS POMPEIVS and his brother GNEIVS POMPEIVS were with such legions and fouldiers as they had gathered together, and so there began betwene them a cruell and bloudie warre. The end whereof was, that neere to the citie of Munda, CÆSAR and GNEIVS POMPEIVS (for SEXTVS POMPEIVS was in Cordoua) ioyned battaile; which was one of the most obstinate and cruell, that euer was in the world. For CÆSAR being the most excellent Capitaine, and the fouldiers which he brought with him, the most valiant and accustomed to overcome; the resolution and courage of POMPEY and his men was such, and they fought in such manner, as *CÆSAR*s esquadrons began to giue ground and were ready to forsake the field, and at the very point to haue been wholly ouerthrowne. And the matter came to this issue, that (as SVETONIVS and EVTRUPIVS do write) CÆSAR was about to haue killed himselfe, because he would not see himselfe overcome; and that he took a target from one of his fouldiers and rushed in among his enemies, slaying with a loud voice (as PLVTARCH reporteth) If you be not affamed, leaue me and deliuer me into the hands of these boyes: for this shall be the last day of my life and of your honour. With which words, and his example, his fouldiers took heart in such manner, that, recouering the ground which they had lost, the battell became equal, which (as AFRIANVS affirmeth) lasted the most part of one whole day, without any signe of victory; sometimes seeming to incline to one partie, and sometimes to the other, vntill that at length CÆSAR and his men did so great exploits, as the evening being come his enemies became faint, and began to flee, and the victory was apparently *CÆSAR*s. There died of his enemies about 30000 men in this fight; and of *CÆSAR*s part, were slaine a thousand men of account, besides many other of lesser note. CÆSAR esteemed this victorie so much, and so gloried in the danger wherein he had been, that after the victorie he vfed to say, that only that day he fought for his life, and in all other battailes euer for honour and victorie. He then remayning master of the field, his aduersarie POMPEY, who in nothing had failed of the office of a valiant and good capitaine (after that he saw no other hope) escaped by flight, and wandering through many places was afterwards taken and slaine by *CÆSAR*s friends, whose head was brought vnto him; the like hapned vnto LABIVS. His second brother SEXTVS POMPEIVS fled from Cordoua, & in the end forsook Spain: hereafter more mention shall be made of him. CÆSAR recouered the cities of Seuill and Cordoua, & all the rest; and disposing of all things in Spain at his pleasure, returned to Rome, & entered in triumph for the warres in Spain, which was his fifth and last triumph: in this place LVC. FLORVS and PATERCVLVS speak of all his triumphs.

CÆSAR came to be the most mightie, the most redoubted, and most highly esteemed man that euer had been in the world, hauing subdued and conquered the greatest part thereof, with an Armie and by force, in as little time, as it might seeme that another man might be able to traual those countries by reasonable iourneys. All which being in subiection vnto him, he made himselfe perpetuall Dictator of Rome; and so without contradiction he finished the making of himselfe foueraine Lord and Monarch of the Romane Empire, within little lesse then five yeeres after that he began the same. And this was the originall and beginning of the Romane Emperours: for I V L I V S CÆSAR would not be called King (for the name of King was odious to the Romans about all things, euer since the Kings were chased from Rome) but contented himselfe to be called perpetuall Dictator and also Emperour; although not with a name of such power and dignitie as his successors haue done since, but as by a name well signified he had been a conqueror in the warres, which in this sense was giuen to the Romane Captaines, when they had obtained any notable victorie; but after I V L I V S CÆSAR, all his successors took that name, glorying to be called Emperours, which was held for the highest title and dignitie in the world.

I V L I V S CÆSAR hauing attained to that absolute power which he so much desired, he shewed in all things great clemency and magnanimitie, honouring and rewarding his friends, and easily forgiving, and very cheerefully pardoning all those which had been his aduersaries; and so he not only pardoned BRVTVS and CASSIVS, CICERO, MARCIVS, and many others: but also some of them he admitted to his companie and priuate familiaritie, and to offices and dignities. It is certaine that among all the many vertues wherewith CÆSAR was endued, his clemency and liberalitie were most glorious. But this sufficed not to quench the desire of their lost libertie, neither to assuage the hatred and malice conceiued against him by his aduersaries, as in time did appeare.

And

And notwithstanding that many were grieved: yet some for the loue which they bare him; others for feare and dissimulation; the Senate and people of Rome, and finally all, gaue him names, preheminencies and titles of honour, such as neuer had been giuen to any other, neither ought he to haue accepted the same, as PLVTARCH, AFRIAN and others doe report: But *CÆSAR*s minde and ambition was such, and his thoughts so eleuated and so high, as he held nothing so great, but he was worthe thereof and had deserved the same: and so he not only accepted that which they offered him; but many more were offered, because they knew that he desired the same. Whereupon they gaue him the name of Emperour, Father, restorer and preseruer of his country: He was created perpetuall Dictator, and Consul for ten yeeres, and perpetuall Censor of their customes. His statue and image was erected among the Kings of Rome, and a chayre and throne of Iuorie in the Temples and Senate, and a high pulpit and throne in the Theatre, and in the place where the Senators did vse to sit, his pictures and statues were set vp in all the Temples and publike places. I passe ouer some titles which they gaue him, and he accepted, which only, to those whom they held for God, ought to haue been attributed. The moneth which they called Quintill, they called I V L I V S after his name, as March of their god MARS, and Iune after the goddesse I V N O: they did also consecrate and build Temples vnto him, as vnto I V P I T E R, and their other gods: and gaue him certaine honours which they held particularly for their gods, which they call Thensas: and so they did many other things to his honour, which exceeded all measure.

I V L I V S CÆSAR enioying such honour and power, so as he had no equal or second in the world with whom he might contend; it seemeth that he would contend with himselfe, and attempt something wherein he might excell himselfe: for he was not contented with all the victories which he had obtained, neither (as PLINIVS, SOLINVS and other report) to haue fought in fiftie seuerall battailes (in all which he overcame) sauing in that one at Dyrnachium against POMPEY; where, as we haue already said, he was not wholly ouerthrowne, neither (according to the same authors) to haue slaine in the warres and battailes which hee fought, a million, ninetie and odde thousand men; and yet they say that they reckon not those which died in the ciuill warres: but that as he was of a most haughtie minde, he sought to doe greater matters, if greater might be. For, first he resolu'd to passe into the East, there to conquer and subdue the fiercenation of the Parthians, and to reuenge the death of MARCVS CRASSVS, and to passe through Hircania and other countries, vntill he should come to the Caspian sea, and so through all the prouinces of Sybilias Asia; and passing the riuer Tanais, to returne through Scythia in Europe, and in this retreat to come into Germany, and other prouinces bordering thereupon, conquering and subduing them all to the Romane Empire; for the which conquest hee presently caused to be leui'd in sundrie places, ten thousand horsemen, and sixteene legions of chosen footmen, and appointing the time wherein he thought to depart, he commanded them to march towards their Rendezous. And besides all this, he sought not only to subdue all the nations of the world, but to correct and reforme nature it selfe: for he purposed to haue made an Iland of Peloponnesus, which now is called Morea, by cutting the neck of the land which is betwene the Egean and the Ionian Seas.

Of the Riuer Tiber and the Riuer Anien (as PLVTARCH saith) he purposed to haue altered the courses, and to haue opened new channels, through which they should run into the Sea, making them to leaue their naturall course, and capable to bear great ships. He commanded, and already began to dig down and make plain many hills and high mountains in Italie, and to dry vp and dreine some of the great lakes and marishes which are therein: and, in this manner, hee thought to haue done other things more than a man, which seemed to bee possible to none but to God alone. He corrected (as many Authors affirm) the computation of the year, conforming it with the course of the Sun, and brought it to that rule which is yet held: for, before that time it was much out of order. He did the like in the course of the Moon, and the conjunctions and oppositions of her and the Sun: and this was attributed to him for tyrannie, by those which did hate him. For, one day, in a discourse in the presence of CICERO, it was said, that the next day there should be an Eclipse of the Sun; yea, quoth he, it is so: for, CÆSAR hath so commanded. Many other things CÆSAR began, which were very great, in reforming the lawes, customes and offices, which for breuitie I omit: among which, the redifying of the ruined city of Carthage by SEPTIO (as all the world knoweth) was one, and he sent thither Colonies and Roman citizens to inhabite: the like hee did by Corinthe. But all these works and these so high conceits and resolutions were abridged by death, which within fewe daies ensued: and this man

C 2